To the most High and Mighty Monarch, ELIZABETH, (my dread Soveraign) by the grace of God, Queen of England
France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c.

ALL my labour whatsoever, in translating another mans work, I present here unto your Highness, and consecrate to the happy and immortall memory of your most sacred Majesty. [illegible] confess) in regard of mine own imperfections, venturous and overbold; as the first enterprise, right hard and exposed to perill. Yet, most Worthy and Powerfull Empress; Who is there so unsufficient, that by the favourable aspect of your countenance, may not be graced and enabled? What so difficult and dangerous, which under the fortunate auspices of your Majesty, cannot be effected with ease and pass in safety?

Accept then, most gracious Lady, the first fruits of a few years study, for the benefit enjoyed of life and liberty. An offering, as well in that respect, as of my self the meanest of many thousands, under all proportion; but considering either the argument or the first Author, not much unfitting. He, in penning the History of the greatest State in his time, for exquisite eloquence had not his equall; no more than your Highness in glorious government at this day any second: Such are the incomparable perfections resplendent in your Royall person; the wonder of the world.

Vouchsafe also, of your accustomed clemency shewed to aliens, of your fervent zeal to learning and good letters, wherein (among other rare vertues and singular gifts seated in your Heroick mind) no Prince cometh near unto your Excellency, to reach forth your gracious hand to T. Livius: who having arrived long since and conversed as a meer stranger in this your famous Island, and now for love thereof learned in some sort the language, humbly craveth your Majesties favour to be ranged with other free denizens of that kind: so long to live under your Princely protection, as he shall duly keep his own alleageance, and acquaint your liege subjects with religious devotion after his manner, with wisdom, pollicy, vertue, valour, loyalty, and not otherwise.

And the Almighty guard your Majesty alwaies with his holy Angels, prolong your life among us in perfect health, adorn your noble heart with divine graces, maintain your Regall estate in all honour: bless the rest of your daies (and infinite may they be) with sweet repose and firm peace, to the joy of your true-hearted and loving people; and finally, accomplish all your desires, for present prosperity and future felicity.

Your sacred Majesties most humble and obedient subject,

TO THE READER.

TRue is that Axiome received from Philoſophy, τὸ τῆς φθορᾶς γένεσιν τοῦ ἑτέρου εἶναι. i. The corruption of one thing is the generation of another. Thus out of the aſhes and ruines of Troy ſprung the City of Rome: and by the woful fall of that one ſtate, aroſe not only the moſt glorious empire of the Romans, but alſo the beſt writer of their hiſtory, Titus Livius. For wheras after the fatal deſtruction of Troy, two principal men of name remained alive, Æneas and Antenor: the one with his fleet arriving in that coaſt of Italy where Tybre runneth, built Lavinium, and became the firſt father of the Romans, according to Virgil in the firſt Æneid:

——— genus unde Latinum, Albanique patres, atq; mœnia Romæ:

——— from whence are Latines come,
The noble Albanes eke, and walls of ſtately Rome.

Antenor entered the Venice gulf, & founded the City of Padua, the native place of Livy their hiſtoriographer; as the ſame Poet writeth a little after:

Hìc tamen ille urbem Patavì ſedéſque locavit
Teucrorum, &c. ———

Yet here the City Padua built he: therein to plant His Trojanes, left when Troy was loſt, who reſting ſeat did want.

And I wot not well, whither they were more beholden to that fortune of theirs, (whereof ſo much they boaſted) for Æneas the author of their beginning and admirable greatnes: than for this writer Livy, who commended their deeds to everlaſting fame. For from their very firſt riſing [even with Æneas] unto their ſenſible declining and decay, were not 1200 years compleat: but ſince Livy enchronicled their acts, ſixteen hundred are come and gone: yet continue they as freſh this day as at the firſt, and ſpred ſtil far and neer into all parts of the world. So much more durable and permanent are the memorials recorded by learned Hiſtorians, than either any Monarchy be it never ſo great, or all thoſe wonderful Pyramides and Obeliskes, reared by moſt magnificent Kings, and mighty Emperors, to immortalize their name and memory. This T. Livius then, was born at Padua, in the year 694 after the foundation of Rome, when L. Furius and Q. Cæcilius Metellus Celer were Conſuls. He flouriſhed riſhed all the time of Auguſtus Cæſar, and died in the fourth year of Tiberius. By which account, he lived full LXXVI. years: as appeareth by an ancient Epitaph upon his tomb at Padua, (where it is thought he died) with the pourtraict of his viſage: whereof the one is repreſented here, and the other immediatly before the beginning of the Hiſtory.

TITVS LIVIVS PATAVINVS,

Cujus invicto calamo, invicta Romanorum facta ſcripta ſunt.

TITE LIVY OF PADVA.

Who wrote long ſince with peer-leſs pen,
The acts of Romans, match-leſs men,

Other evidences there be concerning the ſame, which needleſs it were to call to witneſs: for no Epitaph nor inſcription either enchaſed in ſtone or cut in braſs, is there left, better than the monuments of his own writings (if they had come entire to our hands) and the teſtimony of good and approved authors. For during the time of Auguſtus, he wrote the worthy deeds of the Romans, and continued the narration thereof, from the very foundation of the City of Rome unto the one and twentieth year of his Empire. A ſtory of 750 years, and a peece of work for the artificiall frame and elegant ſetting out, comparable to the beſt in that kind. My purpoſe is not here, to enter into a large field and Rhetorical diſcourſe of his praiſes in regard of any gifts of fortune wherewith he was plentifully enriched: namely, the place of his nativity, a City more ancient by 400 years than Rome; flouriſhing in martial puiſſance, able to ſet out and maintain 100000 fighting men for the wars; in ſtately port at home, having a nobility of 400 in number; in gorgeous and coſtly buildings; in traffique and frequent affluence of Marchants thither; as alſo, that Venice was a Colony deducted and drawn from thence; and, which is not the leaſt, how at this day the famous Vniverſity there, affordeth excellent Profeſſors in all kind of learning: nor his happineſs and felicity to live and die with the glory and beauty of Rome, and not to behold with his eyes thoſe daies of her declining ſtate & deformity, which in great wiſdome he foreſaw in his ſpirit, and denounced accordingly: ne yet the ſpecial favour wherein he ſtood with his Prince Auguſtus, and Livia the Empreſs: much leſs then mean I to ſet forth the ſingular qualities and perfections of his mind, and namely his rare and paſſing eloquence; which my pen is more able now to deſcribe and amplify to the worthineſs therof, than it was to imitate and expreſs the ſame in tranſlating of his ſtory. Moreover, if I ſhould ſet into his commendation, beſides that I muſt needs come far ſhort of his merit, the thing it ſelf would but renew the juſt grief, that all learned men have taken for the piteous maime and defect of that notable peece of work & uniform compoſition which he left unto poſterity. For having digeſted the whole hiſtory into an hundred and two and forty books, as Petrarch was of opinion, and as Sigonius therein well collecteth: like as alſo it is evident by the Breviaries of L. Florus the Epitomiſt, wherof we have 140, with an evident flaw and default of twain, to wit, the 136 and 137: ſee the partial injury of the time, the crooked and maligne deſtiny of the man! Books of far leſs moment and importance, yea, & thoſe of greater antiquity, have been ſpared & remain ſafe: but of that work of his, one fourth part hath not eſcaped the envy of fortune: and that which now is extant, hath been delivered unto us either by fragments of old copies unperfect, or by the over-curious medling of ſome buſy Ariſtarches of late daies depraved, who with their correcting have corrupted; and in ſtead of reforming words, have deformed the natural ſenſe and primitive conſtruction. Where, by the way, I muſt adverti ſe the Reader of that which Pettus Crinitus hath obſerved, even againſt the common opinion proved by thoſe who otherwiſe

are well learned, namely that our Author diſpenſed not this hiſtory into Decades: that is to ſay, ſuted and ſorted them not into ſeveral Tomes and Sections of ten books a peece. For Priſcian and other old Grammarians, when they cite any teſtimony out of Livy, quote the book, and make no mention at all of any Decade; and with him the above-named Petrarch, Florus, and Politian do agree. Now in theſe 35 books, ſo few as they be, preſerved as another Palladium out of a generall skare-fire, we may conceive the rare and wonderfull eloquence of our writer in the whole; for the farther he proceedeth into a world, as it were, of matter, the more copious ſtill he floweth; and with ſuch variety, as that he never iterateth one thing twice; but at every change of new affairs, returneth alwaies freſh and gay, furniſhed with new deviſes, inventions, and phraſes; much like a ſecond Antæus, gathering greater ſtrength and more forces ſtill at every turn; or after the manner of a little hill, which iſſuing from a ſmall ſource, is maintained with freſh ſprings and new riverets; and haſting toward the vaſt Ocean, carrieth a deeper channell and broader ſtream. For the form of his ſtile, I refer the readers to the ſound and ſtaid judgment rather of Quintilian, who compareth him with Herodotus, Thucydides, and the beſt Greeks; than to the fantaſticall conceits of ſome Criticks of our time, who ſeeking nodum in ſcirpo, have dreamed of I wot not what Patavinity in him. What ſhould I ſpeak of that Pathetical ſpirit of his in moving affections? But, that which moſt of all commendeth an hiſtory, which being lux veritatis, ought eſpecially to deliver with ſincerity the whole truth and nothing but the truth, without reſpect of face or perſon; to keep only to the ſubſtance and train of the ſubject argument; the due and orderly regard of the important circumſtances thereto belonging, without incerting extravagant and impertinent by-matters, much leſs than fabulous tales; therein he hath the prick and price above all others. For, neither forbeareth he to reprove (as occaſion is offered) the Romans, in whoſe favour he might be thought to have written; nor doubteth to praiſe the good parts and the valiant exploits of their mortall enemies. The Gauls he may ſeem to gall more bitterly upon a ſiniſter affection, glancing at them, as he doth, in many places for their greedy deſire of gold and idle ſloath, as not able to endure any long travell, and heat leaſt of all; yet ſo, as the French, now living, ſeem not much offended therewith; for above other Nations they have given him moſt friendly entertainment, and twice enfranchiſed him among them. I am not unwilling to touch by the way this principall point and vertue of an Hiſtoriographer, I mean the delivery of a ſimple truth in his narrations; for that I have obſerved in him throughout, that he hath been moſt modeſt in reporting from others by hearſay any thing that ſoundeth to an untruth; ſo little deſerveth he to be noted with the infamous brand of lier. The wary circumſpection of his in that behalf which I dare be bold to recommend unto the Reader, I propoſed unto my ſelf in making him Engliſh; endeavouring by conference eſpecially of the ſelect copies in Latine, yet not rejecting other tranſlations (ſuch as I had ſome little skill in) to come as near as poſsibly I could, to the true meaning of the Author; making this account, that if I could approve my diligence that way to men of reaſon and underſtanding, all other my wants and defects might ſooner be paſſed by and pardoned. A deſire I had to perform, in ſome ſort, that which is profitable to the moſt, namely, an engliſh Hiſtory of that C.W. which of all others (if I have any judgment) affoordeth moſt plenteous examples of devout zeal in their kind, of wiſdome, pollicy, juſtice, valour, and all vertues whatſoever. According to this purpoſe and intent of mine I framed my pen, not to any affected phraſe, but a mean and popular ſtile. Wherein, if I have called again into uſe ſome old words, let it be attributed to the love of my country language: if the ſentence be not ſo conciſe, couched and knit together, as the originall, loath I was to be obſcure and dark; have I not engliſhed every word aptly? Each Nation hath ſeverall manners, yea, and terms appropriate by themſelves; have I varied in ſome places from the French or Italian? Cenſured I look to be, and haply reproved; but like as Alcibiades ſaid to one, πάταξον μὲν ἀλλ' ἄκουσον, i.e. Strike hardly (Euribiades) ſo you hear me ſpeak; even ſo I ſay, Find fault and ſpare not; but withall, read the originall better before ye give ſentence. And howſoever I have faulted otherwiſe by overſight, ſet againſt it my affection and deſire to do ſome good whiles I live to my ſweet native country; add thereto the long travell that I have taken to teſtifie the ſame; and if that will not bring down the ballance, let the profit and delight both, which you ſhall find in the argument and diſcourſe of the hiſtory, counterpoiſe and overweigh my wants, more or leſs. And thus I recommend unto my countrimen Livy in engliſh habit; Livy (I ſay) who whether he were more honored whiles he lived, than beloved at this day of forrain nations, I cannot eaſily determine. For like as then (by the teſtimony of S. Hierom, and Pliny in his Epiſtles) there repaired many great and noble perſonages from the fartheſt parts of Spain and France, only to ſee his face, for the admiration they conceived of him by the fame of his incomparable eloquence; even ſo of late time, his ſpirit (which yet liveth in his writings) hath made a voyage by Florence into the ſame France and Spain; and hath paſſed as far as into Arabia one way, and Almain another. In which diſſite and remote parts he hath found ſuch kind entertainment, not only in Courts of Emperors and Kings, in palaces of Princes and great Potentates; but alſo with the people in generall; that they ſeem to ſtrive no leſs (who may endow him with moſt ample franchiſes and free burgeoſie) than thoſe ſeven cities in old time who every one challenged to themſelves the birth of the Poet Homer. Since then, he hath thus long been deſirous to croſs the ſeas into this noble Iſland, not as a traveller to ſojourn for a time in the Court only or the Vniverſities, but to remain here ſtill both in City and country, and thereto hath learned our language indifferently; let it now appear that this nation of ours (like to reap as great fruit and benefit by his acquaintance as any other) is ready to receive and embrace him as friendly as the reſt.

The Preface of Titus Livius to his whole Work.

WHether in writing the acts and affairs of the people of Rome, from the first Foundation of the City, I shall perform a work of importance and worth my travail, neither wot I well, nor if I wist, dare I avouch: seeing it is a thing both old and usuall, that new Writers alwaies perswade themselves, either in matter to deliver more truth and certainty, or in manner of curious penning thereof, to outgo the rudenesse of elder time. How- K soever it fall out, this yet will do me good, that even I also, to the utmost of my power, have endeavoured to eternize the worthy deeds of that people which is the soveraign of the whole world. And if, among so many Writers, my fame chance to be obscure, yet may I comfort my selfe in this, That they who shall darken and shadow the same, are men so highly reputed and renowned. Besides, the thing it self is of infinite toile and labour, as counting and comprizing from above 700 years past, and which arising from small beginning hath proceeded and grown so great, as now the bignesse thereof is combrous to it self: and I doubt not, but the Readers for the most part will take but small delight and pleasure, either in those far-fetched Originals, or in the times next ensuing, for haste they make to these novelties of later daies, wherein the puissance of that so mighty people hath wrought long since their own downfall and overthrow. But I contrariwise will seek even this for L guerdon of my pains, namely, to turn away from beholding these calamities, which this our Age for many years hath seen, so long at least: whilest I call to remembrance, and wholly employ my spirits in considering those ancient monuments of old time, exempt from care and trouble, which were able, if not to withdraw my mind as I write from the truth, yet to make it pensive and heavy. As for such things as are reported, either before, or at the Foundation of the City, more beautified and set out with Poets Fables, than grounded upon pure and faithfull Records, I mean neither to aver nor disprove. This leave and priviledge hath antiquity, by interlacing the acts of gods and men together, to make the first rising of Cities more sacred and venerable. And if it may be lawfull for any people under heaven to consecrate and ascribe unto the gods their Originall, surely, such is the renowned martiall prowesse of the Romans, that all nations of the world may as well abide them to M report Mars above the rest, to be the prime father both of themselves and of their first founder, as they can be content to live in subjection under them. But these and such like matters, howsoever they shall hereafter be censured or esteemed, I will not greatly weigh and regard. This would I have every man rather to think upon in good earnest, and consider with me what their life, and what their carriage was, by what men and means, both in war and peace, their dominion was atchieved and enlarged. Afterward as their discipline began by little and little to shrink, let him mark how at the very first their behaviour and manners sunk withall: and how still they fell more and more to decay and ruin yea, and began soon after to tumble down right even untill these our daies, wherein we can neither endure our own sores, nor salves for the cure. For this is it that is so good and profitable in an history, when a man may see and behold, as in a conspicuous monument and lightsom memoriall N the lively examples of all sorts, set up in open view for his instruction, whereout he may chuse for himself and his Country what to follow, as also learn how to eschew a foul enterprise, and avoid a shamefull end. But unlesse I be deceived with the affectionate love of mine own commenced work, never was there Common-weal, either more mighty, more holy, and devout, better stored of good presidents, or into which covetousnesse and excesse more lately crept, or wherein poverty and frugality were so greatly or so long time honoured, insomuch as the more they wanted, the lesse they desired. Now of late daies wealth hath brought in avarice, abundant pleasures have kindled a desire by riot, lust, and loose life, to destroy and bring all to naught. But these complaints, which will be nothing pleasant, no not when perhaps they shall be needfull, banish we must (howsoever we do) at our first entrance of so weighty a matter: when as we rather should begin (if as the Poets use, it O were our manner also) with good presages and lucky forespeakings, with vows and prayers to gods and goddesses, to vouchsafe their furtherance and happy successe to the enterprise of so great a Work.

TITUS LIVIUS.

A FIrst of all, this is generally held for certain, That the Greeks, after the winning of Troy, dealt cruelly with all the Trojans, save only Æneas and Antenor: to whom, as well in regard of the bond of mutuall entertainment, as also for that they ever perswaded peace and the rendring again of Helen, they wholly forbare to shew any rigour at all, as by martiall right of war they might have done. And how Antenor afterwards, accompanied with a number of Henetians, who driven by civill discord out of Paphlagonia, and having lost at Troy their King Pylemenes, were to seek both a resting place, and a Captain to conduct them, arrived through many adventures and accidents of fortune, in the inmost gulf of B the Adriatick sea: and after they had expelled the Euganians that inhabited between the sea and the Alps, those Henetians together with the Trojans, kept those parts and there remained. The place where first they landed, called Troy, whereof the Territory and Seigniory thereabout was also named Troy, and the whole people in generall called Henetians. Moreover, how Æneas upon like misfortune, having fled his countrey, yet aspiring by the fatall direction of the destinies to greater affairs, came first into Macedony: and after into Sicily, seeking an abiding place: and sailing with a fleet from Sicily arrived at length, and landed in the countrey of Laurentum: which place likewise was termed Troy. Where the Trojans being set a shore, having after their long wandring nothing in a manner left them but ships and armour, as they forraged and drave booties out of the Countrey, King Latinus with the Aborigines, who at that time inhabited those parts, ran forth in warlike manC ner out of town and countrey, to withstand the violent invasion of these strangers. But what befell thereupon, is two manner of waies reported. Some say, that Latinus being in a battell vanquished, first made peace with Æneas, and after that allied himself to him by marriage. Others affirm, that as both armies stood ranged in battell array, before the trumpets sounded the battell, Latinus came forth into the Vanguard, and called out the Generall of the strangers to parle: demanding who they were, from whence they came, by what chance they departed from their own home, and to what end they entred the Laurentine borders? After that he heard the company were Trojans, the Captain Æneas, son of Venus and Anchises, and that upon the burning of their City, they having forgone their countrey, sought some place to abide and build them a City in: wondred much, not only at the nobleness of the people and their leader, but also at their couragious hearts, resolved either for war D or peace: whereupon, by giving his right hand he plight his troth, and faithfully promised them friendship and amity. So the two Generals made a League, and each host saluted other. And Æneas was by Latinus entertained and lodged in the Court. Where Latinus solemnly in presence of his familiar household gods, by giving his daughter in marriage to Æneas, joyned private alliance to the former publike confederacy. Which thing truly put the Trojans in good hope and full assurance to end one day their wandring and flitting to and fro, and to settle themselves in one certain place of abode. Hereupon, a Town they built, which Æneas of his wives name called Lavinium. Within a while, by this new marriage, he had issue a son: whom the parents named Ascanius. But after all this, were both Trojans and Aborigines warred upon. For Turnus King of the Rutilians, unto whom Lavinia, before Æneas his coming, had been espoused, taking it to heart that a stranger was E preferred before him, made war both upon Æneas and Latinus: but neither Army departed from the battell with joy and well appaid. For the Rutilians were vanquished: the Aborigines and Trojans wan indeed the field, but lost their Captain Latinus. Then Turnus and the Rutilians mistrusting their own strength, fled for succour to the puissant and mighty Tuscans, and to their King Mezentius, who keeping his Royall Court at Cere, a town in those daies of great wealth, not well pleased even from the first beginning, with the foundation of a new City, and supposing the Trojans power was already much more encreased than might well stand with the safety of the borderers, joyned full willingly his forces with the Rutilians. Æneas to win the hearts of the Aborigines against so dreadfull and dangerous war, to the end they all should not only live under one government, but also be all of one name, called both Nations Latines. And from that time forth were the Aborigines noF thing inferiour to the Trojans in love and loyalty towards their Prince Æneas. Æneas also trusting confidently in the valiant and faithfull hearts of these two States, growing up daily more and more in mutuall amity, albeit Hetruria was so mighty, that the name thereof was renowned not only throughout the inland parts, but the sea coasts also, even from one end of Italy to the other, from the Alpes to the narrow seas of Sicily: yet whereas he might well have resisted the force of his enemies and maintained a defensive war within his wals, he brought his Army forth into the open field. This was the second battell that the Latines fought, and the last deed that ever Æneas, whilest he was man, atchieved. And howsoever by right he ought to be named, he lieth interred upon the river Numicius, and Jupiter Indiges men him call. Now was not Ascanius, Æneas his son, ripe as yet for age to sway the Scepter. Howbeit the Royall Crown remained whole and safe for him, untill he came to fourteen years of age. So long continued the state of the Latines, and the Kingdom by grandsire and father descended, unto the childs behoof, under the government only of a woman, as Protectresse: of so vertuous disposition and princely carriage was Dame Lavinia. Doubtfull much I stand (for who can certainly avouch a thing so long ago?) whether this were that Ascanius, or one elder than he, who had to his mother Creusa, whilest Ilium flourished, and who fled with his father from thence, and from whom being named also Julus, the house and family of the Julii do fetch their name and pedigree. That same Ascanius, whersoever, or of whomsoever he was born, (but Æneas his son of a truth he was) when Lavinium grew exceeding populous, lest that City now flourishing and wealthy (as the world went then) unto his mother or stepmother, I wot not whether. He himself built another out of the ground under the mountain Alba, which of the situation thereof, stretching out in length on the side of the hill, was named Long Alba. Between the building of Lavinium and Long Alba, which became an under-town or Colony drawn out of the other, and peopled from thence, were almost thirty years. But so mighty grew they, especially after the discomfiture of the Tuscans, that neither upon the death of Æneas, nor during the time of a womans government, nor all the while that the young Prince learned to be a King, durst either Mezentius, or the Tuscans, or any other of the borderers once stir or rise in arms. But peace was concluded upon these termes, That the river Albula, which now they call Tybris, should divide the Tuscans from the Latines, and limit to either of them their own bounds. After this raigned Sylvius, the son of Ascanius, born by chance within the forrests: who begat Æneas Sylvius, and he had issue Latinus Sylvius, by whom were certain Colonies or petty Townships erected, and the inhabitants named Prisci Latini. And from thenceforth all the Kings of Alba continued the surname of Sylvius. This Latinus begat Alba, of Alba came Atys, Atys begat Capis, and of Capis descended Capetus; whose son Tiberinus in ferrying over the river Albula was drowned, and by his name renowned that river unto all posterity. Next unto him raigned Agrippa his son, and after him succeeded Romulus Sylvius in his fathers Kingdom, who being strucken dead with a thunderbolt, left the Crown to Aventinus. This Aventinus was buried in that hill, which now is part of the City of Rome, and beareth his name. Then raigned Procas, who had two sons, Numitor and Amulius. And unto Numitor, because he was the elder, he bequeathed by his last will and testament the ancient Kingdom of the Sylvians line. Howbeit, might prevailed more than either the will of the father, or the reverend regard of elder brother. For Amulius having driven out Numitor, raigneth himselfe: and not herewith content, heapeth one mischief upon another. For first he murdered the issue male of his brother: then by making Rhea Sylvia his brothers daughter a Vestall Nun, and that under colour of honour and dignity, by perpetuall vowed virginity, he bereft her of all hope of child-bearing. But it was a fatall thing, and (as I think) which God would have, that so great a City should be built for to yeeld the ground and beginning of that Empire, which next under the gods is most mighty. For behold, the Vestall Virgin was by force deflowred, and after delivered of two twins: and were it that she thought so in very deed, or because the name and credit of a god might carry away and cloake the fault more cleanly, she fathered her bastard children upon Mars. But neither god nor man was able to save her self or her children from the Kings cruelty. For the Votary was committed to close prison, and there kept bound in irons: as for the babes he commanded they should be cast into the stream of the river. But (as God would) by good hap the Tyber overflowed the banks, and the standing waters on either side was nothing rough, yet so, as there was no coming to the deep current or channell of the very river: and they that brought the infants, hoped well they might be drowned in any place of the water, were it never so still and low. So to fulfill after a sort the Kings commandement, they laid the children in the next plash they came to: even where as now standeth the fig-tree Ruminalis, called, as they say, Romularis: but all that ground then was nothing but waste deserts, and a very wilderneſſe. The report yet goeth, that when the ebbe and shallow water was gone, and had left on dry ground the floating trough or vessell, wherein the babes were put forth, a she-Wolf from out of the mountains thereby, being athirst, turned towards the childrens cry, and with her pendant teats so gently gave the infants suck, that Faustulus the head Reeve and overseer of the Kings Cattell found her licking them with her tongue: who brought them to his homestall, and gave them to his wife Laurentia to be fostered. There be that think, that Laurentia being a common strumpet among these heardmen and shepherds, was usually called Lupa. Whereupon arose the occasion of this strange tale and wondrous miracle. Well, so were they born and so brought up. And as soon as they grew once to some bigneſſe, it was no boot to keep them within doores, nor to set them idly to tend the cattell, for they would use to hunt abroad in the forrest: whereby having gotten strength of body, and courage withall, they were able now, not only to withstand the violence of wild beasts, and to kill them, but also to set upon common robbers by the high-waies side, laden as they were with booties, and to spoile them thereof, yea, and divide the prey among the shepherds, and as the number of younkers dayly encreased with them to keep holidaies, to make merry, and follow their disports. And even in those daies

A daies (as men say) was the festivall pastime Lupercal, used in mount Palatine, which of Palanteum, a City in Arcadia, was first called Palantium, and after Palatine, wherein Evander, who descended from the Arcadians, long before reigned in that country, and ordained a solemn game and recreation yearly to be held, as aforetime in Arcadia, in this manner: that young men in the honor of Pan Lycæus, whom the Romans after called Inuus, should loosely and wantonly run naked. Now whilest they were busily occupied in this kind of sport, which by vow yearly they performed; there lay in ambush the robbers aforesaid, in revenge and for anger of the prizes which they had lost: Where Romulus manfully quit himself, but Remus they took prisoner: and being thus taken, they brought him before King Amulius, accusing him grievously, and laying especially to his charge, that he with B others invaded and made rodes into Numitor his Land, and with a power of lusty youths, assembled in warlike sort, had forraged and spoiled the same. Thus was Remus delivered unto Numitor to be put to death. Now had Faustulus even since the first day conceived some hope, that there were in his house fotter children of royal bloud: For well he wist, that both by the Kings commandment the babes were cast forth to perish, and also that the time when he took them up fell out fitly thereunto: mary this would he in no wise should be known in haste, and before due time; unlesse it were either upon good occasion or great necessity. Necessity hapned first: and so for very fear he was driven to reveal the whole matter to Romulus. It hapned also, that Numitor himself having Remus in durance, and hearing they were brethren twins, by comparing their age, and viewing withall their very countenance and towardnes proceeding from no servile and base parentage, bethought himself of his C sisters children: and by farther enquiry and computation came so far, as he seemed well-near to acknowledge Remus for his nephew. Thus on all hands were means wrought to circumvent and surprize King Amulius. For Romulus on the one side not accompanied with a troup of tall fellows, for he was not able in open fight to make his part good: but giving the herdmen his assistants, in charge to come at a time appointed, some one way, and some another, to the Kings Palace, he set upon the King. On the other side, Remus with another crue from Numitor his house, came to second him: and so they slew the King. Numitor at the first uprore giving out eftsoons, that the enemies had entred the City, and assailed the Kings Palace, and thereupon having called the youth of Alba into the Citadell, to keep it by force with a good guard, and espying the two young men after the murder done, comming towards him with joy: forthwith assembled the people together, and declared o- D penly before them all, the wicked dealings of his brother against him, the parentage of his Nephews, the manner of their birth and bringing up, and how they came to be known: after that, he reported the murder of the Tyrant, and took it upon himself as the author thereof. The two young men passing with their companies through the midst of the people, saluted their grandsire King, whereat the whole multitude also with one accord and voice ratified the same: so was his royall name and estate by them established. Thus was the whole Regiment or Kingdom of the Albans committed to Numitor. Then Romulus and Remus had a great desire to found themselves a City in the very place where they had been cast forth and fostered. Now were there of Albans and Latines both, very many that might be spared; besides, a number of herdmen: who all set together, put them in good hope, that Alba and Lavinium too, would be but small Cities in comparison of that which now was a E building. Whilest they were devising of these things, an old canker came between to mar all, even desire of rule and soveraignty, the same which had troubled their grandsires before them: and thereupon a foule fray, which arose from a small and slight occasion. Forasmuch as they were both twins at one birth, and the respect of their age might yeeld no choice and difference, it was thought good and agreed upon, that the gods, who had the tuition of those places, should by Augury or flight of birds declare and shew whether of the twain should both name the City, and also rule the same. Romulus chose the mount Palatine, and Remus the Aventine, for their temples or religious quarters, to mark the bird-flight, and each one apart to receive their Augury. First (as they say) had Remus appearing in flight six vultures or gripes: and as tidings came unto him of this Augury, it happened that the number unto Romulus was presented double: whereupon they were both of them by F their assistants and favorites saluted Kings. The one side took the vantage of the time: the other of the number, for the prerogative of the Kingdom. Thus they fell to hot words first, and from cholerick words to blows and bloudshed: in which stir and preis of the people, Remus was wounded and slain in the place. The more common report goeth, that Remus in scorn of his brother, leapt over the new walls: whereupon Romulus in great choler slue his brother with his own hands, and in menacing wise, added these words withall, So perish he, whatever else he be, that shall once dare to leap over my walls. Thus Romulus alone became King, and the City new built, of the found- ers name was called Rome. Wherein first he fortified mount Palatine, in which he was himself reared. To all the rest of the gods he sacrificed after the rule and custome of the Albans: only to Hercules after the manner of the Greeks, according to the first institution of Evander. For the G fame goeth, that Hercules upon a time, after he had slain Geryon, drave that way exceeding fair Oxen, and near the River Tybris, where he had swom over with his drove afore him laid him down in a fair green meadow, as well to refresh himself, being weary of his way, as also to rest and bait his cattell in so plentifull grasse and forrage. There falleth he into a sound sleep, as having well charged himself with wine and viands: and one Cacus a shepherd dwelling thereby, a man right fierce, and bearing him proudly of his strength, being greatly in love with the fairnes of the beasts, had a good will, and minded to fetch away that booty: but for that if he had he drew the goodliest and biggest of them backward by their tails into his hole. Hercules early in the morning when he awoke, and beheld his drove, and missed some of his count, went on towards time, and the inwards or intrals were set before them: which being eaten, the Pinarii came to the L good chear behind: whereupon the custome held that so long as the family of the Pinarii continued

he assembled the multitude to an audience: and for that they could by no means but by Laws be united together into one body and society of a people, he devised Statutes, and ministred justice unto them. And supposing that those Laws would be accounted sacred and inviolable of the wild and M when they chose their King by the common voices of their twelve principall States, each one found a Sergeant. All this while grew the City more and more to be fortified with Ramparts and Bul- N warks, as men still built in sundry places where they liked best, seeming thereby to provide rather for a future multitude in time to come, than for the present number wherewith it was then peopled. Furthermore, lest that the City, so large in compasse, should stand void and vacant, Romulus for to encrease the number of the inhabitants (according to the old practise of the founders

The institution of a Senate So began first the City according to the plot of large buildings, to be well peopled and grow mighty. Thus being provided of power sufficient: he thought then upon a Councell and policy to his power. And so created a hundred Senators: either because that number seemed great enough, puiſſant, that it was able in fight to match any City neer adjoining whatſoever. But for default of woman kind, this puiſſance was to endure but the age of one man: for neither had they hope of iſſue among themſelves at home, nor yet made marriages with their neighbors abroad. Whereupon Romulus by the adviſe of his Senators, ſent Embaſſadors to the countries thereabout, to treat for ſociety and alliance for his new people, by way of marriage. Alledging that Cities alſo, as well as other things, aroſe of baſe beginnings, and in proceſs of time by their own prowels, and help of God withal, grow to great power and reputation: "Whereas therefore they were full well aſſured, "that as the gods were gracious to their firſt upriſing, ſo their own vertue and valor ſhould not be "wanting: their neighbors ought not, in regard of common humanity, and as they were men, think "much and diſdain to join in blood and kinred with them, being alſo men as well as they. Howbeit, this embaſſage in no place had gentle audience and courteous entertainment. For they all in general deſpiſed them, and were in fear for themſelves and their poſterity, by reaſon of ſo mighty a ſtate, encreaſing in the midſt of them, and under their very noſes. And from the moſt of them the Embaſſadors were diſmiſſed and ſent away, with ~~thith~~ this ſtump and demand, Whether they had ſet up a Sanctuary or lawleſs place for women too? For that were alone, and a fit marriage indeed to ſort together. This took the youth of Rome in great diſpleaſure, and doubtleſſe the quarrel grew like to be tried by knocks. But Romulus diſſembling his inward heart-burning, to the end he might find time and place meet for the purpoſe, prepareth to ſet forth certain ſolemn playes and games, which he nameth Conſualia, to the honor of Neptune Equeſtris. Hereupon he commanded to proclame theſe games all over the country adjoining; and with as great preparation and furniture, as in in thoſe days either their skill or ability might afford, they celebrate the ſame, and all to make the ſhew more goodly, and worthy ſo great expectation. Thither reſorted many a one, deſirous alſo to ſee this new City, but their next neighbors eſpecially of Cenina, Cruſtuminum, and Antemnæ: The whole multitude of Sabins likewiſe came with their wives and children. Who being friendly invited to their houſes from one to another, and courteouſly entertained: when they beheld the ſituation of the City, the ſtrong walls and fair buildings, ſo thick ſtanding, wondred how in ſo ſhort a ſpace the City of Rome was grown ſo great. Now when the time of this ſolemn ſight was come, and that their minds were buſied, and their eyes bent thereon; then at once, as it was agreed before, there aroſe an uproar. And the youth of Rome upon a token and watch-word given, fell on every ſide to carry away the Sabin Maidens. A great many of them were raviſhed by hap hazzard, as they did light upon them, and as they came next to their hands. Other ſome more beautiful then the reſt, were appointed for the chief of the Senators, and by certain of the Commons, as they had given them in charge, conveyed home to their houſes. But one paſſing fair and lovely above all others, was hurried by the company or crue of one Talaſſius (they ſay) and when as any asked to whom they carried her, they ever cried out (for fear ſhe ſhould be forced or deflowred) Thalaſſio, i.e. Unto Thalaſſius. Whereupon Thalaſſio became a common by-word at Weddings ever after. Thus their ſport and paſtime upon this ſtir and fright, was marred, and the Parents of the Virgins fled away with heavy cheer, blaming them highly, and complaining of their breach of hoſpitality: and calling upon the god for vengeance, to whoſe feſtival games they being come, were under colour of religion and truth, beguiled. The Damſels likewiſe that were raviſhed, conceived neither better hope of themſelves, nor leſs indignation againſt them. But Romulus himſelf in perſon went from one to another, declaring, "That their fathers pride, who denied their neighbors marriage was the "cauſe of all this, promiſing nevertheleſs that they ſhould be linked in lawful wedlock, made partakers of all worldly goods, obtain the freedom of a City, and (then, which nothing is more deer to "mankind) enjoy the bleſſing of children: exhorting them to appeaſe their anger, and quiet themſelves, and to give them their hearts, whoſe hap it was to have their bodies. For oftentimes upon wrong and injury there groweth love and reconciliation. Alledging moreover, that they ſhould "find their ſpouſes ſo much more loving and kind, as every one of them for his part would endeavour, after they had in their turn and courſe fulfilled the duty to them of good husbands, for to "make amends, and ſupply the miſs they have of father, mother, and native countrey. Their husbands withal uſed fair ſpeeches, and flattering words, excuſing the matter, and laying all the weight upon fervent affection and pure love: which kind of perſwaſion of all other, prevaileth moſt with womens nature. Thus were the raviſhed young Wives in ſome ſort quieted in mind, and held themſelves well contented. But their fathers then moſt of all arayed in mourning weed, with tears and heavy complaints, ſtirred up the Cities where they dwelt: neither contained they their mood within home, but aſſembled themſelves from all parts unto Tatius the King of the Sabins: and to him repaired their Embaſſages, for that the name of Tatius was highly renowned in thoſe countries. They of Cenina, Cruſtuminum, and Antemnæ, who were partly touched and grieved for that wrong done, thought that Tatius and the Sabins dealt but coldly in the action, and went but ſlowly about revenge. Theſe three nations therefore banded themſelves, and agreed to prepare for war. But ſo ſharp ſet were the Ceninians that the men of Cruſtuminum and Antemnæ, beſtirred not themſelves quick enough for them. So they of Cenina entred alone by force of arms the Territories of the Romans. As they waſted and ſpoiled without order and meaſure, Romulus met them with an army, and in one ſmall skirmiſh made proof, how Mood without Might is vain and bootleſs. For he diſcomfited, put to flight, and purſued in chaſe their whole hoſt, ſlew their King in battel, and him deſpoiled: and having ſlain their General, at the firſt aſſault he won the town: and after he had from thence thence brought back his army with conquest and victory, as a man no less desirous to shew his noble acts with glory, then to atchieve the same by prowess, he bare afore him on high as a pompous Pageant in a frame fitly for the purpose wrought, the spoile and armor of his enemies Captain, by himself slain: and so ascended up to the Capitol Hill, where laying them down at the Oak which the shepherds had in great reverence, he consecrated them as a present to Jupiter: and set out withal, the foundation and bounds of a Temple unto him: giving moreover this addition and title to the god, and saying solemnly: "O Jupiter Feretrius, I King Romulus upon my victory, present un- "to thee this armor of a King, and within this compass of ground, which even now I have con- "ceived and assigned, I dedicate a Temple, to receive those rich and royal spoils, which the po- "sterity, following mine example, shall bear away from the Kings and Captains general of their "enemies, whom they shall happen hereafter to kill. This is the very beginning of that Temple, which first of all other was in Rome consecrated. And so it pleased God, that neither the first founders words were spoken in vain, whereby he foretold and pronounced, that his posterity should bring their spoils thither: nor his glory made vulgar and common to many co-partners with him in the like exploit and glorious present. For after him, in so many years, and after so many wars, two royal spoils only were won of the enemies. So rare was the happiness of honor in that behalf. Whilst the Romans were thus employed about Cenina, the army of the Antemnates, taking the vantage of time and of the Romans absence from home, and seeing their frontiers without a guard, with a power of armed men entred the confines of Rome. Against whom also the Roman Legion made head in all haste, and finding them scattered out of order in the fields, charged upon them. By reason whereof, at the very first shock and shout made discomfited were the enemies and their town surprized. As Romulus returned with triumph and joy for these two victories, his Wife Hersilia, at the importunate sute of the Wives that had been ravished, earnestly besought him to pardon their "fathers, and receive them into his City: for so by concord and unity the Weale-publick, and the "good estate of his Kingdom might flourish and grow mighty. This sute was gently heard, and soon obtained. After this, he set forth against the Crustuminians that began to war upon him: with whom he had the less ado, for that their courages were well abated already by the overthrows of others. To both these places as unto Colonies, were new inhabitants sent. But the greater number were desirous to enter their names, and to plant themselves at Crustuminum, for the fertility of the soil. And many likewise removed from thence to Rome, the parents especially and kinsfolk of the ravished women. Last of all, the Sabins warred far more sharply and dangerously then the rest, for nothing did they either in fury and rage, or for covetous desire of spoil. Neither made they talk and shew of war, before they warred indeed and were seen in field. And besides this their considerate policy, they dealt also with craft and subtilty. For whereas one Sp. Tarpeius had the charge of the Castle in Rome, his daughter a young maiden, Tatius with a sum of money corrupted and procured at what time as she went to fetch water without the walls for sacrifice, to receive armed souldiers into the fortress. But so soon as they were let in, they with their armor smothered and killed her: either for that thereby it might be thought the Castle was won by force: or because they would make her an example to posterity, that no Traitor should ever think to escape unpunished. But hereto belongeth a tale, namely, that the Sabins used commonly on their left arms to wear bracelets of massie and weighty gold, and fair rings besides on their fingers, set with precious stones of great value: and that she covenanted and agreed with them to have that which they wear on their left hands, whereupon she had their targets in stead of those golden ornaments, heaped upon her. Others say, that upon agreement and covenant made to deliver that which was on their left hands, she demanded their armor: and because she seemed to deal deceitfully, she was overtaken therewith, and perished by receiving a reward of her own chusing. However it was, the Sabins were possessed of the Castle. From whence the morrow after (when as the Romans army well appointed in battel ray, had taken up and overspread the whole plain that lieth from mount Palatine to the hil Capitol) they would not come down on even ground before that the Romans, partly netled with anger, and partly pricked with an hot desire to recover the Castle again, began with their great disadvantage to climb against the hill. Whereupon the Captains on both sides joined battel. Metius Curtius for the Sabins, Hostius Hostilius for the Romans: who albeit he was on the lower ground, yet in the forefront most couragiously and stoutly underwent the brunt of the conflict. But so soon as he was strucken down and slain, incontinently the Romans retired and gave ground: and thus discomfited fled backward to the old gate of Palatium. Romulus himself also, born back with the press and throng of those that fled, lift up his weapons on high towards heaven, and cried out saying: "O Jupiter, I Romulus by thy direction guided and ruled, have here in this mount Pala- "tine laid the foundation of this City; and now already have the Sabins by corruption and treache- "ry got the Citadel and fortress thereof: from whence they having passed the midst of the vale be- "tween, make hither in haste with force of arms: But thou O father of gods and men, vouchsafe "yet from hence at least wise to repulse the enemies, deliver the Romans from this so great fear, and "stay their shamesul flight. And here to thee O Jupiter Stator I vow a Temple, for a memorial to "all posterity, that by thy present help this City was saved and preserved. Thus having once prayed, as if he had known for certain that his prayers were heard. Even here (quoth he) O ye Romans doth Jupiter Opt. Max. i. the best and greatest of all the gods command you to stay and begin the battel afresh. Herewith the Romans, no less then if they had been commanded from heaven above, made

The Ceninians defeated. Their King ſlain.

A made a ſtand. And Romulus in perſon hyed him with all ſpeed to the formoſt in the vanguard. Now was Metius Curtius, principal leader of the Sabins, run down from the Caſtle, and had ſcattered and chaſed the Romans back as far as the Forum or common place of Rome at this day reacheth in length: and being come within a little of the gate of Palatium, he lift up his voice and cried aloud: "Vanquiſht we have theſe faithleſs friends, and heartleſs foes: and now know they well, it is one "thing to raviſh maidens, and a far other thing to fight with men. In this ſort, as he braved it out, Romulus with a troop of luſty young men, made head againſt him. Metius haply at that time fought on Horſeback, whereby he was forced the ſooner to recule, and the Romans made after and purſued him. The other battel of the Romans in like manner, being much encouraged with the valour
B of their King, diſcomfited the Sabins. Metius with his horſe under him, affrighted at the noiſe of them that ran after, leapt into a mariſh or bog thereby. Which accident, conſidering the danger of ſo great a perſon, made the Sabins to look back to him. And he verily taking heart again at the calling and encouragement of many of his favourites, eſcaped. But the Romans and Sabins both, in the middle valley between the two hills, renew the battel again: where the Romans got the better hand. Then the Sabine Dames, for whoſe wrongful uſage all this war aroſe, with their hair hanging looſe about their ſhoulders, and renting their garments, for very grief and ſorrow paſt all fear, ventured to run amongſt the javelins and darts as they flew: and thus having thruſt themſelves violently overthwart between them, began to part theſe bloody armies, and to end their deadly feud: Beſeeching their own fathers on the one ſide, and their husbands on the other, that they being fathers C and ſons in law, would not embrew themſelves with ſo unkind and unnatural bloodſhed, nor as parricides, murder the young ones newly born, ſome their grand-children, and others their own heirs of their body begotten. "If ye our fathers, think much (ſay they) of the affinity between our hus- "bands and you, or if ye our husbands are diſpleaſed with our marriage, bend all your anger and "malice againſt us: we are the cauſe of this war, we are the cauſe of wounding and killing both "husband and father: yet will we rather die, then live either Orphans without the one, or Widows "without the other. This thing moved as well the multitude of Souldiers, as alſo the Captains; and preſently of a ſudden all was huſht, and the fight ceaſed. Whereupon, the Generals came forth to conclude a League. Neither made they peace only, but one City of two: united their Realms, and joined together in the Regiment: but the royal eſtate they ſetled in Rome.

The Sabins women to their husbans and fathers.

D The City thus being made one of twain, the Romans for to gratifie the Sabins in ſome ſort, were of Cures, a town of the Sabins, called Quirites. And for a memorial of that battel, the very place where Curtius, after he was gotten out of the deed mariſh, firſt ſet his horſe on firm ground, was named Curtius his lake. This joyous peace enſuing preſently upon ſo cruel war, made theſe women better be loved of their husbands and parents: but eſpecially of Romulus himſelf. And therfore when he divided the City into thirty Wards or Pariſhes, he called them by their names. But it is not left in any record (for out of all queſtion the women were far more in number then ſo) whether thoſe that ſhould give names unto the Wards, were choſen by age, or by their own dignity and worthineſs, or their husbands degree and calling, or by caſting lots. At the ſame time were enrolled and ordained three Centuries of Gentlemen or Knights: The Ramnenſes were ſo called of Romulus, the E Titienſes of Titus Tatius; but of the name and firſt beginning of the Lucerians, the occaſion is not certain. So theſe two Kings not only raigned together, but alſo governed with great unity and concord. But after certain years the kinred of King Tatius chanced to beat and evil entreat the Embaſſadors of Laurentum. And when as the Laurentines pleaded the law of Nations, for ſatisfaction of this outrage; Tatius his kinſfolk what by favour, and what by intreaty, prevailed more with him then the juſt complaint of the others. Whereby he brought vengeance due to them upon his own head: for being come upon a time to Lavinium, unto a ſolemn ſacrifice and feaſt, there in an uproar or hurliburly the people ran upon him, and ſo was he ſlain. Which thing (they ſay) Romulus made leſs regard of then was meet: either for that fellowſhip in Lordſhip is never faithful, or becauſe he eſteemed him not unjuſtly to be made away. Whereupon he forbare indeed to make war: yet to F the end the wrong done unto the Embaſſadors, together with the murder of the King, might be expiate and purged clean away, the League between the Cities of Rome and Lavinium was renewed. But whilſt peace verily was beyond mens expectation with them concluded: behold another freſh war aroſe, much neerer then the other, and hard almoſt at their very gates. For the people of Fidene ſuppoſing the Romans power and riches to encreaſe over much ſo neer unto them; before they ſhould grow to ſuch greatneſs as they were like to do, began firſt to war upon them: and ſending a power of luſty tall ſouldiers, invaded and waſted all the country between the City of Rome and Fidene. And taking their way on the left hand, for that the Tyber kept from the other, they forraged and ſpoiled as they went, to the great fear of the Peaſants and country people. So as this ſudden tumult and garboil heard out of the fields into the City, brought the firſt news of the war, Romulus
G raiſed therewith (for ſo nigh a war might bear no delay) led forth his army, and encamped within a mile of Fidene: and leaving there a competent guard, he departed thence with all his other forces, commanding part of his ſouldiers to lie cloſe in certain covert places, among the thickets in ambuſhment. Himſelf with the greater number, and all his horſe, advanced forward, and riding up and down before their gates after a diſordered and bragging manner, made ſemblant of a bravado, and all to train the enemy forth, which was the thing he only ſought. This kind of horſe ſervice was a means that the Fidenates leſs ſuſpected and marvelled at their flying, which they were to counterfeit.

feit. For whilſt the Cavalry ſtood unreſolved, as it were, in a mammering whether to fly or fight, G and the Infantry withal began to retire: all at once the enemies in thronging manner ſallied forth of the gates, and chaſed the Romans ſo fiercely, that in their eager purſuit they were drawn to the very place of ambuſh. Thence the Romans ſuddenly aroſe, and charged the flanck of the enemies; And to encreaſe their fright, they likewiſe that were left behind to guard the camp, ſhewed themſelves with banners diſplayed. So the Fidenates terrified ſundry ways, before well neer that Romulus and his men of arms could rein about their horſe-heads, turned their backs, and rode full gallop towards the town again, and ſo much the faſter, for that they fled now in good earneſt themſelves, that purſued them, who a little before made but ſemblance thereof. Yet for all this could they not eſcape the enemy: for the Romans hard at their heels, ruſhed together with them pel-mel into the town, H before the gates could be ſhut againſt them. At this Fidenatian war ſpreading ſo dangerouſly, the Veientians grew angry in their hearts, and began to chafe. Touched they were alſo in regard of kindred and alliance: for the Fidenates were likewiſe Tuſcans. And fearing leſt (if the Roman forces ſhould thus diſtreſs and lie upon all the borderers) they being ſo neer ſhould not go free, they were the rather pricked forward, and thereupon made rodes, and entred in arms the confines of Rome, ſpoiling and rifling, more like robbers then profeſſed warriers. So without pitching any tents, or abiding the coming of their enemies, but only driving and carrying away great booties out of the fields, they return again to Veii. The Romans contrariwiſe, not finding the enemies in the field, but yet provided and reſolved to give battel, and to hazzard all, paſſed over the Tyber. Whom the Vei-entians underſtanding to be encamping themſelves, fully minded to come againſt their City: iſſued I forth and met them, intending to try the quarrel by dint of ſword, and in open field, rather then to be mued up within the town, and to fight and defend themſelves from off their houſes and walls.
There the Roman King with the ſtrength only of his old beaten ſouldiers, without any other help and ſupply whatſoever, without policy or ſtratagem, had the better: and having thus diſcomfited the enemies, he chaſed them even to their very walls. And for that the City was exceeding ſtrong, fortified as well by natural ſituation, as by walls, he forbare to aſſault it. But in his return homeward, he waſted the country, more upon a mind to revenge, than hope of ſpoil. With this defeature the Veientians no leſs ſubdued then if they had loſt a field, ſent Orators to Rome to ſue for peace:
unto whom Truce was granted for an hundred years, but they were amerced to loſe part of their lands. Theſe were in manner all the acts that were done both at home and abroad, during the reign K of Romulus. Whereof none ſeemed to derogate any jot from the opinion, both of his divine birth and beginning, and alſo of his immortality or deification after his death. Such was his courageous heart in recovering his Grandfires Kingdom: his policy and wiſdom in founding the City firſt, and after in eſtabliſhing and governing the ſame, as well in war as in peace. By whoſe good proceedings it got ſuch ſtrength, and ſo ſure footing, that for forty years ſpace after, it enjoyed peace with ſafe-ty. Nevertheleſs of his Commons he was better beloved then of his Nobles: but above all, his Souldiers moſt heartily affected him: of whom he had always about him, as Eſquires of the body, three hundred Penſioners armed, not only in time of war, but alſo of peace, whom he called Celeres.
Thus having atchieved theſe noble and immortal deeds, as he upon a time aſſembled all his people upon the plain, at the mariſh Capræ, there to number or muſter his army: behold upon a ſudden there L aroſe a tempeſt with great cracks of thunder, which with ſo thick and cloudy a ſtorm, covered the King, that the people loſt the ſight of him. And never after was Romulus ſeen on earth. The Roman youth, after their fear was at length paſt, and that upon ſo dark and troubleſome weather, it proved a fair day again, and calm withal, ſeeing the Kings Throne empty, albeit they credited the Senators that ſtood next about him, who gave out he was taken up aloft in the ſtorm: yet ſtrucken into ſad dumps, as it were for the loſs of their father, held their peace a good while. But afterwards, when ſome few of them had once begun, they all ſet on and cried aloud, All hail god Romulus the ſon of a god, King and Father of the City of Rome: With earneſt prayer beſeeching him of his grace, that he would vouchſafe to be propitious, and ſave their off-ſpring and poſterity for ever. I am of this mind, that ſome there were even then, that ſuſpected and ſecretly ſurmiſed that the King was M pulled in pieces by the hands of the Nobles. For this rumor alſo was bruited abroad, although in very dark and obſcure tearms. But by reaſon of the high admiration of the man, and the preſent fear withal, the former opinion took place, and was more currant. Over and beſides, it grew the rather credible, through the politick practiſe of one perſon. For as the whole City was penſive and ſor-rowful for the miſs of their King, and ſore diſpleaſed with the Senators, one Proculus Julius, a ſubſtantial good author (as men ſay) and to be beleeved in a matter of great importance, ſtepped forth into the aſſembly. "Romulus (quoth he) O Quirites, the Founder and Patron of this City, even "this very morning at the day break, deſcended ſuddenly down from heaven and met me, and as "I ſtood all quaking for fear, ready to worſhip him, and humbly beſeeching that I might behold
"him face to face: Away (quoth he) and tell the Romans that the will of the gods in heaven is, that N
"my City of Rome ſhall be the head and chief of the whole world: will them therefore to follow
"and practiſe chivalry, and the knowledg thereof: and wot this well, and ſo let them teach their "poſterity, to wit, That no power in the world ſhall be able to withſtand the puiſſance of the Ro"mans. Which (ſaid he) was not ſo ſoon ſpoken, but he aſcended on high, and departed. A wonder it was to ſee, how much they gave credit to this mans tale, and how greatly the miſs of Romulus both among the Commons and the Army, was by this belief of his immortality, digeſted.

In

A In this mean while the Senators fell to ſtrive who ſhould be King, and the deſire of ſoveraignty troubled much and perplexed their minds. But as yet, there was no banding nor ſiding from any one perſon in particular: for that in a State ſo newly riſen, and of ſo ſmall continuance, there was not one that far excelled another in authority. All the contention was between the two ſeveral factions in general. For they that were deſcended of the Sabins, fearing leſt becauſe after the death of Tatius there was none of their part, that had raigned with Romulus in equal juriſdiction, they ſhould now loſe their poſſeſſion and title to the Crown, were deſirous to have a King choſen out of their corporation. The old Romans again might not abide an alien or forraigner to be King. Howbeit, thus diverſly affected as they were, a King they all will needs have, as who (God wot) B had not yet taſted the ſweetneſs of liberty and freedom. Beſides, the Nobles began to fear, leſt peradventure in caſe the hearts of many Cities thereabouts, ſhould not be well diſpoſed, but provoked againſt them, ſome forraign power would make invaſion, finding the City without government, and the army without a Captain. Therefore they all liked well to have one head, but none could find in his heart to give place unto another. Whereupon the hundred Senators aſſociate and combine together in the rule of the Common-weale, by dividing themſelves into ten Decuries, and for every Decury chuſing one to bear the chiefe authority. So that ten governed at once, but one alone had the regal Enſigns and the Lictors before him. This ſoveraignty and preheminence determined every five days: and thus went it through them all round in courſe. After which manner, they continued the ſpace of one year. And the government upon this occaſion was (as it is ſtill at C this day) called Interregnum. Then after a year began the Commons to grudge and mutter, that their ſervitude was greater then before, having now Lords over them, an hundred for one: and ſeemed they would no longer endure, but have a King again, yea, and one of their own chuſing. The Senators ſeeing them thereabouts, and taking it to be good policy for to offer that of their own accord, which they were otherwiſe like to forgo, curbed favour with them in this wiſe, to wit by granting the chief prerogative unto the people (in chuſing a King) yet ſo, as they gave them no greater priviledg, then they reſerved to themſelves. For thus it was decreed, that when the people had elected a King, it ſhould ſtand firm and ratified, if the Senators liked thereof, and gave thereto their royal aſſent. And even at this day in making of Laws, and chuſing of Magiſtrates or Rulers, the ſame right is in ſome ſort obſerved, ſetting aſide the violence of Tribunes. For that now before the peoD ple give their voices, the Senators paſſe by their authority, that which they would have done, fall it out in the aſſembly of people, by ſcrutiny, doubtful as it will. To proceed then, the Interregent having called a general Parliament: In the name of God (quoth he) O Quirites, and which may be to you good, lucky, and proſperous, elect, or nominate ye a new King: for ſo is the good pleaſure of the Nobles and Senators: and in caſe ye ſhall elect a man of ſuch quality as may be deemed worthy to ſucceed Romulus, then will they by their aſſent paſs the ſame, and allow thereof. This pleaſed and contented the Commons ſo highly, that becauſe they would not ſeem behind in bounty and courteſie, they anſwered again, that this only they ordained and agreed upon, to wit, that the Senate ſhould determine who ſhould be King of Rome. There was in thoſe days one Numa Pompilius, much renowned and eſteemed for his juſt life and religious: he dwelt in Cures, a City of the Sabins, E a man right skilful and very well ſeen (as any one might be in that age) in all Laws both divine and humane: whoſe teacher and firſt maſter, for want of other Author of his Science and Knowledge (they ſay) but yet untruely, was Pythagoras of Samos. Concerning whom, this is well known, that he 100. years after and above, in the days of Servius Tullius King of Rome, held a School of young men Students, that were his Diſciples, and followed his Sect in the utmoſt and fartheſt coaſt of Italy, about Metapontum, Heraclea, and Croton. From which places (albeit he had lived in that time) what fame of him could ſpread ſo far as to the Sabins? or by what entercourſe and affinity of language might he poſſibly have trained any man unto him for deſire of learning at his hands? or by what good means and help, could Numa travel alone unto him in ſafety, through ſo many countries, of divers tongues and ſundry manners? I am of this opinion rather, that the man by nature F was framed and diſpoſed to vertue, and that he was inſtructed, not ſo much in ſtrange and forraign Sciences, as after that ſtrict rule, that ſtern and ſevere diſcipline of the ancient Sabins; then whom, there was not a nation in times paſt, more preciſe, reformed, and void of corruption. The Roman Senators hearing the name of Numa, although they ſaw well enough, that the Sabins were like to prove of great reputation and power, by chuſing their King from among them, yet was there none of them ſo audacious, as to prefer either themſelves, or any one of their party and faction, not any one, I ſay, Senator or Citizen, before that man: but all in general with one accord, agreed to confer the Kingdom upon Numa Pompilius. Who being ſent for and come; like as Romulus at the founding of the City was inaugurate King, or attained to the Crown by means of Augury: ſo alſo he would needs, that the will and counſel of God ſhould be ſought for, touching his own election. WhereG upon he was by the Augur (unto whom for ever after that publick Miniſtry or Prieſthood, in regard of honor and reverence by patent belonged) brought unto the Caſtle hill, and there he ſet him down upon a ſtone, with his face toward the South. Then the Augur on his left ſide, with head covered, took his place: holding in his right hand a ſmooth ſtaff without knot or knob, and hooked towards the top, which they called Lituus. From whence after that he had with good adviſe, taken a proſpect and view towards the City and Country, and made his prayers unto the gods, he limited the quarters of the Heaven, from Eaſt to Weſt: and the parts Southward he appointed for the the right hand, and those Northward for the left. And so far as ever he could cast his eye and see H forward, he imagined to himself a mark: then shifting his staff into his left hand, and laying the right hand upon Numa his head, he prayed in this form: O Father Jupiter, if it may be right and lawful, that this Numa Pompilius, whose head I lay my hand upon, shall be King of Rome, shew I beseech thee some certain and manifest signs within that compass and those precincts, that I conceived and set out. Then pronounced he in plain words what tokens by sight or flight of fowls he would have to appear. Which being once seen, Numa was declared King, and so came down from the Temple or place of prospect aboveſaid.

In this manner, being inaugurate and invested in the Kingdom, he provideth by good Orders, I Laws, and Customs, to re-edifie, as it were, that City, which beforetime had been new built by force and arms. Whereunto, he seeing that they might not be brought and framed in time of war, whose hearts were already by continual warfare grown wild and savage: and supposing that this fierce people might be made more gentle and tractable, through disuse of arms, he therefore built the Temple of Janus in the nether end of the street Argiletum, in token both of war and peace: with this invention, that being open it should signifie, that the City was in arms; and standing shut, that all the neighbor countries were in peace and quiet. Twice only after the raign of Numa was this Temple shut: once, when T. Manlius was Consul, after the first Carthaginian war was done and ended: and a second time (as God would) in our age for us to see, when as the Emperor Cæsar Augustus, after the battel of Actium (with Antonius and Cleopatra) had obtained peace both by Land and Sea. Numa then having knit the hearts of the borderers about him in firm league and amity, K and thereupon closed up the doors of Janus, secured now from all fear and care of dangers abroad, yet doubting lest through ease and idleness their minds might fall to looseness and riot, whom the dread of enemies and martial discipline had held in aw and good order: devised above all things to strike some fear of God into them, and to plant religion in their hearts: a policy no doubt, with the simple multitude (rude in those days and ignorant) most effectual. Which reverence of God, for that it could not sink nor enter well into their heads, and take a deep impression, without some device of a fained miracle, he made semblance, and gave out, that he conversed in the night season, and had, I wot not what, secret conference with the goddess Ægeria. By whose counsel and direction forsooth, he ordained such divine service and sacrifices to the gods, as to them was most acceptable: and to every god appointed several Priests for the ministery thereof accordingly. But first a- L bove all other things he divided the year, according to the course of the Moon, into twelve months:
and for as much as the Moon hath not full thirty days to every month, whereby some days are wanting to make up the just year, after the revolution and circle of the Sun: he, by putting the odd days between every month, so disposed and ordered the year, that in every three and twenty years space the days agreed just to the same point of the Sun from whence they began, and so made up the void spaces, and accomplished fully the term of every year. He appointed likewise law days and days of vacation, called Festi and Nefasti, thinking it good, that otherwhiles there should be rest from attendance on the Courts, and no dealing with the people. After this, he set his mind about the creation of Priests, albeit in his own person he performed very many sacrifices, especially those which at this day pertain to the Priest of Jupiter, called Flamen Dialis. And supposing that in a City so mar- M tial, there should succeed more Kings like to Romulus then Numa, who in proper person would go forth to war: lest haply the divine ministry that belonged to the King, might be neglected, he created a Flamine to Jupiter, for to be a sacrificer continually resident: endued and adorned him with a rich cope or vestment, and with an ivory chair of state upon wheels, called Sella curulis. Unto him he adjoined two Flamines more; one for Mars, another for Quirinus. He instituted also a Nunnery, as it were, of religious Vestal Virgins. A Priesthood that had the beginning from Alba, and suted well with the house, from whom the first founder of the City was descended. And to the end they should attend continually about the Church, as resiant Chaplains, he allowed them an ordinary fee or pension, at the publick charges of the City: and made them by perpetual vowed virginity and other ceremonies to be reverenced and accounted holy. Likewise unto Mars Gradivus he e- N lected twelve Priests called Salii, and gave unto them a rich purple coat, embroidered for an ornament, and to wear upon that coat a brazen brest-plate, and to bear certain scutchions or bucklers that fell from heaven, called Ancilia: commanding them to run about the City, chanting hymns and songs, with dancing and leaping full solemnly. Moreover, he chose for a Superintendent or high Priest, Numa Martius, the son of Marcus, one of the Senators: and to him he gave in writing set down under his hand and seal, a rule, whereby he might know what beasts should be killed for sacrifice, upon what days, and at which Temples, and how the money should be levied and disbursed for the defraying of all charges. All other sacred rites as well publick as private, he submitted and referred to the discretion and ordering of that high Priest: to this end, that the common people might know unto whom they were to resort for counsel and instruction, and that no part of O Gods worship and service should by neglect of the ancient rites and traditions of their own country, be confounded and corrupted by bringing in any strange and forraign superstitions. He ordained besides, that the same Arch-Prelate should teach, not only these heavenly ceremonies, but also funeral obsequies, and how the spirits beneath, and ghosts of bodies departed, should be quieted and pacified: and what strange and prodigious tokens, that came by way of lightning, thunder, or any other fearful sight whatsoever, should be expiate and purged by sacrifice accordingly. And

A for to know the truth, portended by these tokens even from the minds of heavenly spirits above, he consecrated unto Jupiter Elicius an altar upon the mount Aventine. And by the means of Augury, he consulted with that god, what things he was to enterprize and go about. Whilst the whole multitude was thus drawn away, and clean turned from thinking of force and arms, and busied about devising and ordering of these matters, not only their minds were occupied in doing somewhat, but also the continual fear of God now setled in them, (as being perswaded that the heavenly power was present in the managing of mens affairs) had possessed now all their hearts with such piety and religious holiness, that faithful promise once made, and the reverence of an oath taken, abandoning all fear of law and punishment, was able to rule and govern the City. And B as the people framed and reformed themselves to the fashions and manners of their King, as the only and special pattern to follow: so the nations likewise bordering upon them, who beforetime verily thought that City to be built, and as it were encamped in the midst of them to the disturbance and disquieting of all their peace, were now become so respective of them, that they thought it an impious and sinful deed, once to offend or offer abuse to that City, so well given, and devoted to the worship and service of God. Furthermore, there was a grove, the midst whereof was watered continually by a spring that issued out of a dark and shadowed cave: into which, because Numa used very oft to retire himself alone, without any other, as it were, to have familiar company with Ægeria, he dedicated that grove unto the Muses, for that, their assistance also in counsel and advise he desired together with his wife Ægeria. And to Faith alone he instituted a so-C lemn yearly festival day, and erected a chappel: Unto which he commanded the Flamines to ride in an arched or embowed close Chariot, drawn with two horses, and to sacrifice and execute their function, with their hands covered and wrapped close to their fingers ends: signifying thereby, that faith is to be kept and preserved: and that her seat was sacred and consecrated even upon the right hands. Many other sacrifices, and places for sacrifice, which the Priests call Argeos, did he appoint and dedicate. But of all his acts this was most worthy and memorable, that during the time of his raign he had no lesse regard to preserve peace, then to maintain royal estate and dominion. Thus two Kings one after another, taking either of them a several course by himself, that one by war, this other by peace, mightily promoted the welfare of the City. Romulus raigned 37. years, Numa 43. So that now the City became very puissant, as being well and equally tem-
D pered both with feats of arms, as also with discipline of peace.

Upon the death of Numa the regiment returned again to an inter-raign. Then the people nominated and elected for their King, with the royal assent of the Senators Tullus Hostilius, the Nephew or Grandson of that Hostilius, who had in times past fought valiantly against the Sabins, at the foot of the Castle hill. This man was not only unlike the former King, but also more fierce and hardy then Romulus himself. For besides the heat of youth, and strength of body withal, the glorious remembrance of his Grandfather set him on, and pricked him forward. Supposing therfore that the City through rest and ease began to age, as it were, and to decay, he sought every way to pick quarrels, and to give occasion to make war. It fortuned, that the Peasants about Rome, and those of Alba likewise, preyed upon and spoiled one anothers land. At that time C. Cluilius was Lord E and King of Alba. From both parts well neer at one time, were Embassadors addressed to demand restitution of goods, and satisfaction for their harms. Tullus Hostilius he had straitly charged his messengers to have no dealing with the Alban Prince, before they had delivered unto him their message. For well he wist, that he would make denial, and yeeld no amends: and then might he with safe conscience justly proclame war against him. On the contrary side, the Alban Embassadors followed their business but slackly for being courteously invited, and friendly entertained by Tullus, and lodged within his palace; they were well content to be feasted by the King, and were his dayly guests so long, that the Romans had by this time both challenged their own first, and upon denial made by the Alban King, given defiance and proclamed open war within thirty days next ensuing. Upon which tidings by them related to Tullus, he gave the Alban Embassadors audience, per-F mitting them to declare what their errand was, that they came about. "They (simple men) ignorant "of all that was done, first spent time in excusing themselvs, saying, they were very loth & unwilling "to speak ought that might displease Tullus, but being commanded by authority, they might not "wil nor chuse: and thereupon were come to make claim of goods & amends for wrongs, and if they "were not restored and recompence made, they had commission to denounce war against him.

Whereunto Tullus made answer in this wise, "Tell your King and Master (quoth he) that the "Roman King calleth the gods to witness, whether of the two Nations sent the Embassadors a-"way first, and rejected them when they demanded restitution, that upon his head they might "bring the misery, loss, and calamity of the present war. With this dispatch the Albans returned home. So they made preparation of forces on both sides all that they could, most like in all the G world to a civil war, between fathers and sons, proceeding both from the Trojan race: considering that by Trojans Lavinium was founded; from Lavinium came the people of Alba: and from the Alban Kings were the Romans in right line descended. But the final issue and end of this war, made the war it self less woful and lamentable, both because they came not to a set field, and also for that by rasing the houses only of the one City, two nations were intermingled & united in one. The Albans first with a mighty power entred the Territory of Rome, and encamped themselves not past five miles from the City, where they strongly entrenched themselves: which place of the Captains name was called * Foſſa Cluilia, many years after: until both it and the name with- H al in proceſs of time, decayed clean and came to nothing. In this camp the Alban King Cluilius ended his days, in whoſe ſtead the Alban army created Metius Suffetius their Dictator. Tullus in the mean time became haughty and proud, eſpecially upon the death of the King, oftentimes giving out and ſaying, that the mighty power of the gods, having thus begun at the very head, would likewiſe take vengeance on the whole body of the Alban Nation, for this their unjuſt and godleſs war: and one night above the reſt paſſed ſecretly by the camp of his enemies, and in warlike manner invaded the Alban land. This news raiſed Metius out of his ſtanding camp. Who led forth his army and marched on as neer to his enemies as he could, diſpatching aforehand an Herald unto Tullus, to notifie unto him thus much from him, that it was needful and expedient before they I joined battel to parle and commune together. If he would vouchſafe to confer, he knew very well, that he ſhould alledge and lay forth ſuch matters, as might concern the Weale of the Romans, as well as of the Albans. Tullus refuſed not the offer, albeit they were but vain toies that were pretended, and therefore ſet his men in battel aray. The Albans in like manner came forth againſt him.

After they were thus ranged and embattelled ready to fight, the Generals on both ſides, accompanied with a few of their principal Nobles, advance between both armies. Then began the Alban Dictator in this wiſe: "Me thinks (quoth he) I hear already of injury and wrongs done, and how
"ſuch goods as were demanded are not reſtored again according to the form of the league, as alſo
"that Cluilius our King was cauſe of this war: neither doubt I, O Tullus, but even you pretend,
"and are about to alledge as much. But if we would as we ought to do, ſtand upon the truth of K
"things rather then upon I wot not what gloſſes, and goodly ſhews of words: it is ambition and "deſire of rule only and nothing elſe, that ſpurreth on two nations of one blood and neer neigh"bors to take arms and war one with another: juſtly or unjuſtly, I am not able to ſay, Let him on "Gods name that firſt began the quarrel, in conſcience ſee to that. As for me, the Albans indeed "have made me their General. But this one point Tullus, I would have you to remember and "conſider: How ſtrong about us and you eſpecially the Tuſcans are, you know better, the neerer "ye are unto them: mighty they are by land, much more by ſea. Then wot well this, that when "you ſhall cauſe the Trumpet to ſound unto battel, theſe two armies will be to them a fair mark
"and ſpectacle to behold: that they may give an aſſault to both at once, as well the victors, as "them that are vanquiſhed, whilſt they are wearied and toiled out of heart. For the love of God, L
"if there be any ſpark of grace in us, ſince we not contented with that liberty which we ſurely en"joy, will needs venture and put in doubtful hazzard, which of us ſhall rule and command, and "who ſhall ſerve and obey the other, let us take ſome good courſe whereby it may be decided "without great loſs or bloodſhed on both ſides, whether ſhall be Lord and Soveraign. The motion Tullus miſliked not, albeit both for diſpoſition of nature, and hope of victory, he were the haughtier of the twain. And as they ſought on both parts what way to take, this means at length they found, whereunto fortune it ſelf preſented fit matter and occaſion. For by good hap even then, in either hoſt three brethren twins there were born at one birth, and thoſe neither in age nor ſtrength unlike. Their names were Curiatii and Horatii, that is very certain, neither is there any thing of ancient record more famous and notable. Yet as clear in ſubſtance as it is, there re- M maineth ſtill ſome doubt and error in their names: of whether people the Curiatii and the Hora- tii were. Writers there be on both ſides, but the greater number ſay, as I find, that Horatii were the Romans, to whom I rather encline, and my mind giveth me to follow them. With theſe three brethren the Kings went in hand, perſwading them to fight for the honor of their country, and try the quarrel by dint of ſword: ſhewing them, that on whether ſide the victory fell, there ſhould remain the ſoveraign dominion. Nothing refuſed they to do, the time and place both were agreed upon and appointed. But before the combat, it was covenanted between the Romans and Albans, and theſe conditions drawn: That whoſe champions in fight ſhould have the better, that nation ſhould peaceably command the other. There are of covenants many and ſundry Capitulations far different in matter: but they run all after one manner and form. As for this, it was N made, as we have heard in this wiſe, neither is there extant a more ancient record of any compo-ſition whatſoever. The Herald (called Fecialis) demandeth of King Tullus in this wiſe: Is it your will and commandment my Lord, That I make a covenant and accord with the Paterpatrate of the Alban people? It is (quoth the King.) Then (quoth he) I demand of you ſacred herbs. The King anſwered again, Take them pure and clean. The Fecial then reached from the Caſtle hill pure herbs from among the graſs: which done, he thus asked the King: Do you (my Lord) ordain me the Meſſenger Royal of the Commons of the people of Rome? and allow neceſſary implements, all furniture for my ſelf, and my retinue and train? The King anſwered: I do, ſo far forth as may be, without the harm or detriment of my ſelf, and of the Citizens of the people of Rome. The Fe-cial or Herald for that time, was Marcus Valerius, who created Paterpatrate a King at Arms, Sp. O Fuſius, by touching his head and hair with Vervain. Now the Paterpatrate is for to confirm the agreement with an oath, and ſo he read out the covenant and oath, and that with many words: which to rehearſe, as they were in a long preſcript form pronounced, were very needleſs. After this having recited all the Articles and conditions thereof. "Hearken (quoth he) O Jupiter, liſten

A "coven, or fraud, and how at this day they are moſt rightly meant and underſtood, according to "the tenure of the words: from theſe articles I ſay, ſhall not the people of Rome ſtart back firſt, "nor make default: If they ſhall firſt go back and fail therein by publick conſent, and fraudulent- "ly; that day, O Jupiter, ſmite thou the City of Rome, as I to day will ſtrike this Swine: yea, and "ſmite thou home ſo much more, as thou art more able and powerful then my ſelf. And after he had thus ſaid, he ſmote the ſwine with a flint ſtone. The Albans likewiſe repeated their preſcript form of words, and the oath, by their Dictator and Prieſts for the purpoſe. The complements of the covenant and compoſition thus performed, and all concluded, then thoſe three brethren of both ſides, as it was before agreed, buckle to arm themſelvs. And being encouraged on both hands, B by their well-willers and friends, that put them in mind of their country gods, their native ſoile and parents, ſaying, that all their fellow Citizens and country men whattoever, both at home in the City, and abroad in the camp, every one had their eye only upon them, their weapons and their hands: the young men being both of themſelves by nature forward and luſty, and alſo emboldened with the comfortable words of their friends, advanced forth between both armies. Now were the two hoſts ſet on both ſides before their camps, rid of preſent danger, rather then void of care and penſiveneſs. For why? the whole trial of ſoveraignty and rule, reſted in the valour and good ſpeed of a few. Whereupon they longing to ſee the ſequel and iſſue, were wholly bent to behold, and only minded this unpleaſant ſight and ſpectacle. At ſound of Trumpet theſe brave brethren, three to three like as they had been two ſet battels, and carrying the ſtomachs verily of two C great armies, affronted one another, and with cruel and mortal weapons gave the charge. Neither regarded they their own proper peril, but ſet before their eyes, only the rule or ſervitude of the Common-weal, as if the ſtate of their country from thenceforth lay wholly upon their good or bad ſucceſs in this action. So ſoon as they began to cope together and make aſſault, that their harneſs and weapons once clattered, and their drawn ſwords ſhone and glittered again, behold ſuch an exceeding fear came upon the beholders, that they trembled and quaked withal: and during the time of equal combat, ſeeing no inclination of victory to the one ſide or the other, they were ſo aſtonied, that hardly they could well ſpeak or freely take their wind. Afterwards, when as they were come to hand-ſtroaks, and that now not only the ſtirring of their bodies, and the doubtful handling of their weapons and armor, but bloody wounds alſo were ſeen, two of the Romans D (having ſore wounded all the three Albans) fell down one upon the other, and yeelded up the ghoſt. At whoſe fall, the Alban hoſt ſhouted again for joy: but the Roman legions, albeit they were now paſt hope of victory, yet they were not void of care being amated, and an extaſie as it were, with very fear what ſhould become of him, who being but one, had three Curiatii upon him at once. But as good hap was, he as yet was freſh and unwounded. And as he was not able alone to make his part good with them altogether, ſo in ſingle fight, man to man, he thought himſelfe good enough for them all, one after another. To ſingle therefore, and to part them in fight, he begins to flie, thinking thereby they would follow after him, each one as his hurt body would give him leave. Now when he was retired a pretty good way from the place where they fought, and looking behind him, eſpied them following far aſunder, and one of them not much behind E himſelf, he turned again upon him with great violence. And whilſt the hoſt of the Albans cried out to the Curiatii to reſcue and ſuccour their brother, Horatius by that time had ſlain his formoſt enemy, and was in hand with the ſecond. Then the Romans with ſuch a ſhout, as they are wont to make, who after a great fright recover themſelves and take heart again, encourage their champion: and he himſelf hatteneth to finiſh the combat. And before that the third, who was not far off, could get to the other, he had ſlain the ſecond Curiatius. So that now there was but one to one, left to fight on even hand: and they, neither in hope nor ſtrength equally matched. As for the one of them, his body as yet not wounded, and his double victory withal, cauſed him to attempt the third conflict ſtoutly and couragiouſly. The other faint and feeble of his hurt, tired with running, had much ado to come forward, and quite out of heart, ſeeing his two brethren lie ſlain at F his feet, offereth himſelf as a prey to his victorious enemy: for ſurely between them was no fight at all to ſpeak of. The Roman, he triumphing and crying out for joy, "Two brethren already (quoth he) have I ſent to the Divel, the third likewiſe ſhall I ſend after them, that a Roman may command an Alban, which is the cauſe of all this war." And therewith he thruſt his ſword aloft into his throat, who had much ado to hold his weapons: and ſo ſoon as he was down, ſtript and rifled him. "The Romans with great triumph and gratulation, receive Horatius rejoicing ſo much the more, "as his caſe was more dangerous and well neer deſperate. Then of both ſides addreſs they them- "ſelves to bury their champions, but not with like cheer and alacrity of heart: For why? they of the one part were become Lords, and they of the other, Subjects. Their tombs remain yet to be ſeen in the very places where they were each of them ſlain, two of the Romans entombed together G in one place neerer unto Alba: the three Albans towards Rome, but diſtant aſunder, like as they fought and left their lives. Before they diſlodged and departed thence the one from another, Metius according as it was capitulated in the compoſition, asked and demanded what Tullus would command him to do: who enjoined him to keep his youth ready in armes at an hours warning, for that he would employ them in ſervice, in caſe he ſhould war with the Veientians. So were the armies diſmiſſed home. And Horatius he went formoſt, baring afore him the threefold ſpoile of three brethren. Whom his Siſter a maid affianced before to one of the Curiatii, met before Capena gate: &

espying upon her brothers shoulders, the coat of arms of her espoused husband, which she her self had wrought with her own hands; she unbound her head, let her hair loose, and pitiously called upon her dead spouse by name. This lamentable wailing of the sister presently upon victory, and amid so great and publick joy, moved the proud and hauty young man to wrath, and drawing out his sword therewith, ran the silly damsel through: and with these bitter words rebuketh her also, Get thee hence (quoth he) to thy spouse with thy unseasonable and foolhasty love, forgetful as thou art, of thy two brethren dead, and him that is alive: forgetful of thy native country, and the honor thereof: and so with a mischief go she, whatever she be, that shall bewail an enemy of Rome. A cruel and horrible fact this seemed, as well to the Senators, as to the Commons: but his late and fresh desert made it the less trespass: yet for all that was he apprehended, and brought before the King. The King, that he might not seem the author of a judgment so unpleasant and odious unto the people, and consequently of punishment according to the doom, assembled the people together and said: I ordain Duumvirs to sit upon Horatius, in trial of a criminal cause of felony, and to judge him according to the law, in that case provided. The tenor of the law runneth thus, in dreadful kind of form. [The Magistranes called Duumvirs shall judge the party accused in a capital action of felony, if he shall appeal from the Duumvirs, let him traverse his appeal, if they overthrow him, then hoodwink him, or cover his head, hang him upon a cursed Gallow tree by a rope, and strangle him, having whipped and scourged him before, either within the Pomœry or without.] By vertue of this law were the Duumvirs created, who by the rigour of that law thought they might not quit so much as a guiltless person: and having once condemned him, then one of them gave sentence and said: I judge thee O Publius Horatius a murderer and an enemy to the state of Rome. Go Lictor therefore, and bind his hands together. Then came the Lictor and cast a cord about them. But Horatius, by the advise of Tullus, a gentle and mild interpreter of the Law, I appeal (quoth he.) So upon his appeal was the matter debated, and to be tried before the people: who were not a little troubled in deciding or judging this cause, and most of all in regard of Publius Horatius the Father, crying out and saying, "That he deemed his daughter was justly and worthily killed: otherwise he would himself have punished his son by his fatherly authority. Beseeching moreover, that they would not now make him childless, whom erewhile they saw "with a goodly company of children about him. And therewithal the old father embracing the young man, and shewing the spoils of the Curiatii, set up and hanging in that very place which now is called Pila Horatia, i.e. Horatius his Pillar. "And can ye indeed (O ye Romans, quoth he) abide "to see him bound under a Gallows, yea, and whipped and tormented, whom a while afore ye "beheld to march in great glory and jollity for his atchieved victory? So unseemly and foul a sight "as which, the Albans themselves can hardly suffer. Go Lictor, go bind those hands fast, which "armed a little before, wan the people of Rome their dominion: Go I say, and hoodwink his head "who saved and delivered this City from bondage, hang him by the neck, and strangle him upon "a cursed tree: scourge him and spare not, either within the circuit of the walls, so it be among "those javelins and spoils of the enemies: or without the walls, so it be within the compass of the "Curiatian Sepulchres. For to what place can you lead this young gentleman, where his honora-"ble acts may not save him from so unworthy and shameful punishment? The people could no longer endure, either the tears of the old father, or the constant resolution of the youth his son, who shewed himself still the same, and not to change for any danger. So they quit him, in the honorable regard rather of his prowess and valor, then in the right and equity of his cause. Yet to the end that the murder so manifest and openly known, should be in some sort expiate, and satisfaction made therfore, his father was charged to purge his sons sin, and make amends, at the expences of the City. Who having performed certain purgatory sacrifices, which afterward belonged to the house and family of the Horatii, put a rafter or beam cross overthwart the street, and caused the young man with his head covered to go under, as under a yoak or gallows: which remaineth yet unto this day, from time to time at the City charges repaired, and they call it Sororium Tigillum, i. e. The Sisters beam. And in that very place where Horatia was wounded and fell down, her tomb was erected of four square stone.

But not long continued the Albans in quiet and peace. For the common people finding fault and greatly discontented, that the whole state of the Weale-publick was put into the hands of three souldiers, infected so, and poisoned the vain and shittle head of the Dictator: that for as much as plain and upright dealing sped no better, he began to win again the hearts of his Commons by crooked means, and indirect courses. Seeking therefore war in time of peace, as before in time of war he sought peace: and seeing his people had more heart then hand; and their strength not answerable to their stomacks: he stirred up other nations, openly by way of proclamation and defiance to make war, and reserved his own men under a colour of league and confederacy, for to practise treason and falshood. The Fidenates, a Colony of the Romans, having made the Veientians partakers of their counsel, and combined with the Albans to forsake the Romans, when time came, and turn unto them, brake out and took arms. When Fidene had thus openly revolted, Tullus sent for Metius and his power from Alba, and setteth forward against his enemies: and passing over the river Anio, encamped neer the confluent, where both streams meet together. Between which place and Fidene, the army of the Veientians had crossed the Tyber, who put themselves in the right wing of the battel fast by the river, and the Fidenates in the left,

A leſt neerer to the mountains. Tullus directly oppoſeth his own forces againſt the Veientians, and placeth the Albans to affront the Fidenates. The Alban Captain having as little heart as honeſty and truth, neither durſt keep his ſtanding, nor openly turn unto the enemy, but by little and little withdraweth himſelf toward the mountains: and when he thought he had gained vantage enough, he mounted up the hill with all his companies, and with a wavering mind to ſpend the time, diſplayeth his ranks. His intent and purpoſe was, on what ſide fortune ſeemed to give the better, with them to join and take their part. The Romans that ſtood next, perceiving their flanks naked by reaſon of the departure of their friends and allies, at firſt marvelled much at the matter: but afterwards there gallopt an horſeman, and advertiſed the King that the Albans were B gone away. Tullus in this ſo fearful and dangerous caſe, vowed twelve Prieſts Salii, and two Temples to Pallor and Pavor, i. e. to Paleneſs and Fear: and with a loud voice cryed out in the hearing of his enemies, commanding the ſaid horſeman to return to the battel, ſaying, There was no cauſe at all to fear, for that himſelf had commanded the Alban hoſt to wheel and fetch about, and ſo to charge the Fidenates on their backs where they lay open. Willing him expreſly moreover, to cauſe the men of arms to hold up their lances on end. By which means, a great part of the footmen could not ſee the Albans as they departed and went their ways. And thoſe that had ſeen them, thinking it was a truth which they heard the King to ſpeak, fought ſo much the more hotly. So the fear turned now from them, and fell upon the enemies: for they heard the King when he ſpake ſo loud, and alſo a great many of the Fidenatians being co-habitants with the Romans, C underſtood Latine. For fear therefore, that the Albans ſhould all on a ſudden run down from the hils and ſtop their paſſage to the town, they turned their backs and fled. Then Tullus preſſeth hard upon them, and having diſcomfited the Fidenatians wing, cometh back more fiercely upon the Veientians, being already amazed at the fright of the other. Neither were they able to withſtand the brunt. Howbeit the river behind at their backs kept them at firſt from flying away, but afterwards when their flight bended thitherward: ſome flinging their weapons ſhamefully away, like blind men, ran headlong into the water: other lingering ſtil, and ſtaying on the bank ſide, doubtful whether to flee, or to ſtick to it and fight, were trod under foot, and hewne in pieces. Never had the Romans before that day a more cruel battel. Then the Alban army, which beheld and ſaw all this conflict, deſcended down into the plain. And Metius, forſooth, rejoiceth much on D Tullus behalf for his victory. Tullus again ſpeaketh Metius fair, and gave order, that the Albans in a good hour ſhould join their camp to the Romans: and againſt the next day, prepared a purging or Luſtral ſacrifice. The morrow when it was day, and that all things were in a readineſs, according to the manner, he commandeth both armies to aſſemble together to an audience. The Criers, beginning at the fartheſt part of the camp, ſummoned the Albans firſt. Who alſo for the ſtrangeneſs of the matter, and deſirous to hear the Roman King to make his Oration, preſſed forward to ſtand next. The Roman legion on ſet purpoſe, as it was before decreed, ſtood armed round about, and hemmed them in: and the Centurions had in charge without delay to execute whatſoever they were commanded.

Then began Tullus to ſpeak in this wiſe, "If ever in any war heretofore had cauſe, O Romans, The Oration of Tullus.
E "to render thanks, firſt to the immortal gods, and then to your own manhood and valor, cer"tainly it was in yeſterdays battel. For ye fought not then with the force of your enemies more
"then with the treachery and falſhood of your friends and confederates, which is the greater
"conflict and far more dangerous. For to put you clean out of doubt, and to bear you no longer "in hand with a wrong perſwaſion: The Albans went up toward the hills without my commiſſi-
"on, neither was that my commandment, but a policy and countenance only of command: to "fight, and alſo that your enemies weening they were environed behind, ſhould be afraid and ſo

"enforced to flee. Yet are not the Albans all in general to be charged with this fault which I re-

"this journey, Metius is he that is the worker and deviſer of this war, Metius I ſay it is, and none
"but Metius, the breaker of the Roman and Alban league. But let who that will from henceforth preſume hardly to do the like, if I make not him a notable example to all the world. The Centurions ſtood armed round about Metius, and the King goeth on with the reſt of his ſpeech as he began, and ſaid: "That which I pray God may turn to the good proſperity and happineſs of the

"Rome: to endue the Commons with the freedom of the City: to advance their chief Gentle"men to the order of Senators, and to make one uniform City and Common-wealth: that as in "times paſt the Albans ſtate, out of one body was divided into twain, ſo now it may be united G "and become one again. At theſe words the Alban youth unarmed, and beſet on every ſide with armed men, albeit they were diſtracted in mind, yet were they forced with a general fear to keep ſilence and hold their peace. "Metius Suffetius (quoth Tullus then) If thou couldſt have "learned to keep allegiance, promiſe, and covenants, thou mighteſt have been taught it at my "hands with life. But now ſince thy froward nature is incurable, teach thou by thy fearful exam"ple and death all mankind, to hold and repute thoſe things for ſacred and holy, which have by "thee been broken and violate. Like as therefore erewhiles thou bareſt a double heart in doubt-

"ful ballance, between the the Fidenates and the Romans ſtate: even ſo ſtreightways ſhalt thou H
"yeeld thy body to be drawn aſunder, and plucked in two peeces accordingly. Then forthwith
"he cauſed two teames of four houſes to be ſet to, and Metius to be ſtretched out and tied unto the chariots to them belonging. Afterwards were the horſes driven a contrary way, and carried with them in both chariots the body torn in pieces, as far forth as the limbs hung faſt together by their cords and ligaments: which made all men avert their eyes from beholding ſo cruel and horrible a ſpectacle. This was the firſt and laſt puniſhment that ever the Romans executed with ſo little reſpect or none at all (to ſay a truth) of the laws of humanity. In all other they may ſafely make their boaſt, that no nation in the world hath been leſſe delighted and pleated with extremity of torment.

XXIX Whilſt theſe things were in doing, there had been certain horſemen ſent afore to Alba, for to I tranſlate the multitude to Rome. After whom were the legions alſo of the footmen thither led, to raſe and deſtroy the city. At whoſe entrance within the gates, there was not that ſtir nor fearful hurry, as uſually is ſeen when cities are loſt: and when with breaking down the gates, beating and battering the walls with rams and other engins, forcing the citadel, the enemies ſhout, and the armed ſouldiers run to and fro in the city, killing and ſlaying, firing and burning all afore them as they go: but a ſad ſilence, and a ſtill kind of ſorrow and penſiveneſs ſo poſſeſſed and aſtonied all their minds, that for fear forgetting what to leave behind them, or what to take with them, without adviſe and counſel, one asking another what to do, they one while ſtood in their houſe entries, another while ran up and down wandring in their houſes, as if their laſt day had been K come. But ſo ſoon as they heard the horſemen cry aloud, and command them with menacing to void and depart, and that now the ratling of the tiles and ſlates from off the houſes as they were a pulling down, was from the furtheſt part of the town heard: and that the duſt raiſed from places far off, had as it were with a cloud overcaſt and filled all: then every man catching up haſtily, and carrying forth what he could, leaving their domeſtical gods, leaving their houſes wherein they had been born, bred, and brought up, departed forth: ſo that now they filled the ſtreets as they went cloſe on a row together, and the ſight one of another with mutual commiſeration, redoubled their tears and wofull complaints. Yea, and pitious mone and lamentations were heard of women eſpecially, as they paſſed by their fair and ſtately churches, beſet with ſouldiers, and abandoned their gods as it were captives and priſoners. After the Albans had thus quit the city, down L went the Romans every where with the buildings, as well publick as private, and laid them even with the ground and ſo in one hour deſtroyed and raſed four hundred yeers work, for ſo long had Alba ſtood and flouriſhed. Howbeit the temples of the gods they ſpared for ſo the king had XXX given commandment. Rome all this while riſeth by the fall of Alba. The number of Citizens increaſed double: to enlarge the city the mount Celius was annexed to it: and that it ſhould be better peopled and more inhabited, Tullus had his royal ſeat and palace there, and therein from that time forth he kept his court. The chief Citizens of the Albans he advanced to the order of Senators, that he might augment that ſtate alſo of the Commonweal; namely, the houſes of the Tullij, Curia Hoſtilia. Servilij, Quintij, Geganij, Curiatij, Cloelij: and for that degree and order of Senators by him encreaſed, he built an hall or new court, called until our fathers dayes Hoſtilia curia. M i. Hoſtiliae court. And that all eſtates and degrees might out of this new people be ſomewhat ſtrengthened, he choſe from out of the Albans ten troops or cornets of horſemen, and with the ſame ſupply he both fulfilled the number of the old legions, and alſo made and enrolled new.

War with the Sabins. Tullus upon this affiance he had in his ſtrength and power, denounceth war againſt the Sabins, a people in thoſe dayes of all other moſt puiſſant and mighty, both in men and munition, next the Tuſcans. Wrongs had been done, and outrages committed on both parts, and reſtitution or amends demanded, but to no effect. Tullus found himſelf grieved, that divers occupiers or merchants of Rome, at an open mart or fair of great reſort before the temple of Feronia, were laid hold upon and apprehended. The Sabins on the other ſide complained, that their men, notwithſtanding N they took ſanctuary in a certain ſacred and priviledged grove, were areſted and in hold at Rome.
Theſe were the quarrels and occaſions pretended of the war. The Sabins well remembring, that not onely part of their own forces was by Tatius tranſlated to Rome, and there planted, but alſo that now of late the puiſſance of the Romans was well amended by the ſupplement of the Albans, began likewiſe for their part to caſt about, and ſeek for help abroad, and forrain aids. Now was Tuſcan their neighbour nation, and of the Tuſcans the neereſt unto them were the Veientians.
From thence they gat certain voluntaries to take their part, by reaſon that their minds already were well diſpoſed to revolt upon old grudges and rancour remaining ſtill of the former war paſt: otherſome alſo vagarants and idle perſons of the raſcal ſort, and needy commons, were ſoon hired for mony. But as for any ſuccour from thence by publick conſent of the ſtate they had none at all.
So much prevailed even with the Veientians (for in the reſt it was leſs marvel) the faithful covenant O of truce concluded with Romulus. Now when theſe preparations of war were made on both ſides to the uttermoſt of their power, and that it ſtood upon this point, That they were like to have the ods and vantage, who ſhould begin firſt, and enter the field: Tullus prevented the enemies, and invaded the Sabine land. A ſharp and bloody battel was there fought under the wood Malicuſa.
Where the Romans bare themſelves bravely that day, much upon the valour of the Legionary foot.

A footmen, but more upon the ſtrength of their men of arms, whoſe number lately was augmented: for by the ſuddain and forcible charge of the horſemen, the battel of the Sabins was ſo broken, their ranks ſo diſordered, that they could neither ſtand cloſe together to fight it out, nor yet ſpred themſelves to flie, without great ſlaughter and bloodſhed. The Sabins defeated by the Romans.

The Sabins thus vanquiſhed, and the kingdom of Tullus and the whole ſtate of Rome, being very glorious and wealthy: behold, news came to the King and Senators, that in the Alban mount it rained ſtones: which hardly was believed, and therefore certain men were ſent of purpoſe to ſee this ſtrange and prodigious ſight: who might plainly behold ſtones to fall thick out of the skie like as when ſome forcible winds drive hail in big round bals upon the earth. They imagined more-B over, that they heard a great and mighty voice out of the grove from the very top of the hill crying unto them, and warning the Albans to do ſacrifice and divine ſervice according to the rites and ancient maner of their forefathers, which they had diſcontinued and forgotten, as if together with their country they had abandoned their gods, and either taken to the Roman faſhion, or elſe being angry with fortune (as it is commonly ſeen) forſet and neglected the worſhip of the gods altogether. The Romans likewiſe upon that miraculous ſign, for the purging and expiation thereof, celebrated ſolemn publick ſacrifices for the ſpace of nine dayes, called a Novendial: either becauſe they were moved thereto by that voice from heaven (for that alſo is reported) or took direction from the Soothſayers that pry into the inwards of beaſts. Certain it is, that a ſolemn cuſtome remaineth ſtill unto this day, that whenſoever word cometh of the like wonder, they keep holyday
C nine dayes together. Not long after this, the peſtilence raigned in the city. And albeit the people began thereby to ſlack ſouldery and military ſervice: yet would not this martial prince give them reſt and reſpite from war: being of this mind, that the bodies of young men were more healthy in armour, abroad in the open field, than at home in the city under covert: until himſelf at length fell ſick of a long and lingering diſeaſe. Then that haughty and couragious ſtomack of his, together with his luſty and able body, became ſo abated, that he who earſt before thought nothing leſſe befitting a king, than to ſet his mind, and buſy his brains about religious ceremonies; now all upon a ſuddain became wholly devoted to all kind of ſuperſtition both more and leſſe, yea, and filled the peoples heads beſides with holineſs and devotion. So as now the very common ſort wiſhing again for the old world, under the reign of king Numa, were fully perſwaded, that there D was no other remedy left for their ſick and diſeaſed bodies, but to obtain at Gods hands grace and pardon. Men ſay, that the king himſelf in peruſing and turning over the Commentaries and regiſters of Numa his predeceſſour, and therein finding certain hidden and ſolemn ſacrifices that had been unto Jupiter Elicius, retired himſelf, and kept cloſe within a houſe to celebrate the ſame. But for that this holy ſervice was neither begun aright, nor duly adminiſtred, he had not onely no divine apparition and heavenly viſion preſented unto him, but alſo incurred the heavy diſpleaſure and wrath of Jupiter, whom by his prepoſterous religion he had thus diſquieted; and ſo both himſelf and his whole houſe were conſumed with lightning. This Tullus, in great glory and renown of martial proweſs, raigned two and thirty years.

When Tullus was dead, the government returned again, as it was from the firſt beginning or-E dained, unto the Senators; who named an Interregent, and he called a Parliament, wherein the people elected Ancus Martius for their King, and the Senators gave their aſſent thereto. This Ancus Martius, was Numa Pompilius his daughters ſon, who ſo ſoon as he was come to the crown, both in remembrance of his grand-fathers glorious government, and alſo in regard of the raign of his next predeceſſor, which in other points right excellent and commendable, in this onely failed, and was not ſo happy: either for that religion was neglected, or not with due ceremonies exerciſed; and thinking it a thing moſt neceſſary, and of greateſt moment, to reduce all publick divine ſervice and ſacrifices to the firſt inſtitution of Numa, commanded the Arch-prelate or High-prieſt to make an extract, and tranſcript of all the ſacred rites and myſteries out of Numa his Commentaries, and ingroſs them into one table, and to publiſh them a-F broad unto the people: whereby both his ſubjects and citizens deſirous of peace, as alſo the States thereby adjoining, were in good hope, that the king would altogether comform himſelf, and take after the cuſtomes and ordinances of his grand-father.

Hereupon the Latins, with whom in King Tullus his dayes a league was made, took heart unto them, made inrodes into the countrey about Rome, and fetcht out booties. And when the Romans demanded reſtitution, they made them a proud anſwer, ſuppoſing belike, That the King of Rome would paſs the whole courſe of his raign in eaſe and idleneſs, ſitting ſtill in his chappels, and by his holy altars. But Ancus was of a mean and indifferent diſpotion by nature, having an eye as well to Numa, as to Romulus, and compoſed as it were of both. For over and beſides, that he thought peace more expedient and neceſſary for his grandſires reign, the G people being as then but new riſen, unſetled, and fierce withal: conſidering alſo, that himſelf ſhould not eaſily, without taking wrong, enjoy the quietneſs which to him hapned: for that his patience was already tried, and not onely tried, but alſo deſpiſed: and ſeeing that the State of the preſent time was fitter for a Tullus to be King, than a Numa: yet to the end that, as Numa in time of peace inſtituted ceremonies of religion, ſo he might likewiſe ſet out to poſterity others concerning war: and that wars ſhould not be onely made, but alſo denounced and proclaimed orderly, and in ſome religious form of ſolemnity:

he ſet down in writing that law and formal order, by vertue whereof reſtitution is demanded (which at this day the Feciales or Heralds obſerve) like as he received it from the ancient people Æqui. H

The Embaſſador Fe.ial, coming to their borders, at whoſe hands the goods are requited again, covering his head with a bonnet or vail of woollen yarn, ſaith thus: Hear O Jupiter, give ear ye limits and confines (naming them of ſuch and ſuch a Country) let Juſtice and Right hearken alſo to what I ſhall ſay: I am the publick meſſenger of the people of Rome, of a juſt and religious embaſſage am I come, and to my words give credit. After this, rehearſeth he all his demands, and then calleth Jupiter to witneſs, ſaying, If I unjuſtly and impiouſly demand, that ſuch perſons ſhould be delivered, or ſuch and ſuch goods be rendered unto me, the publick meſſenger of the people of Rome; then let me never return again to enjoy mine own country. Theſe words rehearſeth he, as he ſetteth foot, and ſteps into the confines: the ſame alſo he ſpeaketh to him whomſoever he meeteth firſt: the ſelf ſame words he pronounceth, as he entreth within the gate of the City: yea, and when he is come into the market place he ſaith the ſame, changing and varying in ſome few tearms, from the preſcript form of the demand, and taking the ſolemn oath. In caſe then, the perſons whom he requireth, be not yeelded after 33. days expired (for ſo many juſt are uſually granted) then proclameth he war in this wiſe. Hear O Jupiter, and thou Juno, Quirinus thou: ye celeſtial Saints all, and terreſtrial powers, ye infernal ſpirits alſo liſten and give ear. I call you all to witneſs, and proteſt before you, that this nation (naming them whoſoever they be) is unjuſt, and doth not according to right and equity. But of theſe matters will we conſult at home in our own country, with our elders, and ask their advice how we may come by our own. Herewith returneth the meſſenger unto Rome for counſel, and preſently the King would in theſe or ſuch like words, ſitting in Councel with his Peers, move them in this maner. Whereas the Paterpatrat or Herald, in the behalf of the people of Rome, and their Quirites, hath treated with the Paterpatrat, or Herald, in the name of the ancient Latines, and with the folk of the ancient Latines, concerning certain things, differences, ſutes, and cauſes thereupon depending; which things they have neither yeelded nor paid, nor performed and done; which ought to have been paid, yeelded, performed, and done; what is your judgment? ſpeaking to him, whoſe opinion firſt he asketh in this caſe. Then (ſaith he) My advice is, that thoſe things be ſought for, and recovered by mere force, by juſt and lawful war. This do I fully agree unto, this do I determine reſolutely. After him were the other asked in courſe: and when the greater number of them who were preſent accord thereunto, then by general conſent, they were wont to proclame war in this order: That the Fecial or King at Arms ſhould go with a javelin, having an iron head, or with a red bloody ſpear burnt at the end, as far as to their borders or marches: and there in the preſence of three witneſſes at the leaſt, not under fourteen years of age, ſhould ſay thus: Whereas the people of the old Latines, and the old Latine folk have practiſed and treſpaſſed againſt the people of Rome and the Quirites, and whereas the people of Rome and the Quirites have ſo determined, conſented, and agreed, that war ſhould be made with the ancient Latines; I therefore together with the people of Rome, do denounce and proclame and make war with the nations of the old Latines, and with the old Latine folk. And when he had thus ſaid, he lanced his ſpear or javelin within the confines of the enemies. After this manner then, was reſtitution demanded of the Latines, and war denounced or proclamed: which order of proceeding, their poſterity by tradition received. I K L M

Ancus having committed the charge of divine ſervice and ſacrifice unto the Flamins, and the other Prieſts, levied a new Army, went forth into the field, and by force won Politorium, a City of the Latines. And following the uſual manner of the former Kings his progenitors, who had mightily encreaſed the Roman State, by admitting their enemies into the number of Citizens, tranſported the whole multitude from thence to Rome. And becauſe the ancient natural Romans inhabited Palatium, the Sabins about the Capitol and rock Tarpeia, and the Albans repleniſhed the mount Cœlius: therefore the hill Aventine was allowed this new company to dwell in. Unto whom not long after, there came freſh inhabitants to people it, upon the winning of Tellene and Ficana. But after this, the Romans were driven to recover by war Politorium again: for that whileſt it ſtood void and empty, the old Latines had ſurpriſed and taken it. Which was the cauſe, that the Romans deſtroyed that City quite, that it ſhould not be at all times a receptacle for the enemies. Laſt of all, when as now the Latines war was driven wholly and brought before Medullia, there for a good while was much ado, and doubtful iſſue of fight, and interchangeable victory: for that the Town was both well fortified with bulwarks, and furniſhed with a ſtrong garriſon of men: and alſo by reaſon that the army of the Latines being incamped in plain and open ground, had ſundry times with banners diſplayed, encountred hand to hand with the Romans. At the laſt Ancus bending his whole power againſt them, firſt gave them an overthrow in a ſet battel: and ſo having gained rich pillage, returned to Rome. At that time alſo were many thouſands of the Latines received into the City; Who to the end, that the Aventine and Palatium ſhould meet together, were appointed to ſeat themſelves about the Temple of * Murtia. The Janiculum likewiſe was adjoined unto the City, not for want of ground, but becauſe it might not be at any time a fortreſs and hold for the enemies: which was thought good to be united unto the City, not only with a wall, but alſo for more commodious paſſage to and fro, with a wooden bridge over Tyber. The Quirites foſs or ditch alſo, no ſmall defence againſt the eaſie acceſs from the plain grounds, was a work of Ancus. Thus the eſtate being N O

A grown to exceeding ſtrength and bigneſs: when as now in ſo huge a multitude of people there was much confuſion, and no difference of well doing or ill, and thereby many miſchiefs and outrages began ſecretly to be committed: for to reſtrain therefore with ſome terror, ſuch boldneſs increaſing dayly more and more, there was a goal or common priſon built in the heart of the City, even over againſt the common place of aſſembly. And in this Kings days not only the circuit of the City was enlarged, but alſo their Lands and Territories. For by reaſon that the forreſt Mœſia was conquered from the Veientians, their Seignory reached to the Sea: where, in the very mouth of Tyber was the town Heſtia built, and the ſalt pits made there about, and upon ſuch noble exploits by arms atchieved, the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, was in more ample and glorious manner re-

In the reign of Ancus, there came to dwell at Rome one Lucumo, a pregnant nimble headed man, and a wealthy, upon a deſire eſpecially and hope of advancement and honor, which at Tarquinii (where he was born, although deſcended of forraign parentage) he had no means to attain unto. The Son he was of Demaratus the Corinthian, who upon civil troubles and diſſentions having fled his country, and by chance planting himſelf in Tarquinii, there married a wife and had iſſue by her two ſons, named Lucumo and Aruns. Lucumo ſurvived his father, and became heir of all his goods. Aruns died before his father, leaving his wife behind him, conceived with child: neither lived the father Demaratus long after his ſon, who not knowing that his daughter-in-law and ſons wife was with child, made no mention at all of his Nephew in his Will, and ſo departed

C this world. Whereupon the child after his Grandſires deceaſe, being born to no part of his goods, for his poor condition, was called Egerius. But Lucumo on the other ſide, the ſole heir and inheritor of all, as he began by his wealth to be haughty enough, and to look aloft, ſo he grew much more proud for his matching in marriage with Tanaquil, a dame of a right noble houſe deſcended, and who could hardly bear a lower eſtate and degree then that wherein ſhe was born. When ſhe was once married, and ſaw the Tuſcans to diſdain Lucumo, for that his father was a ſtranger and baniſhed perſon, ſhe could not endure that indignity. But forgetting all kind of affection to her native country, ſo ſhe might ſee her husband raiſed to high promotion, ſhe reſolved and plotted to leave Tarquinii and depart. To which purpoſe and deſign, Rome ſeemed a place moſt fit and convenient of all others. For thus ſhe projected and diſcourſed: That in a City lately founded, where

D all kind of Nobility ſuddenly cometh up, and ariſeth from vertue and proweſs, her husband a valorous and induſtrious man muſt needs have place, and be entertained: that King Tatius a Sabin born, had raigned there: that Numa was from Cures ſent for thither, and called to the Crown: that Ancus alſo a Sabin by his mothers ſide, had the only image of Numa to ſhew for his Nobility. Thus ſhe ſoon perſwaded him, as being a man ambitious and deſirous of honor, and whoſe mother only was a Tarquinian born, and therefore he was to make leſs ſcruple of abandoning the place of his Nativity. Thereupon they removed with all they had to Rome. And it fortuned that to Janiculum they came. Where, as Tarquinius ſat with his wife in the chariot, behold an Eagle came gently flying down from aloft, and took up his bonnet from his head, and ſoaring over the chariot with a great noiſe, and clapping of her wings, as if ſhe had been ſent from Heaven to do

E this feat, ſet it gently and handſomly on his head again: which done, ſhe mounted on high, and flew away. Tanaquil, as they ſay, embraced this Augury with great joy, being a woman skilful, as commonly all the Tuſcans are, in ſuch prodigious ſights and apparitions from heaven; and therewith taking her husband about the neck, willed him to be of good cheer, and to hope for great matters and high preferments: ſaying, how that bird came from ſuch a quarter of the Heaven, addreſſed as a meſſenger from ſuch a god, and ſhewed a divine token and preſage upon the higheſt part of man, even the top of the Crown, and lifted up the ornament that ſtood upon his mortal head, to give it him again immortal, as from God above. In theſe hopes and cogitations which they entertained by the way, they entred the City: where they took an houſe, and from thence forth he was commonly called L. Tarquinius. Now within a while both his new coming, and his

F wealth withal, made him well known: and himſelf alſo beſides, ſet forward his good fortune by courteous and fair ſpeech and affable language to every man, by friendly inviting, and liberal feaſting, and by making what friends he could by gifts, favours, and good turns; ſo far forth, as the fame of him came into the Kings Court: where, by his willing ſervice and ſingular dexterity, in ſhort time he had not only acceſs to the Kings knowledge, but alſo entred into familiar acquaintance and friendſhip with his Highneſs. Inſomuch, that both in private Councels and publick conſultations, as well at home as abroad, he was always preſent, and bare a great ſtroak. And having in all kind of offices carried himſelf with credit, was in the end by the Kings laſt Will and Teſta-ment made Tutor or Protector of his children: Thus raigned Ancus 24. years, for glory and repu- The end of Ancus.

G tation of his ſage government, as well in war as in peace, equal to any of the former Kings his predeceſſors.

Now were his ſons neer 14. years of age when he died. Tarquinius therefore made the more haſte, that the high Court of Parliament ſhould with all ſpeed poſſibly be ſummoned for creation of a King, which being againſt a day proclamed, he ſent away the boys to the chaſe a hunting, at the very inſtant of the ſaid election. He himſelf (as men ſay) was the firſt, that both ambitiouſly ſought for the Crown, and alſo for to win the hearts of the Commons, deviſed and framed an eloquent Oration. "Saying, it was no new and ſtrange thing that he ſtood for: And why? he was not

"the first (that any man should be offended, or make any wonder) but the third alien that in Rome H
"affected and aspired to the Kingdom: that both Tatius, not of a forraigner only, but of an ene"my became King: and Numa likewise, a man unacquainted with the City and matters of State,
"was without any sute or or seeking of his part, by the Romans sent for, & advanced to the crown.
"As for himself, he alledged and said, That from the time that he was at his own liberty and dispose "of himself, he with his wife & all that he had removed and came to Rome: and of that age wherin
"men are employed in civil affairs, he had spent a greater part in Rome, then in his own ancient "country. Moreover, that he was trained up both at home in the City and in war abroad, to the "knowledg of the Roman laws, orders, and customs, and that under no mean person but an ex"cellent master, even King Ancus himself. And finally, for faithful service and diligent attendance I
"about the King, he had endeavoured to pass all others: and for liberality and courtesie towards "all others, he had striven to go beyond the King. These and such like allegations, as he laid forth and pleaded, and that right truly; the people of Rome with exceeding great consent elected him their King. Who being a man otherwise of singular parts and of great worth, as he was ambitious in seeking the kingdom, so continued he still, when he ware the crown: and minding no less to establish his own state and throne, than to maintain the good estate of the Common-weal, he advanced one hundred more to the order of Senators, who afterwards were called Minorum Gentium Patres, as a men would say, Senators of a later sort, and meaner quality. A faction, no doubt to take part and side with the King by whose means they had been admitted into the Senate. The first war he made, was with the Latins: from whom by force he won the town Appiola: from thence ha- K ving brought away a greater pillage in proportion than the war imported in brute, he set forth ga-mings and plays more stately and with greater furniture and provision than the other Kings before his time. Then was the plot or compass of ground first set out & appointed for the lists or theater, *Circus maximus. called now * Circus maximus wherein were assigned scaffolds for the Senators, and for the Gentlemen or Knights severally by themselves, called Fori, where they might make them places to see the pastimes at their ease and pleasure. And in this manner stood they to behold: namely, upon scaffolds born up twelve foot high from the ground with forked perches or props. The gamings were running of horses, and fighting at fists and buffets: for performance whereof, there were champions sent for of purpose, especially out of Tuscan. These sports continued afterwards from year to year in great solemnity, and named diversly, either the Roman games, or the great Games. This L King moreover assigned certain places about the Forum or common place for private men to build in: where the galleries and shops were made. He went in hand likewise to wall the City about with a stone wall, but the Sabin war staid him in the beginning, that he went not forward with that work. This came so suddenly upon him, that the enemies were passed over the river Anio, before the power of the Romans could meet them, and make head against them. Whereupon great fear there was at Rome. And at the first a cruel conflict there was, and much blood shed on both parts, but no appearance of victory. But after the enemies were retired once into the camp, and that the Romans had time to gather fresh forces, Tarquinius supposing his only want was in his cavalry, determined to join unto the Rhamnenses, Titienses, and Luceres, which Romulus had ordained, other Centuries or Cornets of horsemen, and them to leave unto the posterity after him, bearing his M own name. Which because Romulus had done aforetime by the counsel and advise of Augurs, Accius Navius renowned and famous in those days for his skill that way, opposed himself and gave out plainly, that there might be nothing changed or newly ordained in that behalf, unless the birds first approved and allowed the same. Whereat the King was wroth, and in scorn and derision of his art, as they say: Come on Sir Soothsayer (quoth he) areed, and tell me by the flight of your birds, whether that may possibly be done, which I now conceive in my mind. To which demand Navius, who had first made proof therof by his learning, answered resolutely, that it might in very deed be effected. Why then (quoth he) I have imagined in my conceit, that thou shalt cut a whetstone asunder with a rasor: Here take them to thee, and dispatch that which thy fowls foreshew may be done: then as the report goeth, without more ado, he cut the whetstone quite in two. And in that N very place where this feat was done, the Statue or Image of Accius was erected, with his head covered, even in the Comitium, at the stairs therof on the left hand of the Curia or Council house. It is reported that the whetstone also was set up in the same place, for a memorial to all posterity following, of that miracle. Certainly, both Auguries, and the Priesthood and Colledg of Augurs from that time forward was so highly honored, and had in such reverence, that never after was there ought done, either in war abroad, or in peace at home, but by their counsel and advise. Assemblies of people summoned were dismissed, armies levied and ready to take the field were discharged, yea, and the greatest affairs of State, were given over and laid aside, when the birds allowed not thereof. Neither did Tarquin for that time alter the Centuries of the horsemen any whit, only he redoubled the number, so that in three Centuries or Cornets there were 1300. horse: and those O later sort who were added to the others, bare the names of the former, which at this day, because they be double, are called the six Centuries. Tarquin thus having encreased that part of his power, bade the Sabins battel the second time. And over and besides, that the Romans army was in strength well amended. he devised also privily a subtile stratagem, and set certain men to set on fire a mighty stack of wood, lying upon the bank of Anio, and so to cast it into the river: the wood burning still by the help of the wind, and most of it being driven against the piles of the bridge,

A and there ſticking cloſe together with the boats and planks, fired and conſumed it clean. This accident both terrified the Sabins in their fight, and when they were diſcomfited, troubled them much, and hindred their flight: ſo that many a man having eſcaped the enemy, yet periſhed in the very river. Whoſe armor and weapons floating down the Tyber, were known at Rome, and brought news thither of this victory, in manner before word could be brought thereof by land. In this conflict the horſemen won greateſt price and praiſe. For being placed at the skirts of both the wings, at what time as the main battel of their own footmen, were now at the point to retire, they charged ſo forcibly upon the enemy (as it is reported) from the flanks where they were marſhalled, that they not only ſtayed the Sabin Legions preſſing hard and fiercely upon thoſe that be-B gan to ſhrink and give back, but all at once put them to fight. The Sabins ran amain towards the mountains, but few gat thither: for the greater number, as we ſaid before, were by the horſemen driven into the river. Tarquinius thinking it good to take the time, and follow hard upon them whiles they were frighted, after he had ſent to Rome, the booty with the priſoners, and burned on a great heap together (as he had vowed to Vulcan) the ſpoils of the enemies, marched on ſtill forward, and led his army into the Territory of the Sabins: who albeit they had already ſuſtained an overthrow, and could not hope for better ſucceſs, yet becauſe they had no time to conſult and adviſe with themſelves, with ſuch a power as might on a ſudden in that ſtir be raiſed, met with him. Where they once again were defeated and vanquiſhed, and in the end being in deſpair to make their part good, they ſued for peace. Then was Collatia, and all the lands about it taken from the C Sabins, Egerius the Kings brothers ſon, was left with a garriſon at Collatia to keep that place. And (as I find upon record) the Collatins were yeelded into his hands, and the manner of their ſurrender went in this order. Firſt, the King demanded thus and ſaid: Are ye Embaſſadors, or deputed aſſigns ſent from the people of Collatia to make ſurrender both of your ſelves and the Collatines? We are (quoth they.) And are the people of Collatia in their own power, and at liberty to do what they will? They are (ſay they.) Do ye alſo render up your ſelves, the people of Collatia their town, their territory and lands, their waters, their limits, their temples, their houſhold ſtuff and implements, and all thing elſe, as well ſacred as prophane, unto my power and the peoples of Rome, We do yeeld (ſay they.) Then (quoth he) do I accept thereof, and receive all into my hands. The Sabin war thus finiſhed, Tarquinius returned to Rome in triumph. After this, he warred D upon the old Latines, but they never proceeded ſo far on any ſide, as to join iſſue in a general battel, and one ſet field for all. But bringing his power firſt to one town, and after to another, he made a conqueſt of the whole nation of the Latins. So as theſe towns, Corniculum, old Ficulnea, Cameria, Cruſtumerium, Ameriola, Medullia, Nomentum, were recovered from the old Latines, or from thoſe that had revolted unto them.

After all this enſued peace. Then was he more earneſtly bent to go forward with his works, begun in time of peace, then he was before buſied in managing of his wars: inſomuch, as he gave the people no more repoſe at home, then he had in wars abroad. For beſides that he prepared to compaſs the City (which as yet he had not fortified) round about with a ſtone wall, the beginning of which piece of work was by the Sabin war interrupted and broken off: he deviſed alſo certain
E draughts or vaulted ſinks from aloft into the Tyber, whereby he drained and kept dry the baſe City, or loweſt grounds about the market place, and the other vallies between hill and hill, for that out of the plains and flats, they might not eaſily make riddance and conveyance away of the water. Moreover, he levelled a large court or plot of ground, ready for the foundation of the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitol, which he had vowed in the Sabin war, his mind even then giving him, that one day it ſhould be a ſtately place.

At the ſame time there hapned in the court a wonderful ſtrange thing, both in preſent view, and alſo in conſequence. For as the report went, a young lad, whoſe name was Servius Tullius, as he lay aſleep, in the ſight of many perſons had his head all on a light fire. And upon an outcry raiſed at the wondering of ſo great a matter, the King aroſe: and when one of the houſhold brought wa-
F ter to quench the flame, he was by the Queen ſtayed. And after the ſtir was ſomewhat appeaſed, ſhe forbade the boy to be diſquieted, until ſuch time as he awoke of himſelf: and within a while as the ſleep departed, the blaze likewiſe went out, and vaniſhed away. Then Tanaquil the Queen taking her husband aſide into a ſecret room. "See you this boy (quoth ſhe) whom we ſo homely "keep, and in ſo poor and mean eſtate bring up? Wot well this, and know for certain, that he will "one day be a light to direct us in our dangerous troubles and doubtful affairs: he will be the chief "pillar and ſuccour of the afflicted ſtate of the Kings houſe. Let us therfore cheriſh and foſter with "all kindneſs and indulgence the ſubject matter of ſo great a publick and private ornament. Wherupon they began to make much of the boy, as if he had been one of their own children, and to inſtruct and train him up in thoſe arts, whereby forward wits are ſtirred to great enterpriſes, and to G atchieve high place of wealth and honor. And ſoon came to that paſs, which pleaſed the almighty gods. For he proved a young man indeed of princely nature and towardneſs: in ſuch ſort that when there ſhould be a ſon in law ſought out to match with Tarquinius his daughter in marriage, there was not one of all the young gentlemen of Rome to be found comparable to him in any reſpect. So as the King affianced his daughter unto him. This ſo great honor whereunto he was advanced, upon whatſoere cauſe or occaſion it was, induceth me to think he was not the ſon of a bondwoman, nor that he ſerved whilſt he was a little one, as a ſlave. I am of their mind rather, that report thus:

Tanaquil the Queen unto king Tarquinius.

When

When Corniculum was won, the wife of Servius Tullius, a great Lord and principal personage of H that City, and there slain, was left great with child: and being among other captives known whose wife she was, in regard of her rare nobility only, was by the Queen preserved from servitude, and at Rome in Priscus Tarquinius his house, was delivered of a child: upon which so special favor, there grew more familiar acquaintance between the two Ladies, the Queen and her self; and the child also brought up of a little one there in Court, was both tenderly beloved, and also highly regarded.
But his mothers fortune, whose hap was after her country was lost, to fall into the hands of enemies, caused men commonly to think that he was the son of a bond-slave. Now in the 38th. year almost, after that Tarquinius began his reign, was this Servius Tullius in right great estimation and credit, not only with the King, but also with the nobility and commons. Then the 2. sons of An- I cus, who as they always before disdained in the highest degree, that they were by the deceitful practise of their guardian, so unworthily put by the inheritance of their fathers Kingdom, and that a stranger raigned at Rome, one who was not descended of any neighbor house thereby, no nor so much as of Italian blood: so now they began much more to take stomach and indignation, in case that after Tarquinius, the Kingdom should not return unto them and their line, but should still run on end, and headlong wise fall unto such base varlets: That in the same City, 100. years almost after that Romulus the son of a god, and a god himself, raigned therein, (during the time he remained here upon the earth) a very bond-slave and no better, and one born of a bond-woman, should be possessed of the Crown: and that it would be a foul stain and dishonor generally to the name of the Romans, but most especially to their house & family, if whilst the issue Male of Ancus lived, the K Kingdom of Rome should lie open, and be expoted, not to strangers alone, but which is more, to very bond-men and slaves. This ignominy therefore, and open wrong, they resolve by meer force to put by and avoid: howbeit, the grievance of this injury done unto them, set them on against Tarquinius himself, rather then Servius Tullius; both for that the King if he lived still, would be a more sharp revenger of the murder, then a private person: and also if they should happen to kill Servius, whomsoever besides, the King would vouchsafe for his son in law, him was he like to make heir apparent, and inheritor also of the Kingdom. For these considerations they lay wait for to murder the King himself in this manner: There were for the purpose to do this feat, two passing stout and sturdy herdmen chosen, who having such rustical iron tools about them, as they were wont both of them to occupy, and made a great shew of a most tumultuous brawl and fray in the L very porch of the Court gate: by which means, they drew all the Kings officers, sergeants, and guard about them: then as they called with a loud voice, both the one and the other upon the King, in such wise, as the noise was heard within the palace, they were convented before his Highness. At their first coming they cried out both at once, and interrupted one another in all outragious manner, so as by a sergeant they were fain to be restrained and commanded to speak by turns, until at length they gave over their confused brawlings. Then one of them on set purpose, as it was before L. Tarquinius the King killed. agreed upon, began his tale: and while the King as wholly bent to give ear turned aside towards him, the other lift his Ax aloft, and struck the King on the head, and leaving it sticking there still in the wound, they whipt out both of them together, and ran their ways. And whilst they that stood next about Tarquinius, took him up ready to die, the sergeants made after them that were M fled, and apprehended them. Whereupon an outcry arose & a great concourse of people, wondring what the matter might be. Tanaquil in this hurliburly caused the Court gates to be shut, and commanded every one to avoid the place: and at one instant with great diligence provideth things requisite to cure the wound, as if there were some hope of life: and withal, if that should fail, she prepareth other means and remedies against the worst that might happen. Sending therefore in all speed for Servius, when she had shewed him her husband half dead, and already bloodless: she took him by the right hand, and besought him not to suffer, either the death of his father-in-law unre-Tanaquil to Servius. venged, or his wives mother, to be a laughing stock unto the enemies. Thine is the kingdom O Ser-
"vius by right (quoth she) if thou be a man: and not theirs, who by the hands of others have com"mitted a most shameful & villainous fact. Take a good heart therfore, and arm thy self, and follow N
"the guidance and direction of the gods, who long since by a divine and heavenly flame burning
"about thy head, foreshewed that one day it should be highly advanced. Now let that heavenly
"blaze raise thee up: now awake in every deed: what man! we also being strangers have born the "Scepter: consider with thy self who thou art now, and not from whence thou art descended. And "if in so sudden an occurrence, thine own wits be astonied, and to seek, then follow my rule, and be "advised by my counsel. In this while the noise and violence of the people was so great, that it "could not well be suffered. Then Tanaquil from the upper loft of the house, out at a window that opened into the new street (for the King kept his Court hard by the Temple of Jupiter Stator) Tanaquil to the people. spake unto the people willing them to be of good cheer. "The King indeed (quoth she) was ama-
"sed and swooned at the sudden stroak, howbeit it went nothing deep: for now is he come again O
"to himself, his wound cleansed from blood, and searched: all signs of life, and no danger of death:
"and I trust in God within a whil you shall see himself again. In the mean time his pleasure is, that "the people shall be obeysant to Servius Tullius; he shall minister justice and give laws, he shall "execute and perform all the offices of the King. Then came Servius abroad in his royal robe, "called Trabea, attended with the Lictors: and sitting in the Kings throne some causes he dispatch-
"eth himself, of others some he maketh as though he would consult and confer with the King.

Thus

A Thus for certain daies, the King being dead, and his death concealed, he, under colour of executing the function of another, gathered ſtrength to himſelf. But when at the laſt it was openly known by the wailing and lamentation which aroſe in the Palace, that the King was departed, Servius accompanied with a ſtrong guard, ſhewed himſelf and was the firſt, that without the election of the people only by the will and conſent of the nobles, took the Kingdom upon him. Servius Tullius taketh the Crown upon him.

The ſons of Ancus at the firſt, ſeeing the murderers attached, and hearing that the King was alive, and Servius ſo mighty, retired themſelves as baniſhed perſons to Sueſſa Pometia. And Servius now ſought means to make himſelf ſtrong, as well by private helps, as by publike. And leſt peradventure the children of Tarquinius ſhould another day be as ill affected againſt him, as the chil-
B dren of Ancus were againſt Tarquinius, he gave in marriage his two daughters to Lucius and Aruns, two of the Kings ſons late deceaſed. Yet could not he with all the policy of mans wit ſtay the fatall neceſſity, nor ſtop and divert the courſe of the deſtinies; but that the envy that followeth a Kingdom bred all diſtruſt, diſloyalty, and malice, even among thoſe of his own houſhold, for all their alliance and affinity. Howbeit, in very good time, and fitly for the quietneſs of the preſent ſtate, was the war with the Veientes (for now was the term of the truce expired) and other Tuſcans, taken in hand. In which war, both the valour, and alſo the good fortune of Tullius was well ſeen and greatly renowned. Who having diſcomfited a mighty hoſt of the enemies, as undoubted King in the conceit and judgment as well of the Senators as of the Commons, if their hearts had been ſounded, returned to Rome.

C Then in hand went he with a work of peace, and of all other the greateſt, and of moſt importance. To the end, that as Numa was the firſt author of divine Law and Religion: ſo the poſterity for ever after might report and record, that Servius was the founder of all diſtinction and order; whereby between degrees of worſhip and wealth, there might be ſeen due difference, and regard of worth. For he deviſed and ordained the Cenſe, to wit, the Aſſeſſing, and Taxation of the Citizens: a thing moſt profitable to that ſtate and government, which was like in time to come to grow ſo mighty. By which Cenſe, the charges and contributions, either in war or peace, was not levied by the poll upon the Citizens, as aforetime, but according to the valuation of their wealth and ability. So he erected certain Claſſes and Centuries, and appointed their degrees, according to the aſſeſſing, and valuation, meet in decent manner to ſerve in war, and meet to be employed in D peace. And firſt of thoſe who were rated at an * hundred thouſand Aſſes and above, he ordained 80 Centuries; 40 of the elder ſort, and as many of the younger: and all joyntly were counted the firſt Claſſis. The elder were charged to be in readineſs at all hours, for defence of the City: the younger to follow the wars abroad. Theſe were bound to find harneſs, for defence of their own bodies, an headpiece or morion, a ſhield, greeves, and corſelet, all of braſs: and for offence of the enemy, a javelin, and a ſword. To this Claſſis were adjoyned two Centuries of Carpenters and Smiths, or Enginers, who were in wage, and ſerved without armour: and their charge was to find the Campe Engines of battery and artillery. The ſecond conſiſted of thoſe that were valued between 100000 and * 75000 Aſſes. And of this ſort both young and old were enrolled twenty Centuries: who were enjoyned to provide for their armour, a target or buckler inſtead of a E ſhield; and excepting only a corſelet, in all points as the former. The third he would have to be of thoſe that were eſteemed worth * 50000 Aſſes, and as many Centuries of them, and with the ſame diſtinction of age. Neither concerning their armour was any thing altered: only for their greeves they were diſpenſed with. In the fourth Claſſis were thoſe that were aſſeſſed in the Subſidy book, between 50000 and * 25000 Aſſes, and of them were ſo many Centuries. Their armour was changed, having no more but a ſpear and a caſting dart, with a loop called Verutum. The fifth was greater, containing thirty Centuries. Theſe carried with them ſlings and ſtones to fling afar off: among whom were reckoned the beadles or criers, together with the trumpeters and cornettiers, who were divided into three Centuries. This band ſtood of them that were aſſeſſed from 25000 unto * 11000 Aſſes. The valuation under this compriſed all the reſt of the multi-F tude. Whereof aroſe one Century, freed and exempted from warfare. Thus having furniſhed and diſpoſed the forces of the Infantry, he enrolled beſides twelve Centuries of horſemen, and thoſe out of the principall men of the City: and ſix other Centuries likewiſe, to thoſe three that Romulus inſtituted, retaining the ſame name ſtill that they in their firſt ſolemn inſtitution had. Theſe horſemen for to buy their great horſes had * 10000 Aſſes out of the chamber of the City a peece: and for to find and keep thoſe horſes were the rich widdows ſet yearly at * 2000 Aſſes a peece. Thus were all theſe charges and burdens ſhifted from off the poor mens ſhoulders, and laid upon the rich. And therefore afterward was their dignity and honour ſo much the more. For in the grand-leets and ſolemn elections of Magiſtrates, every man had not prerogative alike, nor equall authority, as Romulus firſt ordained, and the other Kings continued, when they gave their G voices by the poll indifferently, one with another: but there was diſtinction made, and certain degrees; but ſo, as neither any one was excluded or ſhut out, and yet the whole reſted and lay in the power of the richer ſort, and chief of the City. For firſt the horſemen were called: afterward, the eighty Centuries belonging to the firſt Claſſis, of the principall footmen: who if they diſagreed, and hapned to be at any difference, then the Centuries of the ſecond Claſſis were cited. And never went they likely ſo low as to the laſt of all. Neither ought any man to marvell, that this order in theſe daies, after five and thirty tribes compleat, agreeth not with the Centuries of the elder and yonger ſort, according to the computation ſet down by Servius Tullius, conſidering their number is now doubled. For having divided the City into four Wards, according to the quarters and hils; thoſe parts which were inhabited he called Tribes, of the word Tribute (as I ſuppoſe.) For he it was that deviſed and brought up the manner of equall contribution and paiment, proportionably to the aſſeſsment and rate of mens goods. Neither were theſe Tribes any waies at all reſpective to the diviſion or number of the Centuries aforeſaid. When this Levy and taxation was finiſhed, which he diſpatched the ſooner, by reaſon of the peoples fear of an act by him made, concerning thoſe that ſhould not come in to be regiſtred and enrolled in the Subſidy book; he publiſhed an Edict, under pain of impriſonment and death, that all Citizens of Rome, as well horſemen as footmen, ſhould the morrow after at the break of day, every one in his own Century, ſhew himſelf in Campus Martius, i.e. in Mars field. There, after he had muſtered and embattelled the whole Army, he aſſoiled and purged the ſame with the ſacrifice of a Swine, a Sheep, and a Bull. And this was called Conditum Luſtrum. Which was the very cloſing up and accompliſhment of the aſſeſſement. In this Luſtrum there were numbred and aſſeſſed 80000 Citizens. Fabius Pictor, a moſt ancient writer ſaith moreover, that ſo many there were of able men to bear arms. For to contain this multitude, it was thought good the City ſhould be enlarged. Whereupon he adjoyneth unto it two hils more, to wit, Quirinalis, and Viminalis. After this, he proceeded to augment the mount Eſquilie: and to grace that hill, and make it of more reputation, there he dwelt himſelf, and had his Court. He caſt a trench and ditch, and raiſed a rampire about the City, and then walled it: by occaſion whereof, he ſet out the Pomœry further. Pomœrium, according to the Etymology and literall ſignification of the word, is as much to ſay, as Poſtmœrium, or the Arriermure, that is, a plot of ground behind, or without the wall. But indeed it is rather a ſpace about the wall on either ſide, which the Tuſcans in old time, when they built their Cities, uſed by advice of Augurs, to hallow and conſecrate in certain bounds and limits, all along where they minded to ſet the wall: that neither within, the houſes might joyn upon the wall (whereas now adaies they build cloſe to) and without alſo there might be a void piece of ground, lying common, free, and unoccupied of men. This vacant ſpace, that neither might lawfully be inhabited, nor yet eared and plowed, as well becauſe it was without the wall, as the wall without it, the Romans called Pomœrium. And ever as the circuit of the City was made larger, look how much the walls ſhould be ſet out further ſo far thoſe hallowed and conſecrated bounds of the Pomœry were extended.

Thus the City being much increaſed in compaſs of building, and all things diſpoſed in good order, requiſite as well for war as peace; to the end, that he ſhould not alwaies ſeek to purchaſe wealth and puiſſance by war and martiall proweſs only, he attempted to amplifie his dominion by policy, and withall to beſtow upon the City ſome glorious ornament to beautifie the ſame. And even at that time was the Temple of Diana at Epheſus, of great fame, and much renowned: which as the report went, was built in common by all the ſtates and princes of Aſia. When as therefore Servius would uſe highly to praiſe and commend unto the Lords and heads of the Latines (with whom of purpoſe he had both in publike and private, mutual entertainment and familiar acquaintance) that generall agreement of the Princes of Aſia, in matters of religion, and in the uniform worſhip of the ſame gods: at length, by much iterating and following ſtill that theam, he prevailed with them ſo far, that the nations of the Latines, and the people of Rome together, built at Rome a Temple unto Diana: which was a plain confeſſion, and clear caſe, that Rome was now the imperiall ſeat, for which they had ſo often warred. This quarrell, albeit now the Latines all in a manner had neglected quite, and made no care at all thereof, ſeeing they had ſo often attempted it by force of arms, and ſped ſo badly: yet fortune ſeemed to one only man to caſt a favourable aſpect, and yeeld good hope, by his private policy and induſtry, to recover again the imperiall dignity unto the Latines. A certain houſholder forſooth, of the Sabins, had, as they ſay, a cow bred with him of a wonderfull bigneſs, and faire withall, (for a memoriall of which ſo rare and wonderfull beaſt the horns were ſet up, and remained faſt fixed in the porch of Dianas Temple, many a hundred years after:) this was ſuppoſed (as it was no leſſe in very deed) a ſtrange and prodigious thing: and the wiſe men or wizards propheſied, that the ſoveraignty and Empire ſhould be ſetled and eſtabliſhed in that State, whereof any one Citizen ſacrificed that cow unto Diana. This propheſie came to the ears of the Prieſt of Dianas Temple. The Sabin aboveſaid, ſo ſoon as he had eſpied a meet and convenient day for ſacrifice, drives the cow to Rome, and leads her to the Temple of Diana, and there preſented her before the Altar: where the Roman Prieſt wondring to ſee ſo huge a beaſt, whereof there had been ſo much ſpeech, and calling to mind withall the foreſaid Oracle, ſpake to the Sabin in this wiſe, My friend (quoth he) what mean you to ſacrifice ſo uncleanly unto Diana, and do not rather purifie and waſh your ſelf all over in ſome running ſtream, before you come hither? Lo where Tyber runneth in the valley beneath. The ſtranger then, moved with ſome ſcruple of conſcience, who deſired nothing more, than that all ſhould be well and orderly done, that an happy ſucceſs might be correſpondent and anſwerable to ſo prodigious a beaſt, forthwith went down to the Tyber. In the mean while, the Roman killed the Cow in honor of Diana. This thing pleaſed the King and the whole City wonderfull well.

Servius, albeit he were now without all queſtion by ſo long continuance, fully and really inveſted in the Kingdom; yet becauſe he heard ſay, that young Tarquinius otherwhile gave out ſpeeches of him, that he raigned without the nomination and election of the people: therefore after he had

A first wan the hearts of the Commons, by dividing among them every one certaine lands gotten by conquest from the enemies, he adventured to propound unto the people, and put it to their suffrages and voices, Whether their will and pleasure was, that he should raign over them. Thus was he declared King with as great consent, as never any before with the like. But Tarquinius for all this, had nevertheless hope to aspire and attain unto the Crown: nay, rather so much the more, because he understood the said division of the lands among the Commons, was a thing concluded and passed against the will and mind of the Senators. Taking therefore occasion thereby to accuse and blame Servius before them, he supposed he had good means offered to wind himself into favor with the Lords of the Senate, and so to become strong in the Council-house. Over and besides, he was B both himself a young man of great courage and hot stomack, and his wife likewise at home, dame Tullia, lay ever upon him, and pricked forward his distempered and troubled mind: for you must think, that the royall Court of Rome also hath brought forth and afforded one example of a tragicall and horrible act: that by a wearinesse and loathing conceived against the Kings government, liberty and freedom might the sooner ensue: and that raign be the last, which was by mischief gotten first. This L. Tarquinius, whether he were the son or nephew of Priscus Tarquinius, it is not very clear, howbeit, I would rather think with most writers, that he was his son. A brother he had, Aruns Tarquinius, a young gentleman of a mild nature. These two (as is aforesaid) had married the two Tulliæ, the Kings daughters, and they also themselves were in conditions far unlike. And happily it so fell out that two froward and violent natures were not coupled together in wedlock: such C was the good fortune, I beleeve, of the Roman people, that thereby the raign of Servius might continue the longer, and the City brought and setled in good order. The younger Tullia, a stout dame and a proud, grieved and vexed much that her husband had nothing in him, no metall or matter at all either to covet and desire, or to enterprise and adventure: her mind was fully set upon the other Tarquin, him she esteemed highly, and had in admiration, him she said to be a man indeed, and descended of royall bloud. As for her sister, she despised and checked her, for that she having a forward and valorous Knight to her husband, sat still, and seconded him not in audacity and boldnes, as a woman should do. Well, in short time likenes and disposition soon brought them together, and as it is commonly seen, Naught will to naught, and sort best together. But the mischief and trouble that brought all up-side down, arose from the woman. For she using to have secret D conference with her sisters husband, never ceased to speak badly, and to rail of her own husband unto his brother, and of her sister unto her husband. "Affirming in good earnest, it were better "both for her self to be a widow, and for him to live single, and without a wife, than so to be mis- "matched as they were, and through the craven cowardise of others to languish and come to no- "thing. As for her self, if the gods had given her an husband according to her own quality and "worthines, she doubted not to see, and that very shortly, the Crown in her own house, that now "she seeth in her fathers. In this manner possesseth she quickly the humorous young man, and filled his head with her own rashnes and follies. Now when Aruns Tarquinius, and the elder Tullia, who died just in a manner both at one time, had well rid their own houses, and made way and overture for a new marriage, it was not long but they were married, with Servius his leave and con-E nivency, rather than his good liking. But then every day more than other began Tullius to be a continuall mote in their eies, his old age hatefull, and his raign more odious: for now the woman minded nothing but one mischief upon another: and would not suffer her husband to be at rest night nor day, lest peradventure the former murders done and past, should serve to no purpose, and miss the effect of their designments. And thus she brake out and said, That she wanted not before one that carried the name of an husband, with whom she served, and kept her self quiet and said nothing. "But she had a want of one, that thought himself worthy of a kingdom, that remem- "bred he was the son of Tarquinius Priscus, that loved better to be seised of a Crown and scepter "indeed, than hope for a kingdom, and hear thereof. But sir (quoth she) if you be the man to whom "I take my self wedded, then I call you both husband and king: if not, then is our case changed for F "the worse, in that cowardlines is accompanied now with wickednes. Why resolve you not? "why arm you not your self, and go about this business? you need not go so far as to Corinth or "Tarquinii, for to seek and compass forrain kingdoms, as your father did. The gods of your own "house and native country, the image and example of your father, the Kings Palace, and therein "the royall seat and throne of estate, yea, the very name of Tarquin, create th, name th, and saluteth "you King. But an if your heart will not serve you to these designs, why bear you the world in hand "and deceive them? why take you so upon you as you do, to shew your self as a kings son? Get "you hence to Corinth again, away to Tarquinii, turn backward to your former stock and condi- "tion, more like to your brother than to your father. With these and such like motives, by way of reproof she checked the young man, set him on and pricked him forwards, and she her self for her G part could be at no repose, for thinking that Tanaquil, an alien and stranger born, could contrive in her head, and effect so great a matter, as to make two kings together one after other, namely, her husband first, and afterwards her son in law: and she her own self, a Kings daughter, could bear no stroke either in giving or taking away a kingdom. Tarquinius kindled with these furies and temptations of a woman, went about, laboured and made court to the Nobles, especially those that were Minorum gentium: oftentimes putting them in mind of the pleasures and favours that his father had done them, and requiring now of duty the like good turn at their hands. The young men the partly with great promises, what wonders would he do, and partly with raising slanders upon the King in all places, and charging upon him odious crimes, he grew very great and mighty. At the last, espying a convenient time to set on foot, and put in execution his intended projects, with a strong guard of armed men, he entred forcibly into the Forum or common place of assembly, whereat the people all surprized with great feare, he sat him down upon the Kings throne, even at the entrance of the Curia or Senate house, and there, by the voice of the crier summoned the Senators to counsell before King Tarquinius. Who forthwith there assembled together: Some, thereto made and prepared aforehand: others, for fear lest their not coming might turn them to displeasure.

And as they were astonied at this strange and wonderful sight, so they thought Servius utterly un- I touching the first pedigree or parentage of Servius: "saying, that he being a slave, & born of a bond-

"woman, after the cruel and shamefull death of his father Tarquin, usurped the Kingdom: not by "means of an Interregn, as the order was aforetime, nor by a solemn assembly, and the free voices "of the people, nor yet by the assent of the nobles, but only through the wile and fraud of one wo"man. And as he was (quoth he) thus born and thus created King, so hath he been a partial favorer "ever of the basest sort, even such as himself; and in hatred of the noble birth of others hath divi"ded amongst the vilest persons, lands taken from the chief men of the City; and all such burdens "and charges, as had been in times past common to all, he hath cast upon great personages of quali"ty and worth, and set up an assessing or taxing, that the state of the wealthier persons being made K
"known and exposed to envy, he might bring them into disgrace with the people, and bestow their "goods upon the poorest and neediest at his pleasure. Amidst this Oration of his came Servius in place, advertised of the matter by a fearful messenger in all haste. And presently began to cry out with a loud voice at the very porch or entry of the Curia: "What is here ado, (quoth he) and what
"meaneth this O Tarquin? how darest thou during my life, assemble the Senators or sit on my seat?
"Whereunto he stoutly made a proud answer, that he did but keep his fathers throne, and being "as he was, a Kings son, he deemed himself more worthy to be inheritor of the Kingdom than a "bondslave: and as for him, he had been suffered long enough to play with his good Masters, and "to insult over his betters. With this arose a great clamour from the partakers and complices of both sides: the people they ran from all parts to the Councill-house, and like it was, that the stron- L ger should be King. Then Tarquinius being put to his shifts, and forced to try the utmost, seeing no other remedy, took Servius by the middle, as being himself much yonger and stronger far, carried him out of the Council-house, and threw him down from the stairs head to the foot, and so returned again into the Senate-house, to get the Senators together. The Kings Officers with the guard attending upon him, fled. Himself well near dead, with certain of his courtiers and train, breathless also for fear, made speed, and retired towards his Pallace, as far as to the top of Cyprius street, where Servius Tullius killed. he was overtaken by them that were sent by Tarquinius, and so slain outright. And it is verily thought, that this was done by the suggestion and procurement of Tullia; so little disagreeth it from other wicked pranks of hers. But this one thing is known for certainty, that she came riding in her coach into the common place of assembly, and nothing dismaied or abashed at the presence M of so many men there met together, called forth her husband out of the Senate-house, and was the first that stiled him with the title of King. By whom she being willed to depart away out of that throng and uprore as she returned homward as far at the pitch of Cyprius street, where was of late a place consecrated unto Diana, called Dianium, the coachman that had the guiding and driving of the steeds as he turned the chariot on the right hand up to the cliff Virbius, for to pass up to the hill Esquilia, suddenly staid for fear, and reined in his horses, and shewed unto his Lady and Mistris Servius lying there murdered. And hereof followed (as the report goeth) a beastly part, and beyond all sense of humanity, which the very place doth witness still at this day, called thereupon Sceleratus Vicus, i.e. the wicked street: wherein the raging and frantick woman Tullia, hurried with the furies and haunted with the ghosts of her sister and husband, caused (men say) her chariot to be N driven over her fathers dead corps; and being her self besprinkled and beraied with the bloudy chariot, carried home with her some part of it in token and witness, that her hand was in this parricide and murder of her own father: to the end, that she might provoke her own domesticall gods and her husbands to wrath and displeasure: and so consequently, as they entred their raign with mischief and wickedness, they might soon after be turned out thereof with shame and infa-
my. Servius Tullius raigned four and fourty years, in such wise carrying himself, as it were hard, even for a good and staid Prince that should succeed him, to follow his steps. This made moreover for his glory and fame, that together with him died all right and lawfull government of Roman Kings. And even that regiment of his, so mild, so gracious, and temperate as it was: yet because it rested in the absolute power of one man, he was minded, as some do write, to have forgone and O given over had not this wicked intestine practise from his own family come between, to prevent and cut off his good designs and intent to set his country free.

After him began to raign Tarquinius, for his insolent acts surnamed Superbus, i.e. the proud.
For he would not suffer his wives father (unkind son in law he) to be interred: saying oftentimes in jibing manner, that Romulus also died and was never buried. Moreover, the principall heads of his Peers and Nobles, such (as he thought) had favoured Servius his proceedings, and took

A part with him, those he made away and slew. Afterwards, fearing upon the guilt of his own conscience, that he had given an ill precedent for others, to take vantage against himself, attaining to the Crown so lewdly; he retained therefore a guard of armed men about his body: and in very truth, setting only might aside, no other right had he to wear the diadem, as who raigned neither by peoples election nor Senators approbation. Over and besides all this, to the end he might sit safely in his seat by servile fear and dread, who reposed no trust nor hope in the love of his subjects; therefore to strike the greater terror into them, and hold them in awe, he by himself alone without assistance of any counsell, sate upon all matters of life and death: by means whereof he was able to kill, banish, and condemn in forfeiture of lands and goods, not those only whom he suspected and hated, B but also them, from whom he could look for nothing else but spoil. Thus when he had decaied the number of the nobles especially, he purposed to chuse no new in their place, for to make supply: to the end, that the fewer they were, the more contemptible the whole order might grow: and with less discontent put up the indignity, that they were not employed in the State, nor ought done by their advice. For this King was the first that abolished the custome received and continued by all others afore him, of consulting with the Senate in all matters, & managing nothing without them. He governed the Commonweale by himself, and after his own waies: with whom it pleased him he made war and peace, league and society, even of his own head: & would break the same as himself thought good: thus he did, and undid all at his pleasure, without regard of the peoples mind, or the Senates authority. Above all, he sought to win the hearts and good wills of the Latine na-C tion, that by support of forrain power also, he might be more secure and safe among his own people: neither entertained he with their Princes friendship and amity only, but entred also into alliance and affinity with them. For unto Octavius Mamilius a Tusculan, he gave his daughter in marriage. This Mamilius was of all Latines the principall and noblest person, lineally descended (if we may beleeve the common bruit and report) from Ulysses and Circe. By this marriage he gained many kinsfolk and friends of his new son in law. So that now Tarquinius was in great authority and reputation among the Lords and Barons of the Latines. Whereupon he gave them knowledge, and proclaimed, that upon a certain day they should all meet him at the sacred grove of Ferentina, to treat and commune together about matters concerning the common good of both States. Thither resorted they in great number betimes in the morning. And Tarquinius himself failed not for his D part to keep the very day appointed but it was sunsetting well near before he came. There, in that assembly all day long, before his coming, was much talk and reasoning, pro & contra, touching him. Turnus Herdonius of Aricida, had inveighed spightfully against Tarquinius in his absence (for his being away) saying, "It was no marvell indeed that he was at Rome surnamed Superbus (for even "then commonly they termed him so, although secretly, and in whispering wise.) For could there "be (quoth he) a prouder part plaid, than thus to mock delude, and abuse the whole state of Lati-
"um, that when their princes and nobles were cited there to appear, far from the Cities and dwel"ling houses, he only should be absent that summoned the assembly? Which verily was but a de"vice of his to try their patience, that if they once took the yoke, he might keep them still under
"as his vassals: for who seeth not what he reacheth at? even to command and Lord it over the E "Latines. And in case his own Citizens have done well, in trusting him in the rule over them (if a "man may say they trusted him, and not rather that he came foulely and forcibly by it even with "shameful murder) the Latines also may put themselves into his hands with security. And yet I see
"not why they should so do, considering he is a meer stranger and alien. But how and if his own "subjects repent, and are discontented with him, being one after another by him murdered, bani"shed, deprived, and spoiled of their goods? What better dealings may the Latines hope and look "for? Therefore if they would be ruled by him, they should depart home every man, and not keep
"the day of the Diet no more than he doth that published and proclaimed it. Whilest this seditious and dangerous person, who by these and such like factious courses was grown to be a great man and powerfull in his country, stood arguing thus, inforcing and following hard upon other F points, tending to the same effect, in cometh Tarquinius. Whereupon he brake off his speech, and all was husht. Then turned every man to salute and welcome Tarquinius: Who after silence made (being advised by some of his familiars that were next unto him, to excuse himself for coming at that time of the day) said that he had been taken to be an arbitrator or daiesman between the father and the son: and because he was desirous and carefull to procure an attonement between them and to make them good friends: he made the longer stay and came the later. Which occasion of business seeing it had disappointed them of that day, therefore the morrow after he would deliver that which he had in purpose and intended to move unto them. But Turnus (as they say) could not hold, nor put up so much as this with silence: but brake out and said again, there was no speedier deciding and taking up of any matter, than between the father and the son; a thing that G might be dispatched in few words: for if he would not obey and give place unto his father, he should abide the smart of it with a mischief. And thus the Aricine having girded as it were, and glanced at the Roman King, departed out of the Assembly. Which thing Tarquinius taking more disp easantly a good deal than he made semblance of, forthwith devised and practised to bring Turnus to his death, that he might strike the same terrour into the hearts of the Latines, wherewith he had kept under his own subjects at home. And for that he had no absolute power to cause him openly to be slain, he framed most falsely a criminall action against the guiltless man; thereby wrongfully to work his destruction. By means of certain Aricians of a contrary faction, he wrought a bondslave of Turnus with a sum of money, to suffer a number of swords privily to be conveyed into his Masters Inn or Lodging: which being done in that one night accordingly, Tarquinius somewhat before day, sent for the chief Lords of the Latines to come unto him; and pretending as though he were frighted by some strange accident, said, "That his long tarrying the day "before, (by Gods speciall providence, as it were, so appointed) was for the safety of him and them "all. For he was informed that Turnus contrived to massacre both him and the heads of their na- "tion, to the end that he alone might raign over the Latines: That he minded yesterday to have "put this plot in execution, even in the very assembly; but the deed was deferred, for that him- "self (the principall author of that meeting) whose life he sought for above all other, was not in "place: and hereupon it was (saith he) that he fared so as he did, and railed against him so bitterly "the day before in his absence; for that he by his long tarrying had put him by his hope and the "effect of his designs: and if all were true that was told him, he nothing doubted but early in the "morning at break of the day, so soon as they were set in Councill together, he would come ar- "med and well appointed with a crew of his adherents and sworn confederats: for reported it is, "(quoth he) that a number of swords & other weapons are brought into his lodging: which whe- "ther it be so or no might soon be known. And therewith he desired them to take the pains to go with him thither. And verily, considering the proud nature and haughty spirit of Turnus, together with his yesterdaies Oration, and the long stay of Tarquinius besides, for that the pretended mas- sacre seemed thereby to have been put off and prolonged, the matter became very suspicious and pregnant. Thus go they with minds verily somewhat enclined and disposed to beleeve all, and yet so, as they would think all the rest but tales and lies, unless they found the swords aforesaid. Being come to the house, and Turnus awakened out of sleep, certain warders were set to keep him on e- very side: and when they had laid hold upon his servants, who for love of their Lord and Master began to make resistance, the swords were brought forth out of all the blind corners of the hostel- ry openly to be seen: then was it a clear case and past all peradventures: and Turnus was appre- hended and irons clapt upon him. And immediatly in all haste the Latines assembled together to councill in that great tumult and uproar: Where, upon bringing forth the swords in sight before them all, they were so incensed and deadly bent against him, that he was not suffered to answer and plead for himself, but was presently at the source or spring head of the Ferentine water plunged down, and a hurdle done aloft upon him, and great stones heaped thereon, and so after a new kind of death stifled and drowned. Tarquinius then, after he had called the Latines again to the place of councill, and much commended them for duly executing Turnus, who practising thus to alter and trouble the state, was detected of a manifest intended murder, made this speech unto them: "I "might (quoth he) if I would, by vertue of ancient rites alledge and plead, that forasmuch as all the "Latines are descended from Alba, they are compriſed within that confederacy and league, "whereby in the raign of Tullus the whole Commonweal and State of Alba, together with their "inhabitants, became incorporate into the Empire of Rome. Howbeit, in regard rather of the com- "modity and weal-publike of all, I judge it requisite, that the league were renewed, and that the "Latines might enjoy and be partakers of the prosperity and happy fortune of the people of Rome, "rather than evermore to hazard and suffer the destruction and desolation of their Cities, with "the spoiling and wasting of their lands, which first in Ancus daies they tasted, and after in my fa- "thers time they had abidden & suffered. The Latines were hereto soon perswaded. And although in that league the preheminence and soveraignty rested in the Romans, yet they saw well enough that both the Heads and Rulers of the Latine Nation stood with the Roman King, and were wrought unto his hand, to side with him: and also Turnus unto them was a fresh precedent and example, to teach them what danger might betide every one that should make a part against him and cross his intention. So the alliance was renewed and proclamation made according as it was capitulated, that all the serviceable men of the Latines should at a day appointed repair in good number with their armour unto the grove of Ferentina. Who when they were there met together from all parts according to the Edict of the Roman King, to the end they should have no Cap- tain of their own to lead them, no privy watchword or regiment by themselves to direct them, nor private ensigns distinct from the rest to keep them together; he shuffled or mingled the bands and companies of Latines and Romans one with another, making one of twain, and two of one: and when he had thus doubled the bands, he set Centurions over them. And albeit he was in peace an unjust Prince, yet was he in war no bad Captain; nay, for martiall prowess he had been equall to the former Kings, had he not failed and degenerated in other things, and thereby stained and hurt his glory even in that behalf. He was the first that warred upon the Volscians, which war after his time lasted more than 200 years: and won from them by force Suessa Pometia. Where having made portsale of the pillage, and raised as much gold and silver as amounted to *40 talents, he conceived in his mind to build so stately a Temple of Jupiter as might beseem the soveraign King of gods and men, become the noble Empire of Rome, and answer the Majesty also of the very place where it was to stand. And for the rearing and finishing of this Temple, he laid that mo- ney apart, that came of the spoil aforesaid. But presently upon this was he surprised with a war that held longer than he hoped it would. For having made one assault in vain upon Gabii, a neighbour City to Rome, and despairing also of any good success by beleaguering the town,

Tarquinius against Turnus Herdonius.

Turnus Herdonius put to death.

"and was fully perſwaded in his conſcience, that the Kings pride muſt needs be odious to his ſubhe ſollicited the principall Citizens to rebell, and went himſelf daily in perſon with a crew of the moſt forward and able young men, forraging, ſpoiling, and making rodes into the Territory of the Romans, and that now through his words and deeds, which tended to fraud and deceit in the end, they began more and more to give credit unto him that one day would deceive them, he was at laſt choſen Generall for the war. And having made certain ſmall skirmiſhes between Rome and Ga- from God above to be their Captain and Protector. But with the ſouldiers, what with attempting painfull enterprizes and performing dangerous ſervice, and what with dealing prizes liberally amongſt them, it paſſed how he grew into credit, and how dearly he was beloved: inſomuch as Tar- quinius the Father was of no greater command at Rome, than Tarquinius the Son at Gabes. Thus when he ſaw he had gathered ſtrength ſufficient, and was fully furniſhed againſt all aſſaies; he diſ-ſure, ſeeing that the gods had done him this grace, that he at Gabes was able to do all in all. To F this meſſage made the King no anſwer at all by word of mouth, taking the man belike, as I verily think, for one hardly to be truſted. But as one muſing with himſelf and in a deep ſtudy what anſwer it is reported, he knapt off the uttermoſt heads and tops of the poppies. The meſſenger weary with talling for an anſwer, and waiting ſuch attendance returned to Gabes as wiſe as he came, and with-upon anger or hatred, or pride ingrafted by nature, uttered no ſpeech at all. But Sextus knowing by theſe myſticall and ſecret circumſtances, his fathers will and direction, made no more ado but ſlew

Gabins whole eſtate, deſpoiled of counſell, bereft of aid and ſuccour, yeelded without dint of ſword

Tarquinius having thus gained the town of Gabes, made peace with the nation of the Æquians, H and renued the league with the Tuscans. After this he converted his mind to the affairs of the City, among which this was the principall, to leave behind him the Temple of Jupiter, upon the mount Tarpeius, for a monument and memoriall of his raign and name. That of two Tarquins, Kings both, it might be said another day, that the father vowed it, and the son finished the same. And to the end that the floor and plot of ground, freed and exempted from all other kind of religions, might wholly be dedicated to Jupiter and his Temple, there to be built: he determined to exaugurate and to unhallow certain Churches and Chappels, which having been first vowed, by King Tatius, in the very extremity of the battel against Romulus, were after by him consecrated and hallowed. In the very beginning and founding of which work, it is said, that the divine power and I soveraign deity, moved the gods to declare the future mightines of so great an Empire. For when as the birds by signs out of the Augurs learning, admitted and allowed the exauguration and unhallowing of all other cels and chappels besides, only in that of Terminus, they gave no token to confirm the unhallowing thereof: which was taken for an ominous presage, and thus interpreted, That seeing the seat and house of Terminus was not stirred, and he the god alone that was not displaced and called forth of the limits to him consecrated; it shewed that all should remain there firm and stable for ever. This divine token of perpetuity being received for good and currant: there followed another strange and prodigious sign, portending the greatnes also of the Empire. For as they digged for the foundation of the Temple, there appeared (as they say) a mans head, face and all, whole and sound: which sight imported no doubt, and plainly foretold, that it should be K the chief Castle of the Empire, and the Capitall place of the whole world. To this effect prophesied the wizards, as well they of the City, as those whom they sent for out of Tuscan, to know their opinion and judgment. Thus was the Kings mind all wholly set upon sumptuous building, and spared for no cost. So that the pillage taken at Pometia, which was laid by for the accomplishment of the whole work, would hard and scant serve for the very foundation. And therfore I would rather give credit unto Fabius Pictor (to say nothing that he is the more ancient author of the twain) that there were but * 40 talents, and no more, than to Piso, who writeth, that there was * 4c coo pound weight of silver set by for that use. Which sum or mass of money could never be looked for to arise out of the saccage of one only City in those daies: and must needs exceed the charges of the foundation of any of these stately and magnificent buildings in this our age. The King being L thus wholly minded and bent to the finishing of the Temple, and sending for Carpenters, Masons, and other workmen, out of all parts of Tuscan, employed not only the Cities money and stock thereabout, but also had the work and labour of the common people withall. Which was no small toil of theirs, considering the travell of warfare besides: yet were they les agrieved and discontented therewith, so long as they founded and reared with their own hands the Temples of the immortall gods. But afterwards were they employed and set to other works, which as they were les in shew, so were they more painful and of greater trouble, namely, the making of scaffolds or standing-places in the Cirque or Theater; and to the conveyance of a mighty great sinke or vault under the ground for to receive and carry away all the filth and corruption of the City. To which two pieces of work, scarcely is the magnificence of our new modern buildings, in any respect com- M parable. Having in this wise held the commons in continuall labour, because he thought that a multitude of people would but over-charge and pester the City, when they were not employed some way or other, and also minded by erecting Colonies, to enlarge the Confines of his Dominions, he therefore sent part of them to inhabit and people Signia and Circeii, two strong forts and frontier towns for the defence of the City by sea and land.

Whilest he was busied in these affairs, there appeared unto him a strange and fearfull sight, namely, a serpent gliding down a pillar of wood, which having put the beholders in great fright, and caused them to flie into the Kings palace, did not so much amaze the Kings heart with sudden and momentany fear for the present, as fill his head with perplexed cares what the thing might portend. Whereas therefore the manner was to use the Calchars and wise men of Tuscan about N publike prodigious tokens only: he being much troubled in spirit, and terrified at this fearfull sight, being domesticall, and as it were touching and concerning his own person: purposed to send out as far as Delphi to the most famous and renowned Oracle in the world. And for that he durst not put any other in trust with the answers that should be delivered by the fatall lots, he addressed two of his sons to take a voyage through unknown lands in those daies, and more unknown seas into Greece. Titus and Aruns were they that went this journey, having to bear them company all the way, L. Junius Brutus. This Brutus was the son of Tarquinia, the Kings sister, a young gentleman of a far other nature and disposition than he seemed in outward shew and semblance. He having heard say, that certain principall Citizens, and his own brother among, had been by this his uncle put to death; to the intent that himself might have nothing left, either in O the parts of his mind for the King to fear, or in his outward state for him to covet and desire: resolved under the cloak of base contempt to save himself, since that in right or justice he might repose small or no safegard at all. And therefore composing and framing himself of purpose to counterfeit a noddy and a very innocent, as suffering himself and all that he had to fall into the Kings hands as an escheat, he refused not to be misnamed Brutus, a name appropriate to unreasonable creatures; that under the shadow & colour of that surname, that courage of his lying close hid,

A which ſhould one day ſet free the City of Rome, might abide the full time and appear in due ſeaſon. This Brutus being by the Tarquins brought to Delphi, as their laughing ſtock to make them paſtime by the way, rather than a meet mate to accompany them, carried with him (as men ſay) for to offer and preſent unto Apollo a golden rod within a ſtaffe of cornell wood, made hollow for the purpoſe: the very type and reſemblance by ſecret circumſtances, of his naturall diſpoſition. Thither being arrived, the young men having done their fathers commiſſion accordingly, were very deſirous and earneſt to inquire and learn of the Oracle, which of them ſhould be King of Rome. And from the bottom of the deep Vault, this anſwer, as men ſay, was delivered in their hearing: [Which of you (O young men) ſhall firſt kiſs your mother, he ſhall bear chief and ſoveraign rule in Rome.]

B The Tarquins then intending that Sextus their brother who was left behind at Rome, might neither know the anſwer, nor yet obtain the kingdom, willed the matter ſhould by all poſſible means be carried ſo ſecret as might be, and concealed from him. They themſelves agreed upon this together, to draw lots whether of them twain, when they were returned to Rome, ſhould firſt kiſs his mother. But Brutus ſuppoſing the ſpeech of Apollo his Prieſt, tended to another ſenſe, made as though he ſtumbled forward and took a fall, and ſo touched the ground with his mouth and kiſſed the earth, thinking this with himſelf, that ſhe was common mother of all mortall men. Then returned they to Rome, where they found great preparation for war againſt the Rutilians.

The Rutilians then were Lords of Ardea, A people in thoſe parts, and for thoſe times, very rich and wealthy: and that was it that gave the very occaſion and was the firſt motive of war. The Ardea beſieged by the Romans

C Roman King was deſirous both to enrich himſelf, as having about the ſumptuous building of publike works emptied his coffers: and alſo by ſome ſpoil, to mollifie and win again the hearts of his naturall ſubjects: being much diſcontented (beſides their generall miſlike of his pride otherwiſe) at his manner of government; and diſdaining greatly that they were by the King made labourers, to ſerve carpenters and maſons, and held ſo long to ſervile toil and painfull labour. The Romans aſſaied at the beginning to ſurpriſe and win Ardea by aſſault: but when that way ſped but ill, then began they to annoy and diſtreſs the enemies by laying ſiege, by caſting trenches, raiſing forts, and fabricks about the town. During this ſiege, and the ſtanding camp lying there, (as it falleth out commonly when the war is rather long and late than hot and cruell) there were granted large licenſes and paſports to and fro between the Camp and Rome, with much liberty: and

D yet more to the Principals of the Army than to the common Souldiers. And the Kings ſons had otherwhile good leiſure to feaſt and banquet one with another. Upon a time it hapned whiles they were drinking and making merry with Sextus Tarquinius in his pavilion, where Collatinus Tarquinius the ſon of Egerius ſat at ſupper; there aroſe among other good table-talk, ſome arguing about their wives: whiles every man highly praiſed and wondrouſly commended his own. And growing to ſome heat and contention thereabout: There need not many words for this matter, quoth Collatinus, for in few hours it may be known how far my Lucretia ſurpaſſeth all the reſt. The ſtory of dame Lucretia.
And therefore if there be any luſtineſs and courage of youth in us, why mount we not on horſeback, and in our own perſons go and ſee the natures and diſpoſitions of our wives? And as they ſhall be found and ſeen, taken of a ſudden, and not looking for their husbands coming, ſo let eve-

E ry man judge of them, and ſet that down for the only triall of this controverſie. They had all taken their drink well, and were prettily heat with wine: Mary, content ſay they all, and to horſe they go, and away they gallop on the ſpur to Rome. Thither were they come by the ſhutting in of the evening when it grew to be dark; and ſo forward without any ſtay to Collatia they ride. Where they find dame Lucretia, not as the Kings ſons wives, whom they had ſupriſed and ſeen afore, paſſing the time away in feaſting and rioting with their minions and companions: but ſitting up far within the night in the midſt of her houſe amongſt her maidens, hard at woollwork by candle-light. Whereupon, in this debate about their wives, the entire praiſe and commendation reſted in Lucretia: Her Husband and the Tarquins had a loving and courteous welcom at her hands. And he again for joy of the victory, invited the Kings ſons kindly and made

F them friendly cheare. There at that inſtant Sextus Tarquinius was bewitched and poſſeſſed with wicked wanton luſt, for to offer violence and villany unto Lucretia: her paſſing beauty and her approved chaſtity ſet him on fire and provoked him thereto. But for the preſent, when they had diſported themſelves all night long like luſty and pleaſant youths, they returned betimes in the morning to the Camp. A few daies after, Sextus Tarquinius, unwitting to Collatinus, attended with one only man came to Collatia, where he was again in good and friendly ſort received by them in the houſe, that ſuſpected nothing leſs than that whereabout he was come. And being after ſupper brought up into the gueſt chamber, when he thought all about him ſure, and that every body was faſt aſleep, all ſet on fire and burning in love, he ſteppeth with naked ſword in hand to Lucretia, as ſhe lay ſleeping full ſoundly, and bearing down the womans breſt with his left hand, Peace (quoth

G he) Lucretia & not a word: I am Sextus Tarquinius, I have my drawn ſword in hand: if thou once ſpeak thou ſhalt ſurely die. The ſilly woman thus ſtarting out of ſleep was ſore affright, as ſeeing no remedy but in a manner preſent death, in caſe ſhe had cried for help. Then uttered Tarquinius and confeſſed his amorous paſſion, fell to entreat and entreat again, and with his prayers intermedled threats, and went every way about her, not ceaſing by all means to ſift, to ſound and tempt the womans heart. But when he ſaw her obſtinate and invincible, and (to die for it) not relenting one jot; then, beſides the fear of death, he preſented unto her diſhonour and ſhame:

pretending that after he had massacred her, he would lay by her side in naked bed, her own man- H servant with his throat cut; that it might be voiced abroad, that she was taken and killed in filthy

For fear of this reproach and infamy, see how sinfull lust gat the victory, and conquered constant chastity: and Tarquinius in great pride and jollity, that he had by assault won the fort of a womans honour, departed thence. But wofull Lucretia, all sorrowing for so heavy a mischance, dispatched a messenger to her father at Rome, and so forward to her husband at Ardea, with this errand: That they should come unto her, each of them with one faithfull and trusty friend, and hereof they must not fail, but make all the speed they could, for that there was befallen a grievous chance and horrible. So there repaired to her Sp. Lucretius her father, accompanied with P. Valerius the son of Volesus: and Collatinus her husband, with L. Jun. Brutus. Who both together by I ting alone in her bed-chamber, all heavy and sad: and she at the coming of these her deerest friends,

The pitifull plaints of chaste Lucretia. shed tears and wept apace. How now my dear (quoth her husband) is all well? "No God wot sir,
"(quoth she again:) For how can ought be well with a woman that is despoiled of her honour
"and womanhood? The print, Collatinus, of another man is to be seen in thy own bed. Howbeit, "my body only is distained: my mind and heart remaineth yet unspotted: and that my death shall "make good and justifie. But give me first your right hands, and make faithfull promise that the "adulterer shall not escape unpunished. Sex. Tarquinius is the man, he it is, who this night past, en"tertained as a friend, but indeed a very foe in the highest degree, hath by force and violence taken "from hence with him his pleasure, a deadly pleasure, I may say, to me: and to himself also no less, K
"if ye be men of courage. All of them one after another give their assured word, comforted the wofull hearted woman, excused her self that was but forced, and laid all the blame upon him that committed the shamefull act: saying, It is the mind that sinneth, and not the body: and where there was no will and consent, there could be no fault at all. "Well (quoth she) what is his due to have,
"see you to that: as for me, howsoever I quit and assoil my self of sin, yet I will not be freed from "punishment. And never shall there by example of Lucretia, any unhoneste woman or wanton har-
"lot live a day: & thus having said, with a knife which she had close hidden under her cloaths, she Lucretia killeth her self. "stabbed her self to the heart, and sinking down forward, fell upon the floor ready to yeeld up the "ghost. Out alas, cried her husband and father hereat: and whileſt they two were in their plaints and moans, Brutus drew forth the knife out of the wound of Lucretia, & holding it out afore him, L all embrued and dropping with bloud, "Now I swear (quoth he) by this bloud, by this most chaste
"and pure bloud, before the villany wrought by the Kings son, and here before the gods I protest,
"whom I call to witness, that I will by fire and sword, and with all my might and main persecute
"and drive the country of L. Tarquinius the proud, and his ungracious wife, and the whole brood "of his children, and suffer neither him nor any else for his sake to raign as King at Rome. Then gave he the knife to Collatinus, and so to Lucretius & Valerius, who greatly amazed at this so strange occurrent, and wondring how it came to pass, that Brutus should of a sudden be so changed, and become so stout of stomack and couragious, took the same form of oath that he sware afore: and so leaving their wailing and lamentation, and wholly set upon anger and revenge, they followed Brutus as their Captain and Leader to put down and overthrow the government of Kings, and ut- M terly to root out their race. The dead corps of Lucretia, was had out of doors, brought into the market place, and there shewed. And thither, what with wondring (as the manner is) at so strange a sight, and what with the indignation of so unworthy a fact, they raised much people together.
Every man for his part was ready enough to complain of the wickedness and violence done by the Kings bloud. The sorrow of Lucretius the father on the one side, the resolution of Brutus on the other side, who rebuked and blamed all vain weeping and fooliſh moaning, moved and perswaded all that were present, that like men of valour, like true hearted Romans, they would take arms against them that demeaned themselves no better, nay, worse than ordinary enemies. And presently, the bravest and tallest young men shewed themselves forward, ready in armour, and voluntary. The rest of the youths followed streight after. And having left at Collatia the one half of their forces in N garrison, toward the gates, and set certain watches, that no man brought tidings or news unto the King and his sons of this rising and commotion, all the other were appointed in warlike manner, followed their leader Brutus, from thence directly to Rome. At the sudden coming thither of this armed multitude: no marvell if all the way whereas they passed and marched, there arose a fear and trouble among the people. But when they perceived the most substantiall and principall Citizens in the forefront, they judged whatsoever the matter meant, it was not for naught. And verily this hainous fact disquieted the minds of men no less at Rome, than it had before at Collatia. Therefore from all parts of the City there was flocking and running into the market place. And being thither come, the Bedell or common Crier, summoned the people to appeare before the Tribune of the Celeres or Captain of the guard: which office haply Brutus bare at that time. Where O
The Remonstrances of Ju. Brutus, inciting the people against the King and his bloud. he made an Oration not proceeding from that spirit, nor resembling that quality of nature which unto that day he had pretended and made shew of unto the world, for he inveighed against the violence and filthy lust of Sextus Tarquinius; the shamefull villany and not to be named, done upon the body of Lucretia: "he discoursed of her lamentable end and pitious death, and "the desolate case of Tricipitinus, bereft now of all his children: who accounted the occasion of "his daughters death a greater indignity, and more pitifull, than her very death. Moreover he "laid

A "laid abroad the pride of the King himſelf, the miſeries, the infinite toile and pains of the Com"mons, buried as it were under the ground, with cleanſing and caſting of ditches, voiding and ſar-"ming of the ſinks. Saying, that the men of Rome which were the conquerers of all nations about "them, were now of warriors become quarriers, hewers of ſtone and day-laborers. He reckoned "up alſo and put them in mind of the unworthy death and cruell murder of Servius Tullius: and
"how his daughter (oh abominable act!) rode over the corps of her father in her curſed chariot:
"And herewith he calleth on the gods that are revengers of outrages and wrongs done to parents.
Thus rehearſing theſe and other matters, much more grievous and horrible, (I verily beleeve) according as the preſent indignity at the very time doth miniſter and give utterance for, not ſo eaſily B penned and ſet down by writers that come after, he ſo mightily inflamed the multitude, that he cauſed them to depoſe the King, to deprive him of his royall ſtate and dignity, yea, and to decree and enact, that L. Tarquinius with his wife and children ſhould be baniſhed for ever. Himſelf having ſelected and armed the younger gallants who offered their ſervice, and willingly entred their names, ſet forward in perſon to the Camp lying before Ardea, for to excite the Army there againſt the King: leaving the government of the City unto Lucretius, who had before been appointed Deputy and Lieutenant there, by the King. In this time of garboile, Tullia left the palace and fled, and all the way as ſhe went, both men and women curſed and cried out upon her, and beſought the ghoſtly ſpirits and furies of parents to be avenged. When news hereof was brought into the Camp, and that the King upon theſe ſtrange tidings made haſte towards Rome, to ſtay and ſuppreſs theſe C broyls: Brutus having intelligence of his coming, turned another way becauſe he would not meet with him. And ſo at one inſtant in a manner by contrary journies came Brutus to Ardea, and Tar- quinius to Rome. But the gates were ſhut againſt Tarquinius, and inſtead of entrance, warned he was, and commanded into exile. The whole Camp received with joy Brutus the redeemer of their City. From thence were alſo the Kings ſons driven: two of them followed after their father and departed into baniſhment unto Cære, a town of the Tuſcans: as for Sextus Tarquinius, he retired himſelf to Gabes as it were into his own Kingdom: where he was murdered in revenge of old quarrels, upon malice and hatred of the people which he had brought upon himſelf in times paſt.
L. Tarquinius Superbus raigned 25 years. Thus continued the Kings Regiment at Rome, from the foundation of the City, unto the freedom and redemption thereof 244 years. Then in a ſolemn D aſſembly and election by the Centuries, held by the Provoſt of the City, according to the ordinance of Servius Tullius in his Commentaries, two Conſuls were created: L. Junius Brutus, and

The Second Book of T. Livius.

NOw will I deſcribe from henceforth, the acts both in war and peace of the people of L
Rome, a free ſtate now from this time forward: their yearly Magiſtrates and Governours: the authority and rule of Laws, more powerfull and mighty than that of men. Which freedom of theirs, the laſt Kings pride made more acceptable and welcome. As for the other Kings before him, they raigned ſo, as that they might be counted all of them, and that worthily, builders of ſundry parts of the City one after another, according as they every one by himſelf added ſtill one new place or other, for the multitude by them encreaſed to inhabit. Neither is it to be doubted, but that even the very ſame Brutus, who deſerved ſo great honor and glory for expelling the proud King Tarquin, ſhould have done the ſame to the exceeding danger of the weal publike, if for deſire of unripe and untimely freedom, he had wreſted the royall dignity and government from any of the former Princes. For what would have come of it, if that communalty M conſiſting of herdmen and fugitive ſtrangers, reſorting out of their own countries there to dwell, having under protection of a ſanctuary and priviledged place gotten liberty, or at leaſtwiſe impunity; being now freed and paſt fear of a royall Majeſty, had begun to be troubled and diſquieted, with the ruffling ſtorms and ſeditious tempeſts of the Tribuns? and in a new and ſtrange City ſown debate, and entertained variance with the Nobility, before that the ſureſt pledges of wives and children, the deareſt affection of the very place and ſoil, which requireth long time of liking and loving, had united and knit their hearts together? Certainly, the ſtate not yet come to full growth and maturity, had by diſcord faded and come to nought, which a peaceable and gracious government cheriſhed and foſtered, and by cheriſhing and nouriſhing brought to that paſs, that now being come to ripeneſs and perfection of ſtrength, it might be able to bring forth and bear N the good and wholſom fruits of liberty.

The beginning of this freedom you muſt account in regard hereof, That the Conſulary regiment was annual, and from year to year, rather than that the royall power and juriſdiction that the Kings had, was any whit abated and diminiſhed. For the firſt Conſuls had the ſame abſolute authority, held all the former royalties, and retained ſtill the regall enſigns and ornaments of ſupreme dignity. This only provided that they ſhould not both have the rods born before them, for avoiding a twofold fear and dread of their Majeſty. Brutus with the good liking and conſent of his companion in office, had the preheminence and prerogative of that honour to be done unto him alone: who had not been aforetime a greater inſtrument, and more forward to procure and recover the liberty than he was afterward a ſure maintainer and protector of the ſame. And firſt above O all other things, whileſt the people were yet greedy of this new freedom, for fear leſt they might any time after be won by entreaty or moved by gifts on the Kings part, he cauſed them to ſwear that they would never ſuffer any to be King at Rome. After this, becauſe the Senate might be of more power and greater reputation by the frequent company of that degree and order: he encreaſed their number (which had been impaired much by maſſacres, committed by the ſaid King) to the full complement of three hundred: by chuſing the chief and principall of the degree of

A Knights or horſemen. And hereof came, as they ſay, this cuſtome, to admit into the Senate both them that were before time of the ancient Nobility, and alſo thoſe that were newly choſen for the ſupply: naming theſe that were laſt enrolled, the new Senate. And a wonder it was to ſee, how much good this did to the concord of the City, and to the knitting of the hearts of Nobles and Commons together.

This done, they went in hand with Religion and Church-matters: and for that there were certain publike ſacrifices that had been uſually executed by the Kings themſelves in their own perſons: leſt therefore they ſhould not find the miſs of Kings in any reſpect nor long after them again, they create of purpoſe a King-Prieſt or ſacrificer: which ſacerdotall dignity they ordained to B be under the Arch-Prelate, leſt that this new addition and title of honour, might prejudice their freedom any jot, whereunto they had then a ſpeciall regard above all other things. And I wot not well, but I think verily they went beyond all meaſure, and were over-preciſe in the maintenance and ſtrengthening thereof every way, even in the ſmalleſt trifles, and toies of no moment. For when as nothing elſe was offenſive unto them, the name forſooth of one of their Conſuls became ſuſpected and odious unto the City, without any other ſcandall whatſoever. And thus they muttered and ſaid, "That the Tarquins had raigned over-long, and too much already: that Priſcus firſt
"began, and when after him ſucceeded King Servius Tullius, Superbus Tarquinius not having in that "time and ſpace between, forgot the Kingdom, as ſeeing another inveſted therein; by wicked "practice and violence claimed and recovered the ſame again, as the inheritance properly to his C "houſe belonging. And now that Superbus is driven out and gone, the rule and government is de"volved unto Collatinus, and there reſteth. Theſe Tarquins belike (ſay they) cannot skill how to "live as private men: giving out among, that the very name was dangerous to a free State, and in "one word, they could not endure it. Theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches at firſt were whiſpered abroad throughout all the City, by them that under-hand ſounded by little and little the hearts and diſpoſitions of men: and when theſe ſurmiſes & ſuſpitions were once buzzed into the Commons heads, and they thereby diſquieted, Brutus called them to a generall aſſembly. Where firſt and formoſt he reciteth the oath of the people, That they ſhould ſuffer none to be a King nor ought elſe in Rome, from whence might ariſe any danger to their liberty. "This oath is the thing (quoth he) that
"with all diligence, & by all means poſſible is to be maintain'd, & nothing thereto appertaining D "is to be deſpiſed and lightly regarded. As for me, I am unwilling to ſpeak, in reſpect of the per-
"ſon, neither would I ſpeak at all, but that the love and affection to the Common-weal doth o"verrule me. The people of Rome is not throughly perſwaded, that they have recovered their en"tire and perfect liberty. For as yet the Kings bloud, yea, and the Kings name, not only remaineth
"ſtill, but alſo beareth ſoveraign rule in the City: This is it that hurteth, this is it (I ſay) that hin"dered their true freedom. Now (quoth he) L. Tarquinius willingly of your own accord rid them "of their fear. We remember well, we confeſs and acknowledge, you it was that expelled the "Kings. Finiſh therefore and perfect this great benefit of yours: take away from hence the Kings

"Howbeit, this their minds give them, that together with the ſtock and houſe of the Tarquins, the "Kings rule and government will likewiſe void and depart for ever. The Conſul at this ſo ſtrange and ſudden a motion firſt wondred much, and was not able to open his mouth. But afterwards as he addreſſed himſelf and began to make a ſpeech, the heads of the City came about him, and with many prayers beſought the ſame at his hands. As for all the reſt, they prevailed full little with him. But after that Sp. Lucretius, a more grave and elder man than himſelf, of greater worth aforetime, and his father in Law beſides, took him in hand and dealt with him ſundry waies, one while by way of intreaty, otherwhiles by perſwaſions and reaſons, that he would condeſcend unto that F which the City in one general conſent required: then the Conſul fearing leſt hereafter being once out of his place and a private man again, he ſhould chance to be forced thereunto, with the loſs of his goods and ſome diſgrace perhaps beſides; reſigned up the office of the Conſulſhip, and removing all that he had away to Lavinium, quit the City and departed. Then Brutus by an act and decree of the Senate, propoſed unto the people, That all the race and linage of the Tarquins ſhould be exiled. And in a generall Seſſion of the Centuries, he created for to be his Colleague in government, P. Valerius, by whoſe aſſiſtance he had driven out the Kings.

Brutus the Conſul perſwadeth Tarquinius to give over the Conſulſhip and depart.

No man doubted now that the Tarquins were about to take arms: yet that war hapned not ſo ſoon as men looked for: but ſee (a thing that no man feared) they had like by fraud and treaſon at home to have loſt and forgone their freedom again. There was of the flower of Rome, certain G youths, & thoſe of no low degree nor baſe parentage deſcended, who in the Kings daies had lived like young Princes more looſely and at pleaſure, as companions and plaiſefellows with the young Tarquins, the Kings ſons: who ſeeking to enjoy the ſame licentious life ſtill, in this equality of eſtate wherein all others then lived, made moan and complained one to another, That the liberty of others turned to their ſervitude. "The King, ſay they, is a man, at whoſe hands one might ob"tain ſomewhat, as need required, were the cauſe right or were it wrong: where a man might find "favour and friendſhip, as who could both be diſpleaſed and angry, and alſo forgive and remit a

"things deaf and inexorable: more wholſome and commodious to the poor than to the rich and "mighty, affording no releaſe nor pardon, if one chance to treſpaſs and tranſgreſs: And a tickliſh
"point it is and perilous for a man among ſo many errours whereto our frailty is ſubject, to bear
"himſelf only upon his innocent life. Being thus of their own accord already diſcontent, ſuddenly unlooked for, there came Embaſſadors from the Kings, who without any mention at all of return, demanded only their goods again. Upon their meſſage being delivered and heard in the Senate-houſe, this debate and queſtion held them for certain daies in councill, fearing leſt that the goods not reſtored might miniſter occaſion of quarrell, and being rendred, yield maintenance and nouriſhment of war. In the mean time the Embaſſadours dealt and treated with divers perſons di- I verſly: in open ſhew, claiming only their goods, but ſecretly and under-hand, contriving how to compaſs the Kingdom for their Maſters. And under colour of procuring friends for the accompliſhment of that which they pretended, and was in queſtion, they ſounded oftentimes the minds of certain noble young Gentlemen, how they ſtood affected to their deſignments. Whoſe words and reaſons were of them gently entertained: and thereupon they delivered unto them letters from the Tarquins, and withall conferred together, and practiſed the receiving of the Kings privily by night into the City. The execution of this plot was principally committed to certain of the Vitellii and Aquilii, that were brethren. A ſiſter of the Vitellii was married unto the Conſul Brutus, by whom he had two ſons that were young men, Titus and Tiberius, whom their uncles by the mothers ſide made partakers with them likewiſe of their counſell. Beſides, there were divers K young Gentlemen (whoſe names long time hath worn out quite) made acquainted therewith. In this mean ſeaſon, their opinion in the Senate-houſe prevailed, who thought it beſt that the goods ſhould be reſtored: and the Embaſſadours upon that occaſion made ſtay in the City, for that they had gotten time of the Conſuls to provide carriage for to have away the Kings ſtuff, and other movable goods. All that time ſpent they in conſulting with the Conſpirators, and ſo importunately laboured them, untill they had procured their letters alſo unto the Tarquinii: for otherwiſe (ſay they) how will they beleeve but that their Embaſſadours make wrong report of matters ſo important. The giving of thoſe letters in pledge of their truth and plain meaning, proved to bewray and reveal their purpoſed enterpriſe. For the day before the Embaſſadours were to take their leave, and return to the Tarquins, they fortuned to ſup with the Vitelii: and whileſt the conſpira- L tors there, were in ſad and cloſe talk together, conferring at large about this new deviſed practiſe, and no man by but only themſelves (as the manner is:) a certain bondſlave chanced to overhear them, one that before had an inckling whereabout they went, but waited the opportunity when the letters ſhould be given to the Embaſſadours, which being found upon them, might directly prove the treaſon. This ſlave after he underſtood the letters were delivered, gave intelligence of all unto the Conſuls: who immediatly departed from their houſes to take the Embaſſadours, and the Conſpirators in the manner, and without any ſtir or tumult light upon them unawares, and

And committing the traitors forthwith to priſon, they made ſome pauſe and doubt about the Embaſſadors, what to do with them. For albeit they ſeemed to have deſerved no leſs M but to be uſed as enemies, and to have no favour at all, yet had they regard to the law of Nations. Now concerning the Kings goods, which they thought meet before to be reſtored, the matter came about wholly in queſtion again before the Senators: who being overcome with ire and indignation, denied flatly the rendring of them, yea, and forbad they ſhould be confiſcate and converted to the common treaſury: but they were given away among the Commons to make ſpoil and havock thereof: to the end, that they having one touched or ſeiſed on the Kings goods as a booty, might for ever after be paſt all hope of any peace or favour with them. The field of the Tar- Campus Martius. quins lying between the City and Tyber, was conſecrated unto Mars, and after called Campus Martii, i.e. Mars field. It hapned (as men ſay) that there was at that time ſtanding corn there, now ripe and ready for the harveſt: which crop of ground, becauſe they made ſome ſcruple of conſci- N ence otherwiſe to conſume, therefore it was cut down, corn, ſtraw, ſtubble and all, and a great number of people ſent thither at once to carry it away in baskets and skeps, and pour it down the Tyber, running then but ſhallow, as it uſeth to do in the midſt and heat of Summer. And ſo the heaps of corn, together with the mud ſtuck ſtill and reſted in the ebbe places and foords of the river: and by little and little encreaſed with one thing or other that came down the ſtream, untill it became an Iſland. Afterwards, I ſuppoſe, there were dams and piles made thereunto, and by mans hand it grew ſo high, and ſo firm a piece of ground, that it was able to bear even Temples and ſtately Galleries that ſtood thereupon.

When the Kings goods were thus ſpoiled, rifled, and made away, the traitors were condemned and put to death. Which ſuffering of theirs was the more notable, for that the father by his place O & vertue of his office was bound and charged to ſee execution done upon his own own children: and he who otherwiſe ought not to have been a ſpectator and looker on, even he (ſuch was his fortune) was forced of neceſſity to be the principall actor in this tragicall execution. Then ſtood theſe moſt noble youths bound faſt to a ſtake. But among all, the Conſul his children, turned upon them the eyes of every man, from all the reſt, as unknown perſons and of no reputation: all men pitied them, not ſo much for being puniſhed, as for deſerving by their fact to be puniſhed:

A punished: That they could find in their hearts and once let enter into their thought, to betray into the hands of Tarquinius, sometimes a proud Prince, and then a cruell enemy, and banished rebell, their native countrey, lately and in that very year set free from captivity: their naturall father who set it free: the Consulship sprung first out of the family of the Junii: the Nobles, the Commons, and in one word, all things whatsoever in Rome belonging either to God or man. Then came the Consuls forth, took their places and set them down on the tribunall seat. The Lictors were sent to do their office, who first stripped them naked and scourged them with rods, and then with an axe chopt off their heads. All which time, the father himself, his countenance and visage was a wonderfull spectacle to behold, considering how a fathers affection could hold
B out and abide the performance of this publike and exemplary punishment. When the offenders had once suffered, to the end there might be shewed noble examples on both sides, for to debar wickedness, and stop the course of sin: the informer and revealer of treason, had for his reward a peece of money out of the common treasury, obtained his freedom, and was enfranchised a Citizen of Rome. This was the first man, as they say, that was made free by the rod Vindicta: for that the party his name was Vinditius, from whence, as some think, the word Vindicta was derived: after whom, this was observed, That whosoever in that sort got their freedom, were supposed withall endenized.

Brutus putteth to death his own children.

When tidings hereof came to Tarquinius, with the manner of proceeding in every circumstance, he not only grieved that so great hope of his was frustrate and come to nothing, but
C also was set on fire with hatred and indignation: and seeing the way shut up and stopped against all deceitfull courses, he thought there was no dealing now but by meer force and open war. Whereupon he went up and down, sollicited and made humble suit unto the Cities of Etruria, and besought the Veientians especially, and the * Tarquinians, that they would not suffer him, being come of their own bloud, a banished man, forlorn, poor, and needy, dispossessed so lately of so goodly a Realm and Kingdom, together with his children (forward young men) to perish even before their eyes. "Alledging that others had been sent for and set out of forrain parts unto "Rome for to be Kings: and he their Liege King, and such an one as advanced still the Roman Em- "pire by martiall prowess, was by the wicked conspiracy of his nearest kinsfolk and friends de- "posed from his imperiall dignity and expelled: and they now, because there was no one man
D "thought sufficient and worthy to raign, had parted between them the Kingdom, and given "among the people his goods as a spoil; that there might not be any one who had not his finger, "and whole hand in so foule a fact. Saying moreover, that his mind and intention was, to seek "means to return into his own countrey, to recover his Crown, yea, and to persecute, and to "be revenged of those unthankfull subjects: and therefore prayed them, to set to their helping "hand, and yield him assistance: and not to sit down with so many old wrongs of their own part "received, namely, their legions so often hewen in pieces, their lands and livings taken from them: "but to go with him for revenge. These suggestions moved the Veientians, and every man for himself muttered and gave out in threatning wise, that now at length, having a Roman Captain especially to be their Leader, they were to do away the foul dishonours sustained, and win E again what by former war they had lost. As for the Tarquinians, they were soon incited in regard of name and consanguinity, and thought it was a godly matter and an honour unto them, to have of their own name and house to be Kings of Rome. Thus two armies of two Cities banded with Tarquin, for to restore him to his Kingdom again, and to make sharp war upon the Romans: who being entred the Territory of Rome, were met with by the Roman Consuls. The footmen marched under the conduct of Valerius, marshalled in a battallion four square. Brutus with the horse went before to espy and discover the coasts: In like sort the men of arms of the enemies rode formost under the leading of Aruns Tarquinius the Kings son, and the King himself in person followed with the Legions. Aruns espying by the Lictors, the Consul afar off, and as he approached nearer, knowing Brutus more certainly by his face, all inflamed with ire:
F "This is the Gallant (quoth he) this is he, that hath driven and banished us out of our native "Countrey. Lo, how bravely he setteth forward, all gorgeously to be seen and dight in our roy- "all ensigns and ornaments. Now help ye gods that are revengers of wrongs done to Kings: and therewithall set spurs to his horse, and ran amain with full carreer upon the Consul his own person intending certainly to speed him. Brutus perceived likewise that he made directly toward him: (Now was it a noble and worthy sight for the Captains themselves to begin the battell.) Whereupon with resolute courage he encountreth him. And so fiercely they charged one another, and so deadly were they bent, that neither of them had regard to save himself, so he might wound and mischief his enemy, but were both with a counterpush that quite pierced their targets run into the sides, and thrust through, and so having one anothers lance sticking in their bodies, G fell from their horses ready to dye. Herewith began on both sides the other horsemen to fight, and within a while the footmen also seconded them. And so equally were they matched and the battell so indifferently fought, that it was very doubtfull whether side had the better. For on both parts the right wings got the upper hand, and down went the left. The Veientians, unto whom it was no news to be overcome of Romans, were discomfited and put to flight. But their new enemies the Tarquinians, not only held their own and stood to it, but also from their battell put back, and forced the Romans to give ground, and gave them the repulse. After this conflict there fell such a fear and terrour upon Tarquinius, and the Tuscans, that both Armies as well of the Veientians as the Tarquinians, gave over their enterprise with doing just nothing, and by night dislodged and departed every man to his own home. This battell was more notable by reason of certain miracles that men report: namely, that in the dead time of the night next following, when all were at rest, there was heard a mighty voice of Sylvanus (as men thought) out of the wood Arsia to utter these words, [That there was slaine on the Tuscans part more by one, and that the Romans won the field.] Thus verily and no otherwise departed they asunder: the Romans as winners, and the Tuscans as having the worse. For the next morrow, so soon as it was day, and that none of the enemies appeared in sight, P. Valerius the Consul gathered up the spoil together, and returned from thence with triumph to Rome, and performed the funerals of his brother Consul, in all sumptuous manner and solemn pomp, as possibly at that time he could devise. But, that which did him the greatest honour after his death, was the publike sorrow and heavinesse of the City, in this respect above all singular and memorable, for that the dames and Matrons of Rome mourned a whole year for him, as for their own father, in that he had been so sharp a revenger of violence done to the chastity of women.

After this, the Consul that survived, presently upon the great liking and favour that he was in (see how wavering and unconstant the minds are of the common people) was not only envied, but also suspected, yea, and charged with an odious and horrible crime. The voice went and bruited it was abroad, that he aspired to the Crown. And why? because, forsooth, he had not chosen unto him a new fellow Consul in the room of Brutus: and began to build aloft on the top of Velia, where (say they) in an high place and strongly scituate he may make a Castle impregnable. These things commonly spoken and credited too, vexed much, and mightily grieved the Consul in his very soule, as a great indignity offered unto him. Whereupon he assembled the people together, & causing the rods to be held downwards to the ground, went up into the pulpit to make an Oration unto them. That sight pleased the people passing well, taking it for a plain demonstration, that the marks and ensigns of rule and government submitted unto them, was a very acknowledging and confession that the people was of greater majesty and power than the Consul. Where after silence made, and commandment to hearken and give ear, "the Consul began highly to extoll the fortune and good hap of his Colleague deceased, who having with great honour set his "Country free, ended his daies, fighting manfully in defence of the Weal-publike, even in the "prime, height, and best time of his glory, ere that he became subject unto envy: but he himself "outliving it, remained alive, exposed unto criminous slanders and spightfull malice of men, and "of a deliverer and redeemer of his Countrey was now reputed no better than the Aquilii and "Vitellii. And will you never indeed (quoth he) approve the vertuous and honest conversation of "a man so well, but it shall be tainted with unjust suspition? What? would any man think, that I "being so fierce and fell an enemy of the Kings, should ever fear to incur the jealousie of men, for "seeking to be King? What if I dwelt on the top of Tarpeie cliff, even in the very Capitoll, "should I beleeve and think it possible, that my countrymen, neighbours, and Citizens, would "stand in fear of me? and will so small a matter as this turn the ballance of your opinion and "conceit of me? Is your affiance and confidence in me grounded so slightly, and standeth it upon "so nice terms and tickliſh points, that you force more and make greater reckoning of my dwelling place than of the quality of my person. Well, P. Valerius his house shall be no hindrance or "impeachment unto your liberty, O Quirites, ye shall not need to fear any harm from Velia for me. "I will remove my house not only down into the plain, but even to the valley under the hill foot, "that you may dwell above me, and overlook me (a suspected Citizen.) Let them a gods name "build in Velia, who may be better trusted with the Cities freedom than P. Valerius. Then was immediatly the timber and all carried down beneath Velia, and where as now Vicus Publicus is, in the very bottom of the hill, was his house reedified.

After this were laws enacted, which not only acquit the Consul and cleared him of all suspition of affecting to the Kingdom, but also contrariwise wrought such effect, that he became exceeding popular again, whereupon he was surnamed Publicola or Poplicola. And first and formost the Statute passed as touching the appeal unto the people, against the Rulers and Magistrates. Item, concerning the cursing and condemning of him both body and goods, that should intend or plot to usurp Princely dominion over them. These acts the Commons liked well of. Which when he had alone ordained, that all the thanks and praise might be his therefore, then assembled he a generall Session for the substituting of another Consul unto him, in the room of his Colleague departed. So, Sp. Lucretius was created Consul: who being an aged man and of great years feeble withall and not able to execute the office and function of a Consul, within few daies paid nature her debt and died. And in place of Lucretius was M. Horatius Pulvillus chosen. In some ancient writers I do not find that Lucretius was Consul. For immediatly after Brutus they make mention of Horatius. But I think verily because no act of his made his Consulship memorable thereupon he was forgotten and left out. Now as yet was not the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitoll dedicated. And when Valerius and Horatius the Consuls, cast lots whether of them twain should perform that duty, the charge fell unto Horatius, and Publicola went forth to the Veientian war. But the kinsfolk and friends of Valerius took it more grievously and impatiently than reason was, that the honor of the dedication of so famous a temple, was given unto Horatius.

Valerius surnamed Publicola of Poplicola.

Devising

A Deviſing therefore by all means poſſible they could, to impeach it, and ſeeing they had aſſaied all in vain and nothing took effect: even at the very inſtant, whiles the Conſul was holding a poſt of the Temple, and in his ſolemn prayers to the gods, behold they brought unto him heavy and wo-full news, that his ſon was dead, and that he might not lawfully, whiles his houſhold mourned and was polluted with a dead corps, conſecrate the Temple. Whether it were that he gave no credit to the meſſenger, or rather was of heart ſo ſtout, neither is it for certain reported, nor eaſie for a man to divine. But for all theſe tidings, never a jot was he turned from his purpoſe, nor ſaid ought elſe to the meſſenger, but willed that he ſhould bid the corps to be had forth to buriall, and ſo holding the pillar or poſt ſtill ſaid out his prayer, and dedicated the Temple. Theſe were the acts B done both at home and abroad in the firſt year after the expulſion of the Kings.

Then were P. Valerius the ſecond time, and T. Lucretius created Conſuls. By this time were the Tarquins fled for ſuccour to Lartes Porſena King of Cluſium: "where, by many reaſons and re"monſtrances, intermingled with prayer, one while they beſought him not to ſuffer them deſcen-
"ded from the Tuſcans, of the ſame bloud and name, to live needy and forlorn in perpetuall exile; "otherwhile they adviſed and warned him not to put up without revenge this new faſhion of "expelling Kings, now comming up. Saying, that liberty in it ſelf had ſweetneſs enough: and un-
"leſs Kings would defend and maintain their Crowns with as great might and main, as Cities
"deſired to enjoy freedom, there would be a general confuſion, and all things turned upſide down:
"neither would there be in States and Common-wealths any thing aloft and eminent above o-C "ther endured: whereupon would iſſue a finall end of Kingly regiment, a thing with God and "man of all other moſt excellent and beautiful. Porſena ſuppoſing it would be an honourable matter unto the Tuſcans, both to have a King at Rome, and a King too of the Tuſcans line, came with a cruell army againſt Rome. Never was the Senate at any time afore put in ſuch fear: ſo mighty in Porſena bethoſe daies was the puiſſance of Cluſium, and the name of Porſena ſo renowned. Moreover, they ſiegeth Rome.
feared not their enemies only, but alſo their own ſubjects at home, leſt peradventure the Com-munalty of Rome for fear of war ſhould receive the King into the City, and accept of peace though it coſt them their liberty. During which time the Commons were entertained of the Nobles with all kindneſs, and many favours and courteſies they had at their hands. And above all things, order was taken for proviſion of grain and victuals. And for to purvey ſtore of corn, ſome were D ſent to the Voſci, others to Cumes. Over and beſides the licence of ſelling ſalt, becauſe it was ſold at an exceeding high price, was taken from private ſalters, and was undertaken by the City, with all the coſt and charges thereto belonging by them defraied, and ſalt delivered out to the people at an eaſie reckoning. The Commons were alſo freed of portage, tollage, and tribute; and rich men that were able to bear the burthen were aſſeſſed at all paiments and contributions: the poor were thought to be charged enough with the bringing up of their children. This kind dealing and indulgency of the Nobles kept the City afterwards (notwithſtanding their hard diſtreſs of ſiege and famine) in ſuch concord and unity, that the meaneſt as well as the higheſt abhorred and deteſted the name of KK. And never after was there any one private perſon, ſo popular, ſo devoted to the people by crafty means and indirect courſes tending to their particu-E lar deſigns, as the whole Senate was at that time, by their good government of the Commonweal. Now when the enemies approached near at hand, every man made ſhift for himſelf, for-ſook the Country and came into the City. Which they fortified with ſtrong guards round about:
ſo that what with wals and bulwarks on the one ſide, and what with the Tyber on the other ſide, it ſeemed ſure enough, and ſufficiently defended. The wooden bridge had like to have given the enemy entrance, had not the valour of one man been, even Horatius Coclet (who that day by the Tha rare for-good fortune of the Romans was a fortreſs unto the City of Rome.) He as good hap was, ap- titude of Ho- pointed to ward and keep the bridge, ſeeing the Janicle by a ſudden aſſault won, and that the ene- ratius Coclet.
mies ran down ſo furiouſly from thence upon him, & contrariwiſe, the multitude of his own companies for fear, to forgo their weapons, break their arraies, and to be gone: took hold of every man, F oppoſed himſelf againſt them afront: and calling God and man to witneſs, proteſted, ſhewed and declared unto them, that forſaking and abandoning thus their quarter, all their flying was but in vain: for if they left the bridge on their backs, to yield paſſage to the enemies, there would anon be more of them in Palatium and the Capitol than in the Janicle: and therefore he willed and commanded them, yea, and gave them direction to break down the bridge, by hewing, by firing, or by what means they poſſible could: aſſuring them for his own part, ſo much as the body of one only man was able to do, he would receive, and withſtand the violence of the enemies. Then advanceth he himſelf unto the firſt entry or foot of the bridge, and all goodly to be ſeen, amongſt thoſe that would in no point fight, but ſhewed their backs, he ſo bent his ſword and target in their very faces, reſolute to encounter with them hand to hand, that even with his G wonderfull hardineſs and incredible courage, he aſtonied and amazed his enemies. Howbeit, two there were that for very ſhame tarried ſtill and ſtood to him, namely, Sp. Largius and Tit. Herminius, brave men both, as well for noble birth as worthy deeds. Aſſiſted for a while with theſe gallants, ſuſtained he the firſt ſtorm of danger and moſt cumberſome puſh of the skirmiſh. But as they that were hewing down the bridge called upon them to come back, he conſtrained thoſe two alſo to retire and ſave themſelves, whiles ſome little part of the bridge was left behind free and uncut. Then caſting all about in menacing manner his fiery and terrible eyes towards the Captains and principals of the Tuſcans, one while he challenged them one by one to ſingle fight: other- H whiles he rated them all in generall, calling them the hirelings and ſlaves of proud Kings and tyrants; who forgetting and making no reckoning of their own freedom, were come to oppugn and impeach the liberty of others. The enemies ſtood at a bay and in ſuſpence a good while, looking about them one upon another who ſhould firſt begin to fight. At laſt, very ſhame made the whole troup to ſtir and come forward and ſo ſetting up a loud cry, from all ſides they let flie their javelins at him one man alone and their only enemy. All this while bare he off their ſhot which light upon his target, and there ſtuck, and nevertheleſs with full reſolution kept the bridge ſtill, walking his ſtations, and ſtalking like a giant. Then aſſaied they with all their force to bear the man down and to turn him over into the water: but by this time the crack of the bridge broken I under him, and the ſhout withall of the Romans, for joy that they had finiſhed their work, ſtaid with ſudden fear their violent aſſault. Then praied Cocles in this wiſe: "O father Tiberinus (quoth

"he) O ſacred river, with devout heart I thee beſeech, receive with thy gracious and merciſull
"ſtream this harneſs, theſe weapons, and this thy ſouldier. And ſo all armed as he was, he leapt into the Tyber: and albeit many a dart was flung from aloft and light upon him, yet he ſwam over and eſcaped ſafe to his fellows. A brave adventure for all poſterity another day to talk of, rather than to beleeve. For this ſo great fortitude and reſolution of his, the City was thankfull, and in token thereof his Image or Statue was ſet up in their common Hall, named Comitium, and as much ground given him in compaſs, as he was able with a plough to break up in one day. Amongſt theſe publike favours and honours done unto him, the kind affections and good wils of private perſons K alſo well appeared: for in that extream want and ſcarcity that then was, every man out of his houſe-ſtore and proviſion ſpared from himſelf, and for to give him one thing or another defrauded his own belly. Thus Porſena with the repulſe of this his firſt enterpriſe, changed his mind from aſfaulting to beſieging of the City: and after he had placed a garriſon in the Janiculum, he planted himſelf and encamped on the plain, even upon the banks of the Tyber. And ſending for boats and craiers from all parts, both to ſtop the mouth and paſſage of Tyber, that no corn ſhould come in and be conveyed to Rome: and alſo that the ſouldiers, as they ſaw occaſion might croſs the river, and fetch booties in divers and ſundry places at their pleaſure in ſhort ſpace he brought the whole countrey about Rome to ſuch ſtreights, that not only other things were brought in, but all their cattel alſo was fain to be driven out of the fields into the City, and no man durſt put any creature L forth out of the gates. The Tuſcans were permitted to be thus bold, not ſo much for fear as for a policy: for Valerius the Conſul, waiting for ſome vantage and opportunity, ſuddenly to ſet upon many of them at once and at unawares, as they ſtragled abroad diſorderly, making little regard to revenge ſmall matters kept himſelf to be revenged of them throughly, and to pay them home one time or other. To the end therefore he might draw forth theſe forragers, and toll them abroad, he gave his men in charge, and proclaimed, That the next day in great companies they ſhould put their cattel forth at the gate Eſquilina, which was fartheſt from the enemies: ſuppoſing that they would have intelligence thereof, by reaſon that in this extremity of long ſiege and pinching hunger, ſome falſe knaves and diſloyal rogues would flie unto them. And ſo fell it out indeed; For they had knowledge thereof by a fugitive ſlave. Whereupon they in far greater multitudes paſs M over the river, in hope to make a general ſpoil and havock once for all. Then Valerius commanded T. Herminius with a ſufficient company to lie cloſe in ambuſh at two miles end, in the Sabine high way, and Sp. Largius with a power of luſty tall fellows lightly armed, to keep the gate Collina, untill the enemy were gone by and paſt: with direction, then to put himſelf between the river and them, and ſo to intercept them in their return. The other Conſul T. Lucretius iſſued forth with certain bands of footmen at the gate Nævia: and Valerius himſelf in proper per-ſon ſet forth from mount Cœlius certain enſigns of his beſt and choice ſouldiers. Theſe firſt were deſcried and diſcovered by the enemy. Herminius ſo ſoon as he heard ſome noiſe and ſtir, aroſe and ran at once out of the ambuſh, and whileſt the Tuſcans turned to ſet upon Lucretius, he charged them luſtily at their backs: ſo that on every hand from the gate Collina on the one ſide, N and from the gate Nævia on the other, the allarm was given. Thus the robbers were ſlain and cut in pieces in the midſt of them: both for that they were overmatched in fight and alſo becauſe all the waies were ſtopped up, that they could not eſcape by way of flight. And never after durſt the Tuſcans range about the countrey ſo audaciouſly. Howbeit, the ſiege continued nevertheleſs, with great ſcarcity of corn, and exceeding dearth within the City. And Porſena had good hope by ſitting ſtill, to force it in the end, and be maſter thereof. At what time one C. Mutius a noble young gentleman, who thought it a diſhonour and foul ſhame, that the people of Rome, who all the while they were in bondage under Kings, were in no war nor by any enemies beleaguered, ſhould now, being the ſame ſtill in time of their freedom, be of theſe Tuſcans beſieged, whoſe armies they often had defeated: and ſuppoſing that by ſome hardy and adventurous piece of ſervice O this reproachfull indignity was to be revenged, deviſed at firſt on his own head to enter into the enemies Camp: but fearing afterwards to go without commiſſion from the Conſul and the knowledge of any other perſon, leſt peradventure he might be taken by the watch of the Romans, and brought back for a traiterous runnagate, at ſuch a time eſpecially, when the hard eſtate of the City was enough to bring him into a deep ſuſpition, and to be reputed for no better: preſented himſelf before the Councill into the Senate houſe: "I am right wil'ing, and I have a purpoſe

A "my LL. (quoth he) to pass over the Tyber, yea, and if I can, to enter the Camp of the enemies,
"not in quality of a robber, nor to be revenged for booties from us taken, with doing the sem"blable. A greater exploit with the favour of the gods, I intend to perform. The Senators gave their consent, and approved his designment. Then with a skein, hidden under his garment he setteth forward. Being thither come into the Camp, he presseth in the thickest throng to stand near the Kings Tribunal. It fortuned that then and there the souldiers were receiving their pay. And the Chancellor, or Kings principal Secretary sate together with the King in like array, much employed and busied in many matters, and the souldiers commonly had recourse unto him. Mutius fearing to enquire whether of them two were Porsena lest by not knowing the King he should be-B wray himself who he was, hapned (see how fortune in her rashness directed his hand) to kill the Secretary instead of the King: then as he passed through the fearful multitude, making himself way with his bloudy blade there was a present outcry, and thereat the Kings guard came running in, laid hold of him, and brought him back before the King his royal Throne: and albeit he was now forlorn and without all succour amidst those threats of frowning fortune, yet as a man more feared still than fearing: "I am (quoth he) a Citizen of Rome, and Caius Mutius is my name, a "professed enemy. I confess, and an enemy would I have slain; as ready and willing am I to dye
"my self, as I was to kill another. For both to do, and to suffer valiantly is the part of a noble "Roman. And it is not I alone that carry this mind and resolution against thee, O King there is a "long train and crue behind of them that seek to win the same praise and honour: make thee C "ready therefore, and arm thy self, if thou think good, against this danger, and reckon every hour
"to be in hazard of thy life, and to have alwaies at the very Court gates thy enemies sword.
"This kind of war do we youths of Rome denounce openly unto thee: no battel, no fight else "shalt thou need to fear. With thee alone will we all, one by one have to do, and with none o"ther. Hereat the King incensed with wrath, and for the danger that he stood in affrighted withall, commanded in menacing wise that he should be fried at a stake, unless he would presently unfold in plain terms, what secret and dangerous practises he meant and threatned under this covert circuit of words and intricate circumstances. "Lo, (quoth he again) how little they set by "this carkass that aspire to great glory and aim at honour: and with that thrust his right hand into the hearth on fire that was made for the sacrifice, and when he endured the rosting thereof, as if D he had been sensless, and felt no pain, the King well near astonished at this wonderfull and miraculous sight start up and leapt from his royal seat and chair of estate, commanding the young man to be had from the altar. "Go thy waies (quoth he) in peace, thou that hast done thy own self "more mischief than thou hast attempted against my person. I would say God bless thee, and "worthy hadst thou been of honour for thy prowess, if it were in my service, and in the behalf
"and defence of mine own Countrey: and now by the law of arms I discharge thee freely, and "give thee leave to depart without any hurt or abuse offered unto thee. Then Mutius, as it were to requite again his curtesie and desert, "Forasmuch as (quoth he) thou settest so great store by va-
"lour, and honourest vertue so highly; to the end it may be seen that thou shalt get at my hands
"by curtesie that which by cruel threats thou couldst not: these are therefore to let thee under-E "stand, that there are three hundred of us noble youths, even the very flower and knighthood of "Rome, that have conspired and sworn thy death, and in this manner to assail thee. My lot it was "to be the first, the rest as it shall fall out, will be here shortly, and wait every man his turn and "time, untill they hit right upon thee. Mutius, surnamed afterwards Scævola, by reason of the maim of his right hand, was no sooner dismissed and gone, but there followed streight after him to Rome, Embassadors from Porsena; and so much troubled in spirit was he, both for the danger past of the first assault, (from which nothing preserved him but a small errour and oversight of the assailant) and also for the hazard to come, (for look how many conspirators remained behind to give the like attempt, so often stood he in jeopardy of his life) that of his own accord he offered the Romans conditions of peace. And among other capitulations, he stood hard upon this article (but F all in vain) of restoring the Tarquins into their Kingdom. This point the King urged instantly, rather because he could not well himself deny the Tarquins so much, than for that he was ignorant, that the Romans would never yield thereto. But another article he got granted, namely, the restitution of the Veientians lands again: and the Romans were driven of necessity to give him hostages, in case they would have the Kings garrison to quit the Janiculum. Upon these conditions peace was concluded and Porsena withdrew his forces from the Janiculum, dislodged and departed out of the territory of Rome. The Senators bestowed frankly upon Mutius as a testimonial of his valiantness, a piece of ground lying beyond Tyber, which was afterwards called, Mutia prata, i.e. Mutius his meadows.

Peace between Porsena and the Romans.

Upon this honourable regard and reward of vertue, women were likewise provoked and en-G couraged to enterprize worthy acts in the service of the Common-weal. For a young damosel and Virgin, named Cœlia, one of those hostages aforesaid, whiles the Tuscans were encamped (as it fell out) not far from the banks of Tyber, deceiving her keepers and leading a company of other maidens after her even within the shot and darts of the enemies, took the river, swam ouer with them, brought them all to Rome safe, and delivered them to their parents, kinsfolk and friends. Which being reported to the King, he at the first stormed at it, and was all in a rage, and sent unto Rome certain Orators to demand again his hostage Cœlia by name: as for all the rest,

The commendable deed of Cœlia.

reſt, he made no great account of them: but afterwards, upon further conſideration he admired H the enterpriſe, and plainly ſaid, it ſurpaſſed far all the adventures of the Coclites and the Mutii: ſo as he pretended that if the maid were not rendred again, he would take the league as broken, and being yielded, he would ſend her back to her friends, undefiled, and without any abuſe or violence done unto her. On both parts was promiſe faithfully kept: For both the Romans reſtored the pledge of peace according to covenant, and ſeen alſo it was, that vertue was not only ſecured ſafe, but alſo highly regarded and honoured with the Tuſcan King. For after he had commended and praiſed the damoſel, he promiſed to give her part of the hoſtages, chuſe whom ſhe would. And when they were all brought forth before her, ſhe made choiſe (they ſay) of thoſe young boies that were under 14 years of age: which was not only moſt befitting her virginity, but alſo by the accord of I the hoſtages themſelves beſt approved: namely, that that age eſpecially ſhould be delivered out of the enemies hands, which was moſt ſubject to injury and taking wrong. The peace thus renewed and confirmed, the Romans rewarded this rare valour in that ſex, with as new and ſtrange an honour, for, in remembrance of her, in the top of Via ſacra, there was erected her ſtatue, [A maiden ſitting on horſeback.

There remaineth yet even unto our daies amongſt other ſolemn ceremonies, this one cuſtome received from our anceſtors, far differing and diſagreeing from this peaceable and friendly departure of the Tuſcan King from before the City of Rome, and this it is: In the portſale of goods they uſe to proclaime firſt aloud, The ſale of King Porſena his goods. This ceremoniall cuſtome muſt needs either begin in time of war, and ſo was not afterwards forgotten in peace: or elſe aroſe from ſome K more gratious and gentle occaſion at the firſt, then this title or outward form pretendeth, of ſel-ling goods by way of hoſtility, and after the manner of enemies. But the likelieſt conjecture and neareſt to the truth of all thoſe that are given out is this: that Porſena diſlodging from the Janicle, gave freely unto the Romans, (the City at that time being after long ſiege diſtreſſed and in great ſtreights) his rich Camp furniſhed with victual and proviſion, conveyed thither out of the plen-tifull countries of Hetruria near adjoyning: which goods, for fear there ſhould have been ſome havock and ſpoil made thereof in warlike wiſe, in caſe the people had been let looſe to the rifling of the tents, were after ſold, and called Porſena his goods: which title ſignified rather their thank-full acceptation of the gift, and remembrance of the giver, than any open and overt ſale of the Kings goods, which were not ſo much as in the Romans power, nor at their diſpoſition. L

Thus Porſena having given over the Roman war, becauſe he would not ſeem to have brought an hoſt of men into thoſe parts, and performed no exploit, ſent his ſon Arruns with part of his forces to ſurprize and aſſault Aricia. At the firſt this ſudden and unexpected enterprize much troubled the Aricins, but afterward when the had gotten aid both from the Latine nations & alſo from Cumes, they took ſuch heart again, that they durſt enter into the field & bid the enemy battel. In the beginning of the conflict, the Tuſcans charged them ſo hotly, that at the very firſt encounter, they brake the arraies of the Aricins. But the troups of the Cumans ſetting policy againſt force, went a little aſide, made way and gave ſome ground, and when the enemies had outſtripped them & were raſhly and diſorderly paſſed beyond them, they turned their enſigns, and ſet upon their backs: ſo were the Tuſcans, being in the very train of their victory, beſet round about and ſlain in the midſt M between. Only a ſmall remnant of them after the loſs of their Captain, becauſe they had no other place of refuge nearer, were fain to trudg to Rome without weapons and diſarmed, like ſuppliants both in deed and ſhew. Where they were kindly entertained and beſtowed in ſeverall lodgings.
Some of them when they were cured of their wounds repaired home, reporting the hoſpitality & courteous uſage they have found. Many remained ſtill at Rome for love of their hoſts and the City:
who had a place allotted them to dwell in, which after they called Thuſcus vicus, the Tuſcan ſtreet.

Rizza.

After this, were P. Lucretius and P. Valerius the third time created Coſſ. In that year, for a ſmall end, there came Embaſſadours from Porſena, to treat about the reſtoring of the Tarquins into their Realm: to whom this anſwer was returned: that the Senate would ſend Embaſſadors N to the King himſelf: whereupon there were immediatly addreſſed unto him in Embaſſie the moſt honourable perſonages of all the Nobility, who in the name of the people of Rome delivered this ſpeech: That the chief of their Nobles were ſent, rather than any diſpatch given by word of mouth unto his Embaſſadours at Rome; not for that they could not have ſhapen them this ſhort anſwer, "They would no Kings have: But to this end, that for ever after there ſhould
"be no ſuit renewed of that matter, nor in ſo great mutuall benefits, and favours paſſed between "them, ſome diſcontent ariſe on either ſide, whiles he might be thought to requeſt that "which was repugnant and prejudiciall to the liberty of Rome, and the Romans again, unleſs
"they would be executors of their own wrongs, and ſeek their own miſchievance, to make
"denial unto him, whom by their good wils they would not ſeem to deny ought for any thing in O
"the world. But as to the ſubſtance in the matter, this was the point: namely, that the people of "Rome were not under the regiment of a King, but were a free ſtate: and fully ſetled in this pur"poſe. To ſet open their gates to the enemies, ſooner than to Kings: and were all generally of this "mind and reſolution, That look when the freedom of that City had an end, then ſhould the "City come to an end alſo. To conclude therefore they were to entreat him, that if he tendered
"the weal and ſafety of Rome, he would permit them to be free ſtill and at their own liberty.

The Roman Embaſſadours to King Porſena.

The

A The King overcome with very modeſty, and much abaſhed in himſelf, anſwered thus again: "Since you are ſo fully minded and ſtifly bent (quoth he) neither will I importune you, nor dull "your ears with harping ſtill upon this unpleaſant ſtring, and do no good: nor bear the Tarquins "any longer in hand, and deceive them of that hope of aid, which nothing at all is in my power to "perform. Let them from henceforth ſeek ſome other place of exile, either for peace or war, as "they ſhall think more expedient, that there may be nothing to let and hinder the free cour e of "amity, and alliance between me and you. To theſe good and kind words he joyned better and more friendly deeds. For all the hoſtages that remained in his hand he ſent home: and the Veientians lands which by the covenants indented at Janiculum, were taken away, he reſtored to the B Romans again. Thus Tarquin ſeeing all hope of return cut off, removed unto Tuſculum to his ſon in law Mamilius Octavius, there to live and ſpend the reſt of his daies in baniſhment. So there continued faithfull peace between the Romans and King Porſena.

Then were Coſſ. M. Valerius and P. Poſthumius. In that year the Romans fought with the Sabins fortunately, and the Conſuls triumphed. But afterwards the Sabins made greater preparation of war: to withſtand whom, as alſo for fear of ſome ſudden danger that might ariſe from Tuſculum, from whence they ſuſpected war, although none was openly ſeen, were P. Valerius the fourth time, and T. Lucretius the ſecond time created Coſſ. But among the Sabins there grew ſome civill diſcord between that part that would have war, and the contrary that ſought peace: which gained the Romans ſome ſtrength even from thence. For Appius Clauſus (who after- C wards at Rome was ſurnamed Appius Claudius) a perſwader himſelf of quietneſs and repoſe, being overmatched and not able to make his part good with the adverſe faction that minded and ſtirred troubles, accompanied with a great power of friends and followers, from Regillum fled to Rome, who were enfranchiſed Citizens, and poſſeſſed of thoſe lands that lye beyond the river * Anio. And from thence came the name of the old trade Appia: after that other new Citizens were put unto them, thoſe I mean, that deſcended of that race, and out of the ſame territory. This Appius was admitted into the number of the Senators, and not long after advanced to be one of the chief men and heads of the City. The Coſſ. went with a ſtrong power into the Sabins land, where after they had firſt waſted the Country, and after in battell abated the ſtrength and puiſſance of the enemy; ſo, as for a long time after they needed not to fear any rebellion from thence, they returned D to Rome in triumph.

The year following, when Agrippa Menenius and P. Poſthumius were Coſſ. P. Valerius ended his daies in great glory, reputed the only ſingular man in thoſe times, by all mens judgment, for skill and knowledge as well in martiall feats, as in civill affairs: but ſo poor was his eſtate, that he had not wherewith to defray his funerall expences, and was therefore at the Cities charge right honourably enterred. And the Dames of Rome mourned for him as they did for Brutus.

The ſame year two Colonies of the Latines, Pometia and Cora, revolted to the Auruncans. The Romans firſt began to war upon the Auruncans. And after they had diſcomfited a great hoſt of them, who met with the Conſuls as they entred the borders, and fiercely made head againſt them, then all the Auruncan war was driven and tranſlated wholly to Pometia. The ſlaughter and execution E was no leſs after the conflict, than during the fight: for whereas there were many more of them ſlain outright in the place than taken priſoners, thoſe alſo that were priſoners, they ſpared not, but murdered every where as they went: neither ſtaid the furious rage of war therewith, but even the very hoſtages whom they had received, to the number of 300, they put to the ſword. In this year alſo was a triumph at Rome.

The Conſuls Opiter Virginius, and Sp. Caſſius, that followed the next year, aſſailed Pometia, firſt by meer force to ſcale the wals, after with pavoiſes, mantelets, platforms, and other fabricks, raiſed againſt it. Upon whom the Auruncans ſallied forth, rather of a cankred and malicious hatred than for any hope or vantage given them of good exploit: the greater part of them furniſhed better with fire-works than armed with ſword and ſpear, killed and burned all afore them: and having F thus fired their fabricks aforeſaid, hurt and ſlain a great number of their enemies, one of the Conſuls alſo (but his name preciſely is not by any author ſet down) was ſore wounded, ſtrucken down from his horſe, and well-near ſlain. Whereupon the Romans returned back to Rome thus unhappily defeated, leaving the Conſul behind them amongſt many that were hurt, like to dye. Soon after, and no longer than whileſt their wounds might be healed, and a new ſupply of ſouldiers made, they came againſt Pometia, in more furious manner than before, and alſo with a ſtronger power. And when by making of new mantelets and other warlike inſtruments of aſſault, they were proceeded thus forward that the ſouldiers were ready to ſcale and get up the wall, then they within yielded: and notwithſtanding the Town was thus ſurrendred up, yet there was no more mercy ſhewed unto it, than if it had been forced by aſſault. The chief and principal Citizens ſhamefully G loſt their heads, the reſt of the inhabitants were ſold at the ſpear in open market like ſlaves. the Town ſackt and razed to the ground, yea, and money made of the lands belonging to it. The Conſuls for that they had ſo wreaked their anger, and ſharply revenged themſelves, more than for any great war they had finiſhed, obtained triumph.

The year following, were Poſthumius Caninius and T. Largius Conſuls. In this year, during the games and plaies at Rome, certain yonkers of the Sabins, went about in a wanton jollity to carry away and raviſh the Curtezans and common Strumpets of the City. Whereupon the people ran together together, and made a riot, grew to words, and from words to brawls, inſomuch, as they went to- H gether by the ears, and made a fray in manner of a battell: upon which ſmall occaſion there was a rebellion like to enſue. Over and beſides the fear of the Latines war, (for to encreaſe their troubles the more) news came, and it was certainly known, that by the ſolliciting and practiſe of Octavius Mamilius, there were already thirty nations banded together againſt the Romans. The City thus being perplexed for the event and expectation of theſe ſo great occurrents, there aroſe the firſt occaſion and mention made of creating a Dictator. But neither in what year, nor in what Conſuls time (for that it can hardly be beleeved, that they ſhould be of the Tarquins faction, and yet that alſo is reported) nor yet who was firſt created Dictator, is it certainly known: Howbeit, in the rall of the horſemen: and Conſular men (i.e. ſuch as had been Conſuls afore) they were that elected him: for ſo the law provided that was enacted, concerning the creation of a Dictator. And this induceth me the rather to beleeve, that Largius an ancient man, and one who had been Conſul before, was appointed as a Controller and Maſter over the Conſuls, and not M. Valerius the ſon of Marcus, and grandſon of Voleſus, who as yet had not attained to the Conſuls dignity. For if theſe Conſular men aforeſaid had been minded to have choſen a Dictator out of that houſe above all other, ſurely they would have made choice rather of his father M. Valerius, a noble perſonage, of approved proweſs and valour, and one beſides that had been Conſul. When the Dictator was once choſen at Rome, and the axes were ſeen born before him, the Commoners ſtood in great awe, and took better regard to be obedient at every beck and command. For neither could they make ac- K count of any help (as they might under the Conſuls, who were both in commiſſion alike, and of equall authority, when they had recourſe from the one to the other) nor yet appeal unto the people: no nor look for ſuccour at all, but in their own double diligence and care of obedience. The Sabins likewiſe were afraid of the Dictator thus created at Rome: and ſo much the more, becauſe they were verily perſwaded he was made of purpoſe for them: and thereupon, they ſent Embaſſadors to treat for peace, who beſeeching the Dictator and the Senate to pardon ſo ſmall a fault, and being but a trick of youth, received this anſwer: That youth indeed might well be pardoned, but ſuch old babes as they might not, who never reſted to ſow debate, and miniſter occaſion of one war after another. Howbeit, they ſate in conſultation about a peace, and obtained it had been, if the Sabins could have found in their hearts and condeſcended to make good and repay the expences L that the Romans had diſburſed about the war: for that was the thing demanded at their hands. So, defiance was ſent and war proclaimed. And yet for that year all was quiet, as it were in time of a ſecret truce during the Conſulſhip of Servius Sulpitius, and M. Manlius Tullus, in whoſe year there was nothing done worthy of remembrance.

After them were T. Ebutius and C. Vetuſius. In their time * Fidene was beſieged, * Cruſtumeria won, and Preneſte revolted from the Latines unto the Romans. And the Latine war, which had been a breeding and budding for certain years, was no longer delaid, but brake forth. A. Poſthumius the Dictator and T. Ebutius Generall of the Cavalry, with great power of foot and horſe, ſet forward and advanced as far as the Lake Regillus, in the Territory of Tuſculum and there encountred the Army of the enemies in their march. And becauſe they heard ſay that the Tarquins were M in the hoſt of the Latines, they could not for anger forbear any longer, but preſently fell to it, and began battell. This field was fought right fiercely, and coſt more bloudſhed a good deal, than others uſually before: becauſe the Generals and chief Commanders were there preſent, not only to give direction by their counſel and advice, but alſo in perſon themſelves hazarded their own bodies, and fought bravely in the medley. And not one almoſt of the principall leaders eſcaped out of the skirmiſh, either of one ſide or of the other, ſafe and ſound, ſave only the Roman Dictator.
The famous battell at the Lake Regillus. For as Poſthumius was encouraging his men, and ſetting them in array in the vanguard, Tarquinius Superbus (albeit he was now very aged and unweildy, and not able to beſtir himſelf) ſet ſpurs to his horſe, and ran full butt againſt him. But having caught a thruſt from aſide, was reſcued by his men that came about him, and retired to a place of ſafety. And in the other wing, Ebutius Generall of N the horſemen, ſet upon Oct. Mamilius: but he, the Captain I mean of the Tuſculans, was well ware of him, and eſpied him coming, and ran his horſe with full carreer likewiſe upon him, and ſo deſperately they bear their Lances one againſt the other, that Ebutius was run quite through the arm, and Mamilius wounded in the breaſt, whom the Latines ſuccoured and received into the middle ward. As for Ebutius not able any longer to bear his ſtaff, with his arm ſore hurt, withdrew himſelf out of the battel. The Leader of the Latines, nothing diſmaied for all his hurt, maintained fight ſtill: and ſeeing his ſouldiers ſomewhat diſtreſſed, he ſendeth for the Regiment of the Roman exuls, that were under the leading of L. Tarquinius his ſon: who ſticking more couragiouſly unto it, for anger that their goods were ſpoiled, and they driven out of their own countrey, renewed the combate afreſh for awhile. And as the Romans from that quarter began to O recule and give ground, M. Valerius, the brother of Publicola, eſpying young Tarquin vaunting himſelf gloriouſly in the fore-front of the exuls, inflamed alſo with a deſire of domeſticall glory of his houſe: that the ſame family which had the praiſe of expelling the Kings, might likewiſe win the honour of killing them, ſpurred his horſe, and with deadly ſpear ran againſt Tarquinius, who giving way to his mortall enemy, retired back to his own Regiment. But Valerius by this time was disbanded from his company, and raſhly ridden into the battell of the exiles,

A and there a common ſouldier hapned to charge upon him a flank, and run him through. The horſe ſtaid not a jot for all the rider was wounded, and ſo the Roman Knight ready to die, fell to the ground with his armour upon his body, and paid nature her debt. Poſthumius the Dictator, after he perceived ſo valiant a man ſain, and the baniſhed men advancing luſtily forward with full trot, and his own ſouldiers diſtreſſed, and at point to turn their backs gave expreſs commandement unto his own band, which he had about him of choſen tall men for to guard his perſon, that as many of their fellows as they ſaw flie, they ſhould take them for enemies, and kill them in the place. Thus by reaſon of a counter-fear the Romans made head again and renewed the battell. Then began the Dictators cohort to fight, and coming with freſh bodies and couragious ſtomacks, charged upon B the wearied exiles, and killed them on every ſide. Wherupon began another combate alſo between the Colonels and Captains of quality and mark. The Generall of the Latines ſeeing the battalion of the baniſhed well near environed round by the Roman Dictator, ſpeedily taketh with him into the forefront of the battell certain ſquadrons of thoſe that were appointed in the rear-guard to ſuccour and aid: whom T. Herminius, a lieutenant, eſpied to come marching in good order, and knowing amongſt them Mamilius by his gorgeous harneſs, and goodly coat-armour, with far greater violence than the Generall of the horſemen a little before, encountred the Colonell of his enemies ſo hotly that both he ran Mamilius through his ſides, and ſlue him outright, and alſo whileſt he was diſarming and rifling his body, he was wounded himſelf with a ſhort javelin, and being brought back with victory into the Camp, and at firſt dreſſing yeelded to nature and died. Then
C rode the Dictator apace to the horſemen, and earneſtly cried unto them, that ſeeing the footmen were toiled out and wearied, they would alight from their horſes, and take the matter into their hands. The horſemen ſoon obeyed, leapt from horſeback, and ſet forward as if they had flown, to the forefront, where they expoſed their targets in defence of them that fought before the enſigns. Whereat preſently the Infantry began again to take heart, ſeeing the principall men of arms, and noble young Gentlemen in the like kind of ſervice, expoſed to the ſame danger, and ready to take part with them. Then at the laſt were the Latines put back, and their whole battel began to ſhrink. The Gentlemen had their horſes brought to them again, and they mounted on horſeback to purſue their enemies. The footmen likewiſe followed after. There the Dictator omitting no help of God and man, vowed, as men ſay, a Temple to Caſtor, and openly promiſed and propoſed rewards
D to that ſouldier that made either firſt or ſecond entry into the enemies Camp. Whereupon they beſtirred themſelves ſo couragiouſly, that the Romans at one brunt both vanquiſhed their enemies, and alſo were poſſeſſed of their tents. This was the noble field fought at the Lake Regillus. The Dictator and the Generall of horſemen returned into the City with triumph. For three years after, there was neither aſſured peace between them, nor yet profeſſed war.

Conſuls were Q. Cœlius, and T. Lartius. After them A. Sempronius, and M. Minutius. Whiles theſe two were Conſuls, the Temple to Saturn was dedicated, and the feaſt called Saturnalia inſtituted. After them ſucceeded A. Poſthumius, and T. Virginius. And in this year and not before, I find in ſome authors, that the ſaid battell was ſtricken near the Lake Regillus, and that A. Poſthumius ſuſpecting the fidelity of his brother Conſul gave over his place, and ſo was made Dictator. The E account of times doth ſo vary and is ſo intricate and confuſed, whiles writers diverſly ſet down the chief Magiſtrates, that in ſo great antiquity, not of acts only, but alſo of authors, a man cannot orderly and directly diſtinguiſh, according to ſome writers, who were Conſuls, and what was done in every year.

Temple of Saturn dedicated. Saturnalia inſtituted.

Afterwards were Ap. Claudius, and P. Servilius created Conſuls. This year was famous for the news of Tarquin his death. He died at Cumes, to which place after the defeature of the Latines power he went to Ariſtodemus the Tyrant. At which tidings the hearts of the Nobles were well lightned the Commons alſo began to look up. But the joy in the Nobility was above meaſure too exceſſive and licentious. For why? the great men began now to wrong and wring the communalty, whom untill that day they had favoured and pleaſured to their full power. In the ſame year the F Colony Signia, which King Tarquinius had erected, was now ſtored again the ſecond time, and the number ſupplied with new inhabitants. And the tribes or wards at Rome were now made up 21. The temple of Mercury was dedicated in the * Ides of May. With the Nation of the Volſcians in the time of the Latine war neither was there peace nor war: for both the Volſcians had levied a power for aid to ſend unto the Latines, if the Roman Dictator had not made good ſpeed: and alſo the Roman Dictator haſtned the more for fear he ſhould in one battell have to deal with Latines and Volſcians both at once. Upon this quarrell, the Conſuls led forth their Legions into the Volſcians Country The Volſcians fearing no revenge for their deſignment (that was intended only, and never came in action) were much troubled with this ſudden and unlooked for occurrent. Not minding therefore to make reſiſtance, and forgetfull of warlike proweſs, they delivered G 300 of their Noblemens children out of Cora and Pometia for hoſtages. Whereupon the Roman Legions from thence without any fight were withdrawn. But not long after the Volſcians being ſomewhat eaſed and delivered of their fear, came again to their old biace & returned to their wonted nature, and ſecretly under-hand made preparation anew for war, joyning with them as confederates in this quarrel the Hernikes. They ſend alſo their Embaſſadours all about to move and ſolicite Latium. But the Latines, for their late overthrow at the Lake Regillus, took ſuch a ſpleen and hatred againſt him whoſoever, that ſhould once put into their heads and perſwade them to take

arms, that they could not forbear the very Embassadours, but offer them abuse. They apprehended H therefore the Volscians, conveyed them to Rome, and delivered them to the Consuls: where they revealed and gave intelligence, that the Volscians and Hernicks were out in arms, ready to war upon the Romans. Which being reported unto the Senators, they were so well pleased and contented therewith, that they set at liberty 6000 Latines, prisoners, and sent them home. And concerning a league to be concluded with them, which was like before to have been denied for ever, they referred the consultation thereof, unto the new Magistrates that should next enter. And in good sooth pleasent & glad were the Latins then, for that they had done, and the authors of peace were magnified and had in great reputation. They send moreover a Crown of gold into the Capitoll, for a present to Jupiter. With these Embassadours and the present, those prisoners which before were I set free, came in greater number. Who repaired straight waies to every man his house, where they had been prisoners, yielding them great thanks for their kind usage and friendly entertainment in time of their calamities and miseries, and promised therewith the like courtesie and mutuall hospitality. Never were the Latines at any time afore, both publikely and privately, united more neerly to the Roman Empire.

But as the Volscian war was now at hand, so the City was at discord among themselves. The Senators and Commons hated one another at the heart, and all this arose by occasion especially of certain persons that were indebted, and in danger of their creditors: who muttered and gave out in murmuring wise, how that abroad they adventured themselves and fought for the liberty and dominion of the City, and at home by their own neighbours they were held prisoners and K oppressed: saying that the freedom of the Commons was more safe in time of war, than of peace, among the enemies rather than their own fellow Citizens. This inward grudge and heart-burning, which of it self still kindled more and more, the notable calamity of one man above all others, set on a light fire. A certain aged person chanced to break prison, and with the arms, badges, and ornaments of all his ancestors, ran into the market place. His apparrell was all to tattered, foule, and loathsome, but the habit or plight of his body much more filthy: so pale, so wan, so lean withall, as if he had been over-pined and starved, his long side beard and hair of his head so overgrown, that they made his visage and countenance wild and gastly. Howbeit, for all he was thus disfigured by this deformity, he was a man well known, and as some said, he had done good service in the wars, had been a chief Centurion, and had the charge and leading of bands in the L field: and the common people, as pittying his estate, and to move compassion, recounted many worthy exploits of his, to his great credit and singular commendation. Himself likewise shewed the scars of wounds, which in his breast and fore-part of his body in divers places he had received that might testifie his valiant service. The people flocking about him as it were in a common assembly to hear a solemn Oration, enquired of him, how he came to be in that taking, so poor, so disfigured and deformed? He answered, that whiles he served in the Sabine war, he by reason of the continuall forraging, and wasting of the Territory, not only lost the revenews and encrease of his lands, but also his Mannor-house was burnt, all his goods ransacked and spoiled, his cattell driven away: and when a levy and tribute was exacted in a time when he ill might, he was driven to take up money and run in debt; which growing more and more by paiment of in- M terest, first he was constrained to sell his land, that his father and grandfather had left him, and to turn himself out of all, by making a clean hand of the rest of his goods: untill at length his body also began to winder away in a consumption. Complaining moreover how by his creditor he was not only brought into bondage and thraldom, but also imprisoned, and whipped, and tormented in most cruell and butcherlike manner. With that he shewed before them all, his back lately scourged, with the fresh wales of the lashes newly given him. At the sight and hearing hereof, there arose a great outcry of the people, so that anon the uprore kept not within the compass of the market place, but spread over all the City: in such sort, that as well they that were bound, as they that were loose, came forth from all parts into the open streets calling the Quirites and the people pitifully to help. In no corner wanted any companions to take part willingly in this seditious rout: and N every where in all the streets they run by companies into the common place. Those Senators who chanced to be abroad, at their no small perill light upon this multitude: and had not the Consuls P. Servilius, and App. Claudius made the better speed, and come upon them to appease the commotion, there would have been some knocks, for hardly could they have held their hands. At whose comming the multitude turned unto them, shewing their irons, and all their other shamefull misusage and misery, saying, This is all the good we have gotten for our warfare: upbraiding every man the services they had performed, some in one place, some in another, requiring them in threatning wise, rather than by way of supplication, to call the Senate together, and they the while stood about the Curia, as if they would be judges and moderators of their publike counsell. Very few of the Senators, such only as by chance came that way, could be brought to re- O pair to the Consuls: as for the rest, they were afraid not only to come into the Councill-house, but also to venture abroad into the market place, so that by reason of their small assembly, there could be nothing done nor determined. Then thought the people indeed they were mocked and dallied withall, and driven off with delaies, surmising, that the Senators which were away, absented themselves not by chance, nor for fear, but only to hinder the proceeding of their cause: and that the Consuls themselves did dissemble and shrink, and without all question made

A made but a ſcorn and game at their miſeries. This broil ſo increaſed, that hardly could the reverence and Majeſty of the Conſuls reſtrain the peoples rage. But the Senators ſtanding in doubtfull tearms, whether to tarry behind or to come forward would be more dangerous, at length they reſolved to repair into the Senate, and being now at laſt a full and ſufficient houſe gathered, neither the Lords there aſſembled, no nor yet the Conſuls, could well agree amongſt themſelves what to do in this caſe. Appius a man of a hot ſpirit, was of opinion to order the matter by Conſular authority and commandment; ſaying, That if one or two of them were laid hold on, the reſt would be quiet. But Servilius more inclined to mild and gentle remedies, thought it a more ſafe and eaſy courſe too, rather to bend than to break their angry and ſell ſtomacks. But amidſt

B theſe troubles there hapned a greater and more fearful occurrence: For certain Latins on horſeback rode in poſt, and brought news in haſty and tumultuous manner, that the Volſcians were coming with a mighty and cruel army againſt the City to aſſault the ſame. Which news being heard (ſee how diſcord had of one City made twain) wrought far other effect in the Nobles, than in the Commons. The comminalty lept for joy, and ſaid the gods were now come down from Heaven to be revenged of the Senators pride, and encouraged one another not to take preſtmony, or to enter their names in the Muſter-maſters book, ſaying that they had rather dye at once with all, than periſh alone and none but they: "Let the Nobles (quoth they) ſerve as ſouldiers; "let them take weapon in hand, and abide the brunts and hazards of war, who receive the pro-"fits, the prizes and rewards thereof. But contrary-wiſe the Senate penſive and ſurcharged with

C this twofold fear, as well from citizen as enemy, beſought the Conſul Servilius (a man by nature more affable and popular) That he would provide for the ſafety of the Common-weal, beſet as it were round with ſo fearful perils. Then the Conſul diſmiſſed the Senate, and came forth into the aſſembly of the people, where he ſhewed what care the LL. of the Senate had for the good of the commons: "But whiles they were (quoth he) buſy in conſultation for the greateſt part "(I confeſs) of the City, and yet in truth no more but a part, it fell out ſo in the mean while, "that of neceſſity they muſt ſee to the whole body of the Common-wealth, whereof they ſtand "in exceeding fear. Seeing therefore the enemies were almoſt hard at the gates, they could not "poſſibly do or intend any thing before war. Neither (if there ſhould be any reſpite and leaſure "granted) were it either for the commons credit and honeſty, not to fight for their Country,

D "unleſs they had their pay before hand; nor well beſeeming the Nobles and for their reputati-"on, to look unto and take order haſtily, to redreſs the miſeries and calamities of their citizens "upon fear, rather than afterwards with good deliberation, for love and of willing mind. This ſpeech of his he confirmed with an edict, by vertue whereof, he gave ſtreight commandment: Imprimis, that no man ſhould keep bound or in priſon, any citizen of Rome, but that he might be enrolled before the Conſuls. Item, that no perſon ſhould hold in poſſeſſion, or ſell the goods of any ſouldier, ſo long as he abode in the camp, nor arreſt his children or childrens children. This edict being once publiſhed and proclaimed, not only the enthralled debtors there preſent, were immediately by name enrolled, but alſo from all parts of the City, they leapt quickly out of their houſes, ſeeing that now their creditors had no right nor power to detain and arreſt them,

E and ran into the market place for to take a military oath of alleageance, to be true ſouldiers and faithful to the State. A number there was of theſe: neither was there any that more manfully behaved and quit themſelves or took more pains in the Volſcian war. Then the Conſul led forth his power againſt the enemies, and within a little of them incamped himſelf. The night following, the Volſcians preſuming upon the variance and diſcord of the Romans, aſſailed the tents, if haply in the night ſeaſon any of them might have been wrought, to abandon the camp, and come to them, or to practiſe any treaſon. But the Sentinels deſcried them, and upon allarm given, the whole army aroſe, and every man made haſt to his weapons. Thus came that enterpriſe of the Volſcians to nothing. The reſt of the night both parts reſted, and were quiet. On the morrow by break of day, the Volſcians having filled up the trench, aſſailed the bulwarks and rampiers.

F And by that time they had on every ſide plucked up the fences, palliſadoes, and other fortifications, the Conſul, who for all he was called unto inſtantly on every hand, but of the debtors aforeſaid eſpecially above the reſt, to give the ſignal, and to ſound the battel, made ſome ſtay on purpoſe to try the courage of his men: and ſeeing well now their forwardneſs and their ſtomacks, at length gave them a token to ruſh forth, and ſo letteth them looſe, as eager to fight as might be. So at the very firſt onſet the enemies were preſently diſcomfited and put to flight: the footmen followed hard upon them in chaſe, and as they could reach, wounded them behind on their backs, and killed them: the horſemen likewiſe purſued them even to their pavillions, who ſtill feared exceedingly what might become of them: and within a while their very camp alſo, environed about with the legions, and abandoned of the Volſcians themſelves for fear, were forced

G and rifled. The next day following, the legions marched to Sueſſa Pometia, for thither the enemies were fled: and within few dayes the Town was won, and put to the ſack, and the ſpoil and pilage given away: whereby the needy ſouldiers were ſomewhat refreſhed. The Conſul in great glory and honour brought back his victorious army to Rome. In his way homeward the Ambaſſadors of the Eretrian Volſcians diſtruſting their own State, upon the loſſe of Pometia, came unto him. To whom after conſultation had with the Senate, and a decree paſſed, peace was granted: but they were fined to part with their Lands. Immediately upon this, the Sabins alſo put the Romans in a fright, and in every deed it might be called a tumult, rather then a war. For word H was brought in the night ſeaſon that an army of the Sabins were come in a rode, as far as the river Anio, robbing, ſpoiling, and burning all the villages and hamlets as they went. Forthwith was ſent thither the whole power of horſes under the conduct of A. Poſthumius, who in the Latin war had been Dictator. After him followed the Conſul Servilius with a choſen regiment of footmen. Moſt of the enemies as they ranged abroad a forraging in ſcattering wiſe, were by the horſemen ſurprized and incloſed. And when the Infantry beſides marched againſt the Sabins legion, they were not able to reſiſt: for being tired out, partly with their long journy, and partly with plundring all night long, and many of them having overcharged themſelves with meat and wine within the villages, had hardly ſtrength enough to run away. Thus the Sabin war in one night was heard of and end- I ed. The day following, when as now the Romans were in good hope, that they had peace on every ſide, behold the Auruncan Embaſſadors came into the Senate, proclaming war, unleſs they would forgo the Volſcian lands, and reſtore them to their rightful owners. And even at one time with the Embaſſadors was the army alſo of the Auruncans abroad, and had taken the field. The news whereof, and namely, that they were now in ſight not far from Aricia, raiſed up the Romans in ſo great a broil and hurliburly, that the Senators could neither be conſulted with, and deliver their opinions in order, nor yet give a peaceable anſwer to thoſe that came as it were with weapon in hand, being thus forced to take arms themſelves. So to Aricia directly in warlike manner they march, and not far from thence they joined battel with the Auruncans. And in one day that war had alſo an end. K

Thus when the Roman ſouldiers had gotten victory within ſo few days in ſo many places, and had now defeated the Auruncans, they looked for the promiſe of the Conſul, and the faithful performance of it by the Senate. At what time Appius both upon a proud ſtomack, and arrogant ſpirit of his own by nature, and alſo to diſcredit and diſanul the word of his fellow Conſul, in all actions of debt proceeded, and gave judgement with rigor againſt the debtors. Whereupon, both they that had been before impriſoned, were delivered again into their creditors hands, and other alſo became priſoners anew. Whereat when as a ſouldier, whoſe caſe it was thus hardly to be dealt withal, called upon the Conſul his fellow for help, they ran all at once to Servilius, at his hands they claimed a promiſe: every one upbraided and reproached him with their ſervice in war, with their ſcars there gotten, requiring that he would propoſe the matter again unto the L Senate, and as a Conſul, ſuccour and protect his Citizens; or like a General, maintain his ſouldi-ers. Theſe matters no doubt, moved the Conſul: but ſo ſtood the caſe that he could neither will nor chuſe, but diſſemble, deal double, and temporize with them: ſo fully bent, and wholly wedded to the other part, was not only his colleague, but alſo the whole faction of the Nobility. Thus by bearing himſelf as a Neuter, and going as they ſay, between the bark and the tree, he neither avoided the hatred of the Commons, nor yet won favour with the Nobles: whiles the Nobles took him for a ſoft and baſe minded Conſul, ſeeking to pleaſe all parties, and the Commons for as crafty and falſe diſſembler: inſomuch as within a ſhort time it appeared he was as much hated of the people as Appius. For, the Conſuls hapned on a time to ſtrive, whether of them twain ſhould dedicate the Temple of Mercury. The Senate put over the deciding of this matter from M themſelves unto the people: and decreed withal, that to whether of them the dedication of the Temple was by the peoples election granted, he ſhould over and beſides have the charge to pur-vey corn and victuals, he ſhould erect and inſtitute a Colledge or fellowſhip of Merchants, and he in ſtead of the high Prieſt, ſhould undertake the ſolemn feaſts or feſtival days. Then the people gave the dedication of the Temple to M. Lectorius, a principal Centurion of the vanguard: which as it eaſily appeared, was done not ſo much to grace the man, as who had an higher office beſtowed upon him, then was fit for one of his degree and calling; as to diſgrace and deface the Conſuls. Hereat one of the Conſuls, yea, and the Patricii ſtormed and fumed exceedingly againſt the Commons. But the Commons took heart unto them more and more, and began to proceed far otherwiſe, and to take another courſe then they purpoſed at the beginning: for deſpairing of N the Conſuls and Senats help, when they ſaw a debtor ſued and brought to the bar, they would run flocking from all parts together, ſo that the Conſuls ſentence and decree could not be heard for the noiſe and clamour. And decree or judge what he would, no man would obey. And ſo violently they went to work, that in preſence of the Conſul, the creditors were ſingled out, evil entreated, and miſuſed of the Commons, being many together. So the whole fear and hazzard of the main chance, even of liberty it ſelfe, was now altogether tranſlated from the debtors to the creditors. In the very neck of theſe troubles, there aroſe a fear of the Sabin war, and when it was determined, there ſhould be a muſter of ſouldiers, no man would anſwer to his name and be enrolled. All this while Appius raged and took on, "inveying bitterly againſt the nicety and popu-

"ſtred juſtice for the loane of money, nor dealt according to law in that behalf, he had brought
"the matter ſo to paſs that he could take no muſters by vertue of the decree of the Senate. How-
"beit (ſaith he) the Common-wealth is not wholly forſaken and forlorne, nor yet the Conſular
"authority utterly caſt down and trodden under foot: for he would himſelf alone, if there were "no more but he, defend and maintain both his own place, and the Senators dignity. Whenas the

A multitude therefore ſtood thus malapertly, as their dailymanner was, about the bar: he commanded one principal Captain of ſedition to be attached and had away: and as he was haled to priſon by the Sergeants and Lictors, he appealed. Neither would the Conſul have given place to the appeal (for all he knew the people how they were bent, and what their doom would be) had not his obſtinate ſtiffneſs with much ado been overſwayed more through the diſcret adviſe & authority of the chief nobles & Lords of the Senate, than by the clamorous noiſe & menaces of the multitude: ſo reſolute was he, and his heart ſo couragious, to undergo their ill will and heavy diſpleaſure. Thus grew the miſchief more & more daily, teſtified not with open mouth & broad ſpeeches only, but alſo (which was more pernicious and dangerous) by conventicles, ſecret meetings, and conferen-
B ces. At length theſe Coſſ. ſo odious unto the Commons, went out of their office, to wit, Appius, a man wonderous well affected of the Nobles, Servilius liked neither of them nor the Commons.

After whom A. Virginius, and T. Vetuſius entred their Conſulſhip. But then the Commons not knowing what manner of Conſuls they ſhould have, began to aſſemble together by night, ſome in Eſquiliæ, others in the Aventine: to the end they might not be unprovided and to ſeek upon a ſuddain, what to do in the common place, nor manage their buſineſs hand over head, and at a venture. Which the Conſuls ſuppoſing (as it was indeed) a perilous example, and of ill conſequence, propounded the matter before the Senators: but when they had propoſed it, they could not orderly ask their adviſe what was to be done: they took ſo on, and kept ſuch outcry and clamour at it, on all hands fretting and fuming, that the Conſuls ſhould lay upon the Senate the burden and heavy C load of that, which properly they by vertue of their authority and office ſhould execute and perform themſelves: and ſurely, if there were any Magiſtrates in the City (ſay they) there would not be thus ſuffered in Rome any other counſel but publick: whereas now the State is divided into a thouſand Courts and conventicles: whiles ſome have their meetings and aſſemblies in Eſquiliæ, others in Aventine: Aſſuredly one only man indeed (for that is more than a Conſul) ſuch a one as Appius Claudius was, would ſoon diſpatch and in one minute of an hour ſcatter theſe their unlawful aſſemblies. The Conſuls upon this rebuke and check, replyed again and demanded in this manner: And what would you have us to do (quoth they) for we are reſolved to do nothing ſlackly and coldly, but with as great courage and diligence as ſhall be well liked of the Senators. Whereupon an order paſſed, that they ſhould take muſter and levy ſouldiers with all rigour and ſeverity: adding D moreover, that the Commons with idleneſs and eaſe were grown over-malapert and too licentious. And when the Senate was diſmiſſed, the Conſuls went into the Tribunal & took their places, and ſummoned by name all the * younger ſort to appear: and none making anſwer to his name, the multitude ſtanding about as it had been to hear ſome publick Oration, ſaid plainly, that the Commons from thenceforth would be no longer deluded, and that the Conſuls ſhould never get ſo much as one ſouldier, unleſs they would ſtand to their word, and make good the promiſe that publickly before was made, and reſtore to every man again his liberty, before they cauſed them to take weapon in hand: to the end they might fight for their country and country-men, and not for their Lordlike Maſters. The Conſuls ſaw well what they had in commiſſion from the Senate & that of all thoſe who within the Councel houſe walls ſpake ſo ſtoutly & gave out ſo great words, there E was not one preſent to take part of this odious maliſe of the people. And like they were to have a bitter fit and cruel broil with the Commons. They thought good therefore ere they tried the worſt, and dealt by extremity, once again to ask adviſe of the Senate, and to confer with them. But then all the younger ſort of the Senators, approached by multitudes, hard almoſt to the Conſuls ſeats, willing them to give over their Conſulſhip, and to reſign up their rule and authority, to the maintenance whereof they lacked courage. Now when the Conſuls had ſufficiently weighed and tried both wayes, thus at length began they and ſaid. A great ſedition and commotion is toward, my LL. To the end therefore that ye pretend not ignorance, and ſay another day ye were not foretold of it, there is a great ſedition and commotion toward. We require therefore that they who find greateſt fault with our remiſſeneſs and lack of courage, aſſiſt us and ſit with us while we take F the muſters: and ſince you will needs have it ſo, we will execute it according to their minds, that are moſt earneſt and ſevereſt. Then come they back again unto the Tribunal, and commanded on ſet purpoſe, one of them that were there in ſight to be cited and called by name. But he ſtood ſtill and held his peace, with a company of men gathered round about to guard him, for fear he ſhould have ſome harm or violence done unto him. The Conſul then ſent a Sergeant to attach him, who being repulſed off, then thoſe Nobles which ſate there on the bench to aſſiſt the Conſuls, cried out upon the ſhameful indignity, and ſaid it was intollerable, and ſo ran down in haſt from the Tribunal ſeat, for to aid the Sergeant. But the violent rage of the multitude, who let the Lictor alone, and only ſtayed him from laying hold on the man, turned upon the Patritians. So that the Coſſ. were fain to ſtep between, and then the fray was appeaſed. In which, there being G no ſtones flying about their ears, nor weapon drawn, there was more clamor, brawling and chafing than any hurt done. Then was the Senate houſe called in a great hurry: and with more confuſion ſat they there in Councel: whiles they that pretended how they were beaten and miſuſed, required that commiſſioners ſhould ſit upon this riot and make due inquiſition: and the ſtouteſt of them gave their determination as much by clamor and noiſe, as by ſentence and opinion grounded upon reaſon. At laſt, when the tempeſt was overblown and their heat allayed, and that the Coſſ. hit them in the teeth, and reproved them, ſaying there was a little diſcretion and gravity in their Court and Councel-houſe, as in the common Hall, they began in the end to conſult orderly H and three opinions there were amongſt them. P. Virginius would not have it a common and general caſe (to wit, that all debtors ſhould be releaſed from their creditors) but his adviſe was, that they ſhould only be conſidered, who relying upon P. Servilius the Conſul his word and faithful promiſe, had ſerved in the wars of the Volſcians, Auruncans and Sabins. T. Largius, he ſuppoſed and thought this, that it was not a time then to make amends only for good deſerts, and to reſpect them alone that had done well, and to recompence good ſervice: but for as much as the whole commonalty was deeply engaged and plunged in debt, unleſs they were all provided for, and good order taken for them every one, there would be no quietneſs nor end of troubles: yea, and (that which more is) in caſe they be not all alike regarded, but ſome debtors in better condition than I others, the diſcord would rather be more kindled than quenched. Appius Claudius a man both of natural diſpoſition fierce and cruel, and alſo by occaſion made more outragious, netled with the Commons hatred againſt him on the one ſide, and tickled with the praiſe and commendations of the Nobles on the other ſide, who ever magnified him and lift him up to the skie, ſpake to this effect: "Theſe ſo great ſtirs and mutinous hurliburlies, my Maſters (quoth he) is not long of the

"no doubt is ſprung of this, that they have liberty to appeal. For ſo long as it is in their power to "flie for help unto thoſe that have erred as well as they, well may the Conſul threaten and give "out menacing words: as for any rule elſe or command they ſhall have none among them. Come K
"on therefore, let us create a Dictator from whom they cannot make their appeal. Then ſhall
"this furious rage, which now ſetteth all on a light fire, be ſoon huſht and quite extinguiſhed. Let "me ſee then, who dare beat a Lictor, when he ſhall well know, that he alone whoſe honor "and Majeſty he ſhall offend and abuſe, hath power to ſcourge him and take away his life. Many men thought this ſentence of Appius to be very hard and cruel; yea, and dangerous withal, in regard of the late precedent of Virginius and Vetuſius. That other likewiſe of Largius was thought inconvenient, in taking away all keeping of credit with the creditors. The opinion and adviſe of Virginius was ſuppoſed as well in one reſpect as in another moſt indifferent and mean between both. But by reaſon of the faction and regard of private benefit, which alwayes hath done hurt and ever will, to publick Counſel, Appius prevailed, and he miſſed very little but he himſelf had L been made Dictator. Which if it had come to paſs, it would ſurely have eſtranged and alienated quite the hearts of the Commons, in that moſt buſy and dangerous time: when it happened that the Volſcians, Æquians, and Sabins, were all up at once in arms. But the Conſuls and elder Senators, had great care and conſideration to chuſe ſuch a one, as might by mildneſs of his own nature allay and qualify the exceeding rigour and ſternneſs incident to Soveraign and abſolute authority. They elect therefore to be Dictator, Marcus Valerius the ſon of Voleſus. The Commons albeit they ſaw well enough this Dictator created for to curbe them, yet having got by his brothers law, the benefit of Appeal, they feared no ſevere and inſolent proceeding from that houſe and name. The Edict beſides, that the Dictator ſet forth, which was welneer all one with that other of the Conſul Servilius, much confirmed and ſetled their minds. For ſuppoſing now, they M had more hold both of the man, and alſo of his authority, and that they might with more confidence rely themſelves on the one and the other, they gave over all debate, and entred their names into the muſter book: ſo there were enrolled full ten legions. The like army for number was never levied afore. Of which legions, the Conſuls had the conduct of three a piece, and the Dictator commanded the other four: and high time, it was: for the war might not be deferred any longer. The Æquians had already invaded the territory of the Latins, and their Embaſſadors were petitioners to the Senate, either to ſend ſuccour, or to give them leave to put on armor themſelves for the defence of their confines, and frontiers. It was thought the ſafer and ſurer way, that the Latins without arming themſelves ſhould be defended, than to permit them again to take weapon in hand. So the Conſul Vetuſius was ſent thither, and he ſtayed them from fur- N ther foraging and waſting. For the Æquians were departed out of the plains, and truſting rather in the vantage of the ground, than in their weapons, ſtood upon their guard, kept themſelves ſafe from danger, upon the high tops of the Hills and Mountains.

The other Conſul who was gone againſt the Volſcians, becauſe he would not alſo loſe any time, drew the enemy forth (by waſting the country eſpecially) to encamp himſelf neerer, and ſo at length to fight a field. Now was there a plain in the mids between both camps: where each army ſtood before their rampiers, embattelled, and ranged in array, with banners diſplayed ready to fight. The Volſcians were ſomewhat more in number, whereupon they began battail diſorderedly and as if they ſet light by the enemy. But the Roman Conſul neither advanced forward, nor ſuffered his men once to ſhout and anſwer again, but charged them to ſtand ſtill with their jave- O lins faſt in the ground, until the enemies were come within the reach of hand fight, and then to lay about them luſtily with their ſwords, all that ever they could. The Volſcians out of breath with running and ſhouting, charged the Romans, who ſeemed for fear to ſtand aſtonied: but after they once perceived that they were hotly reencountred by them again, and ſaw their ſwords glittering in their eyes, they were troubled therewith, as if they had been entrapped and fallen into ſome trains layed for them, and ſo turned their backs. And by reaſon they came running before

to

A to battail, their ſtrength would not hold out now to run clear away: The Romans contrarywiſe, becauſe againſt the beginning of the fight they had ſtood quiet, were freſh of body, and ſoon overtook them thus overtoiled, won their camp by force, and after they had driven the enemies out from thence, chaſed them into * Velitre, and entred the Town pelmell one with another in a medley the Victor together with them that were vanquiſhed. More bloudſhed there was by execution of them one with another, of all ages and ſexes, as they came in their way, than in the very battail. A very few, even ſuch as without weapon yeelded themſelves, were ſpared and pardoned. * Belitre.

Whiles theſe things were a doing amongſt the Volſcians, the Dictator diſcomfited and put to flight the Sabins, with whom he had much cruel war: yea, and forced them to abandon and B quit their camp. For having ſent his horſemen into the main battail of the enemies, which they had but ſlightly ſtrengthened within, and beſtowed the ranks there very thin, and all to ſtretch out the wings on both ſides more at large, he brake their arraies: and when they were once diſordered, the footmen came in upon them: and in the ſame brunt were they Maſters of their camp, and ſo the war ended. There was not in thoſe dayes a braver battail fought and more renowned, ſetting aſide that only at the lake Regillus. The Dictator rode in triumph unto the City. Over and above the accuſtomed honors, both he and his poſterity after him, were allowed a certain place in the great Race or Theater, called Circus, for to behold at eaſe the ſolemn games, and there was ſet the Ivory chair of eſtate, called Sella curulis. The Volſcians thus vanquiſhed, loſt the territory about Velitre, and new inhabitants were ſent thither from the City to C people and to till the grounds, ſo that it became a Colony.

Somewhat after this, there was a field fought with the Æquians, but in truth, full againſt the Conſul his will, for that they were to climb up a ſteep Hill (to their diſadvantage) for to meet with the enemy. But the Souldiers blaming him for trifling out, and making delayes, to the end that the Dictator might be out of Office before they made return to the City, and ſo his word and promiſe, like the Conſuls before him, ſhould come to nothing; drave him perforce to lead up his army, raſhly and at adventure againſt the Hills. This being an enterpriſe ill ordered, and an error eſcaped, fell out notwithſtanding very well through the cowardiſe of the enemy: who before they were come within ſhot and the darts caſt, amazed at the venturouſneis of the Romans, forſook their holds which they had in moſt defenſible places, and leapt down
D into the valleys over againſt them. There was booty & pillage good enough, and a bloudleſs victory.

Having ſped thus fortunately abroad in three ſeveral wars, the Senators and Commons were not careleſs of home-affairs, what would be the iſſue thereof. The Bankers and Uſurers, what with favor, and what with ſubtil and cautelous policy, had deviſed aforehand and wrought ſuch means, as might fruſtrate and diſappoint not only the Commons, but alſo the Dictator, and put them by their expectation. For Valerius, after the return of Vetuſius the Conſul, dealt firſt and above all other matters and cauſes at the Councel table, in the behalf of the people that had atchieved ſuch victories, and propounded to know their minds, What ſhould be done with thoſe endebted, endangered, and impriſoned perſons. "Which motion of his being diſliked and re"jected: I ſee well (quoth he) that I cannot pleaſe you, ſo long as I perſwade to concord and E "unity: wiſh ye will (truſt me truly) e're it be long, that the commonalty of Rome had more "Patrons and Advocates like my ſelf. As for me, I will neither bear my citizens any longer in "hand to deceive them, nor be a Dictator in vain, to effect nothing. Civil diſcord at home, and "forrain war abroad, cauſed the State to have need of this office. Now, when peace is gotten "without, behold it is croſſed and hindered within: yet had I rather be preſent at the ſight of a "mutiny and inſurrection when I am a private perſon, than whiles I am a Dictator. Thus went he out of the Councel-houſe, and yeelded up his Dictatorſhip withal. The Commons ſaw plainly what the matter was, and how upon a diſcontentment and grief that he took in their behalf, for very pitty and compaſſion of them, he gave over the place: and therefore, as if he had fully diſcharged himſelf of his faithful word to them given, (for that there was no default in him, but it F had been performed indeed) they accompanied him along home to his houſe with hearty affection, praiſing and commending him all the way they went. The Lords of the Senate began then to fear, leſt if the army were broken up and diſcharged, there would be ſome ſecret conventicles, and new conſpiracies contrived: therefore, albeit the muſters were taken by the Dictator: yet becauſe the ſouldiers had ſworn alleageance to the Conſuls, ſuppoſing they were ſtill bound to warfare by vertue of that oath, and pretending a colour that the Æquians renued war, they commanded the legions to be led forth of the City.

This haſtened the ſedition the ſooner and ſet it forward. At firſt, as men ſaid, they complotted and laid their heads together about murdering and making away the Conſuls, to the end they might be acquit of their oath unto them: but afterwards being better ſchooled and adviſed, that G no mans conſcience can be cleared of ſcruple, and diſcharged of an oath once taken, by committing a ſinful act and working miſchief, they withdrew themſelves out of the way by the perſwaſion of one Sicinius, and without conge of the Conſuls, departed as far as Mount Sacer, on the farther ſide of the River Anio, three miles from the City. This is the more common report, and goeth more currant, than that whereof Piſo is the Author (namely, that the commons retired themſelves to Aventine.) There, without any head or Captain, they encamped and fortified themſelves within a trench and rampier, and kept quiet for certain dayes, neither taking nor doing harm;

harm; as having caried with them ſuch things only as were neceſſary for the ſuſtenance of their life. Great fear there was in the City, and in this mutual and reciprocal fear, all men were perplexed and to ſeek what to do. The Commons forlorn of their fellow Commoners doubted the violence of the Senators: the Senators again ſtood in fear and jealouſie of the Commons that remained ſtill behind; and were in ſuſpenſe whether it were better they abode ſtill among them, or followed after their fellows. For how long trow ye, will a multitude once disbanded; reſt in quiet? Again, in caſe any forrain war ſhould ariſe in the mean time, what might enſue thereupon in the end? In concluſion, there was no hope behind to be looked for, but in the concord of citizens: and therefore the commons one way or other, either by reaſonable conditions or unreaſonable, were to be reconciled again and reduced into the City, there was no remedy. So it was thought good and agreed upon, that one Menenius Agrippa (a fair ſpoken and eloquent man, gracious withal and well-beloved among the commons, for that he was from them deſcended) ſhould be ſent as an Orator to treat with them. Who being received into the camp, after that old and harſh kind of eloquence in thoſe dayes, ſpake as men ſaith to this effect, and told this tale and parable: "Upon a time (quoth he) when as in mans body, all the parts thereof agreed not, as now "they do in one, but each member had a ſeveral intent and meaning; yea, and a ſpeech by it ſelf: "ſo it befel, that all other parts beſides the belly, thought much and repined that by their careful- "neſs, labor, and miniſtery, all was gotten, and yet all little enough to ſerve it: and the belly it ſelf "lying ſtill in the mids of them, did nothing elſe but enjoy the delightſome pleaſures brought un- "to her. Whereupon they mutined and conſpired altogether in this wiſe, That neither the hands "ſhould reach and convey food into the mouth, nor the mouth receive it as it came, nor yet the "teeth grind and chew the ſame. In this mood and fit, whiles they were minded to famiſh the "poor belly, behold the other limbs, yea, and the whole body beſides, pined, waſted, & fell into an "extreme conſumption. Then was it well ſeen, that even the very belly alſo did no ſmall ſervice, but "fed the other parts, as it received food it ſelf: ſeeing that by working and concocting the meat "throughly, it digeſteth and diſtributeth by the veins into all parts, that freſh and perfect blood "whereby we live, we like, and have our full ſtrength. Comparing herewith, and making his application, to wit, how like this inteſtine and inward ſedition of the body, was to the fell ſtomack of the commons, which they had taken and born againſt the Senators, he turned quite the peoples hearts. Then began ſome treaty of unity and concord: and among other articles it was conditioned and granted, that the Commonalty ſhould have certain ſacred and inviolable Magiſtrates of their own among themſelves, ſuch as might have power to aſſiſt the Commons againſt the Conſuls: Item, that it might not be lawful for any Senator to bear that office. So there were created two Tribunes of the Commons, C. Licinius and L. Albinus. And theſe elected three other fellow officers unto them. Of whom Sicinius, the Author of the ſedition or inſurrection was one, who were the other twain is not for certain known. Some ſay there were but two Tribunes created and no more in the mount Sacer, and that the ſacred law was there made concerning their immunity.

Agr. Menenius his Oration to the Commons.

Tribuns of the common people firſt created.

During this inſurrection and revolt of the commons, Sp. Caſſius and Poſthumius Cominius entered their Conſulſhips. In whoſe time a league was made with the people of Latium. For the eſtabliſhing whereof, one of the Conſuls ſtayed behind at Rome: the other was ſent unto the Volſcian war, who diſcomfited and put to flight the Volſcians of Antium, chaſing and driving them into the Town Longula, which he won. And immediatly he took Mucamites a Town of the Volſcians, and after that with great force aſſaulted Corioli.

There was in camp then among the flowre of gallant youths, one Caius Martius, a Noble yong Gentleman, right politick of adviſe, active beſides, and tall of his hands, who afterwards was ſurnamed Coriolanus. Whiles the Roman army lay at ſiege before Corioli, and were amuzed wholly upon the Towns-men within, whom they kept faſt ſhut up, and feared no preſent danger at all from any forrain war without: behold, all on a ſuddain, the Volſcian legions that came from Antium, aſſailed them: at which very inſtant the enemy alſo ſallied out of the Town. Which Martius ſeeing, who by good hap quartered and warded there, with a luſty band of elect men, not only repreſſed and ſtopped the violence of thoſe that iſſued and brake upon him, but alſo whiles the gate ſtood open, fiercely ruſhed in himſelf: and having made a foul ſlaughter of people thereby, at his firſt entrance into the City, and caught up fire at a venture, flung it upon the houſes that ſtood upon and about the walls. Whereupon aroſe a great outcry of the folk within the Town, together with lamentable weeping and wailing of women and children, as commonly is ſeen in ſuch a fright. Which at the very firſt, both hardened the Romans, and alſo troubled the Volſcians: and no marvel, ſeeing the City taken before their face, for which they were come to reſcue. Thus were the Volſcians of Antium defeated, and the Town Corioli won. And Martius through his praiſe, ſo much obſcured and ſtopped the light of the Conſul his fame, that had it not been ingraven in braſſe for a remembrance and monument, That there was a league with the Latines, and the ſame made by Sp. Caſſius alone (for that his companion was abſent) there had been no record at all, but forgotten quite it had been, that ever Sp. Cominius warred with the Volſcians.

Corioli forced.

The ſame year died Menenius Agrippa, a man all his life time before beloved indifferently of the Senators and the Commons: but after the inſurrection, much more dear unto the Commons than before. This truce-maker, this mediator for civil attonement, this Embaſſador and Meſſenger from the Senators to the Commons, this reconciler and reducer of the Commons home

The death of Menenius Agrippa, and his poverty.

A home again into the City, had not at his death ſufficient to deſray the charges of his funerals: the Commons therefore made a purſe and a contribution of a * Sextant by the poll, and were at the coſt to inter and bury him worſhipfully.

* The ſixt part of As, half a farthing or cue with us.

After this were made Conſuls, T. Geganius, and P. Minutius. In which year when all was quiet abroad for any war, and the diſſention at home healed up clean, and skinned: another calamity far more grievous entred the City. Firſt, a dearth of corn, and all manner of victuals, by reaſon that the grounds upon the departure of the Commons were neglected and untilled. Hereupon inſued famine, even ſuch as uſually is incident to men beſieged. And verily the houſhold of bondſervants, yea, and the commons too, had utterly periſhed for hunger, if the Conſuls had not
B in time made the better proviſion: by ſending purveiours all abroad to buy up corn, not only into Hetruria, by coaſting along the river on the right hand from Hoſtia, and on the left hand by Sea, (paſſing through the Volſcians Country) even as far as Cumes: but alſo into Sicily, there to lay for grain. Such was the hatred of the borderers, that Rome was enforced to have need of ſuccor and relief from afar. Now when they had bought certain corn at Cumes, it was no ſooner embarked, but the ſhips were ſtayed and arreſted there, by Ariſtodemus the tyrant for the goods of the Tarquins, whoſe heir in remainder he was. In the Volſcian Country and Pomptinum, they could buy none for mony. There, the very Purveiors themſelves were in danger of violence, by the men of the Country. Out of Tuſcane there came corn up the Tyber, wherewith the Commons were ſuſtained and refreſhed. And conſidering the ſtreights they were in for want of vi-C ctuals, they had been ſore diſtreſſed and vexed with wars beſides, and that in a very ill time, and unſeaſonable for them: but that the Volſcians, who now were in readineſs, and upon the point to make war, had a peſtilence that raigned hot among them. Which heavy croſs and affliction, the enemies were ſo diſcouraged with, that when the plague began to ſtay, even then they continued ſtill afraid.

The Romans both at Velitre augmented the number of the inhabitants and alſo at Norba, ſending a new Colony into the Mountains, to be a Fortreſs and ſtrength for all the territory of Pomptinum. Moreover, when M. Minutius, & A. Sempronius were Conſuls, great ſtore of corn was brought out of Sicily: and it was debated in the Senat-houſe, at what price the Commons ſhould be ſerved therewith. Many thought the time was now come to wring the Commons, and keep D them under, and to recover again thoſe royalties, which by their departure were forcibly wreſted and diſmembred from the nobility. But above all others Martius Coriolanus, an utter and capital enemy to the Tribuns power and authority, "If they will (quoth he) have their corn and "victuals at the old price, let them reſtore unto the Senators their ancient right and prehemi-"nence. Why ſee I (as one brought under the yoke of ſervitude, and put as it were unto my "ranſome, by Robbers and Theeves) theſe Magiſtrates of the Commons? why ſee I Sicinius ſo "mighty? Shall I endure theſe indignities longer than I needs muſt (I that could not bear Tar-"quinius to be King, ſhall I brook and ſuffer Sicinius? Let him depart aſide now, and take his "Commons with him: the way is open to Mount Sacer and other Hills: Let them carry away "with them the corn out of our poſſeſſions and Lordſhips, as they did three years ago: let E "them enjoy, take for their uſe, and ſpend the ſtore, which they in their foolery and fury have "provided. I dare be bold to ſay, that when they are by this calamity once tamed, they will "rather till and husband the ground themſelves, than with weapon in hand, and by way of in-"ſurrection, forbid and hinder the tillage thereof. I cannot ſo ſoon ſay, whether it had been as meet, as I ſuppoſe it was poſſible and eaſy to effect, that the Senators by offering more gentle conditions in the prices of corn and victuals, might have eaſed themſelves of the Tribuns authority over them, and alſo have been disburdened of thoſe impoſitions which will they, nill they, were laid upon them. Well, this ſeemed to the Senate a ſharp cenſure and ſevere ſentence of Coriolanus, and for very anger alſo it had like to have cauſed the Commons to riſe up in arms. For they muttered and gave it out in theſe tearms, "That now they were laid at and F "aſſailed with famine like enemies, defrauded and bereft of their meat and pittance: that the "outlandiſh corn, the only ſuſtenance and food which fortune had miniſtred unto them beyond "all hope, was ſnatched and plucked from their mouths, unleſs the Tribuns be delivered and "yeelded Priſoners hand and foot bound to C. Martius, unleſs he might have his pennyworths "of the back and ſhoulders of the Commons of Rome. For he was now ſtart up and become "their tormentor and hangman, to command them either to death, or to ſervitude. As he went out of the Councel houſe, they had run upon him with violence, but that the Tribuns, as good luck was, ſerved him with proceſs in time, to appear at a day, and come to his anſwer. Herewith, their furious anger was ſuppreſſed. For now every man ſaw, that he was himſelf to be the judge and Lord of his enemies life and death. Martius at the firſt ſcorned the Tribuns thundering G threats, and gave the hearing, as though he made ſmall reckoning thereof, ſaying: That their authority had power granted by limitation, only to aid, and not to puniſh: that the Tribuns were Tribuns to the Commons, and not to the Senators. But ſo ſpightfully were the Commons bent, and all ſo ſet upon miſchief, that there was no other remedy, but one man muſt pay for it to ſave & excuſe the reſt of the Nobles. Howbeit the Senators did what they could to withſtand them: by oppoſing hatred and diſpleaſure again and making all means, what either privately they were able of themſelves, or jointly by their whole Order and degree, to procure. And firſt, this courſe they assayed to stop and overthrow the suit commenced; namely, by setting their followers and re- H tainers in sundry places to deal with the Commons severally one by one & what they could to af-fright them from meetings and assemblies together. Afterwards, they came all forth at once into the Forum or common place. A man that had seen them would have said they had been the parties themselves in trouble and accused, ready to hold up their hand at the bar: such praying, such a beseeching they made of the Commons, in the behalf of this one citizen, this only Senator; that if they would not in their love acquit him for their sakes, as innocent and unguilty, yet they would give him unto them as an offender and faulty person. In conclusion, when his day came, he made default and appeared not, yet continued they still in their angry mood against him. And being condemned in his absence, for contumacy, departed into banishment to the Volscians, I menacing his own country as he went, and carrying even then with him the revenging stomack of an enemy.

The Volscians at his coming received him courteously, and friendly intreated him every day more than other, as they perceived his anger more and more toward his country-men, by many complaints he made of them, and threats withal that he oftentimes gave out against them in their hearing. He made his abode and sojourned in the house of Accius Tullius, who at that time was a mighty great man among the Volscians, and one that ever bare mortal malice unto the Romans. And whiles the one of them was provoked with an old cankred grudge, and the other set on and pricked forward upon a fresh quarrel and occasion of anger, they both laid their heads together and complotted to make war upon the Romans. This only thing stood in their way to K cross their designs: They thought verily their Commons would hardly or scarcely at all be brought, to rise and take arms again, which they had so often unhappily attempted: And besides, their courages were well cooled, and their stomacks abated by the loss of their youth in many and sundry wars often times afore, and now at last, by the late pestilence and mortality. They were therefore to go cunningly to work; that for asmuch as the old hatred against the Romans was grown out and worn away, their hearts upon some new anger might be chafed and galled again.
There were by chance at that time in Rome, the great Games and Playes in hand, to be set out anew the second time, the occasion whereof was this. A certain householder one morning betimes before the shews and games began, had beaten with rods a poor slave of his under the fork which he carried on his shoulders, and driven him along through the mids of the Circus or Thea- L tre: and with that began the playes, as if there had been no matter therein of scruple or Religion. But not long after, one T. Latinius a mean Commoner had a dream or vision: In which he thought that Jupiter complained and said, that the Dancer before the playes pleased him never a whit: and unless those games were newly exhibited again and that very stately and sumptuously, some great danger should befall the City: willing him withal, to make relation hereof unto the Consuls. The man albeit in truth he was not without some sense and feeling of Religion and the fear of God: yet made he no such great scrupie at the matter, but that the reverence he had of the Majesty and countenance of the Magistrates surmounted and dashed it clean: for fear lest haply he should become a talking stock in mens mouths, and be mocked for his labour. But this delay and sleeping of the matter, he bought full dear. For within few dayes his son hapned to dye. M And because he should be out of doubt what was the cause of this his losse and suddain misfortune, whiles he was troubled in spirit, with anguish and sorrow, behold, the same vision appeared to him again in his sleep, and seemed to ask him whether he had not yet sufficiently paid for this disobedience and contempt of God? threatning moreover, that in case he made no greater hast to certify the Consuls thereof, there was a greater judgment and plague toward, and that very neer. Now was the thing more evident than before, and past all peradventure. Howbeit he neglected and drave it off still, until he was himself overtaken with a grievous disease, and brought to great weakness in all his joints. Then verily the wrath of the Gods taught him to be wiser. And being overwearied with harms past and in fear of more presently to ensue, he conferred with his kinsfolk and friends to be advised by them. When he had declared unto them N what he had seen and heard; namely, how Jupiter had so often appeared unto him in his sleep, and that the fearful displeasure and threatnings of the heavenly Gods were shewed plainly by sundry mischances fallen upon him: by the full consent of all them that were about him, he was brought in a litter to the Consuls, into the Forum or common place, from whence by the Consuls commandment he was carried into the Counsel house. Where, when he had made report unto the Senators of the self-same things, to the exceeding wonder and admiration of them all, see another strange miracle: He that was brought into the Senate house a lame creeple of all his lims, after he had once delivered his errand, returned home to his house (as it is recorded) sound upon his feet. Hereupon the Senate decreed, That the Games should be set out as magnificently as could be devised. O

To these solemnities resorted, by the motion and perswasion of Accius Tullius, a great number of Volscians. But before they were begun, Tullius according to the complot between him and Martius at home, made a step or errand unto the Consuls at Rome, saying that he would Accius Tullius to the Roman Consuls. willingly commune and treat with them apart, of important affairs concerning the State. When the room was clear, and every man gone, he began in this wise: "Loth I am (quoth he) if other"wise I could chuse, to speak ought but well of my country-men and fellow citizens. Yet come I

"not

A "not to complain of any action of theirs already passed, but to give a caveat, and provide that "nothing be practised hereafter. The nature and disposition (I may tell you) of our people, is "too too unconstant and unstayed, more I know than I would they were, a great deal: that have
"we found and felt to our great cost and manifold damage, we I say, who verily at this day by your "long sufferance, and not by good desert of ours, do stand in good terms and peace of safety.
"There is now here a great multitude of Volscians, the Playes and Games ready to be represented "and celebrate. Your City will be wholly amused in the beholding thereof: I remember upon
"the like occasion, what was somtimes enterprised and wrought in this City by the youth of the "Sabins; and my heart doth tremble and quake for fear, lest some inconsiderate, rash and foolish B "part be played by ours: thus much, O ye Consuls, I thought good in our behalf and yours both,
"to give you notice of before hand. As for me, I am minded presently to go from hence home,
"lest I being here seen, might be thought in some word or deed accessary unto them, and so cul"pable. Having made this speech he departed. When the Consuls had declared in the Senate this thing so doubtful, and yet proceeding from the mouth of so sure and certain an Author: behold, the credit of the man (as commonly it is seen) rather than the likelihood of the matter, caused them to be wery and circumspect, yea, although there was no such need or cause at all. Whereupon the Senate made an Act, that the Volscians should be jogging out of the City. And divers cryers or Bedles were sent out sundry wayes, to command them to avoid and be packing before night. At the first, the Volscians were only much affrighted, and ran every man to and fro into C his Inne to fetch away his things. But afterwards in the way homeward, they began to think more and more of it, and to grow melancholy: thinking it a great indignity, that like polluted and profaned persons, they should be driven from the Games, on festival holydayes, discarded (as a man would say) and excommunicate out of the company both of God and man. Thus as they went along all on a row, as it were in one continued and joynt train, Tullius (who was gone afore as far as the Ferentine head) received the formost and chief of them, as every one came, and entertained them with complaints and words of indignation, and drew both them who willingly gave ear to his words so fitly framed and tending to stir more coles, and also by their means the rest of the multitude into a plain field lying hard under the high way side. Unto whom, assembled together as it were to hear a sermon, he thus began to speak: "Admit (quoth he) you could for-D "get the old wrongs and abuses offered you by the people of Rome, the losses and overthrows of "the Volscian Nation; yea, and all the other quarrels whatsoever; how can ye put up this dayes
"spightful reproach and dishonor received at their hands? who to our great disgrace and shame,
"have begun their solemn Games? Perceived you not how they have triumphed over you to day?
"how as ye departed, ye were a spectacle and pageant to all men, citizens and strangers, and to so "many neighbour nations adjoyning? how your wives and children were brought as it were in a
"shew to make them sport and to laugh at? what conceit was in their heads (think ye) that heard
"the voyce of the Bedle? what thought they that beheld you as you dislodged? what imagined
"they that happened to meet this ignominious troup as they marched? Even this & no other, that "there was some wicked sin among us, not to be named, whereby we should as malefactors, have E "stayned and polluted their games if we had been present at the sight of them, & have committed
"some haynous act, that would require by some satisfaction of sacrifice to be purged? and for that "cause were driven from having any conversation, fellowship, and society of good and godly men?
"Over and besides, how can you chose but think of this, That we enjoy our lives still, only be"cause we hastned our remove, (if this may be called a remove, and not rather a plain taking of a "flight and running away.) And yet you reckon this no enemy City, where, if ye had stayed but "one day longer, you had dyed for it every one. Defiance is given already, and war denounced a"gainst you; but if ye be men indeed of courage, to their great cost and mischief that have de"nounced it. Thus being of themselves kindled enough with indignation, and by these words enflamed and set on fire, they went every man his way from thence home: and so effectually sollicited F each one the people where he dwelt that in fine the whole nation of the Volscians revolted and rebelled. To manage this war, were chosen General commanders by one consent of all the Cities, Accius Tullius and Cn. Martius the banished Roman: in whom of the twain they reposed greater hope and this their hope failed them not. So as it soon appeared that the puissance of the state of Rome, consisted more in the dexterity of good Captains, than in strong armies of souldiers. For first he went to * Circeios, from whence he expelled the Roman Coloners, and delivered the City cleer and free unto the Volscians. Then by cross wayes he passed into the Latin street, called Via Latina: and regained from the Romans, these their Towns newly gotten afore, Satricum, Longu- la, Polluſtia and Corioli. After this he wan Lanuvium again, and so forward he forced * Corbio, Vitelia, Trebia, Labicos, and Pedum. And last of all from Pedum, he marched on toward the City G of Rome, and at Cluilia Fossa, five miles off, he encamped and forraged the territory about, sending with the forragers certain guides, to keep them from spoyling and doing harm in the Noblemens Lands: were it that he were more spightful to the Commons, or that thereby some discord might arise, between the Commonalty and the Senators: which doubtless had soon grown so mightily had the Tribuns already by their complaints and accusations, provoked the Commons forward, (who of themselves were shrewd enough) against the heads and Magistrates of the City, but that the fear of forrain dangers, the greatest bond of civil concord that can be, held them in and knit their hearts together, were they never ſo jealous, ſuſpected, H and hateful afore one to the other. Herein only was all their difference, that the Senate and Conſuls, repoſed hope in nothing elſe ſave only in war: the Commons on the other ſide were deſirous of any thing whatſoever, but war.

Now were S. Nantius, and Sex. Furius Conſuls: who as they were ſurveying and muſtering the legions, and diſpoſing of a good Corpus de guard upon the walls, and other places wherein they thought it expedient to keep a ſtanding watch and ward: behold a mighty number called and cryed hard for peace, and with their ſeditious clamors, put them in exceeding fear: yea, and afterwards forced them to aſſemble the Senate-houſe together, and to propoſe concerning the ſending of certain Embaſſadors to Cn. Martius. The Lords of the Senate ſeeing evidently the commons I hearts to fail them, accepted and granted the motion propounded. Whereupon were Oratours ſent

"they have gotten, then would he in remembrance of private wrongs done unto him by his "country-men, as alſo of the friendſhip and courteſy ſhewed him by ſtrangers that had given him

"incenſed, and not abated and quailed by his baniſhment. Then were the ſame Embaſſadors ſent again the ſecond time, but they might not be admitted once to ſet foot within the camp. It is reported moreover that the very Prieſts in their Pontificalibus, in their rich veſtiments and goodly K ornaments, went with ſupplication to the tents of the enemies, and turned his heart no more than the Embaſſadors had done before them. Then the dames of the City came flocking all about Veturia the Mother, and Volumnia the wife of Coriolanus. Whether this proceeded from any publick Counſel and was done in Policy, or came only of womens fear, I find but little in any records.
But howſoever it came about, this one thing is certain, they perſwaded ſo effectually with them, that both Veturia an aged woman, and alſo Volumnia with her two little ſons that ſhe had by Martius, went toward the enemies camp, to ſee if women by their prayers and tears, might ſave the City, which men with ſpear and ſhield could not defend. When they were come into the camp, and word brought to Coriolanus, that there was an exceeding great train of women thither arrived: at the firſt, he, as one that had relented, neither for that publick Majeſty in the Embaſſa- L

"at, Coriolanus, fuming like a man well near beſide himſelf, aroſe from his ſeat, and ran to meet
"his mother, and to embrace her. But the woman falling in ſtead of prayers into a fit of choler:
"Let me know (quoth ſhe) before I ſuffer thee to embrace me, whether I am come to an enemy "or to a ſon, whether I be in thy camp as a captive priſoner, or as a natural mother. And have I "lived indeed ſo long, and rubbed on ſtill in this miſerable old age of mine for this, to ſee thee firſt M
"a baniſhed man, and after that to become an enemy? Couldſt thou find in thine heart to waſte
"and ſpoil that countrey which bred thee, which foſtered thee, and brought thee up? And be
"it that thou hither marched with a cruel intent and full of threats, would not thine anger and "fell wrath ſlake, when thou didſt ſet foot within the borders and marches thereof? And being
"come within the ſight of Rome, aroſe not this in thy mind and thought, Within thoſe walls "yonder is my houſe, there are my houſe-gods, my mother, my wife, my children? Why then,
"belike if I had never been a mother, and born a child, Rome had not been aſſaulted. And if I had "no ſon at all, I might have died well enough in my native countrey, whiles it remained free. But "as for me, neither can I ſuffer ought, more for thy diſhoneſty and ſhame; nor more to mine
"own calamity and miſery than this: and moſt wretched caitife though I be, yet long time ſo I N "cannot continue. But for theſe here, look thou well to it, I adviſe thee, and have pitty of them,
"who if thou go on as thou beginneſt, are like to feel untimely death, or endure long captivity.
Then his wife and children hung about him, and clipped him: whereat the women fell a weeping on all ſides, bewailing their own caſe and the ſtate of their countrey. So as at length the man was overcome. And after he had taken them in his arms likewiſe, he let them go: and himſelf diſlodged and removed his camp backward from the City. When he had withdrawn the legions out of the territory of Rome, he gat himſelf, men ſaid, ſuch hatred and diſpleaſure for this action, that it coſt him his life: and murdered he was, ſome report one way, ſome another. But I find in Fabius a moſt ancient writer, that he lived until he was an old man: who reporteth this of him: That oftentimes in his latter dayes he uſed to utter this ſpeech, A heavy caſe and moſt O wretched for an aged man to live baniſht. The men of Rome envied not thoſe women their due deſerved praiſes. So free was the world in thoſe dayes, from depraving and detracting the glory of others. For in memorial hereof to all poſterity, there was a Temple built and dedicated to Fortuna Muliebri, i. Womens fortune.

After all this, the Volſcians joyned the Æquians unto them, and returned into the territory of Rome. But the Æquians would no longer abide Aceius to be their Commander. And upon this

A this ſtrife between the Volſcians and Æquians, whether of them ſhould appoint a General over the army raiſed joyntly of them both, firſt they grew to a mutiny and afterwards to a cruel battel. Such was the good fortune of the people of Rome, that two armies of their enemies, were thus by civil diſcord and contention, no leſs mortal than obſtinate, overthrown and brought to naught. Conſuls then were T. Sicinius and C. Aquilius. To Sicinius were allotted the Volſcians, and to Aquilius the Herniks (who alſo were out and up in arms) for their ſeveral Province. That year were the Herniks vanquiſhed, but with the Volſcians they fought ſo, as they departed on even hand, giving and taking the like.

After them were Sp. Caſſius, and Proculus Virginius made Conſuls. Then was there a league B concluded with the Herniks, and two third parts of their Lands were taken from them. Whereof the one moity, C ſſius the Conſul was minded to diſtribute among the Latins, the other among the Commoners. To this donation he laid too alſo a good portion of ground, which being Commons by right, he found much fault, that it was in the tenure and poſſeſſion of private perſons. This act of his made diverſe of the Senators, namely, ſuch as were great landed men and intereſſed therein, to ſtartle for fear of hazarding their eſtate. Over and beſides, the Senators all in general were in great perplexity, leſt that the Conſul by this largeſs, ſhould riſe by popular favour to ſuch greatneſs, as might prejudice their free hold, yea and endanger the very main chance of publick liberty. And this was the firſt time that the law Agraria was publiſhed: and ſo forward unto this preſent hour, it was never debated of, but with exceeding great ſtirs and C troubles of the State. The other Conſul withſtood this largeſs, with the general conſent of the Senators, and without contradiction of ſome Commoners: who at the very firſt began to miſlike, and utterly abhor, that the donation was ſo common, and from the natural citizens, extended to their allies and confederates. Moreover, they might oftentimes hear even the Conſul himſelf Virginius, openly in his ſolemn Orations before the people, to deliver by way of propheſie, and as it were to prognoſticate; "That this was a peſtilent largeſs of his brother Conſul, and that thoſe "grounds would in the end enthral the takers thereof, and that it was the very high way to ſet up a "Kingdom again. For to what other intent (I pray you) were their allies, and the nation of the La- "tins aſſociate in the ſame? To what purpoſe either, was a third part of the Lands won by conqueſt, "given again to the Herniks profeſſed enemies but a while before, but that theſe nations might have D "Caſſius to be ſuch another Captain of theirs, as Coriolanus was. And thus by diſſwading and croſſing the law Agraria, he became now to be popular and gracious with the people. Then both Conſuls ſtrived much, who might pleaſe and gratify the Commons moſt. Virginius, by giving out that he would maintain and ſuffer the Lands to be divided, ſo they were aſſigned to none but to the citizens of Rome: Caſſius again, who in the largeſs of the Lands, ſeemed to Court and inſinuate himſelf with the allies and thereby was of the citizens leſſe regarded and reputed. to the end, that by ſome other benefit he might regain the hearts of his country men, was of opinion, and made a motive, that the mony which was received for the Sicilian corn, ſhould be repayed unto the people. But the Commons refuſed and abhorred that, as a very bribe and ready bait for a Scepter and Crown. So greatly were all his gifts, for the deep rooted ſuſpition and jealouſy
E of his aſpiring to a Kingdom, loathed in the conceits of men, as if they had flowed in wealth, and been rich enough. And for certain it is recorded, that ſo ſoon as he left his Office, he was condemned and put to death. Some report, that his own father did the execution: and that upon examination privately had at home within his houſe, he finding him faulty, whipped him firſt, and ſo killed him, and conſecrated the goods and chattels of his ſon, as a Deodand to Ceres, whereof a Statue or Image was made, with this Inſcription or Title, Given out of the houſe of Caſſius. I find in ſome records (which ſoundeth nearer to the truth) that he was by the * Queſtors of Caſo Fabius, and L. Valerius, endited of treaſon, and being convicted, was by a verdict of the people con-
F demned, and his houſe by order from the whole City, raſed and pulled down. And at this day, it is the voyd yard that lieth before the Temple of Tellus. But howſoever he had his tryal and judgement, privately or openly condemned he was when Ser. Cornelius and Q. Fabius were Conſuls. Long continued not the peoples anger and ſpight againſt Caſſius. So ſweet was the law Agraria in it ſelf, that when the Author and Upholder thereof was out of the World, they longed to have it on foot again. Which deſire of theirs was the rather ſet on fire, through the pinching niggardiſe of the Senators, who having that year ſubdued the Volſcians and Æquians, kept the ſouldiers faſting and defrauded them of the ſpoil. For what prizes ſoever were gotten from the enemies, the Conſul Fabius ſold and brought into the Exchequer or Chamber of the City.

Now was the name of Fabius already odious to the Commonalty, for the laſt Conſuls ſake: yet obtained the Senators ſo much, and held their own ſo, as Caſo Fabius was created Conſul with L. Æmilius. This made the Commonr more malicious and bent to miſchief. And ſedition at G home cauſed war abroad. Forrain war reſtrain'd civil diſcord for a while. Both Senators and Commons with one accord, under the conduct of Æmilius fought fortunately with the rebellious Volſcians and Æquians, and diſcated them. Howbeit more enemies periſhed in the chaſe, than were ſlain in the battel: ſo hotly the horſemen purſued them when they were once diſcomfited and gave not over. The ſame year was the Temple of Caſtor conſecrated in the *Ides of Quintilis. It had been vowed aſo etime in the Latins war by Poſthumius the Dictator. His ſon was created Duumvir, for that purpoſe, and dedicated it.

This

This year alſo the Commons hearts were ſet upon the law Agraria, and longed afreſh after the H ſweetneſs thereof. The Tribuns of the Commonalty graced and credited their popular authority, with propounding a law as popular and acceptable to the people. But the Senators ſuppoſing verily that the multitude was furious and outragious enough, and too much of themſelves, without any hire and reward, ſtood in great dread and horror of theſe largeſſes, as the very allurements and provocations, of raſh and heady attempts: & the ſtouteſt champions of their ſide to withſtand the law, were the Conſuls. That part therefore and State of the City had the better hand, not only this preſent year, but for the next enſuing. For they choſe M. Fabius Caſo his brother, for the one Conſul, and L. Verius for the other, a man of the twain more odious in the eyes of the Commons, in regard of his late accuſation of Sp. Caſſius. In which year alſo there was ſtrife and I much adoe with the Tribuns. But both law and law-makers with their glorious bragging and vaunting of their goodly donative, which they could not effect, proved vain and came to nothing. Upon this, the name of Fabij, who after three Conſulſhips together one after another, by them born continually without intermiſſion, were inured and tried in the broils and contentions of Tribuns, was in great requeſt and reputation: and in their houſe and family remained ſtill for a good while after, that dignity, as an honor well and worthily beſtowed upon them. Then began the Veientian war, and the Volſcians likewiſe rebelled. But for any wars abroad whatſoever, they had ſtrength enough and to ſpare, if by jars at home among their own ſelves they had not abuſed the ſame.

Beſides this diſquietneſs and affliction of all mens minds, occaſioned by theſe diſſenſions, there K hapned (to amend the matter well) prodigious, and ſtrange tokens from Heaven, daily in a manner threatning both in City and Country the heavy hand of God. And when as the ſoothſayers and wizards were ſent out unto, to ſearch forth the cauſe of Gods wrath and indignation both in publick and private, as well by inſpection of the inwards of ſacrificed beaſts, as by aſpect of birds and fouls, they could aſſign it to nothing elſe but this, that there was ſome errour committed in their ſacrifices and divine liturgie. Thoſe fearful and prodigious ſigns proceeded ſtill ſo far, that one Oppia a veſtal Nun, convicted and condemned of inceſt, ſuffered death.

After this, followed Q. Fabius and C. Tullius Conſuls. In which year the diſcord at home was nothing leſs and the war abroad far greater. For the Æquians roſe up in arms: the Veientians alſo entred the confines, and made much ſpoil. And whiles they were more and more careful L about theſe wars what order to take, Caſo Fabius and Sp. Furius, were made Conſuls. By this time the Æquians aſſaulted Artona a City in Latium. And the Veientians having ſped themſelves with prizes and booties, made great cracks that they would give an aſſault upon the very City of Rome. Theſe fearful news, which ought to have abated and taken down the ſtomacks of the Commons, made them much more fierce and fell, and they returned of themſelves unto their old biaſs of refuſing warfare: but Sp. Licinius their Tribune, thinking now the time was come to enforce upon the Senators the law Agraria, upon this exigent and extream point of neceſſity, had taken upon him to ſtop the levying and ſetting out of an army. But he drew upon his own head the whole hatred and diſpleaſure of the Tribuns themſelves and their authority. For the Conſuls oppoſed themſelves againſt him no more bitterly than his own companions in office: by whoſe M aſſiſtance the Conſuls went through with the Muſter. And for two wars at once, there were enrolled two armies. The one under the leading of Fabius, againſt the Æquians, the other, againſt the Veientians commanded by Furius. Againſt whom there was nothing done worthy of remembrance. As for Fabius, he had ſomewhat more to do with his own men than with his enemies. That man himſelf alone was he, that being Conſul upheld the Common-weal, which his army for hatred of their Conſul, had as much as in them lay, utterly betrayed. For when as he (above many other warlike feats and parts of a right worthy General, whereof he ſhewed ſingular proof, both in preparation, and alſo in managing of the war) had ſo marſhalled and ranged his battail, that with ſending out the horſemen only, he diſordered and brake the ranks of his enemies hoſt: behold, the footmen would not follow on after that diſaray: neither, when the exhortation of N their leader whom they hated, prevailed not, could their own ſhame at leaſt-wiſe, and the publick diſhonor for the preſent; no, nor yet the imminent danger like to enſue (in caſe the enemy had taken heart again and made head) force them to amend their pace one jot, and make more ſpeed. Neither could he poſſibly make them (if to do nothing elſe) ſo much as to march ſtill in battail aray: but full againſt his commandment they retire with their enſigns: and as men ſory in their hearts and ill apaid, (he that had ſeen them would have ſaid they had loſt the field) curſing their General one while, and the valiant ſervice of the horſemen another while, they return to their Tents. Neither wiſt the General what way to remedy this ſo peſtilent an example and dangerous precedent. Thus we may ſee, that brave men of ſingular and excellent wits, have been more to ſeek and fail in their skill, how to govern a ſubject than to vanquiſh an enemy. The O Conſul returneth to Rome, having purchaſed more hatred of his froward and ſtubborn ſouldiers, than won honor by his martial proweſs. Nevertheleſs, the Senators prevailed ſo much that the Conſulſhip kept reſidence ſtill in the name of the Fabij. So, they created M. Fabius Conſul, and joyn with him Cn. Manlius for his collegue.

The diſobedience of ſoldiers to their Captain.

This year likewiſe, had one patrone and maintainer of the law Agraria, to wit, Tiberius Pontificius a Tribune. He taking the ſame courſe, and following the ſteps of Sp. Licinius, hindered the

A the muſters for a while. And when the Senators were herewith diſquieted again, then Ap. Claudius aroſe up and ſaid, "That the year before, the Tribunes power was overmatched, and the "neck of it broken in proof, only for that preſent, but in example for ever hereafter: foraſmuch "as it was well ſeen then by experience, that of it ſelf even among their own ſelves it fell apieces: "and never will there want at any time one good Tribune or other, that would be glad to get "the ſtart and victory of his fellow, yea, and the favour alſo of the better part for to purchaſe the "good of the weal-publike. And that there would be more Tribunes, if more were needfull, "ready to aſſiſt the Conſuls: and if there were but one, even that one were ſufficient to ſtand "againſt all the reſt. So that the Conſuls and LL. of the Councill would but do their endeavour, to B "win unto the State and Senate, ſome certain of the Tribunes, if they might not compaſs all. The politike practiſe of Appius Claudius to abate the Tribunes authority.

The Senators being thus ſchooled and taught their leſſons by Appius, both all in generall would courteouſly ſalute and friendly intreat the Tribunes, and alſo in particular as many of them as had been Conſuls, according to that intereſt that each man had in any one of them privately, partly by favour and friendſhip and partly by countenance and authority, prevailed ſo with them, that they were willing and well content to employ the Tribunes authority to the good and ſafety of the Common-weale. So by the help of foure Tribunes, againſt one that hindred the good of all, the Conſuls took muſter of the ſouldiers. Then ſet they forward on their voyage to war with the Veientians: unto whom from all parts of Hetruria they came to aid and ſuccour; not ſo much for any love that they bare to the Veientians, as in hope that the puiſſance of Rome C through inteſtine and civill diſſention would decay and come to nought. For in all the Diets and Aſſemblies of the States of Hetruria, the Princes and Peers gave it out and ſaid, That the power and greatneſs of the Romans was everlaſting, if through mutuall diſcord they warred not ſo among themſelves: which hath been found the only bane of wealthy and flouriſhing Cities, whereby mighty Empires became mortall and ſubject to a finall end. "Which miſchief (ſay "they) this long time hath been prevented and delayed, partly through the ſage adviſe and pru- "dent government of the Senate, partly by the patience and long ſufferance of the Commons: "but now they are come to a great extremity. Divided they are, and of one City become twain: "each part have their ſeverall Magiſtrates and laws by themſelves. At the firſt, however they "were wont to be at odds, and to fall out at the muſtering of ſouldiers, yet in war they would D "hold together, and obey their Captains. Howſoever they fared at home in the City, were the "State never ſo far out of order, yet ſo long as martiall diſcipline was on foot and took place, they "might be reclaimed, and all troubles ſtaied. But now, the former uſe and cuſtome of diſobeying "Magiſtrates within the City, is taken up by the Roman ſouldiers in the very Camp. For no "longer ſince than the laſt war of all, in the time of battell and conflict, their whole Army agreed "of their own accord not forced by any extremity that they were put unto, for to give the Vei- "entians, as much as in them lay, even after they had loſt the field, the entire victory and honour "of the day. For they abandoned their enſigns, left their Generall alone in the skirmiſh, and "againſt his will, retired themſelves into the Camp. And ſurely, if they hold on ſtill this courſe, "Rome may be won by means of her own ſouldiers: there needs no more to do, but to proclaime E "and make a ſhew of war: For even the very deſtinies and gods themſelves would performe all "the reſt. Upon theſe hopes and deep perſwaſions, the Tuſcans, who afore were wont otherwhiles to have the better, and ſometimes to take the worſe in their wars, put themſelves in arms. The Roman Conſuls likewiſe were in fear of nothing elſe ſo much, as of their own power, their own force and weapons: being affrighted at the remembrance of that foul and ſhamefull example, and that lewd part plaid in the laſt war: leſt peradventure they ſhould put it upon this point of hazard, as to be in danger of two battels at once. And therefore in ſo doubtfull and perillous a caſe, they held off fight, and kept themſelves within their Camp, if haply time and ſpace would aſſwage their anger, bring them into the right way again, and reclaime them to good and reaſonable order. The enemies hereat, as well Veientians as the other Tuſcans, made F the greater haſte, and were more ſharp ſet, and provoked them to the field: firſt by riding up and down before their Camp, hard at the gates thereof, braving and challenging them forth, at the laſt, ſeeing they could not prevail, they fell to rating and railing one while upon the Conſuls themſelves, another while upon the whole Army, in theſe and ſuch like terms: "A gay matter indeed, "and a proper device to ſalve their cowardiſe, and under a colour of civill diſſention to cloak their "fearfulneſs: and the Conſuls forſooth miſtruſt more the faithfulneſs and loyalty of their ſouldi- "ers in ſervice, than they doubted their valour and ſufficiency of ſervice. Mary, here is indeed a "new kind of mutiny. What? Armed men to hold their peace and ſit ſtill? Hitting them in their "teeth beſides, with their new ſtart-up riſing and late ſprung baſe beginning, letting fly againſt them "lies and truths, one with another, and ſpared not. For all this foule ſtir they kept, flouting and G reviling them under their very trench, and hard at their gates, the Conſuls themſelves were not one jot troubled. But the fooliſh and ignorant multitude what with anger, and what for ſhame of theſe reproachfull terms, was much diſtempered: and one whiles wholly gave over to regard and thinke upon home troubles and diſſentions, and had rather than their lives be revenged of their enemies: Anon again, they would not in any caſe gratifie the Nobles and Conſuls, nor wiſh them good ſucceſs. Thus the hatred both againſt the enemies without, and the Conſuls within ſtrove together in their hearts: untill at length forrain occaſions got the maſtry over them: ſo proudly, so insolently the enemy scorned and made a game of them. Whereupon they came thick by troups H to the Generals pavilion, calling upon them for to fight, requiring to put forth the banner and signall of battell. The Consuls laid their heads together, and as taking good advisement, conferred on the matter a good while. To fight they were most willing and desirous: but this desire was to be kept back and dissembled, and thereby augmented: to the end, that by holding off, by opposing themselves, and making some stay, they might set the souldiers on, and being once set on it, they might make them follow more eagerly at once. In conclusion, this answer was returned unto them:

That they made too much haste: it was not yet full ripe, nor the time come, to give battell: they must hold themselves contented, and keep within their tents: proclaiming moreover, that no man be so hardy as to fight: and whosoever attempted it, without their warrant and commission, they I would proceed against him with all rigour, as a professed enemy. Thus were they dismissed. And the less willing they thought the Consuls were, the more eager were they, and set upon a battell.
The enemies besides, when they had intelligence, that the Consuls were not disposed to fight, and had taken order to the contrary, were inkindled and inflamed so much the more. For now they supposed they might brave it, and insult upon them safely without danger. For why? The Consuls durst not trust the souldiers with weapon in hand: "now were their mutinies come to the "height and to break forth in extremities: now and never before the Roman Empire and Domi"nion was at an end. Presuming confidently upon this ground, they run together unto the gates,
"redoubling a thousand villanous and opprobrious terms, and much ado they had to forbear as"saulting the camp. Now could the Romans on the other side hold no longer, & endure this con- K tumely and indignity, but came running from all parts of the camp unto the Consuls. And now not leisurely as before, make they request, and by mediation of their chief centurions, but all at once on every side plied them with outcries and clamours. Now was the matter come to ripeness, yet slow were the Coss. still and hold off. Then Fabius seeing the tumult increased & that for fear of a mutiny his brother Consul had yielded already, caused silence to be made by sound of trumpet, and thus The speech of Fabius to his brother Consul. he spake: "I know full well O Manlius, that these fellows are able to win the victory: but that "they will so do I know not, and they themselves have caused me to doubt. I have therefore set "down my rest, and fully resolved not to give the signal of battell, unless they swear to return out "of the field with victory. Once did the souldiers in battell deceive a Cons. of Rome: but the gods "in heaven shall they never deceive. Then M. Flavoleius a Centurion, one of the formost that cal- L
"led for battell so instantly, "Return will I (quoth he) O M. Fabius, victor out of the field: and if "I fail, then I beseech father Jupiter, Mars Gradivus and other gods to make me a fearfull example "and shew their wrathfull displeasure upon me. The same oath after him took the whole army, e"very man against himself. Thus when they had sworn the trumpet sounded. Then buckle they themselves toward battell, full of anger, full of hope. Now they bid the Tuscans revile and rail their fill: now being at all points armed, they wished they had afore them man to man their enemies, those that were so lively and lusty with their tongues. Right valiantly bare themselves that day, as well the Commons as the Nobles. But the name of the Fabii, the Fabii I say, passed all the rest and won the spurs. Who in this piece of service purposed to gain again the hearts of the Commons, which in many civill contentions were set against them. And so they embattelled themselves. The M enemies likewise both the Veientians and also the Tuscan legions were nothing behind, as making almost sure reckoning that they should be fought withall no more than the Æquians had been.
Nay they were in hope of some greater disorder amongst them, and that, considering they were so malecontent, and the occasion so doubtfull they would play a more shamefull part, and shew their leaders a beastly cast. But it fell out far otherwise. For never in any other war afore, gave the Romans a hotter charge upon the enemies: so much had they of the one side with spitefull taunts and reproaches nettled them, and the Consuls on the other side with their long delaies whet them on.
Scarce had the Tuscans any time to put themselves in battell array, but at the very first encounter and shock, casting their javelins carelesly from them (I know not how) rather than levelling and charging them against the enemy, they came presently pell-mell to hand-strokes, and to deal with N their swords, which is the cruellest fight of all other. The Fabii among the formost in the forefront fought valiantly, shewing their countrimen a brave sight, and a noble example to follow.
Where Q. Fabius who had been Consul the third year before, the leader and forwardest of them all, whiles he advanced himself and rushed amongst the thickest of the Veientians, and scuffled with many of them together, was not aware of his deadly enemy so near: but behold a certain Tuscan, a mighty man of strength and skilfull at his weapon, ran him through the breast with his sword. Which was not so soon drawn forth of his body, but Fabius fell down headlong upon his wound and died. Both armies felt the fall of that one man: and therewith the Romans retired. With that M. Fabius the Consul stepped over his body as it lay along, and holding forth his target between: "Why, souldiers (quoth he) is the oath ye took to run away and retire thus in- O
"to the Camp? And are ye more affraid indeed, of these most dastardly enemies, than of Ju- "piter and Mars, by whom ye sware? But I, who was not sworn at all, will either make return "with victory, or else O Q. Fabius, fighting here by thee. I will live and die by thy side. To whom, Caso Fabius, who the year afore was Consul, replied again: "Think you brother, with "these words to make them to fight? Nay, the gods are they that must do it, by whom "they have sworn. And let us like noble Knights, and for the honour of the Fabian house,

"stir

A "ſtir up and animate our ſouldiers by fighting rather than by exhorting. Thus rode the two Fabii with lance in reſt into the forefront, and drew the whole battel with them. The fight of one ſide being thus renewed, Cn. Manlius the Conſul in the other wing beſtirred himſelf, and did for his part as valiantly: Where hapned almoſt the like fortune. For as in the one wing the ſouldiers followed Q. Fabius, ſo in this they cheerfully went with the Conſul himſelf Manlius, chaſing the enemies afore him as diſcomfited. And when he was ſore wounded, and thereupon gone out of the battel, his men ſuppoſing him to be ſlain, drew back, and had indeed loſt ground and given way to the enemy, but that the other Conſul with certain Cornets of horſemen, galloped amain into that quarter, and cried aloud that his fellow Conſul was living: and that him-
B ſelf who had defeated the other point, was ready with victory to aſſiſt them, and ſo uphe'd the middle of the Army, that now began to ſhrink. Manlius alſo, to encourage his men, ſhewed himſelf in open ſight. Thus the knowledge and preſence of the two Conſuls made the ſouldiers take heart afreſh. Herewithall beſides, were the enemies battalions the thinner and weaker, becauſe they truſting upon their exceeding number, had drawn out thoſe that were to ſerve for ſuccour and ſupply, and ſent them away to aſſaile the Camp. In the ſurpriſing whereof, finding no great ado and ſmall reſiſtance, whiles they had more mind to rifle for pillage, than to fight for the victory, they loſt time. In the mean ſpace the Roman Triarii, who were not able to hold out the firſt aſſault and entrance, having diſpatched to the Conſuls certain meſſengers, to give knowledge in what terms they ſtood, caſt themſelves round in a ring, and retired them-
C ſelves to the Prætorium or Generals lodging, and of themſelves alone, made head and renewed the fight. Likewiſe Manlius the Conſul being ridden back to the Camp, at every gate ſet certain ſouldiers in guard: and ſo encloſed them within, that they could not get forth. The Tuſcans being in this deſperate caſe, fared more like mad men than hardy ſouldiers. For when as they ran here and there every way, according as they had any hope to find iſſue and to eſcape, and had made ſundry offers and attempts in vain: behold one troup of tall fellows in a body, made no more ado, but knowing the Conſul, who by reaſon of brave and goodly armour was a fair mark, charged upon his own perſon. The firſt volley of their ſhot was received by thoſe that ſtood about him, but their violence afterwards could not be endured. The Conſul himſelf was wounded to death, and fell down in the place, and all the reſt were diſcomfited. Whereupon D the Tuſcans took more heart unto them, but the Romans were ſo diſtreſſed, that they ran all about the Camp in great fear. And in extream jeopardy had they been, but that the Lieutenants caught up the Conſul his body, and made paſſage at one gate for the enemy. Through which they ruſhed forth, and diſmarched diſorderly, untill they light upon the other Conſul preſently after his victory: where they either fell again upon the edge of the ſword, or were ſcattered and put to flight. This brave Victory thus atchieved, was heavy yet and ſorrowful for the death of two ſo noble perſonages. And therefore when the Senate had decreed a Triumph, the Conſul returned this anſwer: "That willingly he could allow thereof in regard of the paſſing good ſervice "performed in that war, in caſe an Army might triumph without a General. But as for himſelf, "ſeeing that his houſe grieved and mourned for the death of his brother Q. Fabius, and that the E "Common-wealth was half fatherleſs as it were, for the loſs of a Conſul, he would not ac-"cept the Lawrel ſo deformed and foully blemiſhed, both with publike and private ſorrow. This Triumph thus by him refuſed, was more honourable than all the Triumphs in the world. By which we may ſee that glory deſpiſed in due time returneth otherwhiles in greater meaſure. Then ſolemnized he with great honour the obſequies one after another, firſt of his fellow Conſul, and then of his own brother. And he himſelf made the funeral Orations for them both. But ſo as in yielding unto them their due commendations, he went himſelf away with the greater part. And not unmindful of that rule which he had learned in the beginning of the Conſulſhip, namely, to win again the hearts and love of the Commons, he divided the cure of his hurt and wounded ſouldiers among the Senators. With moſt of them the Fabii were charged, and of F none were they better tended and looked unto, than of them. Whereupon the Fabii now waxed popular, and that, for no other policy and intent, but only to do the Common-wealth good: and therefore with the favour and good will of the Commons, as wel as of the Nobles, Caſo Fabius was created Conſul, with T. Virginius; Whoſe principal care above all was this, even before war, before muſters, before all things elſe, that ſeeing now in ſome meaſure there was good hope of concord begun already, the hearts of the Commons might be perfectly linked and united together with the Nobles, and that, with all ſpeed poſſible. In the beginning therefore of this year, before that any Tribune of the Commons ſhould prefer the law Agraria, he thought good and gave his advice, that the Nobles ſhould prevent all, and go in hand firſt themſelves to perform their part, and ſhew their bounty: namely, in parting the lands gotten by conqueſt, and freely beſtowing the G ſame as equally as might be, among the Commons. For it was meet and requiſite that they ſhould be poſſeſſed thereof, whoſe ſweat of brows, nay, whoſe bloud had paid for the purchaſe. But the Senators could not hear of that ear, but miſliked of the motion: yea, and ſome of them complained and ſaid, that the lively ſpirit, and couragious diſpoſition of Caſo, which ſometimes he had, was now by reaſon of exceſſive glory, grown to be toyiſh and full of vanities. And there an end of civill factions for a time.

Manlius the Conſul ſlain.

Fabius refuſeth triumph.

But the Latines were much troubled with the incurſions and inrodes of the Æquians. Thither was Cæso with an Army sent, who invaded and overran the very country of the Æquians, forra- H ging and spoiling as he went. The Æquians thereupon retired,& put themselves into their towns, and kept close within the walls, whereby there was no memorable field fought. But at their enemies the Veientians hand, they received an overthrow, and that through the rashnes of the other Consul: and had not Cæso Fabius come to the rescue in good time,the whole Army had been utterly lost.From that time there was neither war nor peace with the Veientians: but their dealing was much what after the manner of robbing. For when the Roman Legions were abroad, they would leave the field &take to their Cities:when they perceived the Legions were removed and gone,they would make excursions and waste the country.Thus plaid they mock-holiday,and dallied with them, shifting off war with quietnes, and quietnes again with war, by turns. So as I the Romans could neither all wholly rest careles and secure for them, nor yet go through-stitch, & make an end once for all with them. Besides, other wars were either presently at hand,to wit, from the Æquians and the Volscians, who could no longer sit still, than untill their fresh grief, and pain of the last defeature was over-past; or else the Sabins, never other but enemies,yea, and all Hetruria, were like all shortly to rise and take arms. But the Veientian a continual enemy, rather than dangerous provoked them to anger with reproachful taunts,oftner than with any great peril or hurt. And yet as little as it was, it might no time be neglected,nor gave them leave to be employed in the mean while otherwhere. Then came the whole house and kindred of the Fabii Cæso Fabius the Consul, to the Lords of the Senate. unto the Senat, in the name of them all spake the Consul in this wise: "My Lords of the Senat,

"the Veientian war had need rather of a resident garrison, as ye know well enough, to keep the K
"frontires,than great forces for expedition. As for you,see ye to other wars. Let the Fabii alone "to deal as private enemies with the Veientians. We dare undertake and warrant,that the State "of Rome shall receive no dishonour nor danger there. We are fully minded and resolved at "our own proper cost and charges, to maintain and mannage that war, as appropriate and pecu-
The linage of the Fabii offer to maintain war with the Veientians in their own persons,and at their proper charges. "culiar to our name and family: the City shall be charged neither with men nor money there.
Great thanks were given them for this their forwardnes. The Consul being come out of the Se-nat house,was attended home with the whole generation of the Fabii who stood at the porch of the Council Court,expecting the Senats decree.And being commanded to be ready in armor well appointed the next day, and to give attendance at the Consuls door, they departed from thence home to their own houses. The bruit hereof spread all over the City. All men extoll the Fabii up L to the skie, saying, "That one family had taken upon them the whole burden of the City. The "Veientian war now is become(say they)a privat charge,and requireth the power and force on"ly that privat persons could make. O that there were two such families more in Rome of that "stomack and valour: that one of them might take the Volscians in hand,and another the Æqui-
"ans. Surely all the nations bordering hereabout might soon be subdued,and the people of Rome
"sit still the while and rest in peace. The day following, the Fabii armed themselves, mounted on horseback,and repaired to the Rendezvous aforesaid, as they were commanded. Then came the Consul forth, clad in a rich coat of arms, and standing in his porch, beheld his whole bloud and linage armed and marshalled in order,and being received in the midst of them,caused the guidons and Cornets to be advanced. Never marched three along the City an Army either les in num- M ber,or more renowned for their fame and the admiration of men. Three hundred men of arms they were and six, all nobly descended, of one stock, of one race and name all. And of all them there was not one that a sage and prudent Senate would have refused at any time as un-sufficient,to be a Leader and Commander in the field.Thus furnished with the force and strength that one only Family could make, they advanced forward, threatning and menacing the ruin and destruction of the Veientians. There followed a number and multitude of Citizens: one private company by themselves of kinsfolk, allies, friends, and fellows, casting in their minds no mean matters, neither of hope nor fear, but all exceeding measure and surpassing: another of the common people, moved with a carefull regard, and astonied again in a favourable applause and admiration of their enterprise, crying with one voice, Hold on right valiant N Knights, March on a Gods name in happy hour; God grant lucky speed, answerable to your magnanimous attempts and designments: and look for, at our hands from henceforth, Consulships, triumphs, all rewards and honourable dignities whatsoever. And all the way as they passed along the Capitol, the Castle, and other Temples they besought the gods, as many as were presented to their eye, as many as they could conceive in their minds, to vouchsafe that squadron to be attended upon with good success and fortunate felicity, and soon to return home again in safety to their native country and loving parents. But, alas the while, in vain were all these prayers made.Then set they forward on their journey,leaving Janus Church on their right hand, taking the ungracious and unlucky way, from the gate Carmentalis, untill at length they came to
* At this day Fossa or Vaica. the river * Cremera.That was thought a convenient place to fortifie in, and there to plant a garri- O son. After this were L. Æmylius and C. Servilius made Consuls. And so long as they adventured no farther than forraging the Country, the Fabii were good enough, not only to defend their hold and fort; but all their frontier parts and marches where the Tuscan Territory adjoyneth to the Roman they so scoured and traversed, between the one confine and the other, that they kept all their own in safety, and mightily endamaged the enemies. Then surceased they a while, but it was not long,from wasting and spoiling. By which time both the Veientians had gathered

A a power out of Hetruria, and aſſaulted the fort of Cremera, and alſo the Roman Legions, under the conduct of the Conſul L. Æmilius, encountred the Tuſcans in open field. And yet the Veientians had hardly time enough to put themſelves in order of battel: ſo ſuddenly at the very firſt skirmiſh, whiles the files were entring into array under their colours in the vanguard, and the ſuccours and ſupplies a placing and diſpoſing in the rereward, a Cornet of Roman horſe charged them ſo hotly on the flank, that they had not room and ſpace, either to begin fight, or to keep their ſtanding ſure. Thus were they diſcomfited, and chaſed back as far as Saxa rubra, i.e., Red rocks (for there they were encamped) where they humbly craved peace. Which when they had obtained (ſee their inbred inconſtancy ſo naturally engraffed) they were weary of it, and repented thereof, B before the Roman garriſon could be withdrawn from Cremera. And ſo the Fabii once again skirmiſhed with the Veientian Nation, without preparation of greater war. Neither made they inrodes only, and ſudden violent incurſions into the Territories but ſundry times they encountred with banners diſplaied, and joined battell in plain field. And that one houſe and kindred of the Roman people carried oftentimes the victory away from that moſt mighty and rich City (in thoſe daies) of all the Tuſcans. This took the Veientians at the firſt for a foul diſgrace and indignity. But afterwards they deviſed to lay trains, as occaſion ſhould ſerve, and entrap their fierce and hardy enemy: and well apaid they were and rejoyced, that the Fabii upon the good ſucceſs that ſtill followed them, were become more bold and venturous. And therefore divers times when the Romans were abroad a plundering, they would drive cattel in their way, but yet ſo, as they might C ſeem to light upon them by chance. The ruſtical peaſants made ſhew as if they fled out of the Country, and left the fields waſt: yea, and the companies of ſouldiers ſent out to reſtrain and ſtay their ſpoiling, made ſhew of running away, pretending oftner they were afraid than they had cauſe indeed. So as now the Fabii by this time ſet ſo light by their enemies, and thought ſo well of themſelves, that they beleeved verily their power was invincible, and might not be withſtood in any ground, or at any time whatſoever. This conceit and hope of theirs ſet them ſo afloat, and made them ſo bold, that eſpying upon a time cattel far from Cremera, (for there was a large plain between) although here and there they might deſcry armed ſouldiers of their enemies, yet from their fort they ran down, with bridle in their horſe neck. And when unadviſedly without foreſight they were patt the ambuſh, which was laid covertly about the very way that they were to D paſs, and were ſtragling here and there diſorderly, driving the cattel away, which gadded in and out, as their manner is when they be ſcared and affrighted, then ſuddenly ſtart the enemies all at once out of the ambuſhment: ſo as both before and behind, and on every ſide they were beſet and environed with enemies. At the firſt the very houting and outcry they made round about terrified them: afterwards flew their ſhot from all ſides. And as the Tuſcans gathered themſelves together, the Fabii were ſoon hemmed within a round battallion of enemies, ſtanding armed thick and cloſe one to another: and the nearer the enemies approached about them, in ſo much leſs room were they enforced alſo to caſt themſelves into a ring. Which, conſidering their arraies were thruſt ſo thick together in ſo ſtraight a compaſs, made their ſmall number appear the leſs, and the multitude of the Tuſcans to carry a greater ſhew. Then forbearing to fight as they firſt intended,
E on every hand alike, and with all at once, they made head to one only place. Thereto they endeavour with might and main, body and armour; and with a pointed pattel wedgewiſe pierced through and made themſelves paſſage. And they took the way that led to a little hill, riſing up with an eaſie aſcent. From whence at firſt they made reſiſtance only and kept their ground: but ſoon after, when by reaſon of the vantage of the hill, they had ſome time to breath themſelves, and to take heart again after ſo great a fright, they forced the enemies alſo to give back that were mounting up the hill. And as few in number as they were, yet by the benefit of the ground they had gotten the better, if the Veientians had not fet a compaſs about the hill ſide, and gained the very top and pitch thereof. Thus became the enemy again to have the upper hand. And ſo
F were the Fabii ſlain every man, and not one of them eſcaped, yea, and their fort overthrown and raſed. Three hundred and ſix there were that died, as all writers do agree. One only of the name was left behind at home, well near fourteen years of age, for to renew and encreaſe, as out of a ſtock, the name of the Fabii, and to prove in time to come the greateſt prop and pillar that the people of Rome ſhould have in their dangers and extremities many a time both at home and abroad. The Fabii all ſlain.

But ere this heavy loſs and overthrow happned, C. Horatius and T. Menenius were Conſuls. Menenius was ſent forth with againſt the Tuſcans, puffed now up with pride for this their victory: with whom then alſo he fought unfortunately and ſped but ill. For the enemies ſurpriſed and got the Janiculum, and the City had ſurely been beſieged, (conſidering that beſides war they were greatly diſtreſſed for want of victuals, for the Tuſcans were paſſed over the Tyber) but that G Horatius the Conſul was called home from the Volſcians. And ſo near approached the enemies in this war and preſſed to the very walls, that firſt there was a skirmiſh on even hand at the Temple of Spes*: and another again at the gate Collina. Where albeit the Romans got but very ſmall odds of the enemy, yet did that conflict upon a little recovery of wonted courage prepare the ſouldiers to better ſervice in the battels enſuing. * Hope.

Now were A. Virginius and Sp. Servilius created Conſuls. The Veientians after this late deſeat, came no more into the field, yet they robbed and waſted ſtill. And from the Janiculum as from a fortreſs and place of ſafe retreat, they would make excurſions out into the Territory of H Rome all about, and neither cattel nor country people could any where be in ſafety for them. But afterwards, they were overtaken themſelves in the ſame wile that they had caught the Fabii with. For as they followed after certain cattel, which were driven forth here and there of purpoſe to draw and train them abroad, they were plunged themſelves headlong into an Ambuſcado laid for them. And the more they were, the greater was their ſlaughter. Upon this foil, their cruel and fell anger gave the occaſion and overture of a greater overthrow. For having croſſed the Tyber in the night ſeaſon, they gave the attempt to make an aſſault upon the Camp of the Conſul Servilius. But being diſcomfited, and many of them ſlain, the reſt retired themſelves from thence, and with much ado recovered the Janicle. Straight after this, the Conſul alſo paſſed over Tyber, and en- I campeth himſelf ſtrongly under the Janiculum. The morrow morning by Sun riſing, ſo venturous he was by reaſon of his fortunate fight the day before, and more for the ſcarcity of corn and victuals, which drave him to take (he cared not how raſh and dangerous courſes, ſo they tended to more quick and ſpeedy expedition) full fondly he advanced forward, and marched up the ſteep hill of the Janicle, and charged the enemies hold: but being ſet back himſelf from thence more ſhameſully than he had the day before repelled the enemies; yet by occaſion that his fellow Conſul came in the while to reſcue, he and his Army both were ſaved: and the Tuſcans encloſed between both hoſts, were forced to turn their backs, both to one and the other, and were killed every mothers ſon. Thus by a raſh enterpriſe (which as good luck was) ſped well, the Veientian war came to an end. The City then, as it enjoyed peace, ſo it came again to be better ſtored of corn K and victual: both for that there was ſome grain brought out of Campania, and alſo becauſe the old ſtore that was hoorded up came abroad, by reaſon that no man now ſtood in fear of dearth to enſue.

Afterwards upon plenty and eaſe they began to be buſie again, and their heads to work, ſeeking to broach old troubles at home, ſince they had none to occupy them abroad. The Tribunes they fell to ſollicite and infect the Commons, with their venome and poyſon, the Law Agraria: inciting them againſt the Nobles that gainſaid it: not in general terms only, but alſo by touching particular perſons. For Q. Conſidius and T. Genutius, who were for the Law Agraria, framed an inditement, and ſued T. Menenius. And this was laid to his charge, to wit, the loſs of the fort and garriſon at Cremera: for that, he being Conſul lay encamped not far from thence. But of this L danger he ſoon ſtopped the courſe, both becauſe the Nobles laboured and took his part, no leſs than they had done afore for Coriolanus: and alſo the affection and favour that men bare to his father Agrippa, was not worn out, and clean forgot. The Tribunes uſed moderation therefore in the penalty, for having commenced a capital action againſt him, and convicted him thereof, they ſet a fine on his head of * 2000 Aſſes. Howbeit this coſt him his life: for he grew, men ſay, into ſuch a melancholick fit for ſhame of this diſgrace, that he fell thereupon from grief of heart unto a pining ſickneſs which followed him to his dying day. Then was there another accuſed and brought into trouble, to wit, Sp. Servilius, ſo ſoon as he was out of his Conſulſhip, at what time as C. Nautius, and P. Valerius were Conſuls. In the beginning of whoſe year the Tribunes L. Cæditius and T. Statius, called him ſtraightwaies to his anſwer. Who ſuſtained the violence of the M Tribunes, not as Menenius did, by his own intreaty and the praiers of the Nobles, but bare himſelf confidently upon his own innocency, and the good grace wherein he ſtood. Blamed he was likewiſe, and charged for the battel with the Tuſcans at Janiculum. But being a man of an hot ſpirit and ſtout courage, as he carried himſelf before in the publike danger, ſo now in his own private peril, by refuting in a bold and ſtout ſpeech that he made, not only the Tribunes, but alſo the Commonalty, and caſting in their teeth and reproving them, for the condemnation and death of T. Menenius, by whoſe fathers means the Commons being in times paſt reſtored, had obtained firſt thoſe very Magiſtrates and Laws, whereby at this day they exerciſe ſuch rigour: he went through all his troubles, and with much boldneſs avoided the preſent jeopardy he ſtood in. The teſtimony of his Colleague Virginius ſtood him in great ſtead, who produced forth as a witneſs, N made him partner with himſelf in all his worthy acts. But that proceſs of judgment which paſſed againſt Menenius (ſo altered were they now, and repented therefore) did him much more good, and ſtruck it dead ſure.

T. Menenius accuſed and arraigned.

* 6. lib. 5. ſterl.

Sp. Servilius arraigned.

When this broil and contention was ended at home, the Veientians war began abroad; to whom the Sabins alſo had joyned their power. Whereupon the Conſul P. Valerius, with the aid of the Latines and Hernicks, was ſent out with an Army to Veii: and incontinently he ſet upon the tents of the Sabins, as they lay encamped under the wals of their confederates, and put ſuch a terrour amongſt them, that whiles they ran forth ſcattering by bands and companies, ſome at one gate ſome at another, to repell the violent aſſault of the enemies, it hapned that the gate which he firſt advanced his enſigns againſt, was won. And within the trench ſmall fight there was, but O more man-ſlaughter. The tumult and noiſe hereof was heard from out of the Camp into the City. And the Veientians in great fear ran haſtily to their weapons, as if Veii had been ſurpriſed. Some make ſpeed to ſuccour the Sabins: others do what they can to aſſail the Romans, who were wholly buſied about the pillage of the Camp. For a pretty while they were put to ſome trouble, diſordered, and withdrawn from their purpoſe: but afterwards they themſelves advanced their banners, and made head againſt the one ſide and the other. The horſemen withall, ſent in by the Coſſ.

A brake the Tuſcans array, and put them to flight. And thus in one hour two armies were defeated, two moſt puiſſant nations, and neareſt neighbours to the Romans vanquiſhed.

Sabins and Veientians vanquiſhed.

Whiles theſe exploits were performed about Veii, the Volſcians and Æquians had encamped themſelves in the Country of Latium, and harried the marches thereof. Whom the Latines of themſelves, with the help only of the Hernikes, and without any Leader or aid at all from the Romans, forced to abandon their tents: and beſides the recovery of their own goods again, atchieved a great and rich booty. Notwithſtanding all this, the Conſul Nautius was ſent from Rome againſt the Volſcians. They were not well pleaſed, I believe, with the manner of it, that their allies ſhould wage war at all with their own power and direction, without the Army and conduct of B the Romans. He ſpared not to work all the miſchief he could, all abuſe and ſpight poſſible againſt the Volſcians: yet could not they be brought to fight a ſet field. Then ſucceeded L. Furius, and C. Manlius, Conſuls. To Manlius fell the charge of the Veientian Province. Howbeit, war there was none at all. But at their own ſute, a truce was granted unto them of forty yeas. And they were enjoyned to find corn and ſouldiers pay. Peace was not ſo ſoon procured abroad, but preſently enſued diſcord at home. For at the inſtigation of the Tribunes, by occaſion of the Law Agraria, the Commons were ſet a madding. But the Conſuls skared neither with the condemnation of Menenius, nor yet with the peril wherein Servilius ſtood, reſiſted all they could. And when the Conſuls were ounce out of their Offi.e, Genutius a Tribune laid hold upon them, and arreſted them: and L. Æmilius with Opiter Virginius enter their Conſulſhip. In ſome Annals or yearly re-C cords I find Vopiſcus Julius Conſul inſtead of Virginius. But in this year, whoſoever then were Conſuls, "Furius and Manlius being indited before the people, went about arraied in vile apparell and "mournful weed to the younger ſort of Senators, as well as the Commons perſwading, adviſing, "and warning them to forbear and refuſe all dignities and offices of ſtate, yea, and all charge of "Common-weal. And as for the Conſuls rods born afore them, their purfled robes with purple, "and chair of ſtate, they ſhould eſteem no otherwiſe of them than of the pageants carried in a "funeral pomp. And that with theſe gorgeous ornaments and enſigns they were but deſtined to "death: much like to beaſts adorned with ſacred white ribbands and labels, appointed to ſacri-"fice. But if the ſweetneſs of a Conſulſhip were ſuch let them conſider now withall, and perſwade "themſelves, that it is become private and overſwaied with the power of the Tribunes: and that D "the Conſul, as if he were the Tribunes ſerjeant, muſt do all at his beck and command. For if he "quetched never ſo little, if he ſeemed to regard the Senators, or make account of any thing "elſe in the whole State but of the Commonalty, let him ſet before his eyes the exile of Cn. Mar-"tius, the judgement and death of Menenius. The Nobles incenſed with theſe ſpeeches, from thenceforth began to conſult and confer together, not openly and in publike council, but privatly, and apart from the privity of many. And when they were reſolved once upon this point, that thoſe accuſed parties now in trouble ſhould be enlarged one way or other, by hook or crook: then the cruelleſt advice, and hardeſt courſe that could be delivered beſt pleaſed them: and for to put in execution the moſt audacious deſignments whatſoever, there wanted not one or other to give counſel. Well the law day of trial came, and when as the Commons gave attendance devoutly in the E Forum, in great expectations of the ſequel and iſſue, they began at firſt to marvel much, that the Tribun Genutius came not down in place: and ſuſpecting ſomewhat becauſe of his long tarrying & delay they imagined that he durſt not for the great men and chief Magiſtrates of the City: and ſo they complained that the common cauſe was forlorn and betraied. At the laſt, they that kept about the door & porch of the Tribune his houſe, brought word that he was found at home ſtark dead. Which news being once noiſed through the aſſembly, mark how an Army is diſperſed and ſcattered when their General is ſlain, even ſo in all the world the Commons ſlipt aſide every one, ſome one way ſome another. But above all others the Tribunes were in bodily fear being thus by their fellow taught how little help or none at all, their ſacred and redoubted Laws afforded. The Nobles could not diſſemble this their joy, nor uſe it with moderation but ſhewed it exceſſively: and F ſo little repented any one of them of the fact committed, that they avowed it, and took it upon them, and would not ſeem culpable in the action; but gave it out in plain terms, that the Tribunes by foul means were to be tamed & their wings clipped in a miſchief. Upon this their victory, ſo ſhameful a precedent in times to come there went out an edict for the publiſhing of a muſter: and whiles the Tribunes were in this feare daunted, the Conſuls without any contradiction, went through with it clear. But then were the Commons much more offended at their Tribunes ſilence and ſitting ſtill then at the Conſuls rule and imperious government: ſaying, "Farewell freedom "now, farewel liberties and all: now is the old world come again, and the Tribunes authority is "both dead and buried together with Genutius. Now they were to go in hand and bethink them-"ſelves of ſome other courſe, how they might withſtand the Senators proceedings: and ſeeing G "they were deſtitute of all other help to rely themſelves upon, the only way was for the Com-"mons to truſt to themſelves, & ſtand upon their own guard. Wheras therefore, there gave atten-"dance upon the Conſuls 24 Lictores or Vergers, Commoners all and no better, none more con-"remptible and baſe minded if they met with thoſe that would ſet them at naught: they might "thank themſelves only, and their own timorous conceits & imaginations, that ſuch things were "ſo dread and terrible. Thus having animated & provoked one another with theſe ſpeeches: there was a Sergeant ſent from the Conſuls to one Volero Publilius a Commoner, who becauſe he had been gain. Volero calleth for help to the Tribunes: but there being no man to reſcue him, the Conſuls commanded the man to be ſtript out of his cloaths, and the rods to be made ready for to ſcourge him. Then quoth Volero, "I appeal unto the people, ſeeing the Tribunes had rather have a Citi"zen and freeman of Rome beaten with rods in their preſence, than be murdered themſelves by "you in their beds. But the more fiercely he cried on ſtill, the more cruelly fell the Lictor to cut and ſlice his apparell for to uncaſe him. Then Volero being himſelf the ſtronger man, and aſ-ſiſted withall by ſome whom he called unto him, thruſt the Sergeant from him: and where he perceived the maineſt out-cry and loudeſt noiſe of his adherents, that fumed and chafed in his behalf, thither retired he, to ſhroud himſelf among the thickeſt, crying: "I appeal and beſeech the I at folk were raiſed and gathered together, and addreſſed themſelves as to a Battel. A foul piece of work was toward, full of exceeding danger, and like it was, that no man would have had regard either of common law or private honeſty. When the Conſuls in this ſo great a broil and ſtorm of outrage came in, to prevent further miſchief, they knew ſoon by experience how ſlenderly guarded againſt danger, the Majeſty of Rulers is, where force is wanting. For their Lictors were beaten, miſuſed, and ill intreated, their rods broken all a peeces, themſelves driven out of the Common place, and forced to take the Senat houſe, doubting how far forth Volero would proceed in the train of his victory. But when the riot was well appeaſed, they aſſembled the Sena- K tors together, and complained there of their injuries received, the violence of the Commons, and the audacious preſumption of Volero. After many opinions and ſharp cenſures delivered among them, the Ancients and Elders prevailed at length, who thought it not good to ſet the anger of the Nobles againſt the head-ſtrong raſhneſs of the Commons. And the Commons ſo highly favoured and embraced Volero, that in their next election they made him their Tribune for that year, wherein L. Pinarius and P. Furius were Conſuls. Who contrary to all mens expectation, that thought verily he would have exerciſed his Tribuneſhip in moleſting and vexing the Conſuls of the former year, preferred the publike cauſe before his own private grievance, and gave not the Conſuls ſo much as one foul word. Only he preferred a Law unto the people, That the Magiſtrates of the Commonalty might be created in a ward-Leet, or Aſſembly of the Tribes L and Wards. Thus under a title, which at the firſt ſight ſeemed nothing hainous, paſſed a matter of no ſmall conſequence, but ſuch as abridged the Nobles of all power and authority, to create Tribunes whom they would, by the ſuffrages and voices of their vaſſals and favourites. But when the Senators reſiſted with all their might, the going forward of this Act moſt pleaſing and plauſible to the Commons, and yet none might be found of the brotherhood of Tribunes, that by the authority either of Conſuls or of Senators could be brought to joyn in his way by their negative voice, which was indeed the only means to croſs it: the buſineſs, notwithſtanding in it ſelfe ſo weighty to wield, and ſo hard to be compaſſed, held out with much debating the year through. The Commons then made Volero Tribune again. The Senators on the other ſide, ſup-poſing the matter would now come to a final triall once for all, created for their Conſul Ap. Clau- M dius, the ſon of Appius: who even for the old contentions maintained by his father, who was both hated of the Commons, and alſo hated them again: and he had for his companion in government T. Quintius. At the very beginning no matter was treated of before that Law. But as Volero was the firſt deviſer and broacher of it, ſo his fellow Lectorius was the more earneſt and hot maintainer thereof, as he came more freſh unto it. The ſtouter he was beſides, by reaſon of his great military glory, for that in thoſe daies there was not a taller man of hands, nor more active than he. Now, when as Volero went ſtraight to the ſubſtance of the Law in hand, without any cir-cumſtance of words, and forbare to inveigh againſt the Conſuls perſon, Lectorius began his ſpeech with challenging Appius and his houſe, as moſt proud, and cruelly affected to the Commonalty of Rome: avouching earneſtly, "That the Nobles had made, not a Conſul, but a butcherly tor- N

"mentor, to afflict and mangle the Commons: but being a rough-hewn ſouldier, and not uſed
"to make Orations, his tongue could not frame to expreſs his mind as freely as he would: and
"ſo his utterance failing him: Since that (quoth he) O Quirites, I cannot ſo readily deliver that "in my ſpeech, as I can make that good indeed which I have ſpoken: Be you here to morrow, and "in this very place I will either get this Law enacted, or I will lie in the duſt and die for it before "you all. The next day the Tribunes were gotten into the Temple or hall firſt. The Conſuls and Nobility abode ſtill in the aſſembly of the people, for to hinder the paſſing of the Law. Then commanded Lectorius all the reſt to avoid and depart, but thoſe only that were to give their voices. The young Gentlemen of the Nobility ſtood ſtill, and gave no place to the Tribunes Officer. Then willed Lectorius ſome of them to be attached. But the Conſul Appius replied again, O
"That a Tribune had authority over none but Commoners: foraſmuch as he was a Magiſtrate, "not of the people, but of the Commons. Neither could himſelf, of his abſolute power (Conſul "though he was) obſerving the cuſtome of his anceſtors, command any man to avoid: for that the
"uſuall form of words ran thus, May it pleaſe you my Maſters, O Quirites if you think good, to depart.
Soon was he able, thus laying the Law unto him, by way of ſcorn and contempt, to outface Lectorius, and put him down. Whereupon the Tribune chafed, and ſet into an heat, ſendeth an

A Officer to the Conſul: the Conſul likewiſe, a Lictor to the Tribune, crying often aloud, that he was but a private perſon without command, without Magiſtracy. And doubtleſs the Tribune had been hardly uſed, but that both the aſſembly roſe up in a rage, and took part with the Tribune againſt the Conſul: and alſo there was a concourſe of the multitude, raiſed out of all parts of the City into the Common Hall. Appius notwithſtanding ſtood ſtiffely to it ſtill, and abide the brunt of this tempeſtuous ſtorm: neither had this broile ſtaid without ſome bloudſhed, in caſe Quintius the other Conſul, had not ſet ſome of the Aldermen that had been Conſuls, to get his brother Conſul by force (if otherwiſe it might not be) out of the Hall, whiles himſelf was in hand, "one while with the Commons, to appeaſe their fury, by way of intreaty and with fair words, B "otherwhiles beſought the Tribunes to break up the aſſembly, perſwading with them to take "more leiſure in this their heat and anger: for that time and ſpace would abridge nothing of their "power, but would joyn counſel and advice thereto: concluding withal, that both Nobles ſhould "be ruled by the people, and the Conſul ordered by the Nobles. Hardly and with much ado were the Commons quieted by Quintius, but far more trouble had the Nobles to ſtill the other Conſul. At the length, when the aſſembly of the people was diſmiſſed, the Conſuls called the Senat together. Where after much variety of opinions, proceeding from fear and anger, according as the one or the other ſwaied among them: look how much longer time they had to reclaime their mind from violent courſes, and ſagely with deliberation to conſider of the matter: ſo much the more their hearts went againſt all contention, and farther ſtriſe: inſomuch, as they yeelded Quintius
C hearty thanks, that by his travel between parties, the diſcord was well allaied. And to Appius they were petitioners, "That he would be contend, that the majeſty of the Conſull might be no grea-"ter than would ſtand with the unity and concord of the Citizens. For whiles the Tribunes for "their part would needs have all, and the Conſul on the other ſide draw all to them: between this "this plucking and haling there was no ſtrength left in the midſt: and to conclude, the Common-"weal was rent, torn and diſmembred between the rulers therof: who ſtrove rather for the mana-"ging and rule, than for the ſafety and preſervation of the State. Againſt whom Appius replied "with a ſolemn proteſtation before God and man, and ſaid, "That the weal publike was aban-"doned, forlorn, and betraied by nothing elſe but fooliſh fear: that the Senat wanted not a Con-"ſul, but the Conſul wanted Senators: who now yeelded to harder conditions than they had be-D "fore time in mount Sacer. Howbeit overweighed at length by the general conſent and accord of the Nobles, he was content: and ſo the law paſſed quietly, was by royall conſent authoriſed. Then and never before were the Tribunes created in a congregation of the tribes, and by their voices. Piſo writeth that there were three more made to the other, as if there had been but twain before: and he nameth alſo the Tribunes, to wit C. Siccius, L. Numitorius, M. Duellius, Sp. Icilius & L. Mecilius. Then had the Volſcians and Æquians, between the civil ſedition of the Romans, & the beginning of war harried & waſted the country: that in caſe the Commons had made an inſurrection, they might have retired to them as to a ſure place of receit & refuge. But when all was huſht & matters compounded between the Nobles and Commons, they removed their camp backward.

The foreſaid law enacted.

Appius Claudius was ſent againſt the Volſcians: and to Quintius fell the Province of the Æ-E quians. The ſame rigorous ſeverity continued Appius ſtill in warfare, that he uſed at home in the City: but ſo much more freely, for that he was not curbed nor held in by the Tribunes. The Commons he hated, more than his father had done afore, ſeeing he was overſwaied and had taken the foil at their hands: and being the only Conſul, oppoſed againſt the Tribunes power, yet maugre his head, the law paſſed clear away, which the former Conſuls his predeceſſors, with leſs ado, nor with ſo great hope and expectation of the Nobility, had ever hindred and ſtaid. This his anger and indignation gave an edge to that fell ſtomack of his by kind, for to plague and puniſh his ſouldiers with imperious and lordly command. But ſo ſet they were to ſpurn again and diſobey, that by no forcible means they could be tamed doing all things that they did lazily ſlowly frowardly, and ſtubbornly. Neither baſhed they for ſhame, nor ſtood in awe for fear. If his will was they F ſhould march on apace, they would on ſet purpoſe go fair and ſoftly: If he encouraged them in proper perſon to intend their buſineſs, they would all of them ſlack their former ſervice, whereunto they were entred of themſelves: whiles he was in place, they would hang down their heads and look on the ground: as he paſſed by they would ſecretly curſe him in their hearts. So as that invincible ſtomack of his againſt all hatred of the Commons, would now and then grieve hereat. And wen he ſaw that all the ſhrewdneſs and rigour that he uſed was in vain, and that now he could do no good with his ſouldiers, he fell to checking the Captains and Centurions, ſaying, They had ſpoiled and marred the Army, terming them Tribunes of the Commons, and otherwhiles in taunting-wiſe nicknaming them Voleroes. All theſe doings were the Volſcians aware of, and therefore were they more eager and forward, hoping that Appius ſhould find the Roman G Army as froward and diſobedient, as they had been againſt Fabius. And to ſay truth they were more crooked and unruly with Appius than with Fabius a great deal. For they were not only unwilling to have the victory as Fabius his Army was, but alſo deſirous to loſe the victory and be overcome. Being brought forth and ſet in battel array, they ſhamefully took their heels and fled into their tents: and never made head and reſiſtance, before they ſaw the Volſcians with banners diſplaied, advancing againſt the munitions of their Camp, and a foul ſlaughter committed upon the tail of their rereward. Then were they driven perforce to fight for very neceſſity, that that the enemy thus far forth Victor, might be kept from the Wall and Trench: and yet ſo, as it H was very apparant, that the ſouldiers paſſed for nothing elſe, but only to ſave the Camp for being won: for ſome of them rejoyced at their own loſs and defeature. Whereat, the ſtout ſtomack of Appius was nothing daunted nor his heart broken: but he minded to deal cruelly with them, and thereupon ſummoned a general aſſembly. Then the Lieutenants, Marſhals, and Colonels, came running unto him advertiſing him in no caſe to try maſteries, and to inforce his authority. The very ground and ſtrength wherof reſteth wholly in the accord of obedient people: adding moreover, that the ſouldiers commonly gave out, that they would not go to the aſſembly: but rather they might be heard every where, calling upon them aloud, to diſlodge and remove out of the territory of the Volſcians: moreover, that the enemy now Maſter of the field, was but a while ſince ad- I vanced to the gates and rampier, and well near poſſeſſed of them: whereby, they were not only to ſuſpect, but might evidently ſee before their eyes ſome great matter toward of dangerous conſequence. Whereupon at laſt he was over-ruled, and (foraſmuch as his ſouldiers thereby ſhould gain nothing but delay of their puniſhment) remitted the aſſemby for that time: and after proclamation made to ſet forward in their journey the next day, and to depart in the morning very early, he cauſed the trumpet to ſound the remove, and to march away. The Army being gone out of the Camp, and ready to be ſet in order of a march at length, the Volſcians who were gotten up by the ſame ſound of the trumpet, plaid upon the tail of the rereward: the noiſe whereof paſſed from thence to the vanguard, & ſo diſordered the enſigns, ſo troubled the ranks by reaſon of that fright, that neither could the direction and commandment of the Captains be heard, nor the Army be K brought into battel array. No man minded any thing at all but to run away: and diſorderly in great numbers, they fled back over the dead carcaſſes and armors that lay on heaps, and ſo eſcaped; and never ſtay they their flight, untill the enemy gave over the chaſe. At the laſt, the Conſul having called his ſouldiers together that were run away ſo ſcattering, (for with all the ſpeed that he made after to call them back, he could not reclaim them) encamped without his enemies ground in a place of ſecurity. Then he called them all together to an aſſembly, and inveighed bitterly, and not without juſt cauſe, againſt the whole Army, as having betraied the diſcipline of war, and forſaken their colours: asking every one of them what was become of their banners? And what they had done with their weapons? And as many ſouldiers as were unarmed, as many enſign-bearers as had Florus ſaith, they had the Baſtinado. vide Carol. Sig. de pœnu. not their enſigns, the Centurions alſo, and thoſe that received double allowance, and forſook their L bands and companies, he cauſed to be ſcourged with rods & to loſe their heads. The whole number beſides, were by lot tithed, and every tenth man as it fell out, executed. But contrariwiſe, in the expedition againſt the Æquians, the Conſul and his ſouldiers, ſtrove to exceed one another in curteſie and kindneſſes. Quintus was by nature mild and chearful, and the cruelty of his brother Quintus beloved of his ſouldiers. Conſul, that never ſped well, made him take more joy in that his gentle diſpoſition. Whiles the General and his Army conſorted thus together, the Æquians durſt not confront them, but ſuffered their enemies to range all abroad and forrage the country: ſo as in no former wars got they greater booties from thence: and all was beſtowed among the ſouldiers. Over and beſides theſe gratuities, they had their due praiſes and ſolemn commendations, wherein ſouldiers take no leſs delight than in rewards and gifts. So that Army returned home better affected to their General, M and alſo to the Nobles for their Generals ſake: reporting that the Senate had given to them a loving father, but to the other Army a lordly maſter. This year thus ſpent with variable fortune abroad in war: with grievous diſcord as well at home as abroad, was above all moſt memorable and famous for the Tribe-Leet. A matter of more note, in reſpect of their victory that entred into the action, than of conſequence, in regard of commodity that grew thereof. For the very Leet it ſelf loſt more credit by excluding the Nobles out of that aſſembly, than either the Commons got ſtrength, or the Nobles did forgo thereby. But more troubleſome was the year following, whiles L. Valerius & T. Æmylius were Conſuls, both for the variance of the three States about the law Agraria, and alſo for the arraignment of Appius Claudius. Whom, being a moſt bitter adverſary of that law, and a great maintainer and upholder of thoſe that poſſeſſed and held the common N lands, as if he had been ever a third Conſul, M. Duellius and C. Scœcius arreſted and endited. Never before that day came to the bar, a perſon to be tried before the people, ſo odious unto the Com-Appius Claudius araigned at the bar. mons: charged with ſo many wrongs done of his own ſo many of his fathers afore him, in regard whereof they were highly diſpleaſed and offended with him. The Nobles likewiſe had not lightly laboured ſo earneſtly nor ſtrained themſelves ſo much for any one as for him. Who being the patron and protector of the Senat, the maintainer and upholder of their port and dignity, a man ever oppoſed againſt all the troubleſome broils of Tribunes & Commons, was now delivered as a prey to the Commons in their anger, and only for that he had overſhot, and paſſed himſelf in heat of contention. But of all the Senators that ever were, Appius Claudius of himſelf alone was he, that cared not a ruſh either for Tribune or Commoner, nor yet for his own arraignment. No mena- O cing threats of the Commons no earneſt prayers of the Senators could once make him, I ſay, not to change his apparel and in humble manner to ſeek and crouch unto men for to be good unto him: no nor ſo much, as when he came to anſwer for himſelf before the people, one whit to mollifie and let fall (as it were) that rough and ſharp kind of ſpeech that he was wont ordinarily to uſe. He kept the ſame ſowre countenance ſtill, the very ſame frowardneſs and crabbedneſs of viſage, the ſame ſpirit of boldneſs in his apology and defence. Inſomuch, as many of the

A Commons were no leſs afraid of Appius ſtanding priſoner, there arraigned at the bar, than they had been of him, ſitting as Conſul in his ivory chair of eſtate. In pleading of his cauſe, he ſpake briefly and at once to the point, with the ſame accuſatory ſpirit that he had ever uſed in all his pleas and actions. With his boldneſs and reſolute conſtancy, he ſo amazed both Tribunes and Commons, that they themſelves deferred the day of giving ſentence, and ſuffered afterward the ſuit to hang and depend ſtill undetermined. But not long after, even before the Law day appointed was come, he ſickned and died. Whoſe funeral praiſes when as the Tribunes went about to hinder, the Commons would not ſuffer, that the death of ſo worthy a man, ſhould be defrauded of the due honour and ſolemn obſequies, and gave audience as quietly and attentively to the commen-
B dation of the man now dead, as they did afore to his accuſation while he was alive: and with a goodly train attended his corps to the grave. Ap. Claudius dieth.

The ſame year Valerius the Conſul made a voiage with an army againſt the Æquians, and ſeeing he could not train the enemy forth to fight, he made a bravado to aſſail the Camp: but there fell ſuch a terrible ſtorm and tempeſt from heaven, with hail and thunder-claps that he was diſappointed of his enterpriſe. And that which made it more ſtrange and wonderfull, he had no ſooner ſounded the retreat, but the weather proved ſo fair and calm again that he made ſome ſcruple and matter of conſcience, to give a ſecond aſſault unto the trench, as if it had been defended by the ſpeciall power and providence of God. So, all the heat of war turned to the waſting only of the Countrey. The other Conſul Æmilius warred with the Sabins. And even there alſo, becauſe
C the enemies kept within their walled towns, the Territories were ſpoiled. But afterwards, the Sabines raiſed with the firing, not only of their villages and hamlets, but alſo of the good towns and burroughs, whereof in thoſe parts there were many, and thoſe well peopled, encountred the forragers: and after a doubtfull skirmiſh, they departed aſunder, and the morrow after raiſed their Camp, and retired themſelves back into a place of more ſecurity, which the Conſul taking for a ſufficient argument and proof, that the enemies were defeated, left them ſo, and diſlodged likewiſe, without any end of the war.

During theſe wars, and whiles diſcord continued in the City at home, were T. Numitius Priſcus and A. Virginius created Conſuls. Now ſeemed it that the Commons would no longer abide the deferring of the Law Agraria. And as they were about to put it to a venture and to try the ut-D moſt by extremity, they took knowledge partly by the ſmoke and flame of the villages on fire, and partly by the running away of the villagers, that the Volſcians were near at hand. Which occurrent repreſſed and kept down the ſedition which was now come to ripeneſs, and ready to break forth. For the Conſuls forced by the Senate immediatly to the war, by taking the ſerviceable youth with them out of the City, reduced the reſt of the Commons to more quietneſs. And the enemies verily made no further attempt, but after they had given a falſe allarm, and ſet the Romans in a fooliſh fear, diſmarched away as ſpeedily as they could. Then Numitius went to Antium againſt the Volſcians, and Virginius againſt the Æquians: where having well-near received a great loſs and defeat by a train laid for him: ſuch was the proweſs and manhood of the ſouldiers, that they recovered all again, which by the negligence of the Conſul had like to be loſt. But better was E the conduct and government of the Army againſt the Volſcians. For there, at the firſt skirmiſh the enemies were diſarraied, put to flight, and chaſed as far as to Antium, a City (for that time) of right great puiſſance and importance. The Conſul durſt not aſſault it, but wan from the Antiates Cenon, another town, but nothing ſo wealthy. Whiles the Æquians and Volſcians thus amuſed the Roman Armies and kept them occupied, the Sabins were come robbing and ſpoiling to the gates of the City of Rome. But within few daies after, they themſelves received more damage than they brought, by occaſion that both Conſuls with two armies were entred in great anger into their Confines. In the end of the year ſome peace there was, but diſquieted, as at all times before, with the variance between the Nobles and Commons. The Commons in a peeviſh and angry fit would not be at the Election of the Conſuls. So by the Senators only and their followers, F there were elected Conſuls, T. Quintius and Q. Servilius. The like year to the former theſe Conſuls had, ſeditious and troubleſome in the beginning: but afterwards upon forrain war, quiet and ſtill. For the Sabins with a running Camp having paſſed over the plains of Cruſtuminium, and put all to fire and ſword about the river Anio, were chaſed back, well near from the gate Collina and the walls: howbeit they drave away with them exceeding great booties both of people and cattell. Whom the Conſul Servilius followed hard with a power ready to bid battell, but could not overtake their main army in any even ground meet to pitch a field in. Howbeit he foraged and waſted the Country all about ſo as he left no corner clear that felt not his fingers, and returned with purchaſe of many rich prizes of all ſorts.

Likewiſe among the Volſcians they ſped well and had lucky hand by the good demeanour both G of captain and ſouldier. Firſt they joyned battell upon a plain, and fought with very great ſlaughter, and exceeding much bloudſhed on both ſides. And the Romans (who for their ſmall number were more apt to feel the loſs) had loſt ground and diſmarched, if that the Conſul by making a lie for a vantage, and crying that the enemies fled from the other wing, had not encouraged them and renewed the battell afreſh. And ſo by giving a new charge, whiles they thought they had the better, they got the better in very deed. The Conſul fearing again, by preſſing too hard upon the Army, to enforce them to turn and make head, ſounded the retreat. Few daies paſſed The ſtratagem of the Conſul Quintius.

between, wherein they rested quiet, as though there had been a secret truce agreed between them. H
In which mean space, a great sort of people from all parts of the Volscians and Æquians repaired to the Camp, thinking verily, that if the Romans were aware of them, they would depart in the night season. Whereupon, at the third watch they came to make an assault upon their Camp. Quintius after he had quieted the tumult, which upon this sudden allarm arose, and given commandment that the souldiers should keep themselves within their pavilions, brought forth a company of Hernicks to guard the gates, and caused certain cornettiers and trumpetters on horseback to wind and sound before the trench and counterscarpe, and so to hold the enemy in suspence and expectation untill day-light. The rest of the night all was so quiet within the Camp, that the Romans had time enough and good opportunity to take their repose and sleep. This I shew of footmen in their harnets, whom the Volscians imagined to be more than they were, and all Romans: the neighing besides, and noise that the horses made by reason of their strange riders that they were not used unto, and the sound also of their trumpets and horns that made them to set up their ears, and to stamp and fume outragiously, amused the enemies waiting ever when they would charge upon them. When it was day, the Romans being in heart and fresh, as having slept their fill, came forth and embattelled themselves, and at the first shock discomfited the Volscians, wearied with long standing and overwatched withall. And yet the enemies rather gave ground and retired themselves, than seemed to be driven from their standings, because they had at their backs certain hils, whereunto they might retire behind the Principia, and not break their ranks, and so save themselves. The Consul seeing he was come to a place of disadvantage, K made a stand. The footmen hardly would be staied, calling and crying to the Consul to follow upon them seeing they were discomfited. The horsemen were more eager, riding all about the Consul, and with open mouth cried out, that they would advance before the ensigns. Whiles the Consul held off, in a mammering what to do, for as he was assured of the valour of his souldiers, so he little trusted the ground; they all at once set up a shout, that they would set forward, come what would: and as they cried, so did they in good earnest. And pitching their javelins fast in the ground, that they might more nimbly get up the steep place, they took their full carreer, and ran up the hill. The Volscians having in their first brunt spent all their darts, and other shot which they had let flie, and made no spare, took up stones that lay under their feet, let drive at the Romans as they climbed up, and so thick and threefold they bestowed them, that they annoyed them L sore, and beat them down the hill. Thus the left wing of the Romans was well-near over-charged, had not the Consul at the point, when as they were ready to retreat, blamed them first for their rashness, and then for their cowardise, and made them for very shame to shake off all fear. First, they stood to it stoutly, and kept their ground, and after, as their strength served them, considering the vantage of the place which the enemies had gotten, they adventured to set foot forward, and won ground with a fresh shout and outcry. And taking their carreer again the second time, they strain all they can, and at length overcame the disadvantage of the place. Now when they were almost at the point to win the very pitch and ridge of the hill, the enemies turned back. Whiles they ran on heaps in disaray, both they that fled, and they that followed, hapned both at once in one company into the enemies Camp, which in that fright was won. The Volscians, as M many of them as could escape, ran as fast as their legs would carry them to Antium. And to Antium likewise was the Roman army conducted: and after a few daies siege, was surrendred upon no fresh and new force of assault, but for that presently upon their unfortunate conflict and loss of the Camp their heart were done, and utterly failed.

C AFter the winning of Antium, T. Æmilius and Q. Fabius were created Conſuls. This was that Fabius that only remained alive of all the name that periſhed at Cremera. Now had Æmilius in his former Conſulſhip perſwaded to diſtribute certain Lands among the Commons. And therefore in this ſecond likewiſe, both the favorers of the law Agraria were in good hope of the foreſaid law: and alſo the Tribuns ſuppoſing verily that now by the help of a Conſul, that might be brought about and obtained, which oftentimes had been enterpriſed againſt the pleaſure of the Conſuls; took the matter in hand and gave the attempt: and withal, the Conſul ſtill continued in the ſame mind. But the great landed men and many of the Nobles, finding themſelves grieved, and complaining that the chief and head Magiſtrat of the City buſied D himſelf, with the Tribuns ſuits, and was by large giving away of other mens poſſeſſions, become popular and gracious with the people, turned the whole burthen and odious heavy load of this action from the Tribuns upon the Conſul his head. And a cruel broil was toward, had not Fabius, by a device and policy to neither party offenſive, made an end of the matter with expedition. For whereas there were certain Lands gotten by conqueſt from the Volſcians the year afore under the conduct of T. Quintius: "There might (ſaid he) a colony be brought to Antium, a City neer ad-
"joyning, very commodious, and ſeated by the Sea ſide: ſo ſhould the Commons without any "grudging or complaints of the poſſeſſors or Land-lords, be ſeized of Land, and the City reſt in "quiet and Unity. This opinion of his was accepted of all hands. And they created three eſpe-E cial officers or Triumvirs for the diviſion of the ſaid lands, to wit, T. Quintius, Aul. Virginius, and P. Furius. Then proclamation was made, That whoſoever would hold any of the Land, ſhould give up their names in writing. But plenty, as the manner is, ſoon cauſed lothing: for there were ſo few that preſented themſelves, that to make up the full number of the inhabitants, they were fain to adjoyn unto them certain Volſcians. The reſt of the multitude had rather (as it ſeemed) to keep a calling for Land at Rome, than be poſſeſſed of Land elſewhere. The Æquians craved peace of Q. Fabius, who was come againſt them with an army: and they themſelves by making a ſodain inrode into the territories of Latium, cancelled the ſame and made it void. But the year next following, Q. Servilius (for he was Conſul with Sp. Poſthumius) being ſent againſt the Æquians, kept a ſtanding camp in the Country about Latium. But by the reaſon of a contagious diſeaſe or a F plague, that raigned in his army, they were of neceſſity forced to keep quiet within their tents. So their war was deferred unto the third year, when as Q. Fabius and T. Quintius were Conſuls. And for aſmuch as Q. Fabius, had upon his victory before granted peace to the Æquians, he had an extraordinary commiſſion directed unto him for the rule of that Province. Who being thither gone with full aſſured hope, that the very fame of him, and noiſe of his army, would quiet the Æquians, ſent Embaſſadors to the Councel of that Nation, with this meſſage: "Q. Fabius the Conſul, ſaith,
"that as he caried before peace from the Æquians unto Rome, ſo he bringeth now war to the Æ-"quians from Rome; having now his ſword in the very ſame hand, which he gave unto them be"fore in friendly manner unarmed. Whoſe treachery it is and perjury, that is the cauſe of this, the "Gods can witneſs now, and in ſome meaſure will revenge hereafter. Nevertheleſs, he for his "part, however the caſe ſtandeth, deſireth that the Æquians would yet bethink themſelves of their G "own accord and repent, rather than ſtand to the extremity and abide thoſe calamities and miſe"ries that follow wars. If they would come in therefore and be ſory for that they have done, their "ſubmiſſion ſhou'd be received, and they taken into the ſafe protection of his clemency, whereof "already they had experience. But in caſe they perſiſt ſtill in their diſloyalty, and take pleaſure in "being forſworn; be they well aſſured, that they ſhould have the ire and wrath of the Gods more "than their enemies to fight againſt them. Theſe words ſo little or nothing at all moved any men there, that the very Embaſſadors had like to have been very hardly uſed and evil entreated, yea, and an army withal was ſent forth as far as Algidum againſt the Romans. When theſe tidings H were brought to Rome, the indignity of the thing and the ſhameful manner thereof, rather than any fearful peril otherwiſe, raiſed the other Conſul out of the City. So two Conſular or royal armies approached the enemy in order of battail, ready to try it out preſently by the dint of ſword.

But the day being (as it fell out) welneer ſpent, there cried one aloud from out of the place where the enemy kept ward: "This is to make a ſhew of war only (ye Romans) and not to war indeed:
"ye ſet your battaillons in array againſt night forſooth, that now draweth hard on: we had need
"of more daylight I wis, for the buſineſs in hand, and to try this quarrel. To morrow therefore "at Sun riſing, ſee you come again into the field, ye ſhall have fighting fear not, your hands full.
The ſouldiers netled and galled at theſe words, retired back into the camp until the next day, I thinking the night was long, that kept them from battail: and ſo for that time they refreſhed their bodies with food and ſleep. On the morrow ſo ſoon as it was day, the Roman hoſt being ſtirring ſomewhat more early, ſtood ready arranged in array: and at length the Æquians likewiſe ſhewed themſelves in field. A ſharp fight there was on both ſides, by reaſon that both the Roman ſouldiers fought in anger and deadly hatred; and alſo the Æquians upon prickt conſcience, that bare them witneſs how they embarked themſelves into this danger, and were out of all hope ever to be truſted again, were forced to hazard all upon a caſt, and venture the utmoſt. Yet were not the Æ-quians able to endure long, the violent fight of the Romans, but were diſcomfited and put to flight. And being returned within their own Frontiers, the unruly multitude for all this, were never the more inclined to peace, but reproved and blamed their Captains, "That they put the tryal K
"of the iſſue to a ſet field, in which kind of fight the Romans had ſingular skill, and ſurpaſſed
"them. As for the Æquians, they were better at robbing, ſpoiling, and foraging, in making in-"curſions and inrodes: and a better and ſafer kinde of ſervice it was, here and there in ſundry "places, to skirmiſh with forces divided, than reduce all into one groſs army, and to pitch a field.
Leaving therefore a guard to defend the camp, they went forth, and with ſuch a tumult invaded the confines of Rome, that the very terror thereof reached unto the City. This ſtir, eſpecially coming ſo ſodainly and unlooked for, made the Romans fear the more. For who would ever have doubted and ſuſpected, that their enemies ſo lately vanquiſhed, and in manner beſieged within their own camp, could poſſibly think upon entring into the lands of others, and to drive booties.
Beſides, the ruſtical peaſants came in at the gates, crying, and ſaying, That they were not petty com- L panies, and ſmall handfuls of theeves and robbers, but (ſuch was their fooliſh fear, augmenting and making every thing greater) whole armies & legions of enemies were at hand, and marched apace with banners diſplayed full againſt the City. From their mouths, they that were next made report unto others. & as they heard news from they knew not whom, ſo they ſet them abroad they cared not how, but ever in the carriage they added ſomwhat of their own, and coyned lies good ſtore.
Here was running, there was crying al'arm & generally ſuch a confuſion every where, as if the City had been quite loſt. By good hap Quintius the Conſul was returned from Algidum to Rome. That remedy cured all and ſtayed the fear. When the tumult was appeaſed, he rebuked the people for fearing thoſe enemies whom heretofore they had vanquiſhed, and placed good guards over the gates. Then he aſſembled the Senate, and by the authority and aſſent of the Nobles, proclaimed M Juſtitium, or a general ceſſation or vacation in all courts of law: and went himſelf forth in perſon with a power to defend the marches, leaving Quintus Servilius Provoſt of the City: but the enemy he found not in the territory all about. The other Conſul performed his affairs paſſing well: who having certain intelligence, which way the enemies would come, ſet upon them laden with prey, and (by that means marching more heavily in diſorder) made it a dear booty unto them, even aſmuch as their lives were worth. For few of them eſcaped the Ambuſh, and all the pillage was recovered. So the return of Quintius into the City made an end of the publick Lawſtead, or above-ſaid vacation which laſted but four dayes. Then was a Cenſe or Aſſeſment ſet of mens goods, and a muſter or view taken of the number of Citizens, together with a ſolemn purging of the people, called Luſtrum, celebrate by Quintius. And there were numbred of Citizens 124214 polles, over and above men and women that lived ſingle, or had no children, and al orphans beſides. And among N the Æquians afterward nothing was done worth remembrance: for they betook them to their ſtrong Towns, ſuffering their territory and villages to be conſumed with fire, and ſpoiled. Thus the Conſul, after he had divers times overrun the Country of his enemies, with a cruel army waſting and ſpoiling as he went, returned home to Rome with great honor and a huge booty. Then were Coſſ. Aulus Poſthumius Albus, and Sp. Furius. Some have written them Fuſii, who indeed are rightly named Furii. Which I note, leſt any man ſhould think they were ſundry men, whereas the variety is only in the name. No doubt there was, but that one of the Coſſ. would war with the Æquians: and therefore the Æquians ſought for aide of the Ecetrane Volſcians. Which being gladly granted and ſent with ſpeed, (ſuch a perpetual hatred bare theſe Cities alwayes O againſt the Romans) there was great preparation for war in moſt forcible manner. The Her-niks having an inckling and knowledge thereof, certified the Romans afore-hand, that the E-cetrans were revolted and banded with the Æquians. The Colony Antium likewiſe was had in jealouſy, for that when the Town was loſt, many people fled from thence to the Æquians, who all the time of the Æquian war, ſerved in the field, and proved the moſt hardy ſouldiers and fierceſt of all others. And now when the Æquians were driven into their Towns, that

A multitude being ſlipt away and retired to Antium, withdrew from the Romans the allegeance of the Coloners and inhabitants there, who were already of their own inclination unſound and not to be truſted. But before the matter was come to ripeneſs, and they entred into any action, the Senate upon intelligence given that they intended only, and were upon the point to revolt, gave the Coſſ. in charge to ſend for the chief men and head perſons of that colony to Rome, and to enquire and learn of them in what terms Antium ſtood: who being come willingly enough, without any great intreaty, and convented by the Conſuls before the Senate, made anſwer to their interrogatories in ſuch manner, that they were ſent away more ſuſpected, than at their firſt coming: whereupon they reſolved fully of war. Spurius Furius one of the Coſſ. to whom that B province by lot fell, having taken his voyage againſt the Æquians, found the enemy ſpoiling and waſting in the territory of the Hernicks: and being ignorant what number they were (for that in no one place they were all diſcovered together) he raſhly joyned battell, and hazarded his power, being in number and force inferior to the other. And at the firſt encounter he was driven back, and retired into the camp: and yet was he not paſt all danger and inſecurity there: for both the night following, and the next day after, the camp was ſo ſtreighty beſet, and ſo hotly aſſaulted, that he could not diſpatch ſo much as a meſſenger from thence to Rome. The Herniks ſent word both of the infortunate fight, and alſo how the Conſul and his army were beſieged. With which news they ſo terrified the LL. of the Councel, that they granted Poſthumius the other Conſul the ſolemn commiſſion, To ſee to the State, that it ſuſtained no danger and damage. C The form of which order and decree, hath been alwayes accounted to ſignify ſome great extremity of the Common-wealth. And thought beſt it was, that the Conſul himſelf in proper perſon, ſhould abide at home to enrol in the muſter book, all thoſe that were able to bear armes: that T. Quintius ſhould be ſent as Pro-conſul or Vice-conſul, with a power of confederate Allies to raiſe the ſiege and reſcue the camp: and for the furniſhing of this army, the Latines, the Hernicks, and Colony Antium, were commanded to ſend unto Quintius, Subitary ſouldiers (for ſo they termed at that time, the aids and ſupplies taken up in haſt and on a ſudden.) Many attempts were made, much skirmiſhing, and ſundry aſſaults for certain dayes on each ſide were enterpriſed. For the enemies being more in number, aſſayed in divers places and ſundry wayes to cut off and diminiſh the power of the Romans, as not ſufficient and able to make head at all D turns. For at one time they both made an aſſault upon the camp, and withal ſent out certain of their forces to waſt the territory of Rome, yea, and to give the venture upon the very City, if they could eſpie any good opportunity to offer it ſelf. L. Valerius was left behind to defend the City, and Poſthumius the Conſul was ſent out to reſtrain and withſtand the waſting of the marches. No point of care or travail on any hand was ſlaked, watch and ward both night and day was ſet in the City, a good Corps de guard appointed afore the Gates, and ſouldiers beſtowed upon the Walls: and (that which was needful in ſo great an hurlyburly) for certain dayes it was no Term, or interdiction of Law was obſerved. In this mean while, Furius the Coſſ. who at the firſt had quietly endured the ſiege and made no reſiſtance, ſuddenly and at unawares ſallied out at the broad gate called Decumana, upon the enemies: and whereas he might E have chaſed them, he made ſome ſtay of that, for fear leſt on ſome other ſide, they would have given aſſault upon the camp. But Furius the Lieutenant (who alſo was the Conſul his Brother) engaged himſelf too far, and upon a hot deſire of purſuit and following the chaſe, neither ſaw he his fellows as they retired, ne yet the enemies as they came to charge him on the back. Thus being ſhut out from all the reſcue, after many eſſayes made (but all in vain) to make way through unto the camp, manfully fighting he was ſlain. The Conſul likewiſe hearing that his Brother was environed all about with enemies, returned again to fight; but as he ran more raſhly than warily into the midſt of the skirmiſh, he was ſore wounded, and being hardly and with much ado ſaved by thoſe that were about him, he both diſquieted and daunted F the hearts of his own men, and made his enemies more fierce, luſty, and couragious. Who were ſo animated and ſet on fire, both with the hurt of the Conſul, and alſo with the death of his Lieutenant, that nothing afterwards could ſtand in their way: no force was able to ſtay them, but that they beat the Romans again into their camp: where they were beſieged afreſh being now both in hope, and alſo for ſtrength worſe than they were before. So that their main State thus lying a bleeding, had utterly periſht, but that T. Quintius with a ſupply of ſtrangers; namely, a power of Latines and Hernikes, came to the reſcue in time: who charging the Æquians behind, whiles they were wholly buſied in aſſailing the camp, ſhewing them within the Lieutenants head in a great bravery and pride, at the ſame inſtant cauſed a ſally out of the camp, by a ſignal that he gave them a far off, and ſo incloſed round about a great num- G ber of the enemies. Small mas the ſlaughter, but great was the flight and ſcattering of the Æquians in the territory of Rome: upon whom (ſtragling here and there and driving their booties afore them) Poſthumius, who in divers convenient places had beſtowed certain companies and bands of ſouldiers, ran violently. And as they fled every way in diſaray, they lighted upon Quintius as he with the hurt Conſul returned with Victory. Then the Conſuls army bravely did their endeavour, and had a goodly day of them; and was revenged both for their Conſuls wound, and alſo for the death of the Lieutenant and the Squadrons with him. Many loſſes and overthrows were given and taken on each ſide for certain dayes. But in ſo ancient a matter as this was, hard it is for a man upon his credit, to ſet down preciſely the certain number, either how many fought, or how many were ſlain. Howbeit Valerius Antias boldly reckoneth the exact numbers, namely, that there died of the Romans in the Hernicks Country 5300, and of the Æquian robbers, who went up and down ſpoiling and pilling in the territory of Rome, were killed by A. Poſthumius the Coſ. 2400. The reſt of the multitude, which laden with ſpoil fell into the hands of Quintius, were not ſo quit, nor eſcaped with the loſs of ſo few mens lives: for of them the ſword devoured 4000, and to account the number exactly, 200 (quoth he) and 30 juſt. Then returned they on all hands to Rome, and the foreſaid vacation or law-ſteed ended. The skie was ſeen much on a light fire, and other ſtrange wonders either appeared indeed, or preſented to the fearful people vain apparitions, and fantaſtical illuſions. However it was, for to avert the dangers by theſe prodigious and terrible tokens preſaged, there were proclaimed feſtival holy dayes for three dayes together. During which time all the Churches were repleniſhed with men and women, making ſupplications and prayers for the favor and mercy of the Gods. The bands and ſquadrons of the Latins and Hernicks, after great thanks given them by the Senate for their good ſervice in this war, were diſcharged and ſent home. But the Antiate ſouldiers, 1000 in number, who after the battell was fought came tardy, and too late for to ſuccour, were diſmiſſed in manner with ignominy and ſhame.

Then was the great Leet or aſſembly held, for the election of Magiſtrates: wherein L. Ebutius and P. Servilius were created Conſuls: and on the * Calends of Sextilis (for on that day) began the year then, they entred their Conſulſhip. A grievous and heavy time it was, and as it fortuned, a year of plague and great mortality, both in the City and Country, as well among brute beaſts as men. And the receiving of the Country peaſants with their cattel into the City, for fear of robbing and ſpoiling, encreaſed the contagiouſneſs of the ſickneſs ſo much the more. For, that confuſed medly of all ſorts of beaſts, both annoyed and empoiſoned the citizens with the uncouth and unuſual ſtink, and alſo ſtifled with ſultry heat and overmuch watching the ruſtical people, lying peſtered together, and thruſt up into cloſe rooms and ſtraight lodgings. The mutual recourſe one to help and Miniſter unto another, and the very catching of the diſeaſe, ſet it all abroad. Thus whiles they had much ado to endure theſe preſent calamities, behold, to mend the matter, all of a ſuddain, the Hernick Embaſſadors bring word, that the Æquians and Volſcians having levied a power joyntly together, were encamped within their limits: and from thence with a mighty army waſted and deſtroyed their territory. Now, beſides that the ſmall aſſembly in the Senate-houſe, was to theſe their allyes an evident token that the City was ſore viſited with the peſtilence, they received alſo an heavy anſwer from them, namely; That the Herniks themſelves together with the help of the Latins, ſhould defend their own: as for the City of Rome, it was with the heavy hand and viſitation of the Gods, diſpeopled by the plague: but in caſe the ſickneſs decreaſed in ſome meaſure and took up in any time, they would willingly aid their confederats, as they did the year before, and as they had done at all times beſides. Thus departed theſe allies, and for their ill news they brought thither, they caried with them home again a worſe anſwer and meſſage, to wit, That they ſhould by themſelves ſuſtain that war alone which hardly they were able to ſupport, if they had the power of the Romans to aſſiſt them. Long ſtayed not the enemy in the Hernicks countrey, but went forward from thence into the territory of Rome, deſolate already (God wot) without the injury of war, and little need there was of calamity that wayes: where meeting with no man at all, no not ſo much as any one unarmed, and paſſing over all the Country, diſfurniſhed not only of Garriſons to reſiſt, but alſo of people for husbandry and tillage, at length they came to the third ſtone, i. within three miles of Rome, to the broad port high way, called Gabina, leading to Gabes. The Roman Coſ Ebutius, was now departed this life, and his brother Coſ. Servilius, lay lingring on at the point of death, in ſmall hope of recovery. Moſt of the peers and principal ancients were infected, and ſick in bed, ſo was the greater part of the Nobles, and welneer all the ſerviceable men of war: ſo as they were not able to ſet forth an expedition or voyage abroad, as meet was in ſo great a tumult, no nor ſcarce to keep any ordinary ſet guard at home for the defence of the City. The Senators, ſuch as age and ſickneſs would permit, took the charge in proper perſons of watch and ward. The Ædiles of the Commons went the round, and had the charge to ſee all well & in good order: ſo that upon them now reſted the government of the ſtate, & the Majeſty of the Conſuls Regiment. Thus when all was forlorn, no head to direct, no ſtrength of man to execute; the Tutelar Gods, Protectors of the City, and the good fortune alone that ever waited upon her, preſerved the main chance. This made the Volſcians and Æquians to carry with them a mind and intent, rather to deal by way of robbings and ſpoilings, than in any hoſtile manner like profeſſed warriors: for ſo ſmall hope had they, or none at all, of winning the City; ſo little heart ſo much as to approach the walls, that even the very roofs of houſes, which they deſcried a far off, and the ſight of the tombs and graves ſo neer at hand, turned their minds clean, and daunted their courages. So as over all the camp they began to mutter with themſelves, What they meant to ſpend time idly, and ſit ſtill without ſpreading, in a waſt and deſart Countrey; within the mortality and putrified air and corruption, both of people and cattel; when as they might as well invade thoſe parts that ſtood clear and ſound, and namely the rich, plentiful, and fat fields of * Tuſculum: and therewith ſuddainly at once they plucked up their enſigns, and by croſs wayes paſſed through the * Lavican countries, even to the mountains of Tuſculum: and thither turned they

A they the whole force and tempeſt of the war. In the mean ſeaſon the Herniks and Latins moved not with pity and compaſſion only, but alſo for very ſhame, in caſe they had neither withſtood their common enemies, marching to Rome with a cruel army, nor relieved their beſieged friends; joyned their powers together, and ſet forward to Rome: where not finding the enemies, and following the bruit that went of them, and tracing their freſh tracks and tooting, they encountred them as they came down from the hilly Country of Tuſculum into the vale of Alba: Where they made no ſaving bargain of it, but fought to their loſs, ſo as their fidelity unto their allyes, had but bad ſucceſs for that preſent. And in Rome there was no leſs mortality of citizens by the ſickneſs, than there were Maſſacres abroad of their allyes by the edge of the ſword. For the other Conſul, B who alone ſurvived hitherto, now died. There left this life alſo, other noble perſonages, M. Valerius, Titus Virginius, Augurs: and Ser. Sulpitius the Curio Maximus. But among the baſe and common ſort, the violence of the diſeaſe raged and ſpread, I know not how far. The Senate now deſtitute of all help and comfort of man, moved the people to devotion, to their beads, and prayers unto the Gods. And commandment was given to all men with their wives and children, to go in proceſſion, to pour out their ſupplications, and crave mercy at Gods hands. Thus being by publick authority called forth to perform that which every man was forced unto by his own proper calamities, they filled all the Temples and Chappels. The Dames and ancient Matrons, lying groveling and ſweeping the Church floors and pavement with their hair and treſſes, hanging looſe down, humbly beſought pardon of the Gods, and an end once of the peſtilence. Whereupon,
C were it that they had obtained the mercy of God, or that the more dangerous and contagious ſeaſon of the year, was now well overpaſt; their bodies by little and little, having eſcaped the danger of diſeaſe, began to recover and wax more healthy.

Then ſet they their minds about the care of the Common-weal, and after certain inter-reigns determined or ended, P. Valerius Poplicola, the third day of his Interreign or Regency for the time, createth Conſuls L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and T. Veturius Geminus, or Vetuſius, whether ye will: who three dayes before the Ides of Sextilis, began their Conſulſhip. By which time the City was grown ſo ſtrong again, that it was able not only to maintain a defenſive war, but alſo to enter the field and aſſail others. When the Herniks therefore gave them advertiſements that the enemies were paſſed over into their borders: they made no delay, but readily and willingly pro-D miſed their aid, and levied two Conſular armies. Veturius was ſent againſt the Volſcians, to begin with them, and to war within their own Country. Tricipitinus was oppoſed in the Frontiers of their confederates, to keep them from invaſion and waſting, and went no further forward than to the Herniks. Veturius at his firſt encounter and confronting of his enemies, diſcomfited and put them to flight. But Tricipitinus whiles he lay ſtill encamped in the marches of the Herniks, miſſed of the army of the Robbers: which was conducted over the Mountains of Preneſte, from whence they came down into the Champain, and ſpoiled the territories of Preneſte and Gabes: and from thence they fetched a compaſs about unto the Mountains of Tuſculum. The City of Rome likewiſe was put in great fear, rather upon the ſodain occurrent of this alarm, than for any want of power to reſiſt their violence. Quintus Fabius at that time was Provoſt or Pre-E ſident of the City, who put the youth in armor, diſpoſed guards in places convenient, and made all ſafe and in good ſecurity. The enemies therefore who had raiſed a booty out of the parts adjoyning, durſt approach no neerer, but caſt about with their army and retired: and the further they went from their enemies City, ſo much the more careleſs they were, until they light upon the Conſ. Lucretius, who by his eſpials and ſcouts, was afore that time acquainted what wayes they would take, and was ready alſo to try battail. So with reſolute and prepared hearts, they ſet upon them, that with the ſodain fear were amazed. And albeit they were in number fewer, yet they diſcomfited and put to flight a mighty multitude of them, and drave them within the hollow vallyes, where becauſe they had no ready way to get out, they kept them incloſed on every ſide in ſuch ſort, that the whole name and nation welneer of the Volſcians, there utterly pe-
F riſhed. In ſome Chronicles I find that there were 13470 ſlain in the fight and chaſe, and 1250 taken Priſoners alive, and 27 enſigns or banners brought away. It may well be that the number perhaps doth ſomewhat exceed the truth, yet a great ſlaughter certainly there was. The Conſul having atchieved this victory, and gotten a mighty great prey, returned into the ſame ſtanding camp again. Then pitched both Conſuls together, and the Volſcians joyntly with the Æquians, rallied their Forces thus decayed and weakened, into one place, and made one entire army. This was the third field fought, in that one year, and by the ſame good Fortune the Romans wan the victory: and having vanquiſhed the enemies, they were Maſters alſo of the camp. Thus the City of Rome recovered her ſelf, and returned to her ancient good eſtate. But this happy ſucceſs in war, immediatly ſtirred up civil troubles at home. C. Terentillus Arſa, for that year a Tri-G bun of the Commons, ſuppoſing in the abſence of the Conſuls, good opportunity was offered to ſet on foot the Tribuns actions, and their proceedings: for certain dayes together gave not over before the Commons, to accuſe the great pride and inſolency of the Nobles: but eſpecially he inveighed againſt the Conſuls Regiment, as being too abſolute, and in a free ſtate intollerable. "For in name only (quoth he) leſs odious and hateful it is than that of the KK. but in fact in "very dead, more grievous and cruel. For why? Inſtead of one Lord. the City hath received "twain, and thoſe having authority beyond all meaſure, unlimited and infinit: who being them-

"and the rigor of all puniſhment, againſt the Commons. But leſt this their licentiouſneis ſhould
"continue for ever, he was minded to prefer and publiſh a Law, by vertue whereof there ſhould
"be five men created, who ſhould ſet down certain conditions, to limit and gage the authority "of the Conſuls: and look what authority and commiſſion the people granted out over them, the "ſame ſhould the Conſul exerciſe, and no more, and not rule of themſelves, and uſe their own
"will and licentious luſt in ſtead of Law. This act being once publiſhed, and the Nobles fearing, leſt whiles the Conſuls were away, they ſhould be taken down and yoked. Quin. Fabius Preſi-dent of the City, aſſembled the Senate, who ſo bitterly and ſharply inveighed againſt the Law and the Law-giver himſelf, that if both the Conſuls themſelves had ſtood about the Tribun of purpoſe I to contradict and croſs his proceedings, there had been no threats nor terrible menaces left for them, to have thundred out. "For he laid ſore unto his charge, that he had lyen in wait, and now "having ſpied the time to fit his purpoſe, had given the venture to aſſail the C. W. and the State.
"And in caſe the Gods in their wrathful diſpleaſure had ſent among them ſuch a Tribun as he the "year before, together with war and peſtilence, there had been no remedy then, but he muſt have "had his way, and then they had been all undone. For when the Conſuls both were dead, and "the City lay bed-rid as it were, in a miſerable confuſion of all things, he would have made laws
"then indeed, to the utter aboliſhing of the Conſuls authority out of the Common-wealth, and
"been a ring-leader to Volſcians and Æquians both, for to have aſſaulted the City. For what "might not he have lawfully done by vertue of his place? If the Conſuls had either proudly or K
"cruelly proceeded againſt any one Citizen, he might have entred an Action againſt them, and "convented them forſooth before thoſe very Judges, of whom peradventure ſome one had been
"by them hardly dealt withal. This would have been the courſe and end of it. And he that thus
"did, ſhould not cauſe the Conſuls authority and rule, but the Tribuns power to become odious
"and intollerable: which having been of late well quieted and reconciled unto the Nobles, began
"now afreſh to come unto the old biace, and to be troubleſome again. Neither intreated he him "not to go on ſtill as he had begun. But ye my Maſters (quoth Fabius) that are the reſt of the "Tribuns, we would requeſt you to conſider well this one point eſpecially: That this power you "have, was brought in for the ſuccour and relief of every particular perſon, and not to the general
"prejudice and undoing of all. Again, that ye are created Tribuns of the Commons, not enemies L "of the Nobles. A heavy and lamentable caſe it is to us, odious and hateful unto you, and will "breed you much ill will and diſpleaſure, in caſe the C. W. now forlorn, ſhould thus be invaded
"and aſſailed. Ye ſhall loſe nothing of your own right, I aſſure you, nay, you ſhall avoid much
"miſlike and hatred of men, in caſe ye be in hand and deal with your brother Tribun, to put off
"this matter and defer it wholly until the Conſuls coming. Why, the very Æquians and Volſci-
"themſelves the laſt year, when both our Conſuls were dead of the plague preſſed not hardly up"on us, to proſecute any proud and cruel war againſt us. So the Tribuns communed and perſwaded with Terentillus: and this his commenced ſuit or action being adjourned in outward ſhew, but in very truth let fall quite and diſanulled, the Conſuls forthwith were ſent for home. Lucretius returned enriched with a right great booty, but with far greater honor and renown. Who at M his very firſt coming wan himſelf more glory, by laying abroad in Mars field all the prizes, that every man for three dayes ſpace might know his own and have it away. All the reſt, that had no owners to come forth and make claim, was ſold in port-ſale. By all mens conſent, the Conſul was thought worthy of triumph: howbeit that matter was put off, by reaſon that the Tribun had not yet done with his law: which was the thing that the Conſul thought meet ſhould be firſt regarded. The matter was debated and treated for certain dayes, both in the Senate and alſo before the people. At laſt the Tribun yeelded to the Majeſty of the Conſul, and gave it over. Then was due honor rendred both to the General and alſo to the army accordingly. He triumphed over the Volſcians and Æquians: and in his triumph his own legions followed after him. To the other Conſul granted it was that he ſhould in a kind of triumph called Ovatio, ride into the City, but N without his ſouldiers. The year next enſuing, the Law Terentilla was by the whole Colledge or fellowſhip of the Tribuns revived and propounded again: which put the new Conſuls P. Volum-nius and Ser. Sulpitius to ſome trouble. And in the ſame year the skie ſeemed to be on a light fire, and there was an exceeding earthquake. And that which the year afore was no credit given unto, was now for truth believed, to wit, That a Cow did ſpeak. Among other ſtrange wonders it rained fleſh: during which ſhowre, a huge number of fowls flew among, and were reported to have ſnatcht it and carried it away as it was in falling. But that which fell down and eſcaped their tallons, lay ſcattered here and there for certain dayes in ſuch ſort, as the ſent changed not at all, nor the fleſh one jot taken and corrupted. Then the books (of Sibylla) were peruſed by the Duumvirs deputed over matters of Religion: who fore-told of ſome dangers to enſue by a Company O of ſtrangers, and gave warning to look leſt haply ſome aſſault ſhould be made upon the higheſt places of the City, and thereof a ſlaughter and maſſacre enſue. Amongſt the reſt, warning was given to abſtain from civil diſcord and mutinies: which the Tribuns found fault with, as a deviſed matter to hinder the law. Whereupon great debate and contention was like preſently to grow.
But behold (that the revolution and courſe of troubles might turn about every year to the ſame point,) The Herniks bring news that the Volſcians had Æquians for all their wings were well clipped,

The Oration of Q. Fabius againſt the Tribun of the Commons.

Prodigious ſights.

A ped, and their forces greatly decayed, began togather and levy new armies: Item, That in Antium lay the whole weight and importance of the affairs, and all depended upon it: That the Antiat coloners held their councels and had their meetings in open ſhow, at Ecetra, but Antium was the principal ſeat of the war, and from thence came all preparations and forces whatſoever. As ſoon as theſe news were reported in the Senate, order was given to muſter ſouldiers: and that the Conſuls ſhould part between them the adminiſtration and managing of his war, ſo as the one ſhould have the charge againſt the Volſcians, and the other againſt the Æquians. But the Tribuns rung it out openly in the common Hall before the people, "That this was but a made mat"ter of the Volſcian war, and a tale deviſed by the Herniks, who were ſuborned and framed to B "play their parts in the Pageant, and to ſerve the turn of the Nobles. And that now verily the "freedome of the people of Rome was not oppreſſed or endangered by plain prowes & vertue,
"but finely ſhifted off and dallied cunningly withal, by ſlye and crafty inventions. And for aſmuch
"as now it was an unlikely thing and incredible, that the Volſcians and Æquians after ſo great
"ſlaughter committed upon them, whereby they were all in a manner killed up, ſhould be able of "themſelves to wage war, there were, forſooth, new enemies ſought out: A faithful Colony near
"adjoyning, was now ſlandred and defamed: war war pretended for a ſhew againſt the guiltleſs
"and innocent Antiats, but in truth, intended with the very Commons of Rome, whom they "meant to drive out of the City in all haſte headlong, ſurcharged with heavy armor, and ſo (by "turning out their poor fellow citizens into baniſhment, and ſending them away, God knows C "whither) to be avenged at length of the Tribuns. And thus the Law (ſay the Tribuns, for they
"muſt think their drift is to this end and to none other) ſhould be troden under foot, unleſs
"whiles all is entire and whole, and nothing done, whiles they remain at home in their houſes,
"whiles they be in their gowns, they take heed and look well about them, that they be not diſ-
"poſſeſſed of the City, and take the yoke of ſervitude upon their necks: aſſuring them that if "their hearts only ſerved, they ſhould want for no help: and that all the Tribuns agreed and were
"of one mind, that there was no cauſe of fear abroad, no force in war to trouble them: laſt of all, "that the very providence of the Gods the year before aſſured them, that their liberty might with "ſafety be defended. Theſe and ſuch like Remonſtrances gave the Tribuns out. On the other part, the Conſuls cauſing their chairs of eſtate to be ſet, even in their ſight and preſence, began to D muſter. Thither ran the Tribuns down in all haſt, and drew the whole aſſembly of people with them. And, to make as it were a proof and tryal, ſome few by name were called, and ſtraightways began a ſtir. For whomſoever the Sergeant by the Conſul his commandment arreſted, the Tribuns charged again that he ſhould be let go. And neither ſide contained within the limits and compaſs of their commiſſion and rightful authority: but preſumed of their might and ſtrong hand, to attain unto their defired purpoſe. For even as the Tribuns had demeaned themſelves in forbidding the muſter, ſemblably the Senators beſtirred themſelves to ſtop the law for going forward: which was propounded every Court day, and when the people might aſſemble. And evermore the brawl began, when the Tribuns commanded the people to avoid the Hall, for that the Patritij would not endure thus to be ſet out and excluded. Few or none of the ancients would E be preſent at theſe troubleſome ſtirs, being ſuch as were not to be managed and ordered by ſage Councel, but wholly left to the raſhneſs and boldneſs of young and green heads. The Conſuls alſo were much abſent, and forbare to be in place, for fear leſt in ſuch a confuſed hurliburly their Ma-jeſty and dignity, might have been ſubject to ſome ſhameful contumely and diſgrace. But there was among them one Ceſo Quintius, a luſty young Gentleman and a ſtout, in regard both of his noble parentage, as alſo of the goodly tall perſonage and ſtrength of his body. Beſides theſe good parts that God had beſtowed upon him, he had won himſelf many ornaments by ſundry exploits atchieved in wars: He had withal an eloquent ſpeech and a good grace at the bar, ſo as, in one word, throughout the whole City, there was not one thought to be more ready in tounge, or taller of his hands. This Ceſo ſtanding in the midſt of the Nobles, higher to be ſeen above all the F reſt, as one that in his ſpeech and ſtrength, carried afore him the countenance and authority of all Dictators and Conſuls, was the only man that bare off the brunts of Tribuns, and ſtorms of the common people. Many a time were the Tribuns driven out of common Hall, the Commonalty defeated and put to flight by the conduct of this Captain. Whoſoever came within his reach, was ſure to go away throughly beaten, and clean ſtripped. So as it evidenly appeared, if this courſe might have been allowed, the law had ſoon been checked and overthrown. Now when all the other Tribuns beſides were herewith diſmayed and welnear daunted, Aulus Virginius alone, being one of their fellowſhip, was ſo bold, as to enter an action againſt Ceſo, of a capital crime.
By which deed of his, he rather fired, than feared his hot and furious nature. For ſo much the more eagerly withſtood he the Law, courſed and troubled the Commons, and perſecuted the Tri-G buns as it were with open war. The plaintiffe in the mean time, ſuffered the defendant to run on ſtill, and with many outrages to kindle more coals of ill will, and hatred upon his own head, and to miniſter further matter of crimes to be charged with. And all the while he ceaſed not to prefer the Law aforeſaid, not ſo much of any hope to bring it to paſs, as to provoke and ſet on work the giddy head and humorous vein of Ceſo. Whereby it came to paſs, that many follies oftentimes were committed both in word and deed, by the yonger ſort: and evermore the blame light upon poor Ceſo: he alone was alwayes charged, becauſe he had been once ſuſpected. But nevertheleſs

hee gainsayed and crossed the Law. And Aulus Virginius ever and anon would entertain the Commons with these and such like speeches. "See ye not already (quoth he) O Quirites, that ye may "not now have Caso your Citizen, and the law which you desire both together. But what mean "I to speak of your Law? It is your liberty that he infringeth and setteth himself against, and in "pride and arrogancy he exceedeth all the Tarquins that ever were. But wait, ye were best, until "he be made a Consul or Dictator, whom ye see already, being but a private person, to bear him-"self so greatly of his strength and boldness, as to Lord it over you, and rule as a King. Many soothed the Tribune and said the like, adding moreover, how they had been well knocked and beaten at his hands: and were forward enough of themselves to set the Tribune on, to proceed in his commenced action against him. H I

Now was the law day of judicial trial come: and it seemed abroad, that all men verily thought that the very foundation of their liberty consisted in the condemnation of Caso. In conclusion, driven he was with much indignity and shame, to creep and crouch unto every man, submissively craving their favor one after another. There seconded him his kinsfolk and neerest friends, the best men of the City, Titus Quintius Capitolinus, who had been thrice Consul, spake in his behalf: and after he had reckoned up many honors and dignities, both of his own, and also of his family, affirmed, that neither in the house and race of Quintii, nor yet throughout the City of Rome, was ever seen so great towardness, no such shew and likelihood of ripe and perfect vertue and proweſs as in Caso: saying, that he had been first his souldier, and served under him, and that with his own eys he had seen him oftentimes fight valiantly hand to hand with his enemies in the field. Again K Sp. Fusius made this good report of him, That upon a time, when himself was in great distress and extremity, Caso was sent unto him from Quintius Capitolinus, to help at a pinch: and that there was no one man, by whose good service, as he thought, the Weal-publick at that time was more relieved and restored, then by his. L. Lucretius the Consul last year before, glittering in his bright glory so fresh and new, joined with the rest, avowing Caso partaker with him in his praise-worthy acts: he recounted his brave combats, rehearsed his noble exploits, both in his rodes and voiages, and also in the pight field: advising & counselling them, that in any hand they would retain him stil for to be a Citizen of their own City, rather then of any other, this excellent young gentleman, furnished with all good gifts of nature and fortune, like to prove a singular stay of the publick affairs, into what City and State soever he should come. As for that heat and hastiness (quoth he) L which was in him misliked and offensive, age and time would dayly diminish, and bereave him of it: grave and sage counsel, which now was wanting, would come on apace every day more then other. Seeing therfore his faults waxed old and faded, his vertues now were in their growth, flourished, and grew ripe unto perfection; they should permit so brave, so rare a person, to live stil among them, and be a good old man in this their City. His father among the rest, L. Quintius, surnamed Cincinnatus, went another way to work: who not by iterating stil his praises, for fear of heaping more matter of envy and repine, but craving pardon for his wildness and youthful demeanor; besought them for his sake at least wise, to give the son as a present to his father, who neither in word nor deed had ever offended any person. Some took no heed and gave a deaf ear to his prayers, either for modesty and reverence, or for fear. Others complaining how they and M theirs had been beaten and hardly used at his hands, bewraied and shewed plainly by their shrewd and churlish answers what their judgment was. Besides, the common mislike and malice conceived against the defendant, there was one perilous matter and crime above all, that touched him very neer. And that was this: M. Volscius Fictor, who certain years before had been Tribune of the Commons, came in against him as a witness, and deposed, how that not long after the plague was in the City, he hapned upon a company of youths as they made a riot and robbery in the Suburra: where there arose a brawl and fray, in which his elder brother, a man wel in years, and not throughly recovered of his sickness, was with a buffet with Caso his fist fell'd to the ground, and lay there for dead: so as he was fain to be had home between mens arms; and as he deemed, of that blow he died: yet might not he as hainous as the fact was, bring his action and prosecute N the law, for fear of the Consuls of these last years. As Volscius thus informed, the whole court was moved therewith, in so much that Caso escaped hardly, from being murdered, in that rage and fury of the people. Then Virginius commanded to lay hold on the man, and to have him away to prison. The Patritii again by force resisted force. T. Quintius cried out, That he who was under arrest for to make his appearance, and answer at a day for his life, and who shortly should come to his trial and be judged, ought not before sentence of condemnation, and before he had pleaded for himself, thus violently be misused. The Tribune replied again, That his meaning was not to punish him before he were condemned: howbeit, by his leave he would be so bold as keep him fast in prison, to be forth-coming at the law day; that he who had killed a man, might suffer therefore according as the people of Rome should award. Then were the Tribunes called unto for their help, who by the means of an indifferent decree then made, shewed their lawful favours with speed. By vertue whereof they forbad expresly, that he should not be imprisoned, but pronounced that it was their wil and pleasure, that the defendant should personally appear, and a piece of money be promised unto the people, in case that he made default and failed of his appearance. Much question there was what sum of money should be thought reasonable to be promised. And the matter was put over to the Senate to be decided: and whilst the Senators sate O there-

A thereupon, the defendant was kept ſtill in ward within the common Hall. At length they thought good and ſet it down, that he ſhould put in ſureties. And they bound each ſurety in 3000 * Aſſes. But how many of theſe ſhould put in bond, was left to the will and diſcretion of the Tribuns, who aſſigned and determined ten and no more. With ſo many ſureties the plaintiff bound the defendant perſonally and peremptorily to appear at his day. This man was the firſt Roman that went under ſpecial bail, and put in good pledges to make his publick anſwer. Thus being enlarged out of the common Hall and diſmiſſed, the next night following, unawares to the Conſul, he departed to the Tuſcans into exile. When the day of this judgement was come, and that it was alledged for his excuſe, That he was out of the town, and gone into baniſhment: yet nevertheleſs

B Virginius aſſembled the people about this matter: but his fellow Tribunes being called unto for their help, diſmiſſed the Court and licenſed every man to depart. But the foreſaid money was cruelly exacted at his fathers hands, ſo that he was driven to ſell up all that ever he had, and for a long time to live apart as a perſon confined, on the other ſide of Tyber, in a poor blind cottage out of the way. This proceſs of judgement, and the preferring of the law aboveſaid together, buſied the City and kept it occupied. Quiet they were for any wars abroad. At what time the Tribunes like Conquerers, ſeeing the Nobles appalled at the baniſhment of Caſo, ſuppoſed now their law was in manner fully eſtabliſhed and enacted. And for as much as the more ancient Senators had diſpoſſeſſed themſelves, as it were, of the Common-weal, and medled not for their own parts with the State: the younger ſort, and ſuch eſpecially as were of Caſo his crue and ac-

C quaintance, were kindled the more againſt the Commons, and abated not their courage: marry, this good thereby was done upon them, that in ſome meaſure they tempered and ruled their furious affections and violent outrage. The firſt time after the exile of Caſo, that the law began again to be propoſed, they being well appointed and banded together, backed alſo with a mighty company of their friends and favorites, ſet upon the Tribunes: taking the occaſion when they charged them to depart out of the hall, in ſuch manner, that no one of them above his fellows was ſingular, or carried home with him any ſpecial praiſe or blame more then another: but the Commons complained that for one Caſo, there were now ſtart up a thouſand. All the days between, wherein the Tribunes medled not with their law, none more quiet, none more peaceable then they themſelves. Courteouſly they would ſalute and ſpeak unto the Commons, at all other times

D they would invite them home to their houſes and make them good cheer, aſſiſt them and be preſent with them in the common Hall, ſuffer the Tribunes themſelves without any interruption or impeachment to keep their courts and hold their aſſemblies whatſoever: ſhewing themſelves at no time to any of them either publickly or privately fierce and cruel, but only when they went in hand with the law, for otherwiſe the young Gentlemen were popular enough. And not only in other cauſes made the Tribunes good diſpatch, and went quietly through all their buſineſſes: but alſo the ſame men were choſen again for the next year following without any foul and croſs word: ſo far were they from being offered any forcible violence: and thus by ſoft handling and gentle dealing, they had now by little and little won the Commons, and made them as it were come to hand. And ſo by theſe fine fetches and devices, for one whole year the law was ſhifted off, and

E prettily avoided. The City being now in more quiet ſtate, C. Claudius the ſon of Appius and P. Valerius Poplicola, came to be Conſuls. And no news this new year: for the ſame care ſtill, either about preferring or admitting the law, held the City occupied. As much as the puny Nobles inſinuated themſelves more into the favour and familiarity of the Commons: ſo much more eagerly again on the other ſide, did the Tribunes labour and endeavor with complaints and ſlanders, to bring them into ſuſpition and jealouſie with the Commons; Saying, that there was a conſpiracy intended and contrived: that Caſo was in Rome: that there were plots laid to murder the Tribuns, and to maſſacre the Commons: that they were ſet on work by ſome great ones, even the Ancients of the Nobles, utterly to aboliſh the Tribunes anthority out of the C. W. and to bring and reduce the City to the ſame paſs again, as it had been before the taking and keeping hold in the F Mount Sacer. Beſides all this, war was feared from the Volſcians and Æquians (ſo ordinary it was, and ſo duly once every year it came about:) yea and with all, another miſchief newly ſprung, and unlooked for.

A rabble of baniſhed perſons, Outlaws and Bondſlaves, to the number of 4500 having to their Captain one Ap. Herdonius a Sabin, ſurpriſed in the night the Capitoll and Caſtle, and were maſters thereof. Who immediately killed in the caſtle as many as would not be of their conſpiracie & take armes with them. The reſt, amid this hurliburly ran headlong down into the Market place for fear. The alarmy was given on all hands: and no cry heard but Arme, Arme, the enemies are in town. The Conſuls were afraid to put the Commons in arms, and they doubted alſo to let them be unarmed, not knowing what ſudden occurrent this ſhould be, that thus had entred and poſſeſ-

G ſed the city: whether it were forraign or domeſtical, ariſing from the malice and hatred of the people, or from the treachery and falſhood of their ſervants; Yet they deviſed to appeaſe the uproar: and as they were buſie to repreſs it, the more other-while they ſtirred up new: for the frighted and amaſed multitude, could not be ordered by any commandment. Howbeit at length they reſolved to ſuffer them to take arms, and not all in general, but only (for that they knew not what their enemies were) to have a ſufficient and truſty guard about them, ready at all aſſayes and dangers whatſoever. In this careful ſuſpence and doubt, who were their enemies, and what their their number was, they passed the rest of the night, disposing strong watch and ward in all meet and convenient places of the City. But the day light disclosed the war and the Captain thereof. Appius Herdonius from out of the Capitol proclaimed freedom to all bondmen that would come and follow him: "taking upon him forsooth to defend the cause of most miserable caitifs: "namely, to restore home again unto their native country all such exiled persons, as had been "wrongfully expelled, and also to take away the heavy yoke of slavery and bondage. Which "thing he could wish it might be effected and brought about with the good will and helping "hand of the people of Rome. But in case there were no hope & comfort there, then he would assay the Volscians and Æquians, yea, and procure what means he could, by all hard courses and "extremities whatsoever. Now the Nobles and Coss. began to see more into the matter: and besides those dangers that were in view, and presently threatned, they feared some practise from the Veientians or the Sabins: and lest, there being already so many enemies in the City, the legions and Tuscans should combine together, and come upon them. Over and besides, lest their old enemies and perpetual, the Volscians and Æquians should now at once, not, as aforetime, invade their borders and drive booties, but give an attempt upon the very City, which was already in some part, taken and possessed by enemies. Many and sundry were their fears. But of all other the dread and jealousy of their own bondslaves presented unto them most imminent and present danger: for fear, lest every man harboured his enemy at home in his own house, whom neither he could trust securely, nor yet mistrusts without some jeopardy: fearing lest being once discredited, he might prove the more malicious and bent to do a mischief. And to such streights they were driven, that with all their concord and agreement, they hardly were able to remedy the matter, and to stop the extremity. So greatly the future troubles like to ensue, exceeded those that presently appeared and were in sight, that no man feared either Tribuns and Commons. That mild and gentle kind of malady, in comparison of others, and rising alwayes by occasion of rest from all other, seemed then by reason of a forrein terror, stilled clean and brought asleep. And yet see, that was the only thing in a manner that lay hardest upon them, ready to bear down to the ground their state, which now began already to shrink and reel. For so furiously and madly were the Tribuns bent, that they stifly would stand to it, and bear men in hand, That it was no war, but a vain illusion and colour of war, and no other, that had seised on the Capitol; for nothing else but to withdraw the minds of the Commons from intending and following their Law: and that a sort of clients, followers, and favorits of the Nobility and Gentry were gathered together, who if they might once perceive that the Law were passed, and that all the stir they had made, took no effect, would slip away soon and be gone, in more silence I wis, than they thither came. Whereupon they called the people away from their armor and weapons, and summoned them to an assembly, to go through with their Law and Enact it now or never. In the mean time the Coss. held a Councel, fearing a greater mischief like to ensue from the Tribuns, than the enemies had wrought in the night season. And when word was brought that arms were laid away, and that the people had abandoned their quarters where they were set in guard, then P. Val. leaving his collegue to keep the Senat together, departed hastily out of the Court & went straight into the Temple to the Tribuns. "What work is here my Masters (quoth he) you that are Tribuns? "Are ye about to overthrow the State indeed, under the conduct of Ap. Herdonius? and who was "not able to solli.it and do any thing with your bondslaves and servants, was his hap so good as to "corrupt and inveigle your selves? Is this your pleasure and to your good liking, whiles the enemy "is over our heads, to have our armor laid aside, and laws preferred? Then turning his speech to "the whole multitude: If ye take no regard nor care (O Quirites) of the City, if ye pass not for your "selves yet have some reverence, and stand in fear of the Gods of your native countrey, which by "your enemies are now taken Prisoners and captivate: Iup. Opt. Max. that most bountiful and Al-"mighty God, Queen Juno and Minerva, with all the rest of Gods, Goddesses (and heavenly "wights) are besieged: Outlaws and bondslaves are encamped about your Tutelar Gods, and "have in possession the Protectors and Patrons of your City. Is this, think ye, the form of a wise "and well governed City? is it in good case indeed and as it ought to be? So many enemies not "only within the walls, but also aloft upon the cliff within the Castle, overlooking and comman-"ding both Hall and Court: and all the while, the people assemble in the Hall, Senators sit in "Court like as when we enjoyed peace and were at rest: the Senator he delivereth his opinion at "the Councel boord: the citizens of Rome besides, are busy in their scrutinies and giving their "voyces. And had it not been more meet and decent that both Nobility and Commonalty, Con-"suls and Tribuns. God and Man, all armed together, should set to their helping hand, should "run up into the Capitol to deliver, save, and set in quiet that most stately and sacred house of Jup. "Opt. Max.? O Father Romulus, vouchsafe, I beseech thee, that mind and that courage unto thy "successors and posterity, whereby sometime thou didst recover and win again this fortress from "these same Sabins, betrayed and lost by corruption, and for a sum of gold: command them to en-"ter even that way, which thou first ledst, and thy valorous army followed after. Lo, I the Con-"sul, so far forth as a mortal man possibly may, will follow thee an immortal God, and thy foot-"steps. The conclusion of his speech was this, That as he put himself in arms, so all the Romans shall do the like. And in case any man went about to hinder this, he would without regard of Consuls rule and dignity, or Tribuns authority & might, pass for no sacred or inviolable laws: but what

A or whereſoever he were, in Capitol, in market place, all as one, take him for an enemy, and deal accordingly. Let the Tribuns (for aſmuch as they forbad to take arms againſt Ap. Herdonius) command hardly, and ſpare not, to arm againſt P. Valerius the Conſul: It ſhould be well ſeen that he would dare and do that by the Tribuns, which the firſt of his houſe and name ſometime had done by the KK. A great broil was toward, and no other like, but that they would have gone together by the ears, and that the mutiny of the Romans, would have been a goodly ſpectacle to the enemies for to behold. But all this while, neither could the law be preferred, nor the Conſul go up into the Capitol. The night at length ſtayed theſe brauls begun, and huſht all. The Tribuns fearing the armed forces of the Conſuls, yeelded to the darkneſs of the night, and gave over. Now
B when the principal Authors of the diſcord were once gone out of the way, The Nobles went about to the Commons, intruding themſelves into their companies as they were met in knots together: where they would enter into talk and diſcourſe with them, according to the preſent occaſions and the time, admoniſhing them to take heed into what danger they brought the State. "For aſmuch as now (quoth they) it is not a matter of debate between the Senators and Com-"mons: but both Senators and Commoners, the Caſtle and ſtrongeſt hold of the City, the Tem-"ples of the Gods their houſes both publick and private, were ready to be yeelded unto the ene-"mies. Whiles theſe things were a practiſing in the common place, for to appeaſe the diſſention: the Conſuls for fear, leſt the Sabins or the Veientians, enemies both, ſhould ſtir and riſe, were gone to the gates, and all about the walls. The ſame night came tidings alſo to Tuſculum of the C taking of the Caſtle, the ſurpriſing of the Capitol, and likewiſe of the troubleſome State wherein the City ſtood. At that time was L. Mamilius, Dictator of Tuſculum: he forthwith called a Senate together, brought in the Meſſengers of the foretaid news, and thought it very expedient and "needful not to wait until there came Embaſſadors from Rome to crave their aid: for that the "preſent peril it ſelf alone, the urgent neceſſity, their ſocial Gods, and the faithful bond of league, "required no leſs at their hands, than to ſend ſuccour: adding moreover, that the Gods would "never give them the like occaſion and opportunity again, to gratify the Romans; to bind and "oblige unto them by a ſound benefit and pleaſure done, ſo mighty a City, and ſo neer a neigh-"bour. Whereupon it was decreed, to reſcue them with all ſpeed. The able men of ſervice were taken up and enrolled, munition and armor given them in their hands: who advancing toward D Rome by break of day, ſeemed a far off to be enemies, and were taken for the Æquians or Volſcians. But afterwards, when this fooliſh fear was overblown, they were received into the City: and marched down in order of battell to the market place. Where, at the very ſame time Pub. Valerius having left his fellow Conſul to guard and fortify the gates, was ſetting his men in array. The authority of the man had prevailed with the people, for he promiſed and aſſured them, that if the Capitol were once recovered, and the City ſet in quiet, if they would ſuffer him to be informed what fraudulent and ſecret miſchief was underhand practiſed by the Tribuns under colour of this Law, he would in remembrance of his anceſtors, and of his * ſurname (which in re- * Poplicola.
E gard of the affectionate love unto the people, by a ſpecial care, as it were by inheritance from his forefathers, was recommended unto him) not hinder and trouble the meetings and aſſemblies of the Commons, nor croſs and thwart their proceedings. They followed him therefore as their Captain, gain-ſay the Tribuns what they could (for all would not ſerve) advanced forward, and marched up againſt the riſing of the Capitol Hill. The Tuſculan Legion ſtuck cloſe unto them, and followed after. Citizens and Aſſociats both did their beſt, and ſtrove who ſhould regain the Capitol firſt, and have the honor of that day. Each Captain exhorted and encouraged his men. Then began the enemies to fear, and wiſt not well what to truſt unto, but only the ſcituation of the place. The Romans and their allies ſeeing their fear, came forward and advanced their Standards againſt them. Now by this time were they broken into the porch of the Temple. Where P. Valerius the Conſul ſlain.
F P. Valerius fighting manfully among the formoſt in the vanguard, was ſlain. P. Volumnius a Conſular man, ſaw him when he fell: who gave his men in charge to cover his body, and ſtept himſelf into the Conſuls room, and fought in his ſtead. The ſouldiers for heat and eagerneſs of fight, took no regard, and came to no knowledge of this ſo great miſchance, but got the victory, ere they knew that they fought without their Captain. Many of the outlaws were there ſlain, and polluted the Temple with their bloud; Many taken alive Priſoners, and Herdonius himſelf was ſlain outright. So the Capitol was again recovered. The captives, as they were either bond or free, were executed every one according to their condition and place. The Tuſculans had thanks given them. The Capitol was cleanſed, purged, and hallowed anew. The Commons, as it is reported, caſt * Quadrants or mites into the Conſul his houſe, that he might with greater pomp of G funerals be brought to the ground. * Quadrans, a piece of braſs coin, the fourth part of As, and is aſmuch as a cue and c.

When all was appeaſed and in quiet, the Tribuns were earneſt with the Nobles to perform the promiſe of P. Valerius: they were inſtant alſo with Claudius, to abſoil the ſoul, and keep it from blame of his fellow Conſul late deceaſed: and to permit the law to be ſet on foot, and go forward. The Conſul flatly denied to ſuffer them to meddle with the law, before he had ſubſtituted a fellow in his place. And theſe contentions held unto the time of the grand Election for the ſubſtituting of a new Conſul. And in the month December, after much ſuit, and labouring of the Nobles, was L. Quintius Cincinnatus, the father of Caſo, created Conſul, and preſently to enter into his office. The Commons herewith were much troubled and ſtrucken dead, now that they

they were to have an angry Conſul, and mighty withal: conſidering the favour of the Nobles wherein he ſtood, and his own vertue & proweſs beſides: by reaſon alſo of his three ſons, of whom there was not one, that for hautineſs of mind came behind Caſo, and for wiſdom, diſcretion, and moderation (when time and occaſion ſerved) went far beyond him. Who being once entred into his office, in all his publick ſpeeches and orations, continually ceaſed not as well to bridle, reſtrain and keep in the Commonalty, as alſo to chaſtiſe ſharply the Senate; through the remiſneſs of which degree, & want of courage, it was come to paſs, that the Tribuns became now to continue ſtill in office, and not as in the Common-wealth of the people of Rome, but as in ſome unruly and diſordered houſe, with their laviſh tongue raigned as it were, and ruled the roſt: ſaying, "That to-"gether with his ſon Caſo all vertue and conſtancy, all commendable qualities that graced young "Gentlemen both in war and peace, were chaſed and utterly baniſhed out of the City of Rome. "In lieu whereof, bablers, mutinous perſons, and ſowers of ſedition and diſſention, are become "Tribuns the ſecond, yea, and the third time: who by indirect courſes & lewd practiſes live looſe-"ly in the City, like Princes and Kings. That ſame Aulus Virginius there, (quoth he) hath he de-"ſerved leſs puniſhment than Ap. Herdonius, becauſe he was not in the Capitol with the rabble of "other Rebels? Nay, much more a good deal, if a man will weigh the matter aright and truely. "Herdonius, (if there were nothing elſe) yet by profeſſing himſelf to be an enemy, advertiſed you, "and gave you warning in a manner to arm your ſelves. But he, by bearing you down ſo confi-"dently, that there was no war, what did he elſe but diſarm you, and as it were, take your weapons "from you, and offer you naked to the devotion and mercy of your bondmen and outlaws? And "have ye (under correction be it ſpoken, and ſaving the reverence and honor of C. Claudius here, "and P. Valerius that dead is) advanced your enſigns up the Capitol Hill, before you had rid the "market place and common Hall of theſe enemies? It is a ſhame (before God and man I ſpeak it) "when our enemies were in the Caſtle and Capitol, when the Captain and Ringleader of outlaws "and ſlaves, abode and lodged within the Chappels and Sanctuaries of Jup. Opt. Max. to the pro-"phanation and polluting of all, that they at Tuſculum ſhould take them to their weapons before "us of Rome, and that it ſhould be doubted, whether L. Mamilius the Tuſculan General, or P. V. I. "and C. Claudius, the Roman Conſuls, ſhould ſave the Fortreſs of Rome: and that we, who hereto-"fore would not ſuffer the Latines in their own defence, when they had their enemies in their "borders, ſomuch as once to take weapon in hand, ſhould now our ſelves have been ſurpriſed and "deſtroyed, had not they, the very ſame Latins of their own accord, put themſelves into armor for "our ſakes. Is this your ſuccouring and helping the Commons, (O ye Tribuns) for to expoſe and "caſt them unarmed before the enemy, to have their throats cut? I wis, if the meaneſt or baſeſt per-"ſon of your commonalty, which you have diſmembred from the whole body of the people be-"ſides, and made it, as it were the native country of your own, and a Common-wealth peculiar "only to your ſelves; If any one of them I ſay, ſhould bring you word, that his houſe were beſet "round about, with a company of ſervants and ſlaves in armor, you would think it meet that he "were aided and ſuccoured: And when Iup. Opt. Max. was beſieged with a power of armed "outlaws and bondſlaves, was he not worthy of mans help? And yet theſe men would be coun-"ted and held for Sacroſancti, i. Sacred and inviolable, with whom the very Gods themſelves are "not ſacred and inviolate. And notwithſtanding, that ye are thus overcharged and ſtayned with "ſins both againſt God and Man, ye go up and down, and ſay, That this year you will get your "law to paſs, and make it ſure. In truth, if ye preſer it again, then I muſt needs ſay the Common-"weal is ill beſtead, and had a ſhrewd turn that day whereon I was created Conſul, yea, and worſe "a good deal than at what time P. Valerius the Conſul was ſlain. But now firſt and formoſt "(quoth he) O Quirites, my colleague and I both, are minded to lead forth our legions immedi-"ately againſt the Volſcians and the Æquians: how the Divine Providence of God hath appoint-"ed it, I know not, but ſurely we find the Gods more gracious and favorable unto us in our wars "ordinarily, than in time of peace. And in what danger we had ſtood of thoſe nations, in caſe "they had known that the Capitol was in the hands and poſſeſſion of outlaws, better it is to gueſs "by that which is paſt, than to try indeed by preſent experience. The Conſul his Oration moved "and galled the Commons. The Nobles took heart, and were in a good belief, that the world was "well mended, and the ſtate better reformed. The other Coſ. more hearty to follow than to lead, and who was well content that his fellow had broken the ice before, and taken in hand to deal firſt in ſo weighty a matter, willingly challenged unto himſelf the charge to perform the part and office of a Conſul, in the execution and accompliſhment of thoſe deſignments. But then the Tribuns made a game therat, and ſetting light at the Conſul his words, inferred again and demanded, how the Conſuls would lead out an army, and no man ſuffer them to muſter ſouldiers. Marry (quoth Quintius) we need no muſtering at all: for, at what time as P. Valerius armed the Commons to re-cover again the Capitol, they were all ſworn unto him, and took their oath in this form, To aſſemble together at the Conſul his commandement, and not depart from their colours without his leave and licence. We will and charge you all therefore, that have taken this oath to preſent your ſelves to morrow, with your armour, at the lake of * Regillus without fail. Then the Tribuns began to cavil and wrangle, and would needs have the people diſcharged in their conſcience of that oath: alledg-ing how when they took that military Sacrament, Quintius was but a privat perſon. There was not as yet that neglect & contempt of the Gods entred into the world, which now reigneth every where and is ſo riſe: neither did men interpret their oaths, and conſtrue laws, to ſerve their own purpoſe,

* Lago de Praſſo de o de S. Severa.

A purpose, but rather attempered and framed their lives and demeanour thereunto. The Tribunes therefore, seeing no hope to hinder the thing, began themselves to treat about setting forward the army: and the rather, because there ran a rumour abroad, that the Augurs were commanded to attend at the lake Regillus: and that by them a place should be hallowed and consecrate there, wherein the Consuls might duly commune and confer with the people, concerning all matters, according to the flight of birds: to the end that whatsoever at Rome had passed under a law, extorted by the violent force of the Tribunes; the same might there in a lawfull assembly and generall Session, be abrogated & made void by the suffrages of the souldiers, who without doubt would accord to that, which should stand with the Consuls pleasure. For by reason that there was no B appeale in force without the city, above one mile, the Tribunes themselves also, if they came thither, should be subject as well as the multitude besides of the people, to the commandment of the Consuls. These matters scared them indeed and put them in a bodily fear, but the greatest thing above all the rest that disquieted their hearts was this, that Quintius oftentimes had given out and said, that he would not call an assembly of the people for the election of Cos. for that the city was grown so far out of frame and temper, that it might not be reformed and cured with ordinary and usuall remedies: but that the Common-wealth had more need of a Dictator, that whosoever went about to trouble the state of the city, might well know that there was an absolute Dictatorship, that checked all appeales. The Senat was assembled at that time in the Capitoll; thither came the Tribunes with their Commons greatly disquieted and troubled. The multitude cried C out and besought one while the Consuls of their favour, another while the LL. of the Senat of their protection; but could not once remove the Consul from his opinion (such a pitch had he taken) before the Tribunes gave their word and faithfull promise, that they would be wholly ruled and ordered by the Senators. Then the Consul propounded the demands and petitions of the Tribunes and Commons, and the Senat enacted these orders and decrees. First, that neither the Tribunes should that year prefer their law: nor the Consuls lead out of the city any army. Item, from thence forth, the Senat deemed it not to stand with the weal publick, that Magistrats should continue still in place from year to year, and that the same persons should be more then once chosen Tribunes. The Consuls for their part, were overruled and ordered by the Senators. But, say and gainsay what the Consuls would, the same Tribunes were chosen anew: and the Nobles also D because they would not be one ace behind hand with the Commons, would needs choose L. Quintius likewise for their Consul again. But all the year through was not the Consul more earnest and vehement in any action and speech whatsoever then in this. Should I marvell my Lords of the Councell (quoth he) that you bear no stroke with the Commonalty, and your authority is so little worth among? Why, you, even your own selves set light thereby: seeing, forsooth, the Commons brake the ordinance of the Senat, touching the continuitie of Magistrates, yea also, because ye would "not seem to yeeld one inch in rashnesse and folly to the multitude, are as ready and willing to "infringe the same: as who would say, this were to have more rule and authority in a city, namely, "to use more levitie, inconstancie, and licentiousnesse. For it is a point of much more lightnes "and vanity, I assure you, for men to disanull the acts and decrees of their own making, then of E "others. Ye that be Senators and Fathers of the C. W. imitate, and spare not, the ignorant, lewd "and inconsiderat multitude: ye that should give good examples to others, sin ye hardly your "selves, and do amiss by the precedent of others; neither then let others by your example do well: "so long as I, for my part, take not after the Tribunes, nor suffer my selfe to be declared Cos. against "an expres act of the Senat. As to you, O Claudius, I would exhort you, that both your self would "restrain the people of Rome of this their licentiousnes, that thus they have not their desire, and "also that you would perswade your self thus much of me, that so far off will I be from thinking "my honour by you impaired, that rather I will take my glory to be increased by the despising and "refusing of a dignitie, and the ill will and envy abated and diminished, that might grow upon the "continuation thereof. Whereupon both the Consuls jointly together made an edict and proclama- F tion, that no man should (by his voice) nominate Quintius, Consul: and if any man did, they would not allow of his election. So there were created Consuls. Q. Fabius Vibulanus the third time, and L. Cornelius Maluginensis.

In this year was held a cessing and numbring of the citizens, but touching the Lustrum, there was some scruple of conscience, because the Capitol had been taken, and the Consul slain. When Q. Fabius and Lucius Cornelius were thus Consuls, suddenly in the very beginning of their year began great troubles: for the Tribunes on the one side, as their guise was, set the Commons a-work: the Latines and Hernicks on the other side, sent word of great wars from the Volscians & Æquians: That the Volscian legions were already at Antium, and the Colonie it self greatly suspected to rebel. Yet hardly could the Tribunes be brought to agree, that preparation should be made G aforehand to prevent this war. But upon these news, the Consuls parted between themselves the charge of all affairs. Fabius was appointed to lead forth an army to Antium: and Cornelius, to abide at Rome for the defence of the city, for fear lest some part of their enemies, as the Æquians manner was, should in running camp make rodes and forge the territories about. The Hernicks and Latines, were by vertue of the league, charged with the finding of certaine soudiers, so as the whole army should consist of 15. parts of confederats and one third of citizens. When, at the day appointed the Allies were come, the Consul pitched down his tents without the gate Capena: from whence when he had taken a generall muster and purged his armie, he marched towards Antium and encamped himſelf not far, either from the town, or the ſtanding camp of his enemies: where H the Volſcians ſeeing no forces yet come unto them from the Æquians, had no heart to fight, but made preparation how they might keep themſelves quiet and ſafe, within their mure and ram-pire. The morrow after, Fabius made not one entire battell of Allies and citizens mingled together, but three battailons ſeverally by themſelves, of three ſundry nations, & ranged them along all about the counterſcarpe and trench of his enemies. Himſelf was in the midſt with the Roman legions, and gave commandment to obſerve heedfully and mark the ſignall: that the Allies alſo ſhould both begin battell and alſo retire, when he ſounded the retreat. In like ſort he placed the horſmen behind the Principia at the back of each battel. Thus in three ſundry parts he aſſailed the camp, and invironed it round about, and charging luſtily hard upon them on every ſide, I he beat the Volſcians down from their rampier, for they were not able to endure his violence. And having gotten over all their trenches and fortifications, he drave the fearfull multitude clean out of their hold, that now were retired to a ſide and corner of the camp. The horſmen might not eaſily get over the trench, and ſtood ſtill of purpoſe to behold the fight, and to mark them when they ſhould flie: but having once gotten them in the open fields, they chaſed them as they ran away on heaps: and by killing them in their fearfull flight, deſerved their part in that victorie. Great was the execution both within the camp, and alſo without the rampires, as they fled; but greater was the pillage, for that the enemies had much ado to carry their armour away with them, and but that they ſhrowded themſelves as they fled in the woods, they had periſhed every man.

During theſe exploits about Antium, the Æquians having ſent before them the talleſt and luſtieſt K young men they had, ſurpriſed the caſtle of Tuſculum, upon a ſudden and at unawares in the night ſeaſon: and with the reſt of their power they were encamped not far from the wals of Tuſculum, intending to intercept and ſtay the army of their enemies. Tidings hereof came in poſt to Rome, and from Rome to the camp before Antium: which troubled the Romans as much as if news had been brought, that the Capitoll was taken. So freſh in remembrance was the late deſert of the Tuſculans: and the like jeopardy ſeeming to challenge and redemand ſemblable aid and ſuccour. Fabius ſetting all other things aſide, cauſed the booty in all haſt to be conveyed out of the camp to Antium: where having left an indifferent guard, he haſteneth apace in order of battel to Tuſculum; by reaſon whereof, the ſouldiers could take nothing with them, but their armour, and ſuch baked or boyled meats as were at hand ready. The Conſul (Cornelius) ſent a con- L voy of victuals unto them from Rome. Thus for certain months continued the war at Tuſculum.
The Conſul (Fabius) with one part of his hoſt aſſailed the camp of the Æquians: for the other part he had let the Tuſculans have, to win again their fortreſſe. Againſt all force it was impregnable, but in the end famine conſtrained the enemies to abandon it. To which extremity being at length driven, they were by the Tuſculans diſarmed and compelled to paſſe naked under the * yoke. Who as they fled homeward with ſhame enough, were overtaken of the Roman Conſul in Algidum, and put to the ſword every one. After this victory, he encamped with the reſt of his army at Columen, for ſo the place is named. The other Conſul like wiſe, ſeeing that there was no danger threatning the wals of Rome, now that the enemy was diſcomfited & repulſed, departed himſelf from the citie. So the Conſuls entring two waies the borders of their enemies, made ſharp war and ſpoiled the Volſcians of the one ſide, and the Æquians on the other. I find in moſt M writers that the Antiates in this year rebelled: and that L. Cornelius the Conſul managed that war and won the town. But for as much as there is no mention made of that matter in any ancient writers, I dare not avouch it for a certaine truth.

* A kind of gallows made with two javelins pitched endlong in the ground, and a third faſtned overthwart to the other.

This war was no ſooner brought to an end, but the domeſticall Tribunes war at home put the Nobles in fear: for the Tribunes cried out that this was cautelous and fraudulent dealing, thus to keep the armies abroad, for nothing els but to diſappoint them for publiſhing the law. Yet never-theleſſe, ſince they had begun it, they would not give over, but go through with it and ſee an end.
Howbeit P. Lucretius, preſident of the city for the time, prevailed thus much with them, That all at any time ſeen openly in the ſtreets, or ſo much as to have ſit up, and mended any whit, but of that diſeaſe which held him many months, he languiſhed and conſumed away to death: nor about that time, wherein the deponent ſuppoſed the deed was done, was Caſo once ſeen at Rome:

it being plainly affirmed and proved by thoſe who ſerved together with him in the wars, that he was ordinarily all the time fighting under his colours as well as they, without any paſport or licence to depart. And to make this good, many there were that of themſelves privatly challenged Volſcius, and offered to traverſe the law and to be tried by any indifferent and competent judges. But when as he durſt not abide the triall and to be judged, all theſe things put together O and ſo conſonant one to the other made men doubt no more of the condemnation of Volſcius then of Caſo, which was grounded upon the bare teſtimony of Volſcius. The Tribunes were only the ſtay; who ſaid plainly they would not ſuffer the Queſtors to hold any ſeſſions or judiciall court, for the trial of the defendant, before they had a ſolemn aſſembly about their law. So were both theſe matters

A matters put off unto the Conſuls coming. Who being entred with triumph into the city, with their victorious armie, & no words made of the law, many thought the Tribunes were clean danted and ſtriken dead. But they (for that the year now was at an end) aſpiring to be Tribunes the fourth time, left all their hot contention for the law; and reſerved themſelves wholly to argue and reaſon at the aſſembly for the Election of new Magiſtrats. And albeit the Conſuls had bent all their might and main againſt the continuity of the Tribunſhip, as earneſtly, as if a law had been propounded, tending to the impairing and abridging of their majeſty, yet got the Tribunes the maſtrie, and had the hand of them in the end. In this year peace was granted upon requeſt and petition, unto the Æquians. And the Seſſing, which the year before began, was now finiſhed.

B And this was counted the tenth general Survey and ſolemn purging of the citie from the foundation thereof. There were numbred in the Cenſe-book of citizens 132419 polles. A glorious and honourable year it was untill the Conſuls, both at home and in war. For they not onely procured peace abroad, but alſo the citie was, if not in perfect concord and unitie, yet in leſſe trouble than at other times. L. Minutius, and L. Nautius, that there were created Conſuls, entred upon the reliques of the two matters begun the former year. And much after one ſort, as the Conſuls croſſed the going forward of the law, ſo the Tribunes hindred the judiciall proceeding againſt Volſcius. But the new Queſtors were men of more power and greater authority. For together with M. Valerius, the ſon of Valerius, and nephew of Voleſus, was T. Quintius Capitolinus created Queſtour, a man that had been thrice Conſul. For almuch therefore, as Caſo, the worthieſt

C gentleman of all other, and the very ornament of the youth of Rome, could not be reſtored again, neither to the houſe of the Quintij, nor the commonweal, he purſued of mere pietie, with juſt & lawfull war, and falſe wittneſs, who would not ſuffer on anythand the innocent perſon to have the liberty to plead in his own defence. And when Virginius, moſt of all the other Tribunes, was earneſt to publiſh the law, the Conſuls had two months reſpit given them to conſider therof, and look into it throughly: to the end, that when they had advertiſed the people what ſecret fraud and inconvenience was hidden and lurked therein, they might afterwards ſuffer them to proceed to a ſcrunitie, and gather voices accordingly. This ſpace between granted, brought the citie into a good and quiet ſtate.

But the Æquians would not abide, that long it ſhould continue ſo; Who having broken the league,

D which the year before was made with the Romans, choſe Gracchus Cluilius for their governor and generall, who was in thoſe daies the greateſt man among the Æquians. Under the conduct of this Gracchus, they enter firſt in warlike manner the country of Lanuvium, and from thence into the territorie of Tuſculum, ſpoiling and ranſacking as they went: and being loaden with preyes and booties, they pitch their tents in * Algidum. Thither repaired from Rome into their camp, Q. Fabius, P. Valerius, and A. Poſthumius as embaſſadours, to complain of wounds received, and to demand amends and ſatisfaction according to covenant. The Generall of the Æquians ſeemed to grant them audience, and willed them to declare what meſſage and commiſſion they had from the Senat of Rome, unto the oake; for that himſelf had ſome other matters to diſpatch the while. Now there grew a mightie great Oake hard by the General his pavilion, ſpreading

E his boughs even over it, and the ſhadow thereof ſerved for a cold ſitting place. Then one of the Embaſſadors, as he went his way, "Let both the ſacred Oake (quoth he) and what divine power ſoever is ſeated in this place, heare and know, that by you firſt the league is broken, who now re-" gard our preſent complaints, and ſhortly aſſiſt our valiant armies, when we ſhall proſecute " and revenge at once the diſloiall breach, both of Gods laws and mans. So ſoon as the Embaſſadors were returned to Rome, the Senat gave direction, that one of the Conſuls ſhould lead forth an armie againſt Gracchus, into Algidum, and the other have in commiſſion, to waſt the borders of the Æquians. The Tribunes, as their manner was, hindred the muſter and peradventure had ſtaied it altogether, but for a new fearfull occurrent that ſuddainly came in the neck of the other. For a mightie power of Sabines were approached well neer to the wals of the citie, robbing, ſpoi-

F ling and deſtroying all a fore them with ſword and fire. The territorie was pitiouſly round about laid deſolat, and the citie therewith ſore terrified. Then the Commons ſtomacks came down, and gently they tooke weapons in hand: and (ſay what the Tribunes would againſt it) two great armies were enrolled. Nautius had the leading of the one againſt the Sabines: and being encamped at Eretum, with rodes and incurſions, and thoſe for the moſt part by night, made ſuch foul work and waſt in The Sabines country, that in compariſon thereof, the lands about Rome, ſeemed as if they had not been once touched. Minutius in his exploits, had neither like good ſucceſſe, nor yet equall courage and valour of heart. For having pitched his tents not far from the enemie, and received no great foile and loſſe at his hands to ſpeak of, yet he kept himſelfe for fear within the camp. Which when the enemies perceived, they grew more bold (as commonly the cowardite of one inceaſeth the courage of another) and aſſailed the camp in the night ſeaſon: but

G ſeeing that plain force little prevailed, the morrow after they raiſed mounts, and caſt trenches round about. But before they had with their countermures and rampires ſtopped up all paſſages, five horſemen being even amongſt the guards of the enemies, brought news to Rome, that the Conſul with his armie was beſieged. Nothing could there have hapned ſo little thought of, and unlooked for: whereupon there was ſuch fear, trembling, and quaking, as if the enemies had beſieged not the camp, but the very citie. Nautius the Conſul they ſend for, and becauſe they thought him like to doe but ſmall good, they agreed therfore to creat a Dictator, who might restore again the distressed state of the C. W. And L. Quintius Cincinnatus by consent of all H men was nominated. Now a world and wonder it is to hear them speak, that in regard of riches despise all things else, and suppose there can be no great honour and vertue, but where wealth and riches do flow in excesse. This L. Quintius, the only hope of the Romans, the man who was to set upright their Empire now distressed, occupied then a peece of ground, to the quantity of foure acres, called at this day Quintia prata, i, Quintius his meddows, on the other side of Tyber, over against that very place, where now the Arsenal and Shipdocks are, and there was he found digging a ditch, and bearing hard on his spade, or else a plowing the ground, I wot not whether, but busie and earnest about some rusticall work, no doubt he was: and after salutations passed on both sides, between him and the Embassadours that were sent, he was requested by them, that I he would put on his best gown, and (that which might turn to the good of himself and the commonweal) hear a message from the Senat First, he marvelled what the matter should be, & very often asking of them if all were well? he willeth his wife Racilia to bring him forth his Senators robe straightway, out of his sorie cottage: which he put on his back (but first he brushed off the dust, and wiped away his sweat, and made himself somewhat mannerly) and then came forth unto them, who in joyous manner, by way of congratulation, stiled him by the name of Dictator: calling hard upon him to repair unto the city, and declaring in how doubtfull termes the armie stood. Then was there barge provided ready for Quintius, at the cities cost: and being ferried over the river, his three sons met him and received him first, then others of his kinsfolk and friends, and after them the more part of the Senatours. Thus attended with this frequent company, and with the K Sergeants going before, was he brought to his house. Great concourse there was also of the Commons: but nothing so joyous were they, to see Quintius, supposing that government of his over-great and absolute, and himself a man in time of his rule, too imperious. And for that night verily, nothing was done, but a good standing watch kept in the city. The morrow after, the Dictator being come into the common place of assembly before day-light, appointed Generall of the horse, L. Tarquitius, of Noble bloud descended: a man who for mere poverty had ever served on foot, but of all the flower of Rome was reputed and taken to be a brave servitour, and an excellent souldier. Then Quintius with the Generall of horsemen, mounteth into the pulpit aloft: pro-claimeth a publicke vacation or Lawsteed: commandeth all shop windows through the city to be shut, and charged that no man should follow any privat businesse of his own. Then as ma- L ny as were of age to fight, were willed to shew themselves in their armour, before the sun set, in Mars field, every one with victuals dressed for five daies, and with twelve forked stakes a peece for to to pitch in the rampart. And that whosoever were above that age, and were unweldy, and not meet for service should dresse and provide victuals for the next souldier unto him, whiles he himself made ready his armour, and sought for stakes aforesaid. Thus ran the young able men to and fro, to furnish themselves with stakes, and took whatsoever they could find, and whatsoever was next hand: no man was forbidden, and so they were all ready with heart and good will, according to the Dictator his proclamation. Then went the Dictator forth with the legions of footmen, the Master of the horse likewise with his men of arms, in such good order and aray, as might not only serve for a speedy march to rid ground, but also for a set battell if occasion served. "In M

"both regiments they spared not to encourage and exhort their souldiers, according as the present "time required: willing them to set foot forward, to mend their pace and make speed, that by "night time they might reach to their enemies: & not (say they) before there was great need: for
"that the Roman Consul and army were besieged, and had now three daies already been pent
"up fast inclosed: and what might happen in one day or one night, no man knew: for oftentimes
"in the twinciking of an eye, and in the very turning of an hand, there fall out accidents of right "great moment and importance. On afore space, Ensigne crieth one: follow souldier saith another. Thus went they also lustily forward, and all to pleasure and gratifie their captains. So that by midnight they were come into Algidum: and so soon as they perceived their enemies to be neer at hand, they pitched down their ensignes. Then the Dictator rode about as far forth N as he could see in the dark, and having viewed well the situation, coasting and fashion of the camp, commanded the Marshals and Colonels to give direction, That all the carriage and baggage, should be laid up together in one place, and that the souldiers with their armour and stakes only, should come again into their ranks. What he commanded was soon done. Then in the same order that he marched, he draweth out his host in length, and compasseth the camp of his enemies, and commandeth them all upon a signall or watchword given) to set up a shout, and presently upon the shout to cast a trench, & every man stuck down his pale in the rampier. Having given this charge, straightwayes the signall followed. The souldiers do that which they were bidden: the shout was heard over all the camp of the enemies, yea, and into the Consul his camp: causing in the one great fear, in the other exceeding joy. The Romans rejoycing one O with another to hear the shout of their fellow-citizens and countriemen, with a conceit of their coming to rescue, begin of themselves from their sentinels and Corps de guard. to threaten and terrifie their enemies. The Consul set them forward and said, there was now no staying for the matter, nor delaies to be made: for that it appeared by that alarm, that not only their friends were come with succours, but also had begun to skirmish: and that it was all to nothing, that their enemies camp, was already on the outward side assaulted. Whereupon, he commandeth his souldiers to arm, and to follow hard after him. Thus in the night began the skirmish,

A and the legions of a Dictator by their outcry and ſhouting made ſignification that the enemies on that ſide alſo were driven to their ſhifts and in great hazzard. By this time the Æquians had addreſſed themſelves to impeach them in their trenching and making of their rampire, to the end that they might not be compaſſed about: but the al'arme was given and the ſkirmiſh already begun by their enemies within: fearing therefore, leſt they would break through the midſt of their camp, they turned from the pioners and workmen without, to them that fought within, and therby gave the other leave to plie their work and labour all the night long at their pleaſure: and ſo they maintained skirmiſh with the Coſ. untill day light. Now by the break of day they were entrenched on every ſide by the Dictator, and were ſcarce able to hold out batell with one of the ar-
B mies. Then the hoſt of Quintius, which preſently upon the finiſhing of the trench returned to their weapons, entring of the mures and rampires of the enemies. Here began a freſh conflict again, and yet the former nothing abated. The enemies then ſeeing themſelves thus diſtreſſed and ſo hardly driven on every ſide, left fighting and fell to intreating: they beſought the Coſ. on one ſide and the Dictator on the other, that they would not get the victorie by effuſion of bloud and cruel maſſacre, but would permit them to go their waies naked without their weapons. The Conſul he poſted them off to the Dictator: who being in great wrath and diſpleaſure, would not be contented without their ſhame and ignominy beſides. But commanded that Cluilius their generall with other Colonels and Captains ſhould be brought bound unto him. Item, he enjoyned them to abandon & quit the town of Corbio: as for the Æquians bloud, he ſought not for it, he had no need
C thereof: they might depart with their lives. Howbeit, becauſe he would have it now at length, maugre their heads, confeſſed, that the nation was vanquiſhed and ſubdued; his will and pleaſure was, they ſhould paſſe all under the yoke or gallows: the maner wherof is this. They took three ſpears or javelins, and ſet two of them pitched in the ground endlong, and their overthwart faſtned unto the other. Under this kind of gallows the Dictator compelled the Æquians to go. Thus having gotten the tents of the enemies full of all kind of ſtore (for naked he ſent them under the yoke) the whole pillage he beſtowed upon his own ſouldiers only: and rebuking ſharply the Conſuls army and the Co. himſelf, Ye ſhall (quoth he) ſouldiers go without your part of booty
"won of the enemie, whoſe booty ye had like your ſelves to have been. And as for thee, O L. Mi-
"nutius, untill thou begin to have the heart and courage beſeeming a Conſul, thou ſhalt be a Lieute"nant only over theſe legions. So Minutius being diſcharged of the Conſulſhip, remained ſtil D as he was commanded, with the army. But ſo well were men content in thoſe daies, willingly to yeeld obedience to them that better could command, that this army in remembrance hereof as of a favour received, rather then of a diſgrace offered, both ordained for the Dictatour a coronet of gold of one pound weight: and alſo when he went homeward, ſaluted him by the name of their Patron. At Rome the Senat being aſſembled together by Q. Fabius Provoſt of the citie, decreed that Quintius ſhould enter the city in triumph with his army marching in battell aray as he came. Before his chariot was led the commanders of his enemies: the enſignes are carried afore, then followed the army laden with ſpoil and pillage. Great chear and banquets were ſet out, men ſay, upon tables at every mans dore. Thus making merry, they followed the chariot with E ſongs of triumph, with ſports and merry conceits, as they are wont to do at their great and ſolemn feaſts. The ſame day L. Mamilius the Tuſculan, with the approbation and good liking of all men, was enfranchiſed citizen of Rome. And forthwith would the Dictat. have reſigned up his office, but that the Court, held for the triall of M. Volſcius, endited of bearing falſe witneſſe, ſtaied him: and in truth, the Tribunes would have hindred the judiciall proceeding againſt him, if they had not ſtood in awe of the Dictatour. But Volſcius was convicted and had ſentence, and departed to Lanuvium in exile. And Quintius having taken the Dictatorſhip for ſix months, gave it over the ſixteenth day after he entred into it. About the ſame time the Conſul Nautius fought valiantly with the Sabines at Eretum: who beſides the waſting of the fields, had an overthrow in fight. Fabius was ſent into Algidum, to ſucceed in the roome of Minutius. In the end of the year, the Tribuns began to ſtir about their law: but becauſe the two armies were abſent, the Senatour prevailed ſo
F much at that time, that no bils were propounded unto the people. The Commons likewiſe obtained, that they might create the ſelf-ſame Tribunes, now the fifth time. The report goeth, that there were ſeen in the Capitol, wolves chaſed away by hounds: for which ſtrange fight, the Capitol was purged. And theſe were the acts of that year. Then followed Conſuls Q. Minutius & M. Horatius Pulvillus.

36. lib. angel gold.

In the beginning of which year, whiles all was quiet abroad, the ſame Tribunes and the ſame law cauſed diſſention and ſedition at home: which would have grown to a farther miſchief, in ſuch heats men were, had not word been brought, as it were of ſet purpoſe, that the gariſon at Corbio was ſurprized in the night by the Æquians and put to the ſword: whereupon the Conſuls G called the Senat together: and order was given, that they ſhould lead a Subitary army and with a running camp invade Algidum. Then was the ſtrife about the law laid aſide clean, and a new contention aroſe about the muſters. But the Conſuls with all their authority, were overſwaied of the Commons, by the help and aſſiſtance of the Tribunes. At what time a new trouble put them in fear: for intelligence came, that a power of Sabins were come down already into the territories of Rome for to fetch booties and make ſpoil: and from thence advanced againſt the city. Upon which fear, The Tribunes were content that ſouldiers ſhould be preſt, yet not without this covenant indented: That for as much as they had now themſelves theſe five years been triſled off and deluded, & that this protectorſhip of theirs ſtood the Commons in little ſtead, in regard of their H

ſmall number, therefore, there ſhould from thenceforth be ten created Tribunes of the Commonalty. The Nobles were ſo near driven and to ſuch ſtraights, that will they, nill they, yeeld they muſt thereto: with this proviſo, that they ſhould never after Elect the ſame men Tribunes twiſe. And for fear that this act ſhould after the war was once paſt, turn to nothing, like as others had done before, Ten Tribunes of the Com. firſt created. they went in hand immediately to call a court for the Election of the Tribunes. So in the 36. year from the firſt Tribunes of the Commons choſen, there were ten created; out of every Claſſis, two. And by an act it was provided, that in ſuch ſort they ſhould be created ever after. The muſters then being taken and ſouldiers enrolled, Minutius went with a power againſt the Sabines, but found not the enemy. And Horatius becauſe the Æquians after they had put the gariſon at Corbio to the I ſword, and won Hortana beſides, fought with them in Algidum. Many a man there he ſlew, and drove his enemies not only out of Algidum, but alſo out of Corbio and Hortana. As for Corbio he utterly raſed it, for betraying the gariſon there. After this, were M. Valerius and Sp. Virginius made Conſuls. At quiet they were both at home and abroad. But great ſcarcity there was of corn, by reaſon of the untemperat and unſeaſonable rain that fell. A bill there was preferred, that the mount Aventine ſhould be turned to Commons. And the ſame Tribunes were made again: who, all the year following, when T. Romulius and C. Veturius were Conſuls, in all their Halls and aſ-
"ſemblies, ſtill publiſhed the law: ſaying, it was a ſhame, that their number was thus increaſed
"to no purpoſe, in caſe their affairs ſhould lie dead in their two years, as they had done in the "whole 5. years paſt. Whiles they were earneſtly debating theſe things, fearfull meſſengers came K in all haſt from Tuſculum, with news, that the Æquians were in the territory of Tuſculum. The freſh deſert of that nation would not ſuffer the Romans for ſhame to defer their helping hand. Whereupon both Conſuls were ſent with an army, and met with the enemies in Algidum in their wonted haunt and accuſtomed place, where they encountred and ſtruck a battell: in which were ſlain about 7000. enemies. The reſt were put to flight. A huge booty there was gotten, which the Conſuls ſold out-right, by reaſon of the want of mony in their common treaſury. But this cauſed the ſouldiers to repine and grudge, and in the end miniſtred matter to the Tribunes, to accuſe the Conſuls unto the Commons. As ſoon therefore as they were out of their office, when Sp. Tarpeius and A. Eternius were Conſuls: Romulius was arreſted and put in ſuit by C. Claudius Cicero, Tribune of the Commons. And Veturius was likewiſe troubled by L. Halienus an Ædile or L Warden of the Commons. Condemned they were both the one and the other, to the great indigna-
* 32 lib 5 ſb. tion of the Nobles. Romulius was fined in * 10000 Aſſes. Veturius in * 15000. But for all this hard
* 46 lib. 17 ſb. hap and calamity that befell to thoſe former Conſuls, the new were never a jot more remiſſe and cool in the quarrel: ſaying, Well may we alſo be caſt and condemned, and both Commons and Tribunes never the neerer to compaſſe and enact their law. Then the Tribunes giving over the law, which now by propounding only ſo oft, was waxen ſtale and old, began more gently to deal with the Senatours, praying them to make an end once of all ſtrife and contention. And in caſe that the "laws of the Commons ſo diſliked and diſpleaſed them, they requeſted them to ſuffer certain Law"makers to be created indifferently out of the Commonalty, as well as of the Nobility, who might
"deviſe acts commodious & profitable to both parts and or the equal liberty and freedom of all. As M
"for the ſubſtance it ſelf of this motion, the Senators refuſed not: but they flatly ſaid, that none but of the Nobility ſhould have the making of thoſe laws. Seeing then they agreed thus about the laws, & differed only and ſqaured about the lawgiver, there were Embaſſadors ſent to Athens, Sp. Poſthumius Albus, A. Manlius, and P. Sulpitius Camerinus: who were commanded to exemplifie and Embaſſadours ſent into Greece for an abſtract of their laws. copy out the famous and worthie laws of Solon: to ſearch out and learn the ordinances, cuſtomes, and rites of other cities in Greece. For any outward wars, this year was quiet, and the year following more quiet, when P. Curiatius, and Sex. Quintilius were Conſuls, by reaſon of the continual ſilence of the Tribunes: which, as the expectation of the Embaſſadors that were gone to Athens, and of ſtrange and forain laws, firſt and principally procured: ſo, two mighty great calamities that roſe both at once, to wit, famine and peſtilence, noiſome and loathſome both to man and N beaſt, afterwards continued. By means wherof, the fields lay waſt and deſolate, the city diſpeopled with continual burials: many right worſhipful and honourable houſes thereby mourned. Sergius Cornelius, the Flamin of Quirinus dyed therof. C. Horatius Pulvillus the Augur went of it likewiſe: in whoſe room the Augurs (his Aſſociats) choſe C. Veturius: and the rather, becauſe he had been condemned by the people. Quintilius the Conſul departed alſo this life, and four Tribunes of the Commons. So that this was a year, with manifold loſſes and calamities fouly diſtained. But for enemies all was quiet. After this were C. Menenius, and P. Seſtius Capitolinus made Conſuls. In which year likewiſe there was no war abroad, mary at home ſome troubles aroſe. By this time were the Embaſſadors returned with the Athenian laws. And therfore the Tribunes were ſo much the more earneſt and urgent, that once at length they would ſet on, to deſcribe and put O
Ten Magiſtrates called Decemvirs, inſtituted for the making of awes. down ſome laws. And agreed it was, that there ſhould be created Decemvirs above all appeal: & for the yeare then, there ſhould no other Officers and Magiſtrats be in place. Now, whether any of theſe might be of the Commons or no, that was a queſtion: and hereupon ſome debate and controverſie continued for a good while. At the laſt, the Nobles went away with it, & had the preheminence, upon this condition, that neither the law Icilia, concerning the Aventine mount, nor other ſacred lawes ſhould be repealed. Thus in the 302 yeare after that Rome was built, was the form of the cities government changed the ſecond time, and to the Conſuls from the Decemviri, was the ſoveraign rule tranſlated, like as before, from the kings to the Conſuls.

This

A This change was leſſe notable, in that it long continued not. The beginning of this Magiſtracie was fair and goodly to ſee to, but grew too rank, and exceeded in overmuch licentiouſneſſe. The ſooner therefore it faded and fell away, and the former government was taken up again, and both the name and juriſdiction of Conſuls returned, and was conferred upon twain. The Decemvirs created were theſe: Ap. Claudius, T. Genutius, P. Seſtius, L. Veturius, C. Iulius, A. Manlius, P. Sulpitius, P. Curiatius, T. Romulius, Sp Poſthumius, Claudius and Genutius, becauſe they had been Conſuls elect for that year, had this dignity beſtowed upon them, in lieu of the other. And Seſtius one of the Conſuls the year before, becauſe he had preferred this matter unto the Senators, againſt his fellow Conſuls will. Next to theſe were counted the three Embaſſadours that went to Athens, both for that they ſhould be rewarded with this honourable dignity, for their embaſſage into ſo far & remote a country, & alſo becauſe men were perſwaded, that by reaſon of their inſight and skill in forrain ordinances of ſtrange nations, they might be well emploied in ſetting down, and making of new; The reſt made up the number. They ſay, that in the laſt ſcrutinies and ſuffrages at this Election, choice was made of thoſe that were more aged, and farther ſtept in years, to the end they might not ſo fiercely and ſtoutly gainſay and croſſe the opinions and conſtitutions of the other. In this new ſtate of government, Appius was the man that bare the greateſt ſtroke, he ruled the roſt and ſwaied all the reſt, ſo highly ſtood he in grace and favour with the people. He had ſo altered his nature, and became ſuch a new man, that all on a ſudden, of a cruel and terrible proſecutor of the Commons, he proved a very Publicola, and courter of the Commonalty, and one that lay for to get every gale of popular love and favour that might be had. Every one ſat his tenth day in place of judgement, and miniſtred juſtice in their ſeverall turnes unto the people. On which day, the twelve knitches of rods were born by the Lictors before the ſoveraign judg: as for his nine brethren, they had each of them one ſet jeant to give attendance. In this agreement among themſelves, (which accord otherwhiles when they were privat perſons, had been hurtfull unto them) reſted only and wholly the greateſt equity towards others. A proof and argument of this their moderation, it ſhall be ſufficient to obſerve now in the example and inſtance of one onely matter: for whereas they were created abſolute, and paſt all appeal, it fortuned, that in the houſe of P. Seſtius, a Nobleman, there was a dead body found buried, and brought forth openly into the publicke aſſembly of the people. The thing being no leſſe apparent in view, then hainous and horrible in fact, C. Iulius a Decemvir, brought Seſtius in queſtion therefore, put him in ſuit to anſwer at a certain day, and became plaintif unto the people, and accuſed that defendant, whoſe competent judge he was by order of law. And ſo he yeelded of his own right: adding ſo much to the freedom of the people, as was taken from the power of his own juriſdiction and government. When as now both high and low gave out, that this authority was ſound and uncorrupt, & ſet as it were from Oracle, and Gods own mouth, & al men wiling to accept of juſtice at their hands: then ſet they to it, and went about the making and giving of laws. And with great expectation of men, they ſet out ten Tables, and called the people to a generall aſſembly, commanding them in a good hour, and in the name of God to go, & (that which might turn to the good, to the benefit, and happines of the Commonweal, themſelves their children & poſterity) to read the law there publiſhed: proteſting, that ſo far as ten men could with all their wiſedome foreſee & provide for, had deviſed indifferent lawes, and equall for all ſorts of callings, as well the beſt as the meaneſt. But for as much as the wits and heads of manymen, were of deeper reach to ſee farther into things, they gave them good leave, to caſt in their minds, and ponder with themſelves each particular, yea, and to reaſon together from point to point, and thereof to deliver their opinion openly, what was ſhort and wanting, or what was ſuperfluous, in every article: and look what laws the conſent of all men ſeemed to bring in, thoſe ſhould the people accept, and none other: that it might appear they were not ſo much to approve of them and give their aſſent after they were propounded, as to propoſe and preferre them their own ſelves. And when as they were thought ſufficiently corrected, according to the ſpeeches of men, and as every one ſpake to the ſeverall titles and chapters of the laws, as they were ſet forth: then in the high court of Parlament, aſſembled of all the Centuries & degrees of men, the laws of ten Tables were enacted and eſtabliſhed. Which even at this day, among that infinit number of ſtatuts, heaped and hudled one upon another, are the very well-ſpring and fountain of all juſtice, both publick and privat. After this, there ran a rumour abroad, that two tables were yet wanting, which if they were put unto the reſt, then might the complete body as it were of the whole Roman law be finiſhed and made perfect. The expectation thereof, now that the great Leet-day grew neer for the Election, made men very deſirous to create Decemvirs again the ſecond time. Now the Commons abroad, beſides that they hated the very name of Conſuls, as well as of Kings, ſought not greatly for the protection of the Tribunes: ſeeing that the Decemvirs one after another, yeelded in their perogative, and admitted in ſome ſort the appeal. But afcer that the ſolemn aſſembly for the chuſing of Decemvirs, was publiſhed againſt the * Trinundinum, or third market day next enſuing, to ſuch an heighth was the ambition and deſire of this dignity growne, that the very chiefe men, and principall heads of the City (for feare, I beleeve, leſt the poſſeſſions of ſo great a government, in caſe they were not inveſted themſelves in the place, ſhould lie open unto ſome unmeet and unworthy perſons) went about and made court to every man, ſuing in humble manner to thoſe very Commons, with whom they had been at ſtrife & variance, for that honour and dignity, which they themſelves had with all their power and might impugned. through ſuch offices, being now come in queſtion, and ſubmitted to the choiſe and judgement of others, pricked on Ap. Claudius, and ſet him forwards. So as a man could hardly know whether H to reckon him among the Decemvirs, or thoſe that ſtood to be Decemvirs again. For otherwhiles he was more like one that ſued for an office, than him that preſently bare office: blaming perſonages of beſt quality in the City, and laying hard to their charge: but extolling the vaineſt & baſeſt of the Competitors. Himſelf in perſon ſorting among the Duilij and Icilij, and ſuch like as favoured the Tribunes, went ſwinging and ſquaring in the common place, uſing them as inſtruments to venditare himſelf forth to the common people. So long, as at length his very brethren in office, who until that time had been ſingularly addicted and affectionated unto him, caſt their eies upon him, and began to mark, & marvail much what his meaning was: reaſoning thus among themſelves: I "Surely there is no ſoundneſſe nor goodneſſe herein, but all meer diſſimulation and hypocriſie. "Certainly, it is not for nought, that in ſuch pride of his, there ſhould appear ſo much courteſie. "What? to force his own nature too much within compaſſe: to debaſe himſelf, and ſuffer pri- "vat men to be his fellows, was a ſigne of one, that made not ſo much haſt to forgo a dignity and "promotion, as ſought means to keep it ſtill. Openly they durſt not preſume to check and with- ſtand his ambitious deſire, but aſſaied by pleaſing and ſoothing him up, to repreſſe and bridle his fooliſh affection. And ſeeing he was the younger of his company, they all with one accord laid upon him the charge, to hold the high court for the Election of Decemvirs. Their drift and policy was, that he ſhould not Elect his own ſelf a thing, which unleſſe it were the Tribunes again, (and that was a moſt dangerous precedent and example) no man ever had done before. And he with K all his heart accepting therof, made profeſſion that he would be preſident of that honourable Court and Seſſion, and prayed to the gods that he might perform it for the benefit of the weal-publik. And ſo took the vantage of that opportunity, to ſet forward his own deſign, which they meant ſhould have ſtopped and croſſed the ſame. And after he had by ſecret packing and conveſing with the other competitours, and given the repulſe unto the two Quintis (Capitolinus, and Cincinnatus) and put beſide the Cuſhion his own Uncle by the fathers ſide (C. Claudius, a moſt ſtout & reſolut champion of the Nobility) with other citizens of like mark and quality: he createth Decemvirs, ſuch as were not for worth, port, and behaviour, to them comparable and his own ſweet ſelf with the firſt. Which as there was no man thought he ever would have done, ſo all good men miſliked when it was done. With him were elected M. Cornelius Malugineſis, M. Sergius, L. Mi- L nutius, Q. Fabius Vibulanus, Q. Petilius, T. Antonius Merenda, Caſo Duillius, Sp. Oppius Cornicen. M. Rabuleius. And there's an end of Appius playing anothers mans part. Off went his maſk and viſour now, and ſo from thence-forth, he began to ſhew himſelf in his own likeneſſe, and to live in his kind: yea, and to frame his companions to the bent of his bow, even before they were entred into office. Day by day had they their ſecret meetings by themſelves apart from all other: and being once hereby furniſhed with ungratious and proud deſignments, which they had cloſely complotted together, they could no longer hold & diſſemble their pride. Few might have acceſſe unto them: ſeldom would they be ſpoken with, ſhewing themſelves ſtrange, ſurly, & churliſh to thoſe that came unto them. Thus drew they the time on, unto the * Ides of May, which was the uſuall 15. day of May and ſolemn day then of entring into offices of government. In the very begining whereof they M made the firſt day of their magiſtracie noted by an intimation and evident ſhew of exceeding terrour. For whereas the Decemvirs their predeceſſors had obſerved this order, That one alone ſhould have the rods of State born before him, and that this regall ornaments ſhould paſſe round through them all in courſe one after another: Behold, theſe came all of them abroad, and each of them had his xij. bundles of rods carried before him. So that theſe Lictors, 120 in number, with their rods and axes too, faſtned within the rods, took up and filled the whole Forum or common place as they went. And for as much as they were created abſolutely, and their commiſſion ran without all appeal, men made this expoſition, that to go with their axes or without was all one, & made no matter at all. Thus was there a ſhew & repreſentation of ten KK. And this terrour grew more and more, not with the meaneſt and baſeſt ſort only, but alſo with the chief and beſt of the N Patritians: ſuppoſing that they ſought to pick a quarell, and miniſter occaſion and overture to ſome maſſacre: that if any man ſhould offer either in the Senat or among the people, to ſpeak one word concerning liberty, forthwith there ſhould be exemplary whipping and heading, to the terrour of all other. For, beſides that, from the people there was no remedy and ſuccour to be had, by reaſon that the appeal unto them was quite diſanulled and taken away: the Decemvirs themſelves drew ſo all in one line together and were ſo combined and linked, that there was no hope at all, that one would thwart and croſſe that which another did: whereas the former Decemvirs could well abide, that their judgements and ſentences ſhould be cenſured and corrected, by the appellations or appeal to one of their brethren in commiſſion: yea, and in ſome caſes put off ſome matters from themſelves to be decided by the people, which ſeemed properly to belong O unto their own juriſdiction. For a while, the fear was to all indifferent: but by little and little the Commons only began to feel the ſmart. The Nobles were forborn and eſcaped clear and ſcotfree: the meaner perſons went to the wals, and with them they dealt according to their luſt and pleaſure right cruelly. The perſon wholly they regarded, and never reſpected the cauſe, as with whom favour and friendſhip prevailed as much as equity and right ſhould have done. At home in their houſes, they determined of matters how they ſhould paſſe: and in open place they pronounced ſentence accordingly. If a man had appealed to one of their bench, from him

A unto whom he fled for relief, he went his waies again by weeping croſſe, repenting that he ſtood not to the order and injunction awarded by the former. It was thought and ſpoken alſo abroad, but the firſt author would not be known, That they had conſpired together, not for the preſent time only to do wrong and injurie, but alſo were confederat between themſelves privily, yea, and had bound it with an oath, to call no aſſembly at all for the electing of new magiſtrats: but being now once inveſted in the ſoveraign rule, to hold the poſſeſſion of the Decemvirſhip for ever. The Commons than began to look about them, to behold and adviſe well the countenances of the Nobles, to ſee if they could from them catch ſome good gale of wind, ſome hope again of liberty, at whoſe hands they fearing bondage, had brought the common-weal to this hard paſſe.

B The LL. of the Senat hated the Decemvirs, they hated alſo the Commons. They liked not of things as they went, and yet were perſwaded that the Commons were well enough ſerved, and deſerved no better: who gaping greedily after liberty were now fallen and plunged into ſervitude and thraldome. Help they would not with the leaſt of their fingers, but rather heap more wrongs upon them: that having a wearifome and tedious lothing of the preſent ſtate, they might fall to a longing deſire after two Conſuls, and wiſh the old world were come again. By this time now was the better part of the year gone and paſt: and the two tables of laws were annexed to the other ten of the former year: which if they might be once confirmed and ratified by a Parliament of the Centuries, there remained nothing behind, for which the common-weal ſhould need theſe magiſtrats: but expected it was certainly, that the aſſembly for Election of Conſuls ſhould out

C of hand be publiſhed and proclamed. Marry, there was one thing hammered in the Commons heads, by what means they might revive again the Tribunes authority; the very grand bulwark of their freedom, and the thing that now had diſcontinued and lien dead. But all this while there was not a word of the new Election. And the Decemvirs, who at the firſt preſented uſually unto the Commons ſight, a crew of thoſe that favoured the Tribunes, for to attend upon their perſons (a thing right plauſible and pleaſing unto the people:) were guarded now, with certain tall penſioners of their Nobility: whole troups of them ſtood about their Tribunal ſeats and places of judgment. Theſe made havock and ſpoil of the Commons and their goods: and look what the mind of a mighty man ſtood unto and luſted after, it was his hap to have it whatſoever. Nay, there was no ſpare now made of their backs and ſides: ſome were ſcourged with rods, ſome loſt their heads

D by the ax. And becauſe this cruelty ſhould not go unrewarded, lightly there was none executed, if he were worth any thing, but his goods went after and were begged or given away. The youth of the Nobility, by this kind of hire well fleſhed; not only oppoſed not themſelves to withſtand theſe wrongful dealings & hard courſes, but carried it afore them, openly profeſſing & avowing that they wiſhed rather their own licentiouſneſs, than the liberty of all. The * Ides of May were now come about, and no new magiſtrates elected in the others roome. Forth come the Decemvirs, (who to ſay a truth and to give them their right, were no other than privat perſons) neither with minds abated for the exerciſing of their imperious rule, nor with fewer regal enſignes, to ſet out and ſhew their honour & dignity. When the people ſaw that, they made no other reckoning but this was plain uſurping of the kings government, and no better: And now farewell freedom

E for ever and a day. For neither had they preſently, nor hereafter were they like to have any man to recover it again. So that now, not they only let fall their hearts and were diſcouraged in themſelves, but alſo grew to be contemptible in the eyes of their neighbour-nations: who diſdained highly, that they ſhould have ſoveraignty of rule, who were not free themſelves, nor enjoyed their own liberty. For the Sabines with a ſtrong power invaded the Territories of Rome: and when they had forraged far and neer, and driven away booties both of people and of cattell, without impeachment, they gather their army together again, that had hanged here and there up and down, and entred unto Eretum, where they encamp themſelves: laying this for a ground, and building their hope upon their diſcord at Rome, that it would ſtay their muſtering. Not only the news that came hereof, but the the flying of the country peaſants, put the whole city in great fear.

F The Decemvirs fall to conſulting what were beſt to do. And whiles they were to ſeek what courſe to take, and between the hatred of the Nobles and the Commons utterly forlorn and deſtitute, there hapned alſo another fearfull trouble in the tail of the former. The Æquians from another ſide were encamped in Algidum. And from Tuſculum Embaſſadours brought tidings that their country was waſted with excurſions from thence, whereupon they craved their help and aid. Theſe fearfull occurrents ſo troubled and perplexed the Decemvirs, that conſidering the city was now beſet at once with wars from two places, their ſtomacks were come down to conſult with the Senat. They commanded therefore the Senatours to be ſummoned to the Curia. And well they wiſt, what a great fit and ſtorm of anger, diſpleaſure and blame was towards: namely, that they would burden them & lay to their charge, how they were the only cauſe both of the country waſted already, and that they were much beholding to their enemies, and might thank war for this, that any ancient guise and custom of a free city was come up and in ure again. They looked about on every side of the Forum, to see if they might espy a Senator: but few or none could they hear of, any where. Then looked they into the Curia, and behold, none at all apeared about the Decemvirs. Whereof their own selves, even the Decemvirs could gather no otherwise, but that in the conceipt, & consent of all men, their government was become odious: & the Commons also thus collected and interpreted, that the Senators met not together, because privat men (such as the Decemvirs were indeed) had no authority to assemble a Senat. And now said they, is the way and entrance made to recover their liberty again, if so be the Commons would join with the Senat: and as the Nobles being called, meet not together in counsel, so the Commons likewise would refuse to be mustered. In this wise muttered and whispered the Commons. And in truth scarcely was there any one of the Senators about the common place, and but few within the city: for very griefe and indignity to see that things went as they did, they had withdrawn themselves into the countrie to their lands: and forgetting the state of the common-weal, they became carefnl of their own privat affairs: thinking themselves so far forth freed from oppression and wrong, as they were remote and sequestred from the society, meeting and conference, with so Lordly & imperious rulers. When they would not assemble at their summons, the officers were sent unto their houses, both for to streine and take away stresses for their contumacie and disobedience, and also to enquire and learn, whether they refused to come at their commandment, or of set purpose or no. And word they bring back, that the Senators were in the country. The Decemvirs were better apaid to hear that, than if answer had come that they were at home and refused to obey. They they gave commandment that they should be sent for: and they warned a Senat house against the next day following: where they assembled more in number then they looked for. Whereupon the Commons supposed that their liberty was bought and sold and utterly betraied by the Nobles, for that the Senat had yeelded obedience to them (that now by right were out of their office) as if they had given lawfull summons, who being privat men had no power at all so to do. But they shewed more obeisance and submission, as we have heard say, in coming to the Councel house, than any disposition to deliver their minds and opinions there, to the liking and pleasures of the Decemvirs. First, L. Valerius Potitus, as it recorded, after that Appius Claudius had proposed unto them the cause of their meeting, before they were required their advice in order and course, claimed the liberty of the house, to speak in the behalfe of the common-weal. But when as the Decemvirs denied it flatly, yea, and forbad him with threats, upon pain of their high displeasure, he inferred again and menaced, that he would go forth unto the commons, and so began a broil and tumult. M. Horatius Barbatus likewise took part with him, and was nothing behind in stoutnesse to maintain the quarell, terming them ten Tarquins: "and are ye aware (quoth he) how the Kings were in times past expelled by the the Valerii and Horatii? And yet the name it was not of "Kings, that men were so weary of and loathed in those daies. For why? it was right lawful to call "Jupiter by that name: whereby Romulus also the founder of this City, and other Princes his "successours have been called: yea, and the name hath been used and is retained still as a solemn ti-"tle, in the sacred rites of holy Kirk. Nay, it was the pride and oppression of the King, that then "was odious, and nothing els, which enormities, if they were in those daies in the King himself, a "lawfull prince, or in the King his son intollerable, who can abide and endure the same in so ma-"ny privat persons? I advise you therefore to take heed how you debar men of their liberty of "speech in the Councel House, lest ye drive them thereby to speak their mind and complain with-"out the Councel House. Neither see I any reason at all, why it were not as lawfull for me "a privat man, to assemble the people to an audience, as for you to call the Senat together to a "Councel. Make triall whensoever ye will, ye shall find how much more forcible our just griefe "will be, in recovering our libertie again, than this greedy desire of yours, holding and upholding "still your usurped, unlawfull, and tyrannicall rule. You have propounded here unto us, forsooth, "concerning the Sabines war: as who would say, the people of Rome can be at greater war with "any than with those, who having been created Magistrates only for the publishing and enacting of "certain laws, have left now neither law nor justice at all within the city. Who have taken away "their Comices, i. Courts and Leets of Election, their yearly Magistrats, the successive change "and course of bearing rule, the only thing that maketh Isonomy, and equality of freedome. Who "being but private men, are possessed both of regall ornaments, and also of roiall government. Af-"ter the expulsion of the Kings, the Magistrats that succeeded were of the Nobility: in proceese of time, upon the rising of the Commons and their departure, there were officers chosen out "of the Commonalty. I demand of you, and I would gladly know, of whether state or body are "ye? Are ye, I pray you, popular, and of the Common people? What have ye ever done with ad-"vice and approbation of the people? Are ye Nobles and Peers? who now for a whole yeers space "almost, have held no Councell of Senators. And now that ye have assembled them, you restrain "them from speaking for the Weal-publick. Well presume not too much, neither bear your selves "upon the timorousnes of others. For, trust me truly, the indignities that men already suffer, "seem more irksom and unsupportable, than whatsoever els they can doubt and fear hereafter. As Horatius spake these words aloud, and the Decemvirs could not bethink themselves of some indifferent & mean course either in anger to be revenged, or in lenity to pardon and put up all, nor wist whereto this matter might tend and proceed in the end: then C. Claudius, uncle to Appius, the Decem-

G of the perils like preſently to enſue: looking for no other, but that there would be given an attempt and ſhrewd puſh, to aboliſh utterly their government, unleſſe they ſtuck cloſely together to it, and by extending their authority ſharply upon ſome few of the ſtouteſt, quail and cruſh the the attempts of others. After the voice of the Bedeil was heard in the Forum or common place, citing the Senatours to repaire into the Councell houſe to the Decemvirs: the novelty and ſtrangeneſſe of the matter, (becauſe they had laid down for a long time the manner of calling them to Councell) cauſed the Commons to marvail and muſe what was befallen, that they ſhould after ſuch diſcontinuance, take up a thing ſo obſolete and out of uſe. And thus they conceived of it,

A Decemvir, began to ſpeak, rather by of way praier and intreatie, then in checking and reproving
" wiſe, and beſought Appius for his brothers ſoul ſake, who was his own father, to remember " and regard more that civil ſocietie wherein he was born, then this ungracious and wicked con-
" federacie, contracted with his fellow Decemvirs. And this requeſt I make (quoth he) tender-
" ing your privat eſtate more then the Commonweal. As for her, if ſhe might not by fair meanes
" and with their good wils, obtain her own due and right, ſhe would by foul waies, and in ſpight
" of their hearts recover it in the end. And for as much as of much debate and ſtrife there enſue
" commonly heats of anger and cankred rancour, I am in dread & horror what the ſequel and iſ" ſue will be of theſe jars. Now when as the Decemvirs would not permit the reſt to ſpeak, but only to the point propoſed and occaſion of their meeting, yet they were abaſhed to interrupt B the ſpeech of Claudius and to cut him off: but ſuffered him to goe on untill he made an end. And in concluſion his opinion and ſentence was, that he would not (to abide by it) agree, that any act of the Senat ſhould for that time paſſe in that behalf. And all that were preſent took his words ſo, as if Claudius deemed no otherwiſe of the Decemvirs, then of private men. Many of them alſo, ſuch eſpecially as had been Conſuls, were of his mind, and ſaid as much. Another opinion there was, more rough and ſharp in outward ſhew, but far leſſe forcible and effectuall in deed: adviſing and willing the Nobles, to make no more ado, but to go together and chuſe an Interregent. For this man ſeemed yet, to account and judge them Magiſtrates; (bad though they were) that had called C a Senat, and held them in Councell: whereas the former, that would not abide any act to paſſe, reckoned them but for privat perſons. Thus when the Decemvirs cauſe began to ſhrinke and go downward, L. Cornelius Maluginenſis, brother to Cornelius the Decemvir, being reſerved of purpoſe to give his opinion in the laſt place of al the Conſular Senatours, ſuch as had been Conſuls, pre" tending a care that they had of the war, took part with his brother and his Collegues, ſaying, that " he marvelled much by what misfortune or deſtinie it happned, that the decemvirs ſhould be chal" lenged and oppugned, eſpecially by thoſe that had ſtood for the Decemvirſhip, or by their " friends and aſſociates: and how it came about, that in ſo many months ſpace, whiles the city was
" at reſt and without fear of war, no man made queſtion or doubt, whether they that were in place,
" and governed the ſtate, were lawfull Magiſtrates or no: and now at laſt, when the enemies are D " in a manner at the gates, they ſhould ſow civil diſſention, unleſſe this were the meaning of it,
" that in a troubled ſtate it would not be ſo clearly ſeen and perceived, what they went about. But " no man is able (qd. he) to ſet down a true doom, & alledge a ruled caſe in ſo great a matter as this " is, to men, whoſe minds are buſied and wholly poſſeſſed of a greater care. And therefore my o" pinion is, that concerning that point which Valerius and Horatius charged the Decemvirs with,
" namely, That before the Ides of May their government was determined, and they out of office;
" the Senat ſhould diſcuſſe and debate, when as the wars now at hand were diſpatched, and the " Commonweal brought once again to quietneſs. And that Appius Claudius ſhould make this rec" koning even now aforehand, and know that he is to render a reaſon of that high court of Parla-
" ment, which for the election of Decemvirs he called and held, being a Decemvir himſelf:
" namely, Whether they were created for one year only, or to continue ſtill, untill the other laws E " which yet are wanting, were ratified and confirmd. As for the preſent time, he thought good that " all other matters ſhould surceaſe, and be paſſed over, ſave the war only: the rumour whereof, if " they thought to be falſe, and that they were but tales that not only the meſſengers, but alſo the " Embaſſadours of the Tuſculans reported, then his adviſe was to ſend out eſpials, who upon their " diſcovery might bring more certain tidings. But in caſe they gave credence to meſſengers and " Embaſſadours both, then with all ſpeed poſſible to muſter, and the Decemvirs to have the con" duct of the armies, and to lead them whither they thought meet: and that nothing els ſhould be thought upon before this. Which opinion of his, that it might prevail and take effect, the punie *Sen*atours by importunat convaſſing, obtained. Then Valerius and Horatius both roſe up the ſecond time more fierce and eager than before, calling upon them aloud, that they might be per-F mitted to ſpeak concerning the Commonweal: and in caſe they might not be ſuffered by reaſon of the faction, to have the liberty of ſpeech in the Councel Houſe, they would ſpeak their mind without, before the people. For neither could privat men (as they were) debar them in Senat Houſe, nor in open aſſembly & to give place unto their imaginary, and pretended imperial enſigns, they would never be brought. Then Appius ſuppoſing the matter wel-neer come to this paſſe, that unleſſe the violence were reſiſted with like boldneſſe, their rule was at an end, and their autho-ritie conquered: Ye were not beſt (quoth he) to ſpeak but to the matter, whereupon we ſit in Conſultation. And when Valerius replied again and ſaid plainly, that he would not hold his tongue for a privat mans commandment: Appius ſent a Sergeant unto him. Whereupon Valerius cried for help to the Quirites, from the porch of the Councell Houſe. Then L. Cornelius claſping G Appius about the middle, without regard to content him whoſe good he pretended, ſtaied the ſtriſe. So by the mediation of Cornelius, leave was granted to Valerius for to ſay his mind at his own pleaſure. But, for as much as his libertie proceeded no farther, then to ſome few words, the Decemvirs held on their purpoſe ſtill, and had their deſire. The Nobles alſo, ſuch as had been Conſuls, and the ancients, upon an old cankred hatred that they beare ſtill againſt the Tribuns authority, where upon they ſuppoſed the Commons were much more devoted and affected, then unto the government of the Conſuls, were rather inclined and willing that the Decemvirs of their own accord ſhould themſelves afterwards forgo their office, than that upon hatred and malice received

againſt them, the Commons ſhould take heart of graſſe, and hold up head again. For if with gentle handling of the matter, without ſtir and clamour of the people, the regiment returned again unto the Conſuls, it would haply come to paſſe, that either by meanes of wars coming between, or through the moderation of the Conſuls in their government, the Commons might in time forget the Tribuns quite. H

Thus whiles the Nobles were ſilent and made no more words, a muſter was proclamed, and the younger ſort of people, ſeeing the government of the Decemvirs abſolute and without appeal, made anſwer to their names. And when the legions were enrolled, the Decemvirs took order and agreed betweene themſelves who ſhould go forth to the wars, and who ſhould have the command of the forces. The chiefe & principal of the Decemvirs were Q. Fabius, and Appius Claudius. I And for that there ſeemed greater war at home then abroad, the Decemvirs ſuppoſed the violent nature of Appius, fitter to repreſſe all troubles and mutinies in the citie; and conſidering withall the diſpoſition of Fabius, to be leſſe conſtant and reſolute in goodneſſe, then active and quick in militarie ſervice, (for this man having been in times paſt of great worth, both at home, and alſo in war; the Decemvirſhip, and the conditions of his colleagues together, had ſo greatly changed, that he choſe rather to be like Appius then himſelf) to him therefore was impoſed the charge of the war againſt the Sabines, together with M. Rabuleius and Q. Petilius joined in commiſſion with him. M. Cornelius was ſent into Algidum, with L. Minutius, T. Antonius, Caſo Duillius, and M. Sergius, and they ordained and appointed Sp. Oppius as aſſiſtant to Appius Claudius, for the de- K fence and government of the city, and to have the full authoritie of all the ten Decemvirs. But the Common-weal ſped no better abroad in warfare, than it fared at home. The onely fault in the Generals was this, That they had made themſelves odious to their ſouldiers and citizens: all the blame els lay in the ſouldiers themſelves; Who to the end that nothing might go well forward and proſper under the leading and conduct of the Decemvirs, ſuffered themſelves to their own ſhame, and diſhonour of their captains, to be defeated: for the armies were both by the Sabines at Eretum, and alſo by the Æquians in Algidum diſcomfited. They that fled from Eretum in the dead of the night, had encamped and fortified upon an high ground nearer unto the city of Rome, betweene Fidenæ and Cruſtumenia. And when the enemie purſued them ſtill and provoked them to fight, they would never come forth into the plain and even ground, to encounter with them L in a pight battell, but ſtood upon their guard and defended themſelves, truſting in the ſituation of the place and their rampier, and nothing upon their own manhood and force of arms. But in Algidum they committed a more foul and beaſtly fault, and received withall a greater loſſe and overthrow; inſomuch as having loſt their camp with all their tents, the ſoldiers being turned out of bag and baggage, their harneſs and implements of neceſſary uſe, retired for refuge to Tuſculum, hoping there to be entertained as gueſts, and to live upon the protection, mercy and devotion of their hoſts and friends: who failed and deceived not their expection. But to Rome there came ſuch fearfull news, that the Senatours and Nobles laying apart now all hatred againſt the Decemvirs, thought good to keep watch and ward in the citie: and commanded as many as were able to bear arms, to keep the wals and guard the gates: they gave order alſo to ſend harneſs and armour to ſuppy their want at Tuſculum: moreover, That the Decemvirs ſhould aban- M don the caſtle at Tuſculum, and with their ſouldiers take the field and keep the camp: That they likewiſe ſhould diſlodge and remove from Fidenæ, that lay fortified there and remove into the countrie of the Sabines: ſo that by making wars upon the enemies firſt, they might ſcare and divert them from purſuing their intent of giving aſſault unto the citie of Rome. Beſides theſe damages and foils ſuſtained at the enemies hands, the Decemvirs committed both in war abroad, and alſo in the citie at home, two moſt wicked and horrible facts. For whereas one L. Siccius, during their abode in the Sabines countrie (upon an odious conceit and malice againſt the Decemvirs) had gone up and down, and in ſecret talke whiſpered in the ears of the Common ſouldiers, ſome mention of creating Tribuns, and of another inſurrection and departure: him the Decemvirs diſpatch before, to ſpie out a convenient plot of ground to encamp in. Now N they had given thoſe ſouldiers in charge, whom they ſent to accompanie him in that expedition to ſet him upon him in ſome fit place of advantage and to kill him. And kill him they did, but to their own coſt: for whiles he fought in his own defence, ſome of thoſe that laid for his miſchiefe, died for it, and lay along about him for companie: for being a right ſtout and ſtrong man of his hands, he ſtood to it courageouſly: and notwithſtanding he was beſet round about, he defended himſelf very manfully. The reſt that eſcaped bring word into the camp, that Siccius was fallen unawares into an ambuſhment, and whiles he fought luſtily, was with certain other of the ſouldiers ſlain. At the firſt, credit was given to him that brought the news. But afterwards, when as there was a band of ſouldiers thither ſent by the permiſſion of the Decemvirs, to bury them that there lay dead: they obſerving none of their bodies there, to be diſarmed and de- O ſpoiled, and Siccius lying in the midſt of his armour, and all the reſt of the dead with their faces towards him: no corps of enemie, nor footing of them departing from thence, brought away with them his dead carcaſſe, and made report that undoubtedly and paſſe all peradventure, he was murdred by his own companie. Hereupon was the whole camp filled with hatred and deteſtation of this fact, and generally it was agreed, that Siccius forthwith ſhould be convaied to Rome, had not the Decemvirs made haſt to ſolemnize his funerals ſouldierlike, at the publike charges of the common treaſurie. So interred was he with exceeding ſorrow and mourning

A of the ſouldiers, but to the moſt ſhameful obloquy and infamy of the Decemvirs, amongſt the common ſort.

Now followeth the other heinous deed committed within the City: which began of wanton luſt, and had as foul and ſhameful an end, as that which upon the carnal abuſing and bloody death of Lucretia, caſt the Tarquins out of the City, and deprived them of their regal dignity: that both KK. and Decemvirs, might have not only the like ſucceſs and iſſue, but alſo one and the ſelf ſame cauſe of loſing their rule and dominion. Appius Claudius enamoured upon a virgin, a commoners daughter, lufted to the abuſe and ſpoil of her body. The father of the maiden L. Virginius, was of good calling, and in place of credit in the camp that lay in Algidum, and had the leading there B of a company: a man of honeſt example and converſation of life, both at home and alſo abroad in warfare. His wife likewiſe of vertuous diſpoſition: ſo were their Children nurtured and taught accordingly. He had eſpouſed and affianced his daughter in marriage to one L. Icilius, a man of ſtout courage (as having been Tribune) and whoſe vertue and valor had been well tried and approved in the quarrel and defence of the commonalty. This damſel in the prime of her years, paſſing fair and beautiful withal, Appius (I ſay) caſt a fancy and liking unto, and ſo burned in love of her, that he aſſayed with gifts and fair promiſes to win her good wil. But ſeeing all guarded and ſurely fenced with maidenly ſhamefaſtneſs and honeſty, he bent his mind wholly to cruel and proud violence. He inborneth and ſetteth on a favorite and follower of his, one M. Claudius, to make challenge and lay claim unto her as his bond-maid: and not to give place nor yeeld her C unto them, that required to have her at liberty out of his hands, during the ſuit, and until ſhee brought proof of her freedom: ſuppoſing, becauſe the father of the virgin was abſent, he had good opportunity to work this feat, and compaſs his intended injury. As the maiden therefore was comming into the market place, (for there were the ſchools for peties kept, of reading and writing) the Decemvirs man (a broker to ſerve his maſters luſt) laid hold upon her, avowing that ſhe was his bond-ſervants daughter, and therefore his bond-maid: commanding her to follow him, and threatning beſides, that if ſhe made any ſtays, he would have her away perforce. The fearful girl hereat was amazed, and her nurſe withal cried to the Quiritsfor help: whereupon the people came running and flocked together all about them. Now was the name of Virginius her father and likewiſe of Icilius her ſpouſe, very gracious and popular: ſo that the love and favour D wherein they ſtood, raiſed friends and acquaintance: and the indignity of the thing beſides moved the whole multitude to tender the cauſe of the damſel. When as therefore ſhe was now paſt danger of violence, the party that made claim unto her, ſaid there was no need that the people thus ſhould gather together, for his meaning was to proceed only by order of law, and not with any violent courſe. And ſo he cited her to the court, minding to commence his action againſt her, and put her in ſuit. Then they that were preſent to aſſiſt her, perſwaded her to follow. Now when they were come before Appius, ſitting judicially upon his tribunal ſeat, the Plaintif, or challenger aforeſaid, declareth againſt her, and telleth a tale ful wel known to the Judge himſelf, being the author and deviſer of the whole matter and argument: Namely, that the maiden was born in his houſe, and by ſtealth was from thence conveied home to Virginius, and ſo was his E ſuppoſed and reputed daughter: this he averred to have certain knowledge of, by pregnant evidences and witneſſes: and would make proof thereof to be moſt true, and let Virginius himſelf be the judg, whom the greater part of this wrong deeply touched: in the mean while, it was but meet and reaſon, that the bond-maid ſhould go with her Maſter. The friends and advocates of the damſel, having aliedged and pleaded in her behalf, that Virginius was abſent and employed in the affairs of Common-weal: and if he had word thereof, would not fail but be at home within two days: that it was no reaſon, that whiles a father was away, he ſhould be in contention and controverſie about his children: they required of Appius therfore to defer and put off the hearing of the whole matter, until her fathers coming, and that according to a law by himſelf in that caſe made and provided, he would grant her to be at large and ſtand at liberty, for to bring in proofs F that ſhe was not bond: and that he would not ſuffer a maid of thoſe years, ripe and ready for a husband, to be more in hazard and danger of her good name, then prejudiced in the trial of her freedom. Appius made a long preface and diſcourſe before his decree, namely, how much he favoured and tendered the cauſe of liberty, and to that effect, alledged the ſel ſame law which the friends of Virginius pretended for their purpoſe and demand. But ſo far forth, and no otherwiſe, ſhould there be in that law aſſured ſafeguard of freedom, as the caſe altered not in circumſtance of cauſes and perſons. For, this priviledge and benefit held only in thoſe that were claimed to be free, where any man whoſoever might go to law and plead. As for her, who was in her fathers hand & at his diſpoſition there was no other man elſe, unto whom the Maſter that maketh challenge, is to yeeld the right of his poſſeſſion. His pleaſure therefore was, and thus he decreed, That G the father ſhould be ſent for; and that in the mean ſeaſon, he that made title to her, ſhould not be prejudiced thereby, but that he might lead away the wench, promiſing and aſſuming to have her forth-coming, and to preſent her in Court, at the return of him who is pretended and nominated to be her father. Againſt this injurious decree, when as many men rather muttered and murmured then any one durſt refuſe and contradict it, P. Numitorius, the maids Uncle by the mother ſide, and Icilius her eſpouſed husband, hapned to come in place: and having way made them through the throng and preſs, the multitude thought verily, that by the coming, eſpecially of Icilius, Appius might have been reſiſted and croſſed. But then the Lictor pronounced that

Appius had paſſed an order and decree already, and put Icilius back: who cried out aloud (for ſo manifeſt and horrible a wrong had been enough to have moved a very Saint, and ſet on fire a right mild natured perſon.) "Nay, Appius (quoth he) thou haſt more need to ſet me back with "force of arms, if thou wouldſt go clear away, and not be ſpoken to, for that which thou wouldſt "do in hucker mucker. This maid, I tell thee, I mean ſhal go with me: I purpoſe to have her "to my ſelfe, an honeſt and pure virgin, and enjoy her in lawful marriage, as my wedded wife: "call therefore unto thee all the Lictors beſides (thou were beſt) that belong unto thy compani- "ons: cauſe both rods and axes to be made ready: I tell thee, Icilius his eſpouſed wife, ſhall not "abide in any place without her fathers houſe. What? although ye have taken from the Com- "mons of Rome the Tribuns aſſiſtance and protection, and the priviledge of Appeal, two principal "bulwarks for defence of their liberty: ye are not therefore allowed to rule and tyrannize, and "to fulfil your luſt upon our children and wives too. Exerciſe your rigour and cruelty and ſpare "not, upon our backs and ſides in ſcourging us, yea, upon our necks and heads alſo, in taking "them from our ſhoulders: ſo ye forbear to aſſail our chaſtity and honeſty. Whereunto, if any "violence ſhall be offered, I will for my part, call for the help of the Quirites here preſent, in "the behalf of my ſpouſe: and Virginius for himſelf will call to the ſouldiers, in regard of his on- "ly daughter: we will cry for help of God and man: and coſt it ſhall our lives before thou go away "with this decree, and put it in execution. I require and charge thee, O Appius therefore to be "wel adviſed, and look how far thou doſt proceed. Let Virginius when he is come, ſee to his "daughter, how he dealeth about her: and let him know thus much for certain, that if he give "place to this plaintifs aſſertion, and forgo the preſent poſſeſſion of her, he ſhall go ſeek his eſtate "and propriety that he hath in his daughter. As for me, in this quarrel of maintaining the free- "dom of my ſpouſe, I will loſe my life, before I fail in my faithful promiſe to her made. Hereat the whole multitude was moved, and like it was, that ſome mutiny and fray would preſently have enſued. For the Lictors had hemmed in Icilius on every ſide. Howbeit they proceeded no far- ther then to big words and high threats: whiles Appius laid hard to Icilius, "That he did not "this ſo much in the behalf and defence of Virginius, as, (being himſelf an unruly perſon, and even "already breathing forth a Tribuns ſpirit) ſought means, and picked occaſion of an uproar and ſe- "dition. Howbeit for his part, he would not that day miniſter unto him any matter thereof. And "that he might now wel know, that he did not this to feed his malapert ſaucineſs, but in re- "gard of the abſence of Virginius, and for the name of a father, and the tender reſpect of freedom, "he would not that day ſit to hear and determin the matter, nor award a definitive judgment in "that caſe: but would requeſt Mar. Claudius, to ſuſpend his action, and to forbear and yeeld ſo "much of his own right, as to ſuffer the maid to be bailed and go under ſureties, and to be at her "liberty until the next day. But in caſe her father appeared not in Court the morrow after, he "gave Icilius, and ſuch as he was, to wit and underſtand, that neither the law ſhould want the "patronage of the maker, nor the Decemvir fail in courage and reſolution: neither would he cal "together his fellow officers and ſergeants, for to keep under ſuch ſeditious and turbulent ſpirits "as he was: but would content himſelf with his own Lictors, and do wel enough. The time now of effecting this injury, being thus deferred, and the maids Advocates gone aſide, they agreed firſt of all upon this point, that a brother of Icilius, and a ſon of Numitorius, two luſty and nimble young men, ſhould be diſpatched ſtraight from thence to the gate: and that with all ſpeed poſſible Virginius ſhould be ſent for home from the camp: for that it ſtood the maid upon as much as her whole eſtate and life was worth; that he would be preſent and ready in due time the day follow- ing, to preſerve her from this hard courſe, and wrongful proceeding. According as they were bid- den, they ſet forward, and ſpared no horſefleſh, until they brought tidings hereof to her father. All this while the plaintif that made challenge to the maid, was very inſtant with Icilius to bail her, and put in ſureties. And he again made anſwer, That he went about it as faſt as he could, and did nothing elſe: but indeed trifling out the time on purpoſe, until the meſſengers that were ſent to the camp, were got afore wel onward on their way. Then the whole multitude on all ſides held up their hands, in token that they offered themſelves every one unto Icilius, ready to be- come bound. Whereupon, he burſt out into tears for tender heart. Gramercy (quoth he) my ma- ſters all, to morrow I wil uſe your helping hand: for this time I am ſped of ſureties enough. So was Virginia ſet at liberty, and bailed by the ſuretiſhip of her kinſfolk. Then Appius, after he had ſtayed a while, becauſe he would not ſeem to have ſat for that matter alone, when he ſaw all other ſuits and cauſes omitted, in regard they had to it, and no man coming to him for juſtice, he a- roſe, gat him home to his houſe, and wrote unto his brethren Decemvirs into the camp, that they ſhould not give Virginius his paſport, but keep him faſt in durance, and in ward. This wick- ed practiſe (as God would have it) came ſhort. For Virginius already had got his diſcharge, and was departed forward on his journey, in the evening by the ſetting of the firſt watch. And very early in the morning came the letters for to ſtay him, but all in vain. For Virginius by break of day was arrived: by which time the whole City reſorted into the common place, ſtanding and waiting earneſtly for his coming. And thither he himſelf being in ſoiled and ſimple array, brought his daughter in her old worn cloaths, accompanied with certain Wives, and a great number of Advocates and friends: Then and there began he to go from one man to another, and to labour them hard: and not only beſought their aſſiſtance by way of intreaty and prayer, but alſo requi- red it as due and deſerved: ſaying, that he ſtood dayly in field ready to fight in defence of their

A wives and children: neither could there be reported of any man more hardy exploits and valiant pieces of ſervice in war, then of him ſelf. But what booteth or availeth all this (quoth he) to ſave the City from enemies, in caſe our children be forced to abide the utmoſt extremities that befal unto Cities taken by the enemies? thus went he about preaching, as it were, from one man to another. Likewiſe Icilius caſt forth and redoubled like ſpeeches freely and ſpared not. But the train of women, with their ſtill and ſilent weeping, moved men more then any words uttered. All this notwithſtanding, Appius in his obſtinate mind (ſo diſquieted was he and wholly poſſeſſed with a forcible ſpirit of humorous madneſs rather then of amorous paſſion) aſcended up into the tribunal. Where, as the plaintif firſt of himſelf was framing ſome ſhort complaint, that by reaB ſon of partial favour and making of great friends, he could not have law and juſtice the day paſt: before that either he had made an end of his demand, or given leaſure to Virginius for to put in his anſwer accordingly: Appius interrupted the ſpeech, and began himſelf. What preamble it was that he made before his decree, peradventure ſome ancient writers have for truth recorded. But for as much as I cannot any where find, in ſo ſhameful a decree, that which carrieth but a ſhew and ſoundeth like a truth: therefore, that only which is of all agreed upon, I thought beſt to ſet down, even the ſentence barely without any preface at all: namely, That he judged her in the behalfe of the Plaintif to be his bond-ſervant. Firſt, all men there, wondered at this unworthy and foul act: and being ſtrucken therewith aſtonied, for a good while after, ſtood ſtill and held their peace. But afterwards, when as M. Claudius, went to lay hand on the maid, amongſt the dames C that ſtood about her, and was received with a piteous lamentation, and cry of the women: Then Virginius becking with his hands and ſhaking them at Appius: "To Icilius (quoth he) have "I betrothed my daughter and not to thee O Appius: brought her up I have for honeſt and "chaſt wedlock, and not for unclean and filthy whordom: to be a wife another day, and not an "harlot. Is this the manner of it, like bruit and wild beaſts without all regard, to leap and run "upon you care not whom, and to fulfil your fleſhly luſt? How theſe that be here wil ſuffer ſuch "pranks, I know not: but they that are in camp with ſword in hand, I hope, will never put them "up. Now when as he that challenged the maid was by a knot of Women and Advocates that ſtood about her repelled back, then proclamed the Bedle and commanded ſilence. And the Decemvir having his head intoxicate, and altogether carried away with unbridled luſt, brake forth D and ſaid, That he had certain intelligence and was informed of a truth, by manifeſt and aſſured evidences, (and not induced and led thereto by the reviling taunts of Icilius yeſterday, and the violent proceedings of Virginius, whereof he had the people of Rome to bear witneſs, and which might give ſome light and preſumptions) That the night paſt, there were meetings and conventicles in the City, and all to raiſe a mutiny and inſurrection: and therefore, he not ignorant of ſuch a broil and riot toward, was come down into the common place with a guard of armed men: not minding to hurt any one that would keep the peace, but only by vertue of the majeſty of government and authority, to repreſs ſuch as troubled the peaceable ſtate of the City: therefore it were beſt for them to be ſtill and quiet. Go Sergeant (quoth he) cauſe the people to avoid the place, and make room for the maſter to lay hand upon his bond-ſlave: and after he had thundred E out theſe words full of ire and wrath, the multitude of themſelves gave back and made way: ſo the poor ſilly wench ſtood all forlorn and left as a prey to their injurious clutches. Then Virginius ſeeing all paſt help and no other remedy: Well Appius (quoth he) pardon me firſt I beſeech thee, if upon a fatherly affection and grief of heart, I have let fal ſome ſhrewd and curſt words againſt thee more then was beſeeming: Then, give me leave here before the virgin, to enquire of her nurſe the truth of this matter, that if I have fathered her untruly, I may go hence better apayed and ſatisfied in my mind. Leave being granted, he led his daughter and the nurſe apart from the reſt, neer to the Church of Venus Cloacina, hard at the ſhops, called at this day Novæ Tabernæ, i. e. the new ſhops or ſtandings: and there having caught a knife from a butcher, he thus ſpake: My ſweet daughter, no other means have I but this only to ſet thee free: and ſo he ſtruck F the damſel to the heart: and looking preſently to the judgement ſeat, Here with this blood I ſacrifice thee Appius, and thy head to the Devil. Appius with the crie that aroſe upon ſo horrible a fact, being much troubled, commanded Virginius to be apprehended: but he with bloody blade in hand, made way where he went, until with a number that followed him apace to bear him company, he recovered the gate. Icilius and Numitorius took up the bloodleſs corps, and held it aloft to the people, blaming and curſing the wickedneſs of Appius: pitying the unhappy and unfortunate beauty of the damſel: and bewailing the hard exigent and extremity of the father. The Matrons followed after and cried: Is this the condition and fortune allotted unto parents for getting and bearing children? Is this the hire and reward of chaſtity and virginity: with other like ſpeeches, which in ſuch a caſe, women in their grief of mind uſe to utter: whoſe ſorrow as it is G more heavy, proceeding from weak and tender hearts, ſo it yeeldeth and affordeth more pitiful and lamentable words, as they make their plaints and dolorous moans. But the men and Icilius above the reſt, had no other talk but of the Tribunes authority, and the appeal unto the body of the people, how they were taken away from them, and of other publick indignities and common diſcontents. The whole multitude partly upon the hainouſneſs of this wicked act, and partly for hope by this occaſion to recover again their liberties, were all upat once in an uproar. Appius one while commanded Icilius to be called, another while for his diſobedience and contumacy to be attached and convented before him. At the length, ſeeing no way made unto the Apparitors, for to come by him, paſſed himſelf with a crew of tall gentlemen of the Nobility that were of his H guard through the throng & commanded to have him away to priſon. By which time there were gotten about Icilius not only the multitude, but the chief Captains and ringleaders of the multitude, L. Valerius and M. Horatius: who having thruſt the ſergeant back, ſaid withal, that if Ap- pius had any thing to charge him with by order of law, they would bail Icilius, and maintain his cauſe againſt him, who was but a private perſon: but if he went about to offer violence, he ſhould ſoon meet with his matches. Hereupon grew a fierce brawl and broil. The Decemvirs officer ſetteth upon Valerius and Horatius to lay hold upon them: but his rods were by the multitude broken to pieces. Then Appius gets him up into the common place of audience, for to ſpeak unto the people. Horatius and Valerius follow after him up, to do the like. Them the aſſembly heard with I patience, but they hiſſed at Appius and cried out againſt him. Then Valerius took upon him, and commanded the Lictors to give attendance no longer upon a private perſon. Whereupon, Appius his heart was done and his courage quailed: and ſo ſtanding in fear of his life, he was fain to cover his face, and to withdraw himſelf in diſguiſed manner, and took an houſe over his head, neer unto the common place (unknown to his adverſaries) there to ſave himſelf. Sp. Oppius, for to reſcue and ſuccour his Colleague, ruſhed from an other ſide into the place: and there he might ſee force and might to have got the upper hand of authority. After many devices and conſultations, wherwith he was diſtracted, and framing himſelf to yeeld conſent on every ſide, at length by the advice and perſwaſions of many there about him, in great fear he commanded the Senat to be called together. This appeaſed the multitude, for that they were in hope that (by means of the Senators, K who many of them, ſeemed to miſlike the acts and proceedings of the Decemvirs) that government of theirs ſhould come to an end. The Senat deviſed and took order, not to provoke the Commons too far: and withal to have a more provident and ſpecial eye, that the coming of Vir- ginius into the camp, bred no mutiny in the army. Whereupon were ſent certain of the puny Senators unto the hoſt, that lay encamped upon the hill Vecilius, who advertiſed the Decemvirs from the Senat, to endeavor all they could to keep the ſouldiers in good order, from commotion and ſedition. But there Virginius raiſed a greater uproar and tumult then he had left behind him in the City. For beſides that, he was ſeen coming with a crew and train almoſt of four hundred men, who incenſed with the indignity of the late accident, accompanied him voluntary from the City, his naked drawn knife, and himſelf beſprinkled and embrued with blood, cauſed the whole L camp to turn their eyes upon him. Moreover, their gowns ſeen in ſundry places within the camp, made a greater ſhew of citizens in number then was indeed. Being demanded of them what news, and what the matter was, he wept, and for a good while held his peace. At the laſt, when as now the multitude, that for fear ran confuſedly together, began to ſtand ſtill and keep ſilence: he declared orderly from the beginning to the end, every thing in particular, as it was done. Then lifting up his hands to heaven, and calling to all his companions and fellow ſouldiers, he beſought them not to impute that foul act unto him, whereof in truth Appius Claudius was the author and cauſe: nor to deteſt and abhor him as a parricide and murderer of his own children: ſaying, that his daughters life was more dear unto him then his own, if ſhe might have lived free and honeſtly. But when he ſaw her once haled by force, as a bond-maid to be raviſhed and made a ſtrumpet, M he thought it better to be bereſt of his children by death, then by contumely and reproach: and ſo upon meer pitifulneſs incurred the ſhew and appearance of cruelty. And but that he repoſed ſome hope in the aid of his fellow ſouldiers, truſting that they would be revenged for his daughters death, he would not have remained a liveſman after her. I know well (ſaith he) that you alſo have daughters, ſiſters and wives of your own: And it is not the death of my child that hath killed and mortified the luſt of Appius, but rather the longer it eſcapeth unpuniſhed, the more outragious and unbridled would it be. So that by the calamity of another man, ye are well taught and warned to beware of the like injury. As for me, I have buried my wife before, who died on Gods hand: and now my daughter, for that ſhe might not finiſh the courſe of her days, with the ſafety of her maiden head and chaſtity, hath died, I confeſs, a pitiful and lamentable, but yet an N honeſt kind of death. As to Appius, (quoth he) now can he not fulfil his luſt in this my houſe:

and for any other violence of his whatſoever, I carry the ſame mind and heart ſtill, to defend mine own body, wherewith I have already ſaved my daughters. Now let other men look to themſelves and their children, as well as they can. As Virginius uttered theſe ſpeeches aloud, the whole multitude with one accord cried and proteſted, they would not fail, but both revenge his grief, and maintain their own freedom. The Citizens alſo in their ſide gowns, intermingled among the ſouldiers, made the ſelf ſame complaints: ſhewing how much more horrible thoſe things were in the eye to be ſeen in fact, then they could ſound unto the ear by bare relation: and withal reported, how at Rome the matter was well neer diſpatched already, for that there were certain come after them, even hard at their heels from thence, who brought word that Appius had like O to have been murdered, and was departed into exile: and ſo far prevailed they with them, that they gave the alarme, plucked up their ſtandards, and took their way to Rome. The Decemvirs being ſore troubled, both at theſe preſent occurrents which they evidently ſaw, and alſo to hear theſe news, in what bad tearms all things ſtood at Rome, ran up and down, here one, and there another, into ſundry parts of the camp, for to appeaſe the tumult. When they went to work mildly and gently, they had not a word of them again: but if any one laid his commandment upon them, and extended his authority, they would beard them and anſwer, That they were men, and

A more then that men in arms and ſouldiers. Thus march they in order of battel toward the City, and take the mount Aventine, and there ſettle themſelves. And as they encountred any, all their ſong was this, to exhort and encourage the Commons to recover their franchiſes, and to create Tribuns of the Commonalty. Not a word was heard elſe, tending to any violence. Oppius aſſembled the Senat together: where it was agreed, not to proceed by way of rigour in any caſe: for as much as they themſelves had given the occaſion of ſedition. But three ancient perſonages, ſuch as had been Conſuls, were ſent Commiſſioners in Embaſſage, as it were, Sp. Tarpeius, C. Iulius, and Publius Sulpitius with commiſſion, to demand of them in the name of the Senat, by whoſe commandment they had abandoned the camp, or what their intent was thus in war-like manner to B keep the Aventine: and why leaving to war with their enemies, they had thus invaded their native Country: They were not to ſeek of an anſwer, only there wanted a man to give the anſwer: for as yet they were grown to no certain head, upon whom they might rely: and ſingly by themſelves they durſt not incur the hatred and dangerous diſpleaſure that might enſue. This only the multitude with one voice cried aloud, to ſend L. Valerius, and Marcus Horatius unto them, for to thoſe they would make a reſolute anſwer. The Commiſſioners being diſmiſſed, Virginius putteth the ſouldiers in mind, and advertiſeth them, how erewhile in a matter not of the greateſt importance, they were in fear and perplexity, becauſe the multitude was without an head: and how an anſwer was returned, although not altogether unprofitable and beſides the purpoſe, yet agreed upon at a venture, and not proceeding from any publick counſel. But now his opinion was, that C there ſhould be ten choſen to bear ſoveraign rule: who for the honour of warfare and ſouldiery, ſhould be called military Tribuns. And when this dignity was to him offered firſt, Nay (quoth he) reſerve ſtill theſe your good perſwaſions and judgments of me, unto more happy days and favourable times both to me and you. For neither doth the remembrance of my daughter ſuffer me to take joy of any honour in this life, nor (as the ſtate ſtandeth now troubled) is it good for you to have them to be your Magiſtrates, who of all other are moſt expoſed to ill will and diſpleaſure, and in neereſt danger to be hardly thought of. If I may ſerve you in any ſtead, you may make bold, and have no leſs uſe of me, remaining ſtill a private perſon. So they create Tribuns military, ten in number. But all this while was the army as unquiet in the Sabins country. For even there alſo, by the inſtigation of Icilius and Numitorius, the ſouldiers fell away from the Decemvirs and de-D parted. For their minds were no leſs troubled and diſquieted with the remembrance renued, of the late murder of Siccius, that kindled and ſet on fire by the freſh news of the death of Virginia, ſo villanouſly, ſo ſhameleſly laid unto and challenged, and all to ſatisfie the luſt of another. Icilius, ſo ſoon as he heard ſay, that there were ten military Tribuns created in Aventine, fearing leſt the Election in the City ſhould follow the prerogative of the military Election in the camp, as a predecent to create the ſelf ſame men Tribuns of the Commons, being a man well ſeen and experienced in theſe popular affairs, and reaching himſelf at the ſame dignity and promotion, wrought ſo with his adherents and friends, that before they went to the City, they ſhould likewiſe elect the ſelf ſame number with equal authority. Who entred the City with banners diſplayed, at the gate Collina, and marched through the midſt thereof in warlike order, up to the Aventine. And E there joining and uniting themſelves unto the other army, they gave in charge to the twenty military Tribuns, to create out of their number twain for ſoveraign governors to rule all. So they elected Marcus Oppius, and Sextus Manilius.

The Senators being in great care for the Common-weal, ſat in Councel every day: where they ſpent time oftner in wrangling and jarring, then in ſage advice and politick counſel. The murdering of Siccius, the wanton luſt and looſe life of Appius, the ſhameful diſgraces received in the wars, were laid in the Decemvirs diſh. At length they concluded, that Valerius and Horatius ſhould go to the Aventine. But they refuſed and would not go, but upon condition that the Decemvirs would give up the Enſigns and Ornaments of that Magiſtracy and government, which by right they ſhould have forgon and departed from, a full year before. The Decemvirs were grie-F ved and complained, thus to be ſet down & made no better then private men, and ſaid flatly they would not be depoſed from their place of rule, before thoſe laws were fully enacted and confirmed. for which at firſt time they were created. The Commons having intelligence by Duillius (who had been a Tribun of the Commons) that by reaſon of continual debate and contention in the Senat houſe, there was nothing done and agreed upon, removed from the Aventine unto mount Sacer. For Duillius ceaſed not to ſuggeſt, and plainly affirm unto them, that the Senators and Ancients of the City would never ſadly think upon any care and proviſion to be made, until they ſaw the City abandoned and deſolate: moreover, That the mount Sacer would put them in mind of the conſtant reſolution of the Commons; and that they ſhould well know, that matters would never be ſetled and brought to concord, without they reſtored unto them their pow-G er and authority again. So they take their way by Nomentana Via, which at that time was named Ficulenſis, and encamped themſelves in the mountain Sacer; doing no harm to any creature as they paſſed along: following therein the modeſty of their forefathers. The whole Commonalty followed after the hoſt: there was not one who for age was able to travel on foot, that drew back and tarried behind. Their children and wives bare them company, in piteous wiſe moaning themſelves, and asking them: whereto they would leave them behind in that City, where neither their honeſt chaſtity might be guarded, nor yet their liberty ſecured and kept ſafe. When as now, by reaſon of his uncouth and ſtrange deſolation, all ſeemed at Rome waſte and void, and none to be ſeene in the publick place, beſides a few of aged men: and when the Senators were H abroad, the Decemvirs overweighed with the general conſent and unity of the houſe, promiſed:

That ſeeing it was ſo thought good, they would be wholly ordered and ruled by the Senators.
This only they beſought at their hands, and admoniſhed them of, by way of a proviſo, that they would take order for the ſafety and ſecurity of their perſons: and not by ſhedding their blood, to fleſh the Commons, and to train them up, and acquaint them with exerciſing cruelty upon the no-we find in records) and M. Duillius, who before the chuſing of Decemvirs, had right worthily ny former deſert, M. Titinius, M. Pomponius, C. Apronius, Ap. Julius, C. Oppius. Then C. Icilius immediately in the very entrance into the Tribunſhip, preferred a bill unto the Commons, and the Commons enacted it. That the departure and inſurrection of the common people againſt the Decemvirs, ſhould not be laid to any mans charge, nor bring him into trouble. Then without farther delay M. Duillius went through with an act of his own, to wit, That there ſhould be Con-E ſuls created, with reſervation of liberty to appeal unto the people. All theſe things paſſed in the Comices of Commons, aſſembled in the meddows named Flaminia, which now they cal Circus Flaminius.

Then, by an Inter-regent were Conſuls created, L. Valerius and M. Horatius, who preſently Conſuls elected again.
began their government. Whoſe popular Conſulſhip, as it was without wrong doing to the Senators and Nobles, ſo it was not without ſome offence committed of their part: For whatſoever was provided for the liberties of the Commons, they ſuppoſed it abridged ſomewhat of their power and authority. And firſt and formoſt, whereas it was a queſtion and controverſie not well cleared in law, Whether the Nobles were bound to ſtand to the Acts of the Commons: they made a law now in a general Seſſion by the ſuffrages of the Centuries, That what ordinance ſoever the F Commons (being parted by Tribes) had by their voices granted, it ſhould compriſe and bind the whole body of the people. By which law, the Tribuns acts were armed with a moſt ſharp and keen weapon to ſtrike withal. Moreover, The other Conſular law concerning Appeal, the only fort and ſtrength of liberty, which by the Decemvirs abſolute power had been overthrown, they not only revive again, but alſo fortifie the ſame for the time to come, by making a new law, forbidding expreſly that no man ſhould create any magiſtrate abſolutely without the liberty of appealing: and whoſoever ſhould creat any ſuch, he might rightfully and lawfully be killed, and that murder ſhould not be counted a capital crime. And when they had ſufficiently ſtrengthned tain ſolemn ceremonies which having been of long time laid aſide & neglected, were now brought up again and put in ure. And they ordained them to be inviolate as wel in a reverent regard of religion and ſcruple of conſcience, as alſo by a ſpecial law in that behalf provided: namely that whocurſed and devoted to Jupiter and his family ſold in port-ſale at the Church of Ceres, Liber & * Libera. By vertue of this Act, the great Expoſitors of the law deny that any man is a ſacroſanct or inviolable: but (ſay they) it is enacted only, That whoſoever hurt any of them, ſhall be accurſed.

And therefore an Ædile may be attached and led away to prison by superior Magistrates. Which H although it be not warranted by law (for he is hurt, who by this law ought not to be hurt) yet it is a good argument to prove, that an Ædile is not inviolable. Marry, as for the Tribuns, they were indeed by vertue of an ancient oath of the Commons, at what time as they first created that power and authority, inviolable: as they would seem to expound and make construction of the law. Others have been, that thus open and interpret the law, That in this self same Act of Horatius, the Consuls also, yea, and Pretors too, (because they are created by the same auspicia or bird-signs that the Consuls be) were comprised, and had the benefit thereof. For a Consul is called by the name of a Iudg. But that exposition is confuted, for that in those days it was not the manner to tearm the Consul a Iudge, but the Pretor only. And thus much concerning the Consular Laws. I

The same Consuls also brought up this order and custom, that all the Acts of the Senat should be brought into the Church of Ceres, and presented unto the Ædiles of the Commons: which aforetime were suppressed and smothered, yea, and corrupted or perverted at the will and pleasure of the Consuls. After all this, M. Duillius a Tribune of the Commons, propounded unto the Commons a Law, and they let it pass and granted it, That whosoever should leave the Commonalty destitute of their Tribuns, or create any Magistrate absolute without Appeal, should be scourged, and lose his head for it. All these Acts, as they passed against the wills and minds of the Nobles: so they went clean without their contradiction: for that, all this while hitherto, there was no rigour and severity that seemed to extend and reach to any one particular person among them. But afterwards, when as both the Tribuns power, and also the Commons freedom, were once K well and surely grounded: Then the Tribuns, supposing now it was full time, that they might safely and without peril give the onset upon them, severally one by one, made choice of Virginius to be the first accuser or plaintif, and Appius Claudius the first defendant. And Virginius had not so soon arrested Appius to answer at a day, and Appius come down into the Common place, guarded with a company of tall young gentlemen of the Nobility: but presently upon the sight of him and his guard about him, the remembrance of that most cruel and detestable tyranny was refreshed and renued. Then Virginius: "Speeches (quoth he) and Orations were devised for doubtful causes: and therefore will I neither spend time in accusing him before you, from whose cruelty ye have by force of arms delivered your selves: nor suffer this wretch, over and besides his other wicked pranks, to shew in the defence of himself his audacious impudence. Therefore, as touching all other lewd parts of thine and wicked designments, O Appius, which thou hast for these two years ungratiously and impiously enterprized and practised one on the neck of another, I will do thee some favour, and pardon thee: but for one crime only, unless thou canst acquit thy selfe the better, namely, that thou being the Iudge, against all order of Law, didst not grant unto the party defendant, the benefit of liberty to go at large, during the time of the suit depending, until she might bring proofs of her freedom; for this, I say, I command thee to prison. Now had Appius no hope at all, either in the Tribuns helping hand, or in the doom and judgement of the people. Howbeit he both called upon the Tribuns for succour: and also seeing himself tugged and haled away by the officer, and no man to stay his hand: I appeal (quoth he) unto the people. This one word in maintenance of freedom, being heard to come out of that M mouth, that lately had given sentence on his side that impeached the freedom of one, and challenged the party for bond, caused silence. And when every man to himself secretly muttered in this wise: "I see well (when all is done) there are Gods in Heaven, and such Gods as neglect not the affairs of mortal men. Pride and cruelty (although it be long first) at length will surely have a fall, and throughly be punished. Lo, how he is now fain to appeal, who aforetime abolished and took away all appeal: he humbly craveth relief of the people, who heretofore trod under foot all rights and franchises of the people: and see how he is carried to prison, destitute and deprived of the benefit of liberty, who awarded and adjudged a free body to bandage and servitude. Amidst these words, I say, that might be overheard in that confused humming of the assembly, Appius also was perceived to call unto the people of Rome for relief and mercy. He reckoned N up withal, the deserts of his ancestors in the behalf of the C. W. both at home in the City, and abroad in the wars: he alledged his own unhappy affection (when time was) to the Commonalty of Rome, and partaking with them: and namely how with the exceeding displeasure of the Nobility, he resigned up his Consulship, and all for to bring in and establish equal and indifferent laws to both parties. He rehearsed moreover his own laws, which notwithstanding they remained stil in force and strength, he, the law-giver himself, was going to prison. But concerning his own proper parts and deserts good or bad, he would then make trial thereof (he said) when he should be permitted judicially to make his defence: as for the present time, he pleaded the common benefit of the City, to wit, that being a Citizen, he might at the appointed day, speak for himself & stand to the doom of the people: neither feared he the hatred & malice of men so much O as to repose no hope at all in the equity and mercy of his neighbors and fellow Citizens. But and if he were cast into prison and not suffered to come unto his answer, then he would once again call upon the Tribuns of the Commons for their help, and admonish them, not to follow and imitate them, whom they would seem to hate. And in case the Tribuns will be known and avow that they are linked in the same bond and covenant to abolish and take away the benefit of calling unto any one of them by way of mediation (against which they have charged & blamed the Decemvirs for complotting & agreeing together) then he said, that he appealed unto the people.

"a personage punished, and the very Commons themselves thought their liberty too large & ex-

Amid these affairs, there came to Rome Embassadors from the Latins and Hernicks, to congratulate, and to shew their joy and great contentment, for the unity and concord between the Nobles and the Commons: in token wereof, they brought as a present unto Jup. Opt. Max. a crown of gold, not very massie in weight, but according to their ability, which was not much, yet answerable to their devotion: which men performed rather with religion and zeal in those days, than in portly shew and magnificence. By relation and intelligence from them they were certified also that the Æquians and Volscians prepared war with all the power they could make.
E Whereupon, the Consuls were commanded to part their provinces between them. To Horatius befel the Sabins, and to Valerius the Æquians and Volscians. And when they had proclamed musters against these wars, such was the forward affection and favour of the Commons, that not only the younger folk, but also a great sort of these that by law were dispensed with, and discharged from warfare, and lived of their pensions, offered their voluntary service, and were ready to enter their names into the muster-Masters book: whereby the army was not only in number greater, but also for the goodness of men, more puissant, as having the old, beaten, and experienced souldiers among them. But before they went out of the City, the Decemviral laws (which now are known by the name of the twelve Tables,) they set up openly to be seen, engraven in brass. Some writers have delivered, that the Ædiles performed this office, as they had it in charge The Laws cal-

He being now a very aged man returned to sue and intreat for his deliverance out of danger, whose vices he abhorred: and in sullied weed and poor array, accompanied with those of his linage, and other his followers and vassals, went through the common place, and laboured every man one by one, "Beseeching them not to set that brand of ignominy, and bring such a *C. by vertue & prowess, so the concord of all degrees & estates might be established sure by clemency.

Some

Some there were whom he moved, more in regard of his own kindneſs and love, then in any re- H ſpect of him for whom he ſpake. But Virginius prayed them, "To take pity and compaſſion ra"ther, of him and his daughter, and to give ear to the prayers and ſupplications, not of the Clau-
"dii, who have had the day, and tyrannized over the Commons but to the neereſt friends of Vir- "ginia, the three Tribunes, who being created for the aid and ſuccour of the Commons, do now
"themſelves implore and beſeech the help and aſſiſtance of the Commons. And verily theſe tears Appius killeth himſelf. were thought more reaſonable, and like to ſpeed. Thus when Appius ſaw all means of hope cut off, before the foreſaid day appointed was come, killed his own ſelf. Soon after this, Sp. Oppius, who of all the reſt next unto Appius, was moſt hated: for that he was in the City at the very time when this unjuſt doom and ſentence of his Colleague hapned to be pronounced, was attached by I P. Numitorius. But Oppius was the worſe thought of and more prejudiced, by occaſion of an injury by himſelf done, then for not ſtopping the wrong intended by Appius to Virginia. For a witneſſe was produced to depoſe againſt him, one, who having ſerved in the wars ſeven and twenty years, had been rewarded and honoured extraordinarily eight times. This valiant ſervitor, thus adorned with thoſe gifts and marks of valour, in the view and ſight of the people of Rome rent his garments, and ſhewed his back and ſides, and the skin all broken with ſcourging: beſeeching no other favour, but if Oppius the party accuſed, could juſtly charge him with any treſpaſs and offence by him committed, he ſhould not ſpare him, but now a private perſon as he was, exerciſe Oppius dieth in priſon. and redouble his cruelty upon him once again. Well, Oppius likewiſe was had to priſon: and there before the law day, ended his life. The goods of Appius and Oppius both, the Tribuns did confiſ- K cate. Their com-partners and fellow Decemvirs fled their country and were baniſhed, and all their goods alſo were forfeit & confiſcat. And not ſo much as M. Claudius the party that laid claim unto Virginia eſcaped, but he was arreſted to anſwer at a certain day, and was condemned. Howbeit Virginius of himſelf releaſed him his life, and would not take the extremity, ſo he was ſent away and confined to Tybur, as it were into baniſhment. Thus the poor ſpirit and ghoſt of Virginia more happy after her death, then fortunate during her life, having wandered abroad, and haunted ſo many houſes for due revenge of her adverſaries: at laſt, when there was not one guilty perſon of them left unpuniſhed, gave over her walking, and reſted quiet.

Now were the nobles in exceeding fear, beholding the ſame countenance already in the Tribuns, which they had obſerved in the Decemvirs. But then M. Duillius, a Tribune of the Commons, L wiſely and politickly reſtraining and keeping within a mean this exceſſive power of theirs: "We "have enough (quoth he) both of our own liberty, and alſo of revenge of our enemies: and ther"fore I will not ſuffer for this year, any man more to be arreſted or impriſoned. For I do not like "that old faults done and paſt, and now as it were cancelled and raſed out, ſhould be revived a"gain, and brought in queſtion, ſince that by the puniſhment of the Decemvirs, ſatisfaction hath "been made for the new: and the continual care and diligence of the Conſuls both twain, for the "maintenance of your freedom aſſureth me, that nothing will be committed hereafter, that may "require and need the power of the Tribunes. This moderation at the firſt hand of the Tribun, put the Nobles out of their fear: but made the Conſuls to be thought the worſe of, (for that they had been ſo addicted, wholly to the commonalty) in that a Magiſtrate of the Commons had more M regard of the ſafety and liberty of the Nobles, than the proper Magiſtrate of the Nobility: and becauſe the adverſe part had their ſul of revenge and puniſhment of the Nobles, before it did appear that the Conſuls would once ſeem to ſtop the courſe and ſtream of their licentiouſneſs. And many there were who gave it out, that the Conſuls bare themſelvs too remiſs and ſlack in the matter, and little reſpected the good and credit of the Nobles, in that they had approved & confirmed the Acts that were propoſed by the Tribuns. And no queſtion, troubled as the ſtate was then of the C. W. they were forced to give place, and do according to the neceſſity of the time.

When the Conſuls had ſet all things in good order within the City, and ſurely grounded the ſtate of the Commonalty, they went either of them into their own Province. Valerius againſt the armies of the Æquians and Volſcians, which now had joined together in Algidum: where ful po- N litickly he held off, and ſtood upon his defence only: for if out of hand he had put it to the hazard of a battel, I cannot tell, but I greatly doubt (conſidering how the hearts of Romans and enemies both, were affected preſently upon the unfortunat conduct of the Decemvirs) it would have turned to their great loſs, and coſt them an overthrow. He therfore haying encamped a mile off from the enemies kept his ſouldiers within the camp. The enemies ranged in battel array took up the whole grounnd between both camps, & when they made bravado's, and challenged them to come forth and fight, not one Roman would anſwer them again. At length the Volſcians and Æquians, weary with long ſtanding ſtill, and in vain expecting battel, thinking verily that the honor was in manner yeelded unto them, departed: ſome into the country of the Hernicks, other ſome to the territories of the Latins, for to raiſe booties and make ſpoil: leaving behind them rather a com- O petent guard for defence of the camp, then a ſufficient power to maintain a field fight. Which when the Conſul perceived, he paid them again with the like meaſure of fear, as they before had from them received; and with his army ready embattelled, bids them battel: who being privy to themſelves what forces were wanting, forbare to fight: whereupon the Romans preſently took a better heart unto them, and made account that their enemies were overcome, being in ſuch a fear within their rampart. When they had ſtood thus a whole day ready to fight, they retired back in the evening and gave place to the night. And the Romans full of good hope, refreſhed their

A their bodies and made much of themſelves, but the enemies nothing ſo hearty and couragious, ſend out meſſengers every way in fearful haſt, to call again the forragers. Such as were near at hand came running back into the camp: thoſe that were farther off, could not be found nor met withal: Now when it was once day light, the Romans iſſue forth of the camp, intending to give an aſſault upon the Rampier, unleſs they would come forth and fight. But when it was far forth day and the enemies ſtirred not at all, the Conſul commanded to advance with their enſigns. The Æquians and Volſcians ſeeing their battell coming forward, began to chaſe and take foul diſdain, for very ſhame that their rampier and trench ſhould protect victorious armies within ths camp, rather than their weapons and valour defend them in plain and open field: and were earneſt B likewiſe themſelves with their Generals for the ſignal of battell, and at length after much importunity obteined it. Now were ſome of them ſallied out at the gates already: and others followed hard after at their heels, keeping their array, and every man coming orderly into his file and rank. By which time, the Roman Coſſ. before the battel of the enemies ſtood ſurely furniſhed with their full ſtrength, came on ſtill and gave the onſet: charged them before they were all come forth, yea, and ere they were well marſhalled that came abroad, being a multitude, waving (as it were) to and fro every way for fear, and looking about themſelves, and to their fellows: and to amuze their troubled heads the more, he aſſails them with a great ſhout and main violence. At firſt the enemies gave back: but after they had gathered their ſpirits together, and were come again to themſelves, and that their Captains on every ſide rated them, and asked them whether C they would yeeld unto them, whom before they had overcome, the fight began again to be renued. "The Conſul on the other part, willed the Romans to remember, that this was the firſt "day, wherein they being newly ſet free, were to fight likewiſe for the freed City of Rome: and "therefore they were to win a victory for themſelves, and not after victory gotten, to be a prize "for any more Decemvirs to prey upon. For they fought not now under the conduct and ſtan- "dard of Appius, but of the Conſul Valerius: who as he was deſcended from the deliverers of "the people of Rome, ſo he was one of them himſelf: exhorting them to ſhew now, that in for- "mer battels of late dayes, it was long of the leaders and not of the ſouldiers, that they atchieved "no victories: ſaying, it were a foul ſhame for them, to have had more ſtomack againſt their "own neighbours and citizens, than heart againſt their enemies; and to have ſtood more in fear D "of ſervitude at home, than of bondage abroad. As for Virginia, ſhe was but one, whoſe honeſty "and chaſtity was in time of peace hazarded: and Appius it was only, and none but he, that in "regard of his unbridled and diſſolute luſt, was the dangerous citizen. But if the fortune of war "ſhould fail on our ſide, and go againſt us, then ſhall our children all be in jeopardy, to be abu- "ſed and ſpoiled at the hands of many thouſands of enemies. Unwilling I am (quoth he) to "preſage ſuch miſeries and to prognoſticate to the City thoſe calamities, which both Iupiter "and our ſtock-father Mars, forbid and hinder to light upon it, founded upon ſo lucky ſigns and "happy foretokens at the firſt beginning: I put you in mind rather of the Aventine Hill, and "Mount Sacer: that where within theſe few months you recovered your freedom, thither ye "may carry back again your Empire, ſafe and ſound, unſteined and unfoiled: that all the World E "may ſee that Roman ſouldiers are as forward and nobly minded after the baniſhing of the De- "cemvirs, as they were before their creation: and that by the bringing in of equal and indiffe- "rent Laws, the manhood and proweſs of the people of Rome, is no whit decayed nor dimi- "niſhed. Having uttered theſe words among the enſigns of the footmen, he made ſpeed to the "cornets of the Horſemen. Go to, brave gallants, (quoth he) excel the footmen in valour and "and chivalry, like as ye exceed them in honor and degree. At the very firſt ſhock and en- "counter, the footmen forced the enemy to retreat: and being now retired to your hand, ſet "ſpurs to, gallop after them apace, and chaſe them out of the plain field: they will never abide "your violent charge: for even already they are at a bay, and ſtand rather at a ſtay, than make "any reſiſtance. Hereupon they gird out luſtily, and run their horſes among the enemies, diſ- F ordered already, and in diſarray by the ſervice of the footmen. And having broken through their ranks, and paſſed forth even to the rereward: certain of them caſt about in the void and open ground, and when the enemies were about on all ſides to fly, they turned moſt of them away from their camp, and overriding them, they got between them and home, and ſcared them wholly from thence. The footmen and the Conſul himſelf, with the whole ſtrength of the main battell, made forward to the camp, aſſailed the tents, won them, and beſides a great ſlaughter, obtained a booty far greater.

When news of this battel was brought, not only into the City, but alſo to the other army into the Sabins country, it was received in the City with joy only and ſolemnity: but in the camp it ſet the ſouldiers hearts on edge, and enkindled them to ſtrive for the like honor and renown. G Now had Horatius already partly by ſending his ſouldiers forth, to make incurſions and outrodes: and partly by training and proving them in light skirmiſhes, enured and acquainted them to truſt to themſelves and have confidence in their own good ſervice, rather than to remember the ſhamefull diſgrace and foil, received under the leading of the Decemvirs. And even thoſe ſmall bickerings had done them much good already againſt they ſhould venture upon a ſet field, and heartned them in aſſured hope to win the victory. The Sabins again for their part, ſtill luſty upon their good ſucceſs the year before, ceaſed not to provoke and urge their enemies: very oft asking them what they meant after the guiſe of robbers, to run in and out in ſmall companies, ſo to trifle out the time, and thus by peece meal to make of one entire battel many petty and ſmall skirmiſhes? H Why rather fought they not one field for all, and without more ado, hazzard all upon a caſt, and commit the whole to the trial of fortune, to ſee unto what ſide ſhe will incline. Then the Romans, beſides that of themſelves they had gathered heart and courage enough, were with the indignity of this challenge alſo ſet on fire: conſidering, that when the other army was at the point now, with victory to return into the City, their enemies began to inſult and crow over them with reproachful tearms: and if now they were not meet and even with them, when ſhould they ever be able to make their parts good? So ſoon as the Conſul perceived the ſouldiers thus to mutter and mumble within the camp, he aſſembled them all together, and thus he ſpake: "Sirs (quoth Horatius the Conſul to his ſouldiers. "he) what ſucceſs hath been, and how the ſervice hath ſped in Algidum, I ſuppoſe you have al- I

"ready heard, namely, ſuch as beſeemed the army of a free ſtate and people. By the policy of my "fellow Conſul, and the manhood of his ſouldiers together, atchieved is the victory. As for my
"ſelf, that courſe will I take, and that reſolute mind will I carry, which you my ſouldiers ſhall "afford unto me. The war may be drawn out in length profitably: it may be alſo diſpatched and "ended ſpeedily: If protracted it ſhall be, look how I have begun already to train you, with the "ſame diſcipline ſtil I wil exerciſe you, and bring to paſs, that your hope and prowes may encreaſe
"every day more then other. If your hearts now ſerve you wel, and that you like to fight it out,
"Go on in the name of God, and in token of your willing heart and valorous proweſs, now ſet "up ſuch a cry and ſhout, as you wil make when you firſt join battel, and give the charge. After that they had with exceeding cheerfulneſs ſhouted aloud: God bleſs us all (quoth he) I wil ful- K fil your deſire, and bring you forth to morrow into the field for to fight. So the reſt of that day was beſtowed in making their harneſs and weapons ready. When the morrow was come, the Sabins ſo ſoon as they perceived the Romans ranged in battel array, came forth alſo themſelves, as ready and deſirous of fight, as they. Here was a battel ſtruck, ſuch as might beſeem two armies, that truſted on both ſides in their own valour, and made ful account of that days honour. The one eager and greedy to recover their ancient glory, wonted evermore to have the upper hand, the other proudly bearing themſelves, upon a new victory lately atchieved. The Sabins beſides, mended their ſtrength wel with a ſtratagem, for when they had equally divided their battalions every way, they reſerved two thouſand drawn out of the reſt, extraordinary without the ranks apart. Who in the very time of the conflict, ſhould hotly charge the left point of the Romans: L they advancing overthwart with their enſigns, & flanking them on the one ſide, preſſed ſhrewdly upon that one point, and overcharged it, wel neer environed all about. Then the horſemen of two legions, 600. almoſt in number, alight on foot from their horſebacks, and as their fellows were even now ready to retreat, ruſh forward with all ſpeed to the forefront: and withal, made head againſt the enemy. And firſt, they put life unto them again, for that they entred equally with the footmen into danger and bare even part thereof: afterwards, for very ſhame, they gave more boldneſs and animated them to fight. For abaſhed they were, that horſemen ſhould be put to double ſervice in both kinds of fight, on horſe and on foot: and profeſſed footmen not able to countervail the horſemen, who had taken them to their feet. So they advance forward to the battel, which on their part was abandoned, and make haſte to recover the ground which they M had loſt. And in a trice, at one inſtant, not only the fight was renued, but alſo a battalion of the Sabins began to ſhrink. The horſemen cloſely among the ranks and files of the footmen, gat again to their horſes, and from thence rod ſpeedily unto the other ſide, reporting to their fellows the victory: and withal, ſharply charged the enemies, who now were affrighted, becauſe the ſtronger wing of their ſide was diſcomfited: neither were there any in this battel alſo, that were ſeen to perform better ſervice then they. The Conſul, as an overſeer, beheld all the manner of it, praiſing thoſe that ſtood to it manfully, and rebuking where they fought but faintly. They were not ſo ſoon chaſtiſed and reproved but preſently they bare themſelves like hardy men, and did right good ſervice: and look how much that praiſe excited ſome, ſo much ſhame ſtirred up others. Then with a freſh ſhout and outcry, they bent their whole force on all ſides, and compelled the ene- N mies to turn their backs: who were not able after this, to abide the violence of the Romans. The Sabins ſcattered here and there all over the fields, left their tents for a ſpoil to their enemies: where the Romans recovered again not the goods of their Allies as before in Algidum, but their very own, which they had loſt by the forraging and ſpoiling of their lands.

For this two-fold victory atchieved in two ſundry battels, the Senat right ſparingly (ſuch was their miſery) decreed in the name and behalf of the Conſuls, one days thankſgiving and proceſſi-on, and no more. But the people, the ſecond day likewiſe, without order and warrant from authority, ſolemnized the ſame in great numbers. And this popular proceſſion, diſorderly as it was, and without formality, was with more good will and better affection of men celebrated, then the other. The Conſuls of ſet purpoſe (as it was agreed afore) came within the compaſs of thoſe two O days into the City: and ſummoned the Senat to aſſemble in Mars field: where, as they were about to make ſome ſpeech of their exploits and worthy acts, the chief and principal Lords of the Senat, complained and ſhewed themſelves grieved, that the Senat was aſſembled on purpoſe, among the ſouldiers, to ſtrike a terror into them. Whereupon the Conſuls, becauſe they would give no occaſion of quarrel and fault-finding, called away the Senat from thence into Prata Flaminia, where now the Temple of Apollo ſtands, a place which even then they called Circus Apolli-naris: wher they being denied triumph with one voice and general conſent of the nobles, L. Icilius
a Tribun

A a Tribun of the Commons, propounded unto the people, to know what they thought of the Consuls triumph. And among many that ſtepped forth to croſs and diſſwade the bill, C. Claudius above all others cried out aloud, that the Coſſ. intended to triumph over the Nobles, and not over their enemies: and that they ſought a thank by way of recompence for a private favour done to the Tribun, and not for an honorable reward, for any vertue and worthy act. For never (quoth he) aforetime, was there held any treaty of triumph before the people: but evermore it was referred to the Senate, to conſider and determine of that honor. Neither had the Kings at any time, impaired the Majeſty of that higheſt Court and degree: what ſhould the Tribuns then meddle ſo much, and have their hand in all matters by vertue of their authority, as to ſuffer no publick
B counſel at all to remain in force? For a City can never be counted free, nor Laws equal and indifferent, but when each degree and eſtate retaineth ſtill their own priviledge, and hold their proper pre-eminence. When the reſt of the principal Senators had ſpoken much to the ſame effect all the Tribes notwithſtanding in general, allowed by their ſuffrages that which the Tribun had propounded. This was the firſt time that ever any triumph was granted by the voyces of the people, without the authority and aſſent of the Senators. But this victory of the Tribuns and the commonalty, had like to have turned to a dangerous ſurfeit of licentious liberty: by reaſon that the Tribuns conſpired together and were fully agreed, to be choſen Tribuns again: and to the end that their own ambition ſhould be leſs ſeen above others, they alledged to the Coſſ. for a ſufficient reaſon (that they likewiſe ſhould continue ſtill in place of government) the agreement and conſent of C the Senators: through whoſe holding together and drawing in one line the liberties of the Commons, to the great diſgrace and reproach of the Conſuls, were infringed and indammaged. For what would come of it, ſay they, if before the late Laws were fully eſtabliſhed the (new) Conſuls with their factious banding, ſhould ſet upon the new Tribuns: for we muſt not look to have alwayes ſuch as the Horatij and Valerij, to be Conſuls, men that would not regard their own weal before the freedom of the commonalty. As it hapned very well for that time, it fell to M. Duillius his lot eſpecially, to be chief Preſident of the Comices and Election: who like a prudent and wiſe man, forſeeing the heart-burning and hatred, like preſently to enſue, upon the continuance of the ſame Magiſtrates ſtill in place, ſaid flatly, that of the old Tribuns he would not propound any one: and when his brethren in office laboured earneſtly with him, to permit the Tribes to go to a free D ſcrutiny, or elſe yeeld up the charge to him allotted, of holding the aſſembly, unto his brethren, who would keep the ſame and manage the matter, according to Law rather than to the will and pleaſure of the Nobles: Duillius then, ſeeing their earneſt contention, cauſed the Conſuls to be called into their own pues and ſeats, and demanded their minds concerning the Election of the Conſuls: and when they anſwered that they would create new, he having once got them to be the authors of a popular ſentence, and not popular themſelves, went forth together with them into the aſſembly of the people. Now when the Conſuls were brought out into their preſence, and were asked the queſtion, what they would do, in caſe the people of Rome ſhould elect them Conſuls the ſecond time, and that, in remembrance of their liberty received and recovered by their means, and for their good ſervice in war, and worthy acts by them performed: he finding them conſtant in the E ſame mind ſtill, and nothing altered from their reſolution: after he had commended the Conſuls, for their ſteadfaſt perſeverance unto the laſt (as altogether unlike to the Decemvirs) went preſently to the new Election. And when he had created five Tribuns only, ſeeing there were no other competitours enough to reach unto ſufficient voyces of the Tribes, in compariſon of the other nine Tribuns his colleagues, who openly ſtood to be choſen again: he brake up the aſſembly, and from that time forward called no more about any Election. For he ſaid, That he had fulfilled the Law in that behalf, which without ſetting down any preciſe and definite number of Tribuns, ſo that there were ſome left behind, and rooms void, gave authority to thoſe that were created, to chuſe and take unto them more colleagues, to make up the number. And therewith he recited the words of the Law, which run in this form. If I ſhall propound ten Tribuns of the Commons to be
F created, and they ſhall that preſent day make fewer than ten: they by vertue of this Law, ſhall be accounted Tribuns, whom thoſe elected ſhall cauſe and take unto them for their fellows, and as lawful ſhall they be held, as thoſe whom this day ye ſhall create Tribuns of the Commons. Thus when Duillius perſiſted ſtill reſolute unto the end, ſaying, That in any caſe the ſtate might bear five and twenty Tribuns, and having thus conquered the greedy ambition of his colleagues: with great favor and the good liking as well of the Nobility as the Commonalty, he gave up his room. The new Tribuns now in the electing and making choiſe of their companions, curried favour with the Senators, and framed themſelves to their will and pleaſure, in chuſing to them two of the Nobility, and thoſe that had been Conſuls, to wit, Sp. Tarpeius and Au. Æternius. And Conſuls there were created, Sp. Herminius and Titus Virginius Calimontanus. Who bearing themſelves in a mean be-G tween Commons and Nobles, and not greatly inclining to one ſide or other, had peace as well at home as abroad. Lu. Trebonius, a Tribun of the Commons, being highly offended with the Senators, and ſpightfully bent againſt them, and ſaying withal, that in the coaptation of the reſt of the Tribuns, he had been cunningly over-raught by them, and betrayed by his colleagues, propoſed a Law, That whoſoever hereafter propounded unto the Commons any Tribuns to be elected, ſhould not give over, but ſtill propound, until he made up the full number of ten. Thus continued he all his Tribunſhip in perſecuting and moleſting the Nobles, never letting them to be quiet: whereupon he was ſurnamed * Aſper.

After this, M. Geganius Macrinus, and C. Julius, being created Consuls, appeased the contentious Orations of the Tribuns, which were begun and raised against the young Gentlemen of the Nobility, so as without any bitter invectives against that authority of the Tribuns, they preserved still the soveraign Majesty of the Nobles: and by means of decreeing matters against the wars of the Volscians and Æquians, stayed the Commons, and kept the City from all sedition and discord: saying, That by civil unity, all would be at quiet abroad: whereas through discord of citizens, forrainers took heart. The care likewise of outward peace, was the cause of inward and intestine concord. But evermore the one state disquieted the moderation of the other: for whiles the Commons were still and in good temper, the puny Senators began to offer them wrong and hard measure. And when the Tribuns would have assisted the weaker side, at first it booted little, and small good they did: but afterwards they themselves escaped not without abuse and hurt: and especially in their latter moneths, when as they received injuries, both by reason of the meetings and packing together of the mightier sort, and also for that toward the end of the year, the edge and vigor commonly of all authority waxeth dull and groweth feeble and weak. So that now the Commons had little or no confidence at all in the Tribunship, unless they might have such as Icilius to be Tribuns: and as for these two years last past, they had them but in bare name, and not to any effect and purpose. The elders and ancient fathers of the Senate on the other side, as they believed verily that their youth were too forward and lusty: so they were of this mind, That if there needs must be trespass and excess, they had rather those of their own degree and coat should exceed measure, and have greater stomack, than their adversaries. So tickliſh and dangerous a thing it is to keep a mean in maintenance of liberty: whiles under a colour of wishing and desiring equality, every man advanceth and lifteth up himself so, as that he thrusteth and beareth down another: and in pretending a care and regard that men should not stand in awe and fear of them, they make themselves dread and fearful to others, and so the wrong that we put off and turn from our selves, we impose upon others. As if there were no remedy, but that we must either do, or suffer injury.

Then were made Consuls, T. Quintius Capitolinus the fourth time, and Agrippa Furius: who found neither sedition within, nor war without. But yet both the one and the other was near at hand. For now could no longer the dissention of the citizens be held in, but needs it must break out. And both Tribuns and Commons rose against the Nobles. For in all the assemblies and meetings of the people, one or other alwayes of the Nobles and Senators were served with process: whereupon grew fresh troubles and new contentions. At the first noise whereof, as if the signal of battel had been given, and the al'arm stricken up, the Æquians and Volscians took arms: and withal, their Leaders and Captains (such as gaped greedily after spoil and pillage) had born them in hand and perswaded them to believe, That for these two years past, they could not go through with their musters proclaimed: for that the Commons refused to obey, and brake their alleagance: which was the only cause that there were no forces sent out against them. Besides say they, The use and manner of their warfare, is now with their licentious looseness, discontinued and clean decayed: Rome was now no more a common-wealth and country to her citizens: For, all their anger, quarrels and malice, that they bare aforetime against forrein nations, was now turned upon their own selves: so that at this time they had fit occasion and good opportunity to surprise them, blinded as wolves with mutual rage and fury one against another. Hereupon they joyned their whole power, and first wasted the country of Latium: and afterwards seeing none to encounter them and make defence (to the exceeding joy of those that were the authors of this war) they came foraging and spoiling all the way to the very walls of Rome, even before the gate Esquilina, there braving and vaunting in reproachful and scornful terms before the whole City, telling them how they had laid their fields and territories wast. From whence they retired themselves without revenge and loss, driving their booties afore them, and marched along to Corbio. Quintius the Consul seeing this, assembled the people, and there (as I have heard) he made to them a speech in this wise. "Albeit "I am not privy to my self, and my conscience accuseth me not of any fault, O Quirites, yet am "I exceedingly abashed and ashamed to come forth into this assembly of yours: that ever you "shou'd know, or the posterity hereafter understand, how the Æquians & Volscians (who of late "dayes were hardly comparable to the Hernicks) came when T. Quintius was the fourth time Cos. "in warlike manner with banner displayed to the walls of the City of Rome & went their wayes "again clear and without any hurt by them received. This shameful dishonor, if I had known it "would have light, so just in this year (and yet for this good while the world hath so gone and "such hath been the course of our life and conversation, that my mind ever gave me there was no "goodness toward) I would have avoided this place of dignity, either by banishment or death, if "there had been no other way to escape it. And might indeed have Rome been taken in the time "of my Consulship, if those weapons which were under our gates had been in the hands of valorous men? Then had I indeed enjoyed sufficient honor already. then had I lived long enough, "and a little too long, and might have dyed well when I was but the third time Consul. But who "were they, I pray you, whom these most base and cowardly enemies of ours despised and set so "light by? Were we they that are your Consuls, or you (Quirites) the people of Rome? If we were "in the fault, take from us as unsufficient & unworthy persons our rule and government: and if that "be not enough, let us over and besides be well punished and abide the smart. But if the blame be "in you Quirites, let neither God nor man chastise your trespass and offence, only do you repent "your

A "your ſelves, and be ſory therefore. It was not your cowardiſe that they ſcorned and deſpiſed, nei"ther was it their own valour wherein they truſted. For why? they having been ſo often defeated "and driven out of the camp and the field, fined with forfeiture of Lands, forced to go under the "gallows, and brought into ſervitude, knew very well both themſelves and you alſo. No, no, the "variance and diſcord between our own ſtates and degrees, is the only bane, and nothing elſe, of "this City: the jarres and debates, I ſay, between the Nobles and the Commons. Whiles neither
"we have any gage or ſtay of rule and command, nor you know mean of freedom and liberty:
"while you are weary of Noble men rulers, and we likewiſe of the Commoners Magiſtrates, they "gave gotten heart, and wax bold. Now, (Gods will) what mean you to do, and what would B "you have? Tribuns of the Commons ye longed and ſought after: for quietneſs and concord ſake, "we let you have your longing, Decemvirs you had a great miſs of, and them you deſired: we "granted and permitted them to be created. Weary you were anone, and all too weary of De-
"cemvirs: we forced them to forgo their office. And when your anger continued ſtill againſt
"them, being become private perſons again, we ſuffered to be put to death, and to be exiled, moſt
"noble and right honorable men. When you would needs elect anew your Tribuns of the Com"mons, you choſe them at your pleaſure. To create Conſuls from out of your own faction, al"though we knew it hurtful and prejudicial to the Nobles, yet have we ſeen that dignity proper "to Nobility, given away as it were, and made common with the Commonalty. The aſſiſtance of "Tribuns, the appealing to the people, the Laws and Acts deviſed by the Commons, to be ten-C "dered and impoſed upon the Nobles, to bind them thereto: and that, under the pretence and co"lour of Iſonomi, or equal and indifferent Laws, our own rights and priviledges ſhould be over"thrown, we have abidden, and do ſtill endure. When will there be an end once of diſcord and "diſſention? Shall we never have one City of it? Shall we never have this to be the common "Country of us all? We can be content much better to be at quiet, when we are vanquiſhed, than
"whiles we are victors. And is it not enough for you, that you are dread and feared of us? but ſtill
"you ſeek for more? Againſt us it was, that you took the Mount Aventine, againſt us it was that "you held and kept the Mountain Sacer. For when the gate Eſquilina, was wel-neer ſurpriſed by "the enemy, and when the Volſcians our enemies were ready to climb our trench and banks, and "to ſcale our walls, none of you there was to be ſeen, for to remove and ſet them farther off. A-D "gainſt us ye play the men againſt us ye can be armed. Well then go to: When ye have here beſet
"the Senate-houſe, taken up the market place and common Hall with ſouldiers, filled the goal
"with Noblemen, and thoſe of the chiefeſt and beſt quality, then with like courage and ſtoutneſs
"of heart ſally forth of the gate Eſquilina. Or, if you dare not venture ſo much, behold and view al
"afore you from the walls, diſcover your Lands and territories with fire and ſword waſted & con-
"ſumed, your goods and cattel had and driven away as booties and prizes, your farms and houſes "burning and ſmoking in every quarter. But all this time the Commonweal only (you think) by "this means is in worſe plight and poorer caſe, the villages fired, the City beſieged, and the enemy
"goeth his way with the honor of the war. And in what taking, I pray you, is your own private
"eſtate the while? Tidings will come anon to every man particularly, from out of his own livings E "and poſſeſſions, of his proper loſſes: and what have you at home (if a man may ask) to make ſup-
"ply again? Will the Tribuns make you reſtitution, and amends for all your damages? You ſhall
"have words of them your fill. They will not ſtick to ſpeak, to rail, and let fly ſlanders freely before "you againſt the heads of the City. Laws upon Laws you ſhall have heaped thick and threefold.
"Aſſemblies, convocations, and ſeditious invectives good ſtore. But from theſe their aſſemblies, "never came there any of you home to his houſe, richer of one gray groat or ſingle denier, nor in "better ſtate to live than before. Was there ever any one carried ought from thence to his wife &
"children but hatred and malice, diſpleaſure and rancour, grudges and heart-burnings, both publick
"and private? From which at all times ye have been ſhielded and defended, if not with your own
"vertue and innocency, yet by the help and aid of others. But certainly, when ye ſerved in wars F "under the conduct of us your Conſuls, and followed not the leading of your Tribuns: when you
"ſerved I ſay in camp, and not in the Hall and common place: when in battel your enemies quaked
"to hear you ſhout and not in your aſſemblies, the Romans were in dread of your vivas and out-
"cryes: then you wan prizes, and conquered Lands from your enemies, then you returned home
"with triumph to your houſes, ful of riches and wealth ful of honor and renown as well publick
"as private. Whereas now, you ſuffer your enemies to depart, fraught and laden with your "goods. Stick to your Ward-Leets, as if you were nailed and faſt pinned to them: dwell ſtill in "your Hall, and lead your lives continually there: yet muſt you needs war when all is done, fly from
"it as faſt as you can. Grieved it you indeed, and thought you it a trouble and painful thing, to "take an expedition ſo far as into the Volſcians and Æquians country? Lo, the war is come even G "unto your gates: if it be not put from thence, it will anon be within the walls, it will ſcale the "Caſtle and Capitol, it will follow you even into your houſes. Two years ago, the Senate gave or"der and commanded that there ſhould be ſouldiers muſtered, and an army conducted into Algi-
"dum. But we ſit ſtil at home & do nothing, but chide & ſcold (as it were) one at another like curſt
"and ſhrewd women, contenting our ſelves, and joying in a preſent peace: and little ſeeing, that of "that reſt, there will come ſundry wars again, and that right ſhortly. I know full well, there are "ſpeeches more pleaſing & plauſible than theſe. But to ſpeak the plain truth for your good rather "than to flatter and ſooth for your pleaſure, if mine own nature and diſpoſition did not teach and " admoniſh me, even very neceſſity doth force and conſtrain me. Willing would I be, and moſt H " willing, O Quirites, to pleaſe you: but much more would I have you to be in ſafety, think what" ſoever ye will of me. It falleth out commonly, as a thing that cometh by kind, that who ſo ſpea-

" keth to a multitude in his own cauſe, and for himſelf, is better liked, and heard with more ap-" plauſe, than he whoſe mind aimeth at nothing elſe but a publick weal. Unleſs peradventure you " think theſe common flatterers, theſe clawbacks, and men-pleaſers, which give you no reſt, nei" ther in war nor peace, do ſtir you up and provoke you for your good. But will you have the " truth? ye being once ſolicited and pricked on by them, ſerve their turns in good ſtead, either
" for their honor or gain. And becauſe they ſee themſelves to be of no worth and regard, while " the ſtates do agree, they deſire to play ſmall game, rather than to ſit out: to be Captains of miſ- I
" rule and lewdneſs, rather than of nothing: and in one word, to be the heads, the ringleaders
" and guides of troubles and diſſentions. Whereof, if you be ſo bleſt and happy, as to be weary now " at length, and will betake your ſelves to the ancient manners and faſhions, both of your own,
" and of your anceſtors, in lieu of theſe new fangles, I will refuſe no puniſhment: nay, let me be " put to the moſt ſhameful death that is, if I do not before many dayes paſs over my head, defeat,
" diſcomfit and put to flight theſe robbers and deſtroyers of our fields, and ſend them packing out
" of their own camp, and finally tranſlate and remove this terror of war, wherewith ye now are
" ſo affrighted and aſtonied, from our gates and walls, even unto their own Towns and Cities.
Seldom at any time elſe, had there been a ſpeech delivered by a popular Tribune, more acceptable unto the Commons, than was the ſharp Oration at this preſent of a moſt ſevere Conſul. Yea, and K the very youth, which amid ſuch terrors of war, had been wont to refuſe ſouldiery, the only keen and ſharp weapon they had to fight withal againſt the Nobles, now deſired war and to be in armes. Over and beſides, the country kerns that fled (to Rome,) ſuch alſo as were ſpoiled and wounded in the villages about, reported more foul and cruel outrages in their ears, than were preſented unto their eyes, and ſet all the City in an hot an angry broil. Now when the Senators were aſſembled together in the Councel Houſe, then verily they all caſt their eyes upon Quintius, beholding and regarding him well, as the only patron and maintainer of the Majeſty of Rome: but the chief peers and Lords of the Senate ſpake out and ſaid: That he had made an Oration, beſeeming the ſoveraign Government of a Conſul, beſeeming ſo many Conſulſhips by him already born, beſeeming the whole courſe of his life, that had paſſed oft through many honorable digni- L ties, and yet alwayes deſerved more. As for other Conſuls, they either in flattering and ſoothing up the Commons, had betrayed the dignity of the Nobles: or elſe in ſeeking by hard courſes to maintain the rights, preheminencies and royalties of their ſtate, and to tame the multitude, have thereby made them more fell and untractable. But T. Quintius, he hath made a ſpeech, reſpective and tending, as well to the royal dignity of the Nobles, as to the concord and unity of the States, and principally regarding the condition of the times. They would requeſt him therefore, together with his brother Conſul, to take in hand the care of the Common-weal. They would requeſt the Tribuns likewiſe, to joyn in one accord with the Conſuls, and ſhew themſelves willing and forward, to have the war kept off and put back from their City walls: and in ſo fearful and dangerous a caſe, to reclaim their Commons to their due obedience to their Nobles: ſaying more- M over, That the native Country, the common mother of them all, calleth unto the Tribuns and craveth their aid, now that the territories are waſted, and the City at hand to be aſſaulted. Whereupon, they all agreed generally to decree a muſter, and preſently to make a levy of ſouldiers. And when the Conſuls had pronounced before the whole people then and there aſſembled, that it was no time as then to hear excuſes, but that all the younger ſort, ſhould betimes the next morning by day-light be ready to attend in Mars field: and that after the war was ended, they would find out and appoint a time, to enquire into their allegations and reaſons, that entred not their names:
and that he ſhould be taken for a traytor and rebel, whoſe excuſe they allowed not: the whole manhood and youth of the City ſhewed themſelves the morrow after in readineſs. Each cohort or regiment choſe their Centiners or Captains, and every Regiment had two Senators for their N Provoſt Marſhals. All this was performed (by report) with ſuch ſpeed and expedition, that on the very ſame day, the ſtandards and enſigns were by the Queſtors had forth of the Armory and Chamber of the City and brought into Mars field: and by the fourth hour (or ten a clock) the ſame day, ſet forward and advanced out of the field. And this new army, with a few bands of old ſouldiers, who willingly of their own accord followed them, marched on and reſted, at ten miles end. The day following they diſcovered their enemies, and at Corbio encamped cloſe unto them.
And by the third day, there was no ſtay on both hands, but they muſt needs encounter and fight.
For why? The Romans for anger were ſharp ſet: the enemies again, upon a guilty conſcience that they had ſo often rebelled, were grown deſperate. Now, whereas in the Roman army the two Conſuls were in equal commiſſion, yet gave Agrippa place unto his brother Quintius, and yeelded O unto him the entire and abſolute command. A courſe moſt profitable in the managing and execution of great affairs. And being thus preferred, he again in courteſy anſwered and requited the others Gentleneſs and inclination to ſubmiſſion, in this wiſe, by imparting unto him all his Counſels: by parting with him all his honor and praiſe, and by making him his equal, who was indeed his inferiour and underling. In the battel, Quintius commanded the right pont, Agrippa led the left: Sp. Poſthumius Albus, the Lieutenant General, had the conduct of the main battel. And P. Sulpitius the other Lieutenant, they ſet over the horſemen. The footmen

A men of the right point fought moſt valiantly, and the Volſcians received them with equal valour. Sp. Sulpitius with his men of arms, brake through the main battel of the enemies: & albeit he might have retired himſelf the ſame way again unto his company, before that the enemies could bring their ranks again into order, that were diſarayed: yet he thought it better to charge them upon their backs. And in one moment he had diſcomfited and quite defeated his enemies, by aſſailing them behind, and thus affrighting them on both ſides, but that the Volſcian and Æquian Horſemen recharged him, held him play in his own fight, and ſo kept him occupied a good while. "Thereat, Sulpitius ſaid, it was no time now to linger and to drive off, but to beſtir themſelves, "crying out aloud, that they were enironed round, encloſed within their enemies, and excluded
B "from their own fellows, unleſs they ſet to, and bent their whole force, quickly to diſpatch the "Horſe-fight: and that it would not ſerve, to put the Horſemen to flight and ſave their lives: but "kill both horſe and man, that none might ride back again from thence into the battel to renew "the fight. And to make head and reſiſtance againſt him and his horſemen, they were never able, "ſince that the main thick battel of footmen had given him ground already. Good ear they gave to his words, and ſoon harkned to his direction: and with one entire aſſault they gave a fierce charge, and defeated the whole power of the Cavallery, unhorſed and diſmounted a number of them, and with their javelins goared both them and their horſes. And there's an end of the horſe-ſervice. Then they ſet upon the battel of the footmen, and diſpatched meſſengers unto the Conſuls with news, what they had done: where alſo by that time, the battel of the enemies began to C ſhrink. And when tidings came unto the Romans that were already upon the point of victory, they verily were more encouraged: but the Æquians that were about to retreat, were ſtrucken with greater fear. In the main battel firſt began the overthrow; namely, whereas the men of arms before had broken the array. After them, the left point alſo began to be diſtreſſed and driven back, by Quintius the Conſul. But in the right there was hardeſt hold, and moſt ado. Where, Agrippa being a tall man of his hands and young withal, ſeeing in every part of the battel things go better than where he was: caught the enſigns from the enſign-bearers, advanced them forward his own ſelf, yea, and fell to flinging ſome of them againſt the thickeſt of his enemies. For fear therefore of ſo ſhameful a diſgrace, the ſouldiers beſtir themſelves, and freſhly aſſailed the enemy. And ſo on all hands alike, they atchieved the victory and won the field. Then came a meſſenger
D from Quintius, & brought word, that he had the better hand, and was now ready to give an aſſault upon the camp, but would not break in, and enter thereinto before he knew for certain, that they in the left point alſo had gotten the upper hand, and made an end of the battel. In caſe therefore he had diſcomfited the enemy, he ſhould joyn his forces to him, that the whole army altogether might gain the ſpoil and pillage of the tents. So Agrippa, who alſo for his part was victor, came to his brother Conſul and the camp of the enemies, and met with mutual congratulation one to the other. There, finding but a few to defend, whom they diſcomfited in the turning of an hand, they brake into the rampier and munitions, without conflict or skirmiſh: and ſo beſides the recovery of their own goods again, which they had loſt by the overrunning of the country, they gained alſo a rich booty, and retired back with their whole army. I cannot learn, that either they themſelves
E required triumph, or the Senate offered them any: and no cauſe appeareth upon record, why they ſhould either refuſe, or not hope for that honor. For mine own part, ſo far as I can gueſs in ſo long diſtance of times, ſeeing that Valerius and Horatius, who over and beſides the conqueſt of the Volſcians and the Æquians, had the honor alſo of diſpatching and finiſhing the Sabines war, were denied triumph at the Senats hand; theſe Conſuls might not with modeſty, ſue for the ſame; having performed but half the good ſervice of the others: leſt if they had gotten it granted, there might have ſeemed more regard had of the perſons, than of the deſerts.

But this noble and honourable victory over the enemies abroad, thus atchieved, was obſcured and ſouly diſtayned with a ſhameful doom of the people, in a controverſy of their allies, about the bounds and meers of certain Lands. The inhabitants of Aricia and Ardea, having F warred oftentimes one with the other, about ſome Lands in queſtion between them, and by giving and taking ſundry foils and overthrows outwearied, choſe the people of Rome their Umpire to decide and determine this quarrel. And when they were come with their counſel to plead the caſe, the Magiſtrates granted a Court of Aſſiſes of the people. Where was much arguing and diſpute on both ſides before them: and after the witneſſes were depoſed and that at length the Tribes ſhould be called to the ſcrutinie, and the people give their voices, there ſteps forth an „old father one P. Scaptius, a Commoner. And I (quoth he) for my part, O Conſuls if it be lawful „to ſpeak for the good of the State, wil not ſuffer the people to erre, and be deceived in this que„ſtion. When as the Conſuls denied him audience, as being an old fool, and of no credit: and commanded him (as he cryed ſtill that the publick cauſe of the City was betrayed) to be had G away, he calleth for the aſſiſtance of the Tribuns. The Tribuns then, who lightly are ever overruled by the multitude, rather than able to rule them, yeelded unto the Commons: That for as much as they were deſirous to hear what the old man could ſay, Scaptius ſhould ſpeak his mind at large. Then ſetteth he the tale on end, and beginneth thus: I am (quoth he) fourſcore winters old and three on the head of it: and even upon that very ground for which all this ſtrife and vari"ance is, I ſerved as a ſouldier, when I was no young man neither, but one that had been preſt to "wars, and received pay twenty years afore. And it was, I remember well, during the ſiege be"fore Corioli. Hither am I now come, to give evidence of a thing by long continuance of time,

A controverſy between the Ardeates and Aricins, decided by the people of Rome.

The evidence given by old Scaptius.

" worn out clean and forgotten of other men, but freſh in my knowledge and remembrance: to H
" wit, that the Lands thus litigious, and in controverſy, had been ſometime within the confines
" of the Coriolans: and after the winning of Corioli, were ſeiſed by right of conqueſt, to the Com" mons of the people of Rome. I marvel much therefore, by what cuſtome and preſcription, the " Ardeates and Aricines, who never had right and intereſt, and were not poſſeſſed of the land,
" (ſo long as Corioli ſtood in proſperity) ſhould hope to defeat the people of Rome thereof, whom " being the LL. in fee of the ground, they had choſen for their Arbitrator. As for me, I have " but a ſmall while to live, and one foot already is in grave: and yet I cannot find in my heart, but " (to that Land, which as old, I being a young and luſty ſouldier, did my beſt to fight for, and " conquered with ſword in hand) make claim now that I am aged, by word and mouth, the only I
" means left me to recover it. I adviſe the people therefore in good ſadneſs, that in a vain reſpect
" of bootleſs modeſty, they condemn not their own cauſe, nor give away their right. The Conſuls marking well what audience was given to Scaptius, and that he was heard not only with ſi-lence, but alſo with good liking and contentment, cryed out upon this abominable practiſe: calling both Heaven and Earth to witneſs, and therewith ſent for the Lords of the Councel: and joyning with them, went to the Tribuns, fell in hand with them, and inſtantly beſought them
" not to go forward with this moſt lewd action for the preſent, and a more ſhameful precedent
" for the time to come: namely, that Umpiers and dayes men, ſhould convert the thing in ſuit
" unto their own and proper vantage: eſpecially conſidering, that, Admit it were a lawful thing
" for a judge himſelf to have an eye and regard to his own commodity: yet would there not be K
" ſo much gained and gotten by coming thus between, and interverting the Land, as there would " be damage and hinderance another way, in alienating by thoſe hard courſes, the hearts of their " good friends and Allies. For the loſſes (verily) and cracks of name and credit, are ſuch as may " not be valued at any price. And ſhould the Embaſſadors indeed, ſay they, go their wayes home
" with this goodly award: and make report abroad how they have ſped? ſhould our confederats
" hear this? ſhould our enemies come by the knowledge thereof? with what grief the one? with " what joy the other? Think ye that our neighbour nations will impute, attribute, and aſcribe
" this, unto the ſpeech made by Scaptius, a prating old buſy body, and one that loveth to hear
" himſelf ſpeak in aſſemblies? Nay, this is certain: well may Scaptius be famous and much talked " of, in the playing of this pageant: but the people of Rome ſhall incur the obloquy, to have acted L
" the part under the viſour of Scaptius, of a cunning promoter, and a falſe interceptor to himſelf,
" of other mens right in ſuit. For, what judge at any time in a private matter, hath done the like,
" as to award the thing in queſtion, unto himſelf? Why, even Scaptius, paſt all ſhame and grace
" as he is, would never have done it. Theſe and ſuch like words, ſpake both Conſuls and Senators aloud in all their hearing. But the covetouſneſs of men, and Scaptius that firſt ſet them a longing and their teeth a watering, prevailed more than they all. The Tribes were called to the Scrutiny of their voyces, and gave judgment, That the Lands pertained to the common Territory of the people of Rome. Neither can it be denied, but it would have ſo appeared indeed, in caſe it had been tried before other judges. But now, for all the goodneſs of the cauſe, is not the ignominy of the arbitrement one jot the leſs: Nay, the Aricines and Ardeates themſelves, thought not M more ſhamefully and hardly of it, than the very Senators and Peers of Rome. The reſt of the year continued quiet, from all troubles as well domeſtical as forrain.

*THe Law concerning marriage between the Nobles and the Commons, was propoſed, and with much ado enacted by the Tribuns of the Commonalty: notwithſtanding, the Nobles withſtood it. # The fourth Book of T. Livius.

THere ſucceeded Conſuls after theſe, M. Genutius and P. Curiatius. A year full of broils, both at home and abroad. For in the beginning of the year, both Canuleius, a Tribune of the Commons, propoſed a law, concerning alliance of the Patritians with Commons, by way of mariage. Whereby the Nobles ſuppoſed their bloud to be ſtayned, and the Rights and Priviledges of Families and Houſes confounded. Alſo, whereas at firſt the Tribuns by little and little had moved, That one of the Conſuls might be created out of the Commons: now the matter proceeded ſo far, that of ten Tribuns that then were, the other
C nine propounded this in plain terms for a law, That it might be in the peoples power to chuſe both the Coſſ. (if they would) either out of Commons or Nobility. Mary, if that ſhould come to paſs, the Nobles thought indeed that the ſoveraign rule and authority, was not only made common with the baſeſt ſort, but alſo tranſlated altogether from the great men and beſt of the City, to the commonalty. Glad were the Senators therefore to hear ſay, that the people of Ardea, for the wrongful awarding away of their Lands from them, were revolted: and that the Veientians had waſted the Frontiers of the Romans: and that the Volſcians and Æquians grudged and muttered for the fortifying of Verrugo; So much preferred they any war, miſerable though it were and dangerous, before a ſhameful and diſhonourable peace. Having heard therefore theſe news, and taken them in the worſt manner: to the end that amidſt the rumour and bruit of ſo
D many wars, the Tribunitian troubleſome ſuits might ſtay and be dead for the time: they command muſters to be taken, ſouldiers to be levied, all furniture of war, and all manner of force to be prepared, and (if it might be) with more indeavour, than it had been when T. Quintius was Conſul. Then C. Canuleius, after ſome hot words which he ſpake aloud in the Senate; namely, that the Conſuls by frighting the Commons, went about but in vain, to avert them from the regard of their new Laws: and that ſo long as he had any breath in his body, they ſhould never go through with muſter, unleſs the Commons had firſt ratified thoſe things, which by him and his brethren had been propounded: forthwith aſſembled the people together. Thus at one inſtant the Conſuls animated the Senate againſt the Tribune, and the Tribune incited the people againſt the Conſuls. "The Conſuls gave it out plainly and ſaid, that no longer now might theſe furious
E "courſes of the Tribuns be endured. Now were they come to the very height and extremity, "and raiſed more war in effect, at home, than the enemies abroad. Which thing (no doubt) "hapned not ſo much through the fault of the Commons, as of the Nobles, nor of the Tribuns "more, than of the Conſuls. For look what thing was beſt rewarded in a City, the ſame alwayes "moſt increaſed: thus men in peace (we ſee) prove excellent, thus in war they come to be ſingu-"lar. In Rome (ſay they) ſeditions ſped ever beſt, and have been reputed both to each one in par-"ticular and to all in general moſt honourable. But let the Senate call to mind the dignity which "they themſelves had received from their fathers, and compare it with that which they were like "to leave to their children: and ſee, whether they may boaſt as the commonalty doth, how that "their condition is much bettered and more glorious than before. Well, neither is there any end
F "now, nor ever will be, ſo long as the Authors of ſeditions be as highly advanced, as the ſeditiō-"ons themſelves are proſperous and fortunate. See what matters and how great hath Canuleius "attempted! He would bring in a commixture or rather confuſion of kindreds and houſes, a "perturbation in the managing both of publick and private affairs: that nothing might be ſin-"cere and intire, nothing pure and undefiled: that all difference and diſtinction being taken away, "no man might know either himſelf or his. For what thing elſe do theſe mixtures of ſtates and "degrees by mariages draw after them, without all order and diſcretion: but that like bruit beaſts "in a manner, Commons and Nobles may go and couple together? ſo that the children between "them born, ſhall not be able to tell of what bloud he is deſcended, and to what Religion he doth "belong, being a mungrel as it were, the one half a Noble, the other a Commoner; and not well G "ſuiting and according with himſelf? They thought it not enough (be like) that all divine and "humane Laws, were confuſed and ſhuffled together: for now theſe mutinous perſons, theſe buſy "heads and troublers of the common people, addreſs themſelves to ſhoot at the Conſulſhip. At "firſt, they ſounded in private ſpeeches and ſecret diſcourſes, only, how to compaſs, That one of "the Conſuls might be created out of the body of the Commons: but now they go roundly to "work and carry it before them: they are ſo bold to prefer laws (forſooth) that the people might "make them both either Nobles or Commons, at their good pleaſure. Whereby (no doubt) they "would make choiſe from out of the Commons, of the moſt ſeditious perſons of all other.

The allegations of the Conſuls againſt the Tribuns of the Commons.

"We

"We ſhall have then the Canuleians and Icilians to be our Conſ. But Jupiter (that great good H
"God) forbid, that ever the Royal and Imperial Majeſty, ſhould come to that low ebb or de-
"ſperate paſs: dye they would a thouſand deaths rather, than ſuffer ſo great a ſhame and indigni"ty: knowing this aſſuredly, that their anceſtours alſo, if they had once ſuſpected or forſeen,
"that by granting the commonalty every thing as they deſired, they would not have proved "more lovely and chearful towards them, but rather more churliſh and untractable: and when "they had obtained their firſt ſuits, to proceed ſtill to demand worſe and worſe, one thing after "another: they would ſooner have indured at the firſt, any conteding and debate whatſoever,
"than ſuffered thoſe hard conditions to be impoſed, and put upon them: and becauſe they had "once relented, that Tribuns ſhould be created, therefore to grant them again the ſecond time. I
"So that as now, there is no quietneſs with them, nor end of quarrels will be none, ſo long as in "one and the ſelf ſame City, Tribuns and Senators remain together. Nay verily, either this ſtate
"muſt be put down, or that office utterly aboliſhed. And better late than never, to withſtand "and meet with their raſh and deſperate boldneſs. What? ſhall they without controlment, firſt
"ſow diſcord at home, and then ſtir up forrein wars abroad? and afterwards, againſt thoſe wars
"which themſelves have raiſed, debar and hinder the City, for to take arms and defend it ſelf?
"and when as they have as good as ſent for the enemies to come to their dores, then not ſuffer an "army to be levied againſt them. But let Canuleius (if he dare) ſpeak theſe words out in the Se"nate, That unleſs the Nobles ſuffer his laws, as if he were a Conqueror, to be admitted and re"ceived, he will ſtay the muſtering? For what elſe is that, but to threaten that he will ſell and K
"betray his country, and ſuffer it to be aſſailed and loſt? What encouragement will ſuch a word
"give as that, I ſay not, to the commonalty of Rome, but to the Volſcians, Æquians and Veien"tians? Will not they hope, under the conduct of Canuleius, to be able to ſcale the Capitol and "the Caſtle, if ſo be the Tribuns ſhall take from the Nobility their couragious hearts, as they have "bereaved them already of their right, their honor and dignity? Let him know therefore, that "the Conſuls are ready, firſt to ſhew themſelves to be Captains and Leaders, againſt the mitchie-
"vous practiſes of their own citizens, before they will make head againſt the armed forces of "their enemies? Whiles theſe matters were debated of with great contention and heat in the Senate houſe, Canuleius for the maintenance of his laws, and to croſs the Conſuls, made this O-The Oration of Canuleius to the Commons, againſt the Nobility. ration unto the people. How greatly the Nobles have deſpiſed you, O Quirites, how unworthy L they have ever thought you, to live among them within the walls of one City, me thinks I have, as often heretofore, ſo now eſpecially and moſt of all perceived: in that they have riſen up altogether ſo fiercely to check and withſtand our propoſed laws. "Wherein, what pretend we elſe,
"but to tell them and put them in mind, That we are, as well as they, citizens: and although we "are not of the ſame wealth, yet we inhabit the ſame country with them? In the one, we requeſt
"mariage; a thing to borderers, yea, and to forrain nations uſually granted: and to ſpeak of our "ſelves, we alſo have afforded even to our conquered enemies, the benefit of our City, which is "far more than marriage. In the other, we move no new matter, but only claim again and chal"lenge that, which is the peoples right, to wit, that the people of Rome may beſtow their offices "and dignities, upon whom they pleaſe. What reaſon have they then, I pray you, to ſet all on an M
"uprore, as if Heaven and Earth ſhould go together? and what is the cauſe, that erewhile I had "like to have had violence offered unto me in the Senate? What moved them to break out and
"ſay, they could not forbear nor keep their hands from me, and threaten to abuſe and violate the "ſacred authority of the Tribuns? Set caſe that the people of Rome may have their free voyces
"and ſuffrages, to elect the Conſuls whom they will, and that no Commoner be denied, ſo he be "worthy of the higheſt place, for to obtain the ſoveraign dignity. How then? cannot this City
"poſſibly ſtand any longer? and is our Empire come to an end for ever? And all one it is (be like)
"and importeth as much, to diſable a Commoner, for being made Conſul, as if a man inferred, that "a bondman or a freed libertine ſhould become Conſul. Perceive you not yet (my Maſters) in "what contempt you live? They would, if they might, bereave you in ſome meaſure of this day N
"light: that ye breath and ſpeak, that ye have the ſhapes of men, they think much, they repine,
"and it goes to their heart. And what elſe? They give it out flatly and ſay (if God will) it is un"lawful, that a Commoner ſhould be a Conſul. I beſeech you hear me a little. If we may not be "allowed to read the Chronicles, nor to peruſe the High-prieſts records and regiſters, know we "not thoſe things then, that even all ſtrangers know? namely, That Conſuls entred in place of "Kings, and ſucceeded them, and have no other right, preheminence or dignity at all, than Kings "had before? Think ye that men have never heard, that Numa Pompilius, a man not ſomuch as "a citizen of Rome, much leſs then, a Patritian and Nobly deſcended among them, was ſent for "out of the Sabines countrey, and by the peoples voyces, and the aſſent of the Nobles, created
"King of Rome? Alſo, afterwards, how L. Tarquinius, who was no Roman born, no, nor yet ſo O
"much as an Italian, but the ſon of Demaratus the Corinthian, a ſtranger inhabitant at Tarquins,
"and from thence removing, albeit King Ancus his ſons were living, attained likewiſe to the "crown? Moreover how Servius Tullius after him, the ſon of a captive woman of Corniculum, "whoſe father was unknown, whoſe mother a bondwoman, through wit and vertue, obtained "and held the Kingdom? For what ſhould I ſpeak of T. Tatius the Sabine, whom Romulus him-
"ſelf, the father and founder of this City, admitted to raign together with him? Well, ſo long as "no ſtock was diſdained, no race rejected, wherein appeared ſparks of vertue, the Romans Em"pire

A "pire became mighty, and flouriſhed. Scorn ye then at this day, a Conſul out of the Commo"nalty, when our forefathers deſpiſed not Kings that were aliens and ſtrangers? No, nor when "the Kings were expelled, was this City denied and ſhut againſt forreiners, that were valorous, and "men of action. The kinred and whole name (I am ſure) of the Claudii, after the Kings were "exiled, we not only admitted into our City, from out of the Sabins, but alſo received into the "number of the Patritians and Noble men. And may a meer forrainer indeed become a Noble-
"man, and ſo a Conſul? And ſhall a Citizen of Rome, if he be of the Commonalty, be wholly diſa-
"bled and out of all hope for ever of being Conſul? Tell me I pray you, Think ye it not poſſible, "that a valiant and hardy man, approved both in war and peace, being one of the Commons, B "may prove like to Numa, L. Tarquinius, or Servius Tullius? and if he do whether ſhall we ſuffer "him to govern the Common-weal, or no? And whether will ye have our Conſuls, ſuch rather "as the Decemvirs (the moſt wretched and wicked perſons under the ſun, who, by your leave,
"were at that time of the Nobility) than ſtrangers and new-commers, which of all the Kings
"were ſimply the very beſt? But forſooth, preſently after the KK. were depoſed and expelled,
"there was not one of the Com. a Conſul. What of that? ought no new thing to be ordained,
"and which hath not been already taken up afore? For many things have not yet been practiſed,
"(as in a ſtate newly incorporate) ought not ſuch then to be put in uſe, if they be thought expe"dient? While Romulus reigned, there were no Biſhops nor Augurs: by Numa Pompilius they "were created. There was no Seſſing of the people at all in the City, no deſcription of Hundreds C "and Claſſes. By S. Tullius they were inſtituted. Coſſ. were never heard of before: when the KK.
"were driven out, they were elected. The time was, when neither the abſolute rule nor yet the "name of a Dictator was known. In our fathers dayes it firſt began. Tribuns, Ædiles, Queſtors
"there have been none: it was ordained they ſhould be made. Within this ten years, we have "both created and alſo aboliſhed out of the common-weal, Decemvirs for the making and pen-
"ning of our laws. And who doubteth, but in a City founded for ever to endure, and increaſing
"ſtill infinitely, there will be brought in new Governments, new Prieſt-hoods and ſacerdotal "dignities, new priviledges both of kindreds and private perſons? And even this one thing in "queſtion, to wit, that the Com. and Nobles might not joyn in marriage, were not the Decem"virs they that firſt within theſe few years made that Edict? A moſt ſhameful enſample and pre-D "cedent in a free ſtate, and tending to the manifeſt wrong of the Commons. Can there be any "greater or more notorious injury, than that there ſhould be in a City one part and member, as "defiled and polluted, thought unworthy of the bond of marriage? What elſe is this, but to ſuffer "exile and confining within the ſame walls, when they debar us that we ſhould not be either al"lied in affinity or knit in kindred? They provide (forſooth) and take order that bloud ſhould
"not be mixed, nor families confuſed. How then? If this do pollute this great gentry of yours,
"which moſt of you deſcended from the Sabins and Albans, have not by right line from the Pa"tritians, but by coptation and election into the number of the Nobles, as being choſen either by "the favour and grace of the Kings, or elſe by the peoples voyces after the KK. were expelled:
"could not your wiſedoms have kept your bloud uncorrupt by ſome private means and proviſi-E "on, namely, by taking heed neither to eſpouſe wives from among the Commons, nor to ſuffer "your daughters and ſiſters to be married to any other than Nobles? No commoner (ye might "be ſure) would have forced a daughter of any noble houſe: no, theſe inſolencies of laſcivious
"luſt are appropriate to Gentlemen only of the Nobility: none of us would have compelled any of "you againſt his will, to make covenant and contract of matrimony. But I wot, that by an ex-
"preſs law it ſhould be forbidden, and that marriage between Nobles and Commons ſhould be "condemned, that is it, which to the commonalty is a plain contumely and open injury. And
"why conſer ye not and lay your heads together, that the rich may not marry with poor? That,
"which at all times and in all places, hath been a matter left unto particular policy and conſide-
"ration; namely, That into what houſe ſoever a woman caſt a liking and fancy, there ſhe might F "be married: and into what family a man obliged himſelf by word, promiſe and covenant, from "thence he might take a wife: even that, reſtrain ye within the bonds of a moſt proud and tyran"nical law: whereby ye might break in ſunder all civil ſociety, and of one City make twain. Why "forbid ye not by a poſitive Law, that a commoner ſhould not dwell by a Noble-man, or go the "ſame way that he doth, or frequent the ſame feaſt, or converſe in the ſame market or common "place of aſſembly? For in effect what difference is there, if a Gentleman marry a commoners
"daughter, or a commoner eſpouſe a Gentlewoman? What right I pray you or condition of ſtate
"is thereby changed? ſurely the children ſtill take after the father. Neither ſeek we for any thing
"elſe by matching with you, but only this, that we may be reckoned in the number of men and of "citizens. Neither is there any cauſe, why you ſhould ſo contend and ſtand upon it (unleſs it do G "you good to croſs and take a pleaſure to exerciſe your ſelves in working us diſgrace and ſhame.)
"Finally I would gladly know whether the ſoveraign government of the ſtate reſteth in you or in "the people of Rome? When the Kings were driven out, got you thereby to your ſelves Lordly "ſoveraignty, or purchaſed all men equal liberty? It muſt needs be granted, that the people of "Rome may at their pleaſure publiſh and ordain a law. And will ye then as ſoon as any law what"ſoever, is by them propoſed, appoint a muſter preſently for their puniſhment? and as ſoon as I
"that am Tribun, ſhall begin to call the wards to give their voyces, ſhall you that are Conſuls by
"and by ſwear all the younger ſort, preſs them to warfare, lead them forth unto the field, and

"menace

" menace the Commons, menace I say, the Tribun also? What? If ye had not twise already good H
" experience, how little these goodly threats of yours prevailed against the Commons, when they " agreed and stuck together, it were somewhat. Will ye say, that ye forbare to strive, ye tendered
" our good, and for pity spared us? Nay rather, to say a truth, was not this the cause that no fray
" was made, For that the stronger side was also the more cool and modester of the twain? Neither
" (O Quirites) will there now, I warrant you, be any combate, nor blows dealt: they will al-
" wayes assay and sound, what stomacks and hearts ye have, but never will they feel your fists, and " try how keen your swords be. Therefore to these wars (be they falsely pretended, or truly in" deed reported) O ye Consuls, the Commons are ready prest to follow you: provided alwayes,
" that by granting them liberty of mutual marriage, ye will make at length this City one: that I
" they may be linked, joyned and united unto you, by private alliance and affinity: that hardy and " valiant men may have hope and possibility, to honors and dignities: that they may be allowed
" fellowship and society in the Common-weal: Finally, that (which is due unto equal liberty)
" they may one with another in alternative course, obey annual Magistrates, and be obeyed again
" in their turns. If any of you shall gainsay and withstand these conditions, prate still and talk at " your pleasure of wars: multiply and make them as many and as great as ye will; There is not " one shall give his name, not one shall take arms, not one shall fight for those proud Lords, with " whom they can have neither fellowship of dignity in the Common-weal, nor alliance of mar" riage in private estate. Now when as the Consuls also were come forth into the open assembly of the people, and that they fell on all hands from continued and long Orations, to short dispute K and altercation: the Tribun demanded why a commoner might not attain to a Consulship? Unto whom the Consul returned an answer, as to the substance perhaps truly, so for the present contention not very wisely and to the purpose: Namely, because that no commoner had the Auspices: which was the cause why the Decemvirs ordained distinct marriages, lest upon a doubtful and mingled issue, there should follow a troubled confusion of the Auspices. But hereat, the Commons stormed and stamped most of all: that as odious men unto the immortal Gods, they were flatly denied and deemed unworthy to observe the flight and singing of birds. And never gave they over their heats of clamorous debate (whiles the Commons had gotten unto them a most sharp Tribun to set them a work and were themselves in obstinacy no whit behind him) untill at length the Nobles were overcome and driven to grant, that the Law as touching marriage L should pass: supposing by that means especially, that the other Tribuns would either clean give over their suit for making commoners Consuls, or at least wise put it off, until the war were ended: and that the Commons in the mean while being well pleased and contented with marriage among the Nobles, would be willing and ready to levy a muster. Canuleius for this his victory over the Nobles, and for the favours he gat among the Commons, became a great and mighty man. Whereupon, the other Tribuns were kindled to the like combate: and for the proceeding of their Law also, indeavoured with all their might and main. And albeit the rumour of the war encreased daily more and more, yet they hinder the levy of souldiers. The Consuls seeing now that no decree and order could pass the Senate-house, by reason that the Tribuns interposed their negative voyce:
took counsel together with the chief of the Nobility at home in their private houses. And well M they saw that they must yeeld either the victory to their enemies, or the buckler to their own citizens. Of all the Senators that had been Coss. only Valerius and Horatius were not present at these counsels. C. Claudius his opinion was, That the Consuls should put themselves in arms against the Tribuns: But the two Quintij, Cincinnatus and Capitolinus, abhorred all bloudshed and violent proceedings against those, whom by a solemn covenant made with the Commons, they had received and accepted for to be as sacrosainct and unviolable. But in these counsels they grew to this point in the end, that they suffered military Tribuns of equal power with the Consuls, to be created indifferently from out of the Commons and Nobles: provided alwayes, that as touching creation of the Consuls, there should be no alteration from the old manner afore-time. And herewith were both Tribuns and Commons well satisfied and contented. A general N assembly therefore was proclaimed for the chusing of three Tribuns in Consuls authority, which being once published: forthwith as many as had spoken or done ought tending to sedition, and above all others those that had been Tribuns of the people, began in their whited robes to take hold of men and run to and fro about the common place labouring for this dignity. At the first, the Nobles partly in despair of obtaining the place (seeing the Commons so set a flote) partly for disdain and indignation to bear any honourable office joyntly with them of so base condition, were scared and affrighted from standing therefore: at the last (but they were forced thereto first by the heads and the chief Lords of the Senate) they were content to be competitors and suit-ers for the dignity: lest they might seem to be fully excluded forth of the possession of the Common-weal, and leave it entirely for the Commons. The event and effect of this Court, shewed O plainly, that mens minds are otherwise affected in contending about liberty and dignity, than presently after such contentions laid away, they are in weighing and judging aright without passion and affection. For the people satisfied herewith, that there was some account made of the Commoners, and that they were not shut out, elected military Tribuns all of the Nobles. This modesty, this equity, this noble mind where shall a man now adayes find in one person, which then was to be seen in the whole people? In the three hundreth and tenth year after the City of Rome was founded, were the first military Tribuns created, that bare office in the room of the Con-

A Conſuls, to wit, A. Sempronius Aratinus, L. Attilius, and C. Cecilius: in whoſe government, concord at home cauſed alſo peace abroad. There be writers who affirm, That upon occaſion of the Veientian war, and the rebellion of the Ardeats, becauſe two Conſuls were not able to manage ſo many wars at once, therefore were three military Tribuns choſen: without making any mention of the Law publiſhed, concerning election of Conſuls of the Commons: and that they were inveſted both in the jurisdiction, and alſo in the ornaments of the Conſuls. Howbeit, the exerciſe of that government, ſtood not faſt and ſure, nor continued long. For within three moneths after that they entred, they forewent their office, by a decree of the Augurs, as if there had been ſome error in their creation. It was alledged that C. Curiatius, who was Preſident of that Court B of Election, had taken his quarters amiſs for the obſervation of the lucky ſigns by flight of birds, and not according to the Augurs skill. Military Tribuns firſt created, with Conſuls authority.

There came from the Ardeats to Rome, Embaſſadors, complaining of wrong received, in theſe terms: That if it might be redreſſed, and amends made, and their grounds reſtored, they ſeemed willing to abide ſtill in league and amity. Anſwer was made them by the Senate, that the judgment of the people, already paſſed, could not be reverſed by the Senate, if it were ſo: nothing elſe but for concord ſake and agreement of the States: beſides, they had neither any precedent to lead them thereto, nor Law and authority to warrant them. Marry, if the Ardeats would wait their times, and put to the Senates arbitrement and diſcretion, the redreſs and eaſement of their injury pretended, it would come to paſs, that in proceſs of time they ſhould not repent of governing C their paſſions, and bridling their choler: and ſhould well know, that the Nobles had a good regard, that there ſhould no wrong be offered unto their friends, as they were careful, that if any were offered, it ſhould not long continue. Thus the Embaſſadors, promiſing, to make a true report, unto their citizens of the matter, wholly as it was: were friendly diſmiſſed, and had their diſcharge.

The Senators ſeeing now the Commonweal, without any ſoveraign Magiſtrate of the chair and of State, went together, and made an Interregent: and whiles they ſtrove whether Conſuls or Tribuns ſhould be created, the Interregent continued many dayes. The Interregent and the Senate laboured, that there ſhould be an Election of Conſuls: the Tribuns on the other ſide, and their Commonalty, were for the Tribuns Conſular. But the Senators prevailed, becauſe both the people ſeeing they were to confer the one office or the other, upon the Nobles, ſurceaſed to ſtrive any D more: and alſo the chief of the Commons, choſe rather to have that Election, wherein they ſhould not be once propounded, than wherein they were ſure to take the repulſe, as unworthy. The Tribuns alſo gave over to contend any longer to no purpoſe, and without effect, ſeeming thereby ſomewhat to gratify and pleaſure the LL. of the Senate. So T. Quintius Barbatus the Interregent, choſe for Conſuls L. Papyrius Mugilanus, and L. Sempronius Atratius. Whiles theſe were Conſuls, the league with the Ardeats was renued. And this is the only evidence and proof, that they were Conſuls that year, for that neither in the ancient yearly records, nor in the Calenders of the Magiſtrates, they are found at all. I take it, becauſe the military Tribuns were created in the beginning of that year: and therefore, although theſe Conſuls were in their ſtead choſen, yet their names were left out, as if the other had remained in office the whole year. Conſuls choſen again.

E Licinius Macer affirmeth, that they are mentioned both in the compoſition with the Ardeats, and alſo in the linen books or regiſters in the Church of Juno Moneta. Albeit there had been ſo many terrors and bravados, threatned from the borderers, yet both abroad and at home, all was quiet. And whether Tribuns only, or Conſuls alſo choſen in the room of Tribuns governed in this year; certain it is, that the next following, had Conſuls M. Geganius Macerinus the ſecond time, and T. Quintius Capitolinus the fift time. This was the very year when the Cenſors office came up firſt. A thing that roſe of a ſmall beginning: which notwithſtanding afterwards increaſed to that height, that it had government of the manners and diſcipline of the Romans: and under the jurisdiction thereof, the Senate and Centuries of the order of knights, the diſtinction of worſhip and ſhameful diſgrace, were reduced. Likewiſe, the ſurvey of publick and private Ædifices, F yea, and the tributes, revenues and ſubſidies of the people of Rome were at the diſpoſition, ordering, and diſcretion of that office. The beginning of which thing aroſe upon this occaſion: For that the people in many years ſpace had not been aſſeſſed and numbred, and ſeeing the Cenſe could be deferred no longer, nor the Conſuls (by reaſon of wars, from ſo many nations imminent) had leiſure to go about and accompliſh that buſineſs: the Senate therefore made a motion, that the charge being painful, and not for the Majeſty of Conſuls to buſy themſelves in, required a ſpecial Magiſtrate, and a peculiar officer by it ſelf. Under whom ſhould attend the Secretaries and Clerks: who likewiſe ſhould have the keeping and charge of the rolls and publick records: and at whoſe diſcretion ſhould paſs the ſcedules and inſtruments of all Aſſeſments. The Senators therefore accepted gladly of this overture, although it were but a trifling matter: yet becauſe there G ſhould be the more Magiſtrates of the Nobility. Suppoſing (I ween) it would come to paſſe, as (it proved indeed) that ſhortly the power and wealth of thoſe, who bare the office, ſhould win more authority and credit unto the thing. Yea, and the Tribuns alſo made no great ado, but ſuffered it to paſs, being an office (as it was in truth, no other at that time) rather of neceſſity and attendance, than of ſhew, port, or honor: becauſe they would not ſeem to be croſs and peeviſh in every ſmall matter. When as therefore this dignity was of the principal of the City refuſed, the people by their voyces choſe to that Office. Papyrius and Sempronius, of whoſe Conſulſhip there was ſome doubt: to the end, that by that office they might ſupply and make up the defect and miſs of a Conſulſhip. And of the exerciſe and function it ſelf, Cenſors were they called. H

Whiles theſe things were a doing at Rome, there came Embaſſadors from Ardea, craving as wel in regard of their moſt ancient amity, as alſo of the late league renued, their helping hand for their City, welnigh undone and overthrown. For, peace (which wiſely and by right good adviſe they had kept and maintained with the people of Rome) they might not enjoy at home, by reaſon of inward debate and domeſtical quarrels. The cauſe and beginning whereof, as it is reported, aroſe from ſiding and factions, which have been and will be to moſt States more pernicious, than forrain wars, than famine or plague, or other adverſities, which men attribute to the anger and wrath of God, as the extremity of all publick calamities whatſoever. There was a maid, a Commoners daughter and no better, by birth, but for her rare beauty of ſingular note and paſſing renown: whom two young men were ſuiters unto. The one of the ſame condition or eſtate that the maid was of, and who relied upon her guardians and tutors, who alſo were of that degree and calling: the other a Gentleman, enamoured on her, only for her beauty. As for him, he had the good wills of the beſt in the City, by whoſe means the ſtrife of partaking, entred even into the houſe of the Damoſel. For the Gentleman in the Mothers judgment, was the more welcome and better liked of, whoſe deſire was, that the maid ſhould be preferred by marriage, and be moſt worſhipfully beſtowed. The Guardians alſo banded themſelves, and laboured for their party. But when as the matter might not be ended within dores, it came to ſuit in Law. And when the reaſons and allegations were heard, both of the Mother, and alſo of the Guardians, the Judges pronounced ſentence of marriage to be at the diſpoſition of the Mother. But might prevailed more than right. For the Tutors aforeſaid, openly in the market place of the City, having amongſt thoſe of their party and faction, complained of that injurious award, with a troup of men by force, fet the maid out of the Mothers houſe. Againſt whom aroſe a ſtronger power of the gentry, and following the young Gentleman, who was incenſed and ſet on fire upon this injury offered. Whereupon inſued a cruel fray. The Commons being defeated, went forth (far unlike to the Commons of Rome) armed as they were out of the City, and took for their hold a Hill, and invaded the Lands of the Nobles with fire and ſword: and having gathered to them a multitude of Artiſans and handicrafts men, whom in hope of ſpoil they had called forth, they purpoſe and prepare to beſiege the City alſo, which aforetime had been altogether unacquainted with the like ſtorms. In ſuch ſort, as no kind of calamity that followeth war, was wanting: as if the poor City had been tainted, infected, and poiſoned with the furious madneſs of two brain-ſick young men, ſeeking a woful and deadly marriage, with the utter ruin and deſtruction of their native Country. And neither part thought it enough to war and fight at home among themſelves. For the Nobles ſolicited the Romans for to reſcue their beſieged City: the Commons ſtirred up the Volſcians, to help to force and ſack the City. The Volſcians under the conduct of Æquus Cluilius came firſt to Ardea, and againſt the walls of their enemies, raiſed a countermure, and caſt a trench, and blocked the Town round about. Which tidings being brought to Rome, forthwith M. Geganius Conſul, went forth with an army, and incamped himſelf three miles from the enemies: and the day being now far ſpent and drawing toward night, he commandeth his ſouldiers to refreſh and make much of themſelves, and take their reſt: and afterwards at the relief of the fourth watch, he brought forth his enſigns, ſet his men to work, and ſped his buſineſs once begun, ſo that by the ſun-riſing, the Volſcians might ſee themſelves inveſted more ſtreightly by the Romans, then the City beleaguered by them. And on another ſide the Conſul had joyned a ſconce to the wall of Ardea, by which way his ſouldiers might go and come in ſafety. The Captain of the Volſcians, who had to that day prepared no victuals, but ſuſtained his army only with the corn which he had for the preſent from day to day robbed by forraging the Country, ſeeing himſelf intrenched, and of a ſudden to be deſtitute of all things, called the Conſul forth to emparle, ſaying, That if the Romans coming was to raiſe the ſiege, he would remove and diſlodge from thence. To which again the Conſul made this reply, That vanquiſhed men were to take, and not to make Articles of Conditions: neither ſhould they, as they were come at their pleaſure to aſſault the allies of the Romans, ſo depart again when they liſt to Volſci. He commandeth therefore to yeeld their General, to lay down their weapons, confeſſing themſelves overcome, and to be at his devotion. Otherwiſe he would be a bitter and mortal enemy unto them, whether they departed or tarried ſtil, and carry home to Rome the victory of the Volſcians, rather than their faithleſs peace. The Volſcians, when they had aſſayed that ſmall hope they had in their weapons (for all hope elſe was cut off) beſides all other things that were croſs unto them, encountred in a place of great diſadvantage for fight, but worſe for flight: and ſeeing themſelves on every ſide beaten down and ſlain, turned from fighting to intreating, delivered up their Captain, yeelded their weapons, were driven under the Gallows, and in their ſingle doublet and hoſe with great ſhame and calamity, were let go and ſent away. And ſitting them down to reſt themſelves, not far from the Town Tuſculum, the Tuſculans upon an old grudge and hatred againſt them, ſet upon them thus diſarmed and naked as they were at unawares, and were ſo meet with them, that ſcarcely there remained any one to carry news of their ill day and unfortunate overthrow. Then the Roman Coſ. appeaſed the troubles at Ardea: beheaded the chief Captains of that commotion, and confiſcated their goods to the common cheſt and Chamber of the Ardeats. And ſo by this great favour and benefit of the people of Rome, they ſuppoſed the injury of the former arbitrement was done away and recompenſed. But yet K L M N O

A the Senat of Rome, thought ſomewhat behind ſtill for the cancelling of the memorial of publick avarice. The Conſul returned, triumphing into the City, leading Cluilius the Captain of the Volſcians before his chariot, with the ſpoil born afore him of the enemies, whom he had diſarmed, and brought under the yoak. Quintius the Conſul again for his part, in his long robe and gown of peace, countervailed (a thing not uſually ſeen) the glory of his Colleague in his bright armor: who had ſo great regard at home to entertain concord and peace among the Citizens, by miniſtring juſtice indifferently, as wel to the higheſt as to the loweſt, that the Senators reputed him a ſevere Conſul, and the Commons accounted him as meek and gentle a perſon. And more he won at the Tribuns hands by countenance and reputation, than by contention and debate. His B five Conſulſhips wherein he carried himſelf after one and the ſelf ſame manner and order: the courſe of his whole life, ever Conſul-like, cauſed his perſon to be in a manner more reverenced then his honourable place. By this means, whiles theſe were Conſuls, no words were made of military Tribuns. Then created they for Conſuls M. Fabius Vibulanus, and Poſthumius Ebutius Cornicen. Theſe Conſuls, by how much greater and more glorious the acts both at home and abroad, were atchieued by thoſe, whom they ſaw they were to ſucceed (and ſurely that year was right memorable among the borderers, as well allies as enemies, and namely, becauſe the Ardeats in ſo hard diſtreſs, were by them ſuccoured) ſo much the more earneſtly endeavoured for their part, to raze out of mens minds the infamy of that judgement aforeſaid, and made an Act and Decree of the Senat in this form, That for as much as the City of the Ardeats, by reaſon of Civil C troubles, was diſpeopled and brought to a ſmall number of Citizens, there ſhould be enrolled certain inhabitants to be ſent thither for a Garriſon, and defence againſt the Volſcians. This was openly ingroſſed in publick Tables, and Inſtruments, for a policy, that their ſecret intent and purpoſe of reverſing and diſanulling the arbitrement, might not be perceived by the Tribuns and the Commons. But they cloſely complotted, that when they had enrolled a far greater number of Rutilians than of Romans, for to inhabit Ardea, neither ſhould any other lands be divided, but thoſe which by that infamous and unhoneſt award were intercepted: nor that one foot or clod of ground ſhould be aſſigned to any other Roman, before the whole lands were parted among all the Rutilians. Thus the domain that had been in queſtion, returned again to the Ardeats. The Triumvirs for the conveying of a Colony to Ardea, were created theſe, Agrippa Menenius, T. D Cloelius Siculus, and M. Ebutius Helua. Who, beſides that, they offended the Commons by their ready ſervice and nothing popular, in regard, that they aſſigned and ſet out to their allies, that land which the people of Rome judged their own, were not well thought of neither, by the chief of the Nobility: becauſe in the execution of their charge, they did nothing of affection, and for favour. Howbeit they avoided all troubles and dangers that were toward them (albeit they were accuſed by the Tribuns before the people.) For when they had regiſtred and placed the Coloners, they remained ſtill themſelves in the ſame Colony, which they had as witneſs of their innocency, and juſt dealing.

In this year, and the year following, when Caius Furius Pacilius, and Marcus Papirius Craſſus were Conſuls, there was peace at home and abroad. The plays which had been vowed by the De- E cemvirs, according to the Senats decree, during the time of the Commons inſurrection and departure from the Nobles, were this year ſet forth. Petilius ſought for ſome occaſion of ſedition, but in vain. Who being made Tribun the ſecond time, albeit he harped ſtil upon one ſtring, and threatned the ſelf ſame things that he had before, yet he could not bring about, that the Conſuls ſhould propoſe unto the Senat, concerning the diviſion of lands among the Commons: and when as with great ado he had obtained thus much, that the Senators ſhould be moved and their opinions asked, whether they would have an election of Conſuls or Tribuns (Conſular:) determined it was at length, that Conſuls ſhould be choſen. So, that the menaces of the Tribun, that he would hinder the muſter, was a ridiculous matter of game: ſeeing that when the borderers were at quiet, there was no need either of war or preparation for war. After this great quietneſs of the State, F followeth a year (wherein Proculus Geganius Macerinus, and L. Menenius Lanatus were Conſuls) for ſundry calamities and perils memorable: namely, Seditions, Famine, and hazard of receiving upon their necks the yoak of Kings rule again and that, by the ſweetneſs of a Largeſs. There wanted only forraign war: wherewith if the Common-weal had been afflicted too, hardly could the help of all the gods above, have recovered the State. Theſe calamities began with hunger. But whether it were, for that the year was unſeaſonable for corn, or that they were ſo in love with the plauſible and ſeditious Orations, and of the City it ſelf, that they ſlighted and neglected the Tillage of their ground, it is uncertain. For both the one and the other is reported. The Lords of the Senat blamed the idleneſs of the Commons: and the Tribuns of the Commons laid the weight, one while upon the fraud and naughtineſs, another while upon the negligence and remiſ- G neſs of the Conſuls. At the laſt, the commoners enforced and drave the people (but not againſt the will of the Senate) to chuſe L. Minutius Maſter of the proviſion or principal purveior of corn and victuals: a man who in that office proved more lucky to preſerve the liberty of the City then happy in the exerciſe or miniſtery of his charge: albeit at the latter end, he deſerved and had, both praiſe and thanks, for bringing down the price of Corn. Who, notwithſtanding many Embaſſages ſent both by ſea and land to the neighbor nations round about, and all to little purpoſe (ſaving that out of Hetruria there was brought ſome little ſprinkling of Corn) nothing eaſed and mended the Market: and therefore he turned again to the diſpenſing or dealing the preſent dearth indifferently among all, by forcing every man to confeſſe what corn he had, to open his garners, H to bring it forth, to vent and ſell that, which he had more then would ſerve a month. But when by this practiſe, and by defrauding ſervants a portion of their dayly food, and by accuſing the corn-mungers and expoſing them to the furious ire of the people, he had with all his hard courſes and ſharp inquiſitions rather laid open then eaſed the preſent need and neceſſity: many of the common people deſpairing of all hope, rather then they would live thus miſerably tormented, pining and wearing away in hunger, covered their heads, and threw themſelves headlong into Tyber. Then Sp. Melius, by calling a Knight or Gentleman of Rome, a man (as in thoſe days) exceeding rich, enterpriſed a thing, commodious I muſt needs ſay, but a diſhoneſt precedent of dangerous conſequence, and proceeding of a worſe mind and intent of his. For having with his own I mony bought up the corn out of Hetruria by the means of his friends and vaſſals, whoſe mini-ſtry he uſed: which thing (I believe verily) was an hindrance that all the publick care and providence, took ſmall effect, and nothing helped the general want and ſcarcity, he deviſed to bring up a free dole and diſtribution of corn: and to the end that when he had once by this benefit and liberality won the hearts of the Commons, then he might, what way ſoever he went carrying a port and majeſty with him above the degree of a private perſon, draw after him a train of the people, promiſing him by their favour of ſupport, undoubted and aſſured hope of a Conſulſhip. But himſelf (as mans nature is unſatiable) not content herewith, aſpired to higher matters then fortune promiſed him, and thoſe unlawful, and beyond his reach. And for as much as even the very Conſulſhip was to be wreſted from the Nobles againſt their wills, he plotted to make himſelf a K King, and thought that, the only guerdon due for ſo deep reaches and deſigns, and worthy that great contention and ſtrife which he was to abide with much toil and ſweat of brows. Now drew the Election on apace for Conſuls, which thing prevented him afore he had brought his devices to full ripeneſs and perfection. Conſul was created L. Quintius Capitolinus the ſixth time, a man moſt unfit for his turn, that ſhould go about innovations and to change the ſtate: and with him was joined Agrippa Menenius, ſurnamed Lanatus. And L. Minutius, was either made again the maſter victualler, or elſe created he was at firſt without limitation of time, to continue ſo long as the caſe ſhould require. For there is no certainty thereof, but only the name of Corn-maſter, recorded both years in the linnen Books or Regiſters among other Magiſtrates. This Minutius was vigilant, and as careful for the Common-weal, as Melius for his private wealth: and upon oc- L caſion that men of the ſame quality, to wit, the Commons, were converſant in both houſes, namely, in his own and in the houſe of Melius, he came to the knowledge by their means, of Melius his treaſon: and declared unto the Senat the whole complot. Namely, That there was armor and weapons good ſtore, carried into the houſe of Melius: that he kept conventicles there, and made ſeditious Orations, and that it was paſt all peradventure that he practiſed to be King. As for the time of working the feat and to put it into action, as yet it was not determined and certainly known: all other things were already agreed upon. Item, that the Tribuns were bribed and hired to ſell and betray the liberty of the City: That to certain Captains of the multitude divers charges were appointed. And herewithal, he excuſed himſelf (and ſaid) That becauſe he would not be reputed the author of any uncertain or vain intelligence, he uttered theſe matters ſomewhat M with the lateſt, and later well-neer, then might ſtand with the common ſafety of the Weal-publick. Which news after they were heard, and that on every ſide the chief Senators had given both the Coſſ. of the former year a check, for that they had ſuffered thoſe Largeſſes of corn, and tollerated meetings of the Commons in a private houſe: and rebuked the new Conſuls alſo, for that they had ſtayed ſo long and waited till a matter of ſo great importance was by the corn-maſter detected and declared unto the Senate, which required a Coſ. to be not only the informer, but alſo the reformer: Then T. Quintius anſwered, That the Conſuls were blamed without juſt cauſe, who being bridled with the laws of appealing, tending to the great prejudice and diſanulling of their ſoveraign government, had not commiſſion ſufficient by vertue of their place, to puniſh the thing according to the hainouſneſſe and quality thereof, as they had courage and heart thereto: N and that there was need now, not only of a valiant and ſtout man, but alſo of one that was freed from all bonds of laws and tied to none. And therefore he would name L. Quintius for Dictator: in whom there was courage anſwerable to that abſolute authority. When all men liked wel ther-of, Quintius himſelf at the firſt refuſed: demanding what they meant, to object and expoſe him, an unweldy man & ſo far ſtept in years, to ſo great trouble, and manifeſt danger. Afterwards, when as they replied on all hands, and alledged how in that heart of his for all his age there was more valour, and in his head more policy then in all men beſides; heaping on him right due and deſerved praiſes, and commendations; and whiles the Conſul alſo importuned him ſtill and gave not over: then Cincinnatus, after he had prayed to the gods immortal, that his decrepit old age in XIV ſo fearful a caſe, might not turn either to the loſſe or diſhonor of the Common wealth, was by O the Conſul pronounced Dictator. And he forthwith nominated C. Servilius Hala General of the horſemen. The morrow after when he had ſet and diſpoſed certain guards, in divers places of the City, and was come down into the common place: the common people wondring at the ſtrangeneſſe of the matter, had their eyes upon him: and the adherents and complices of Melius, and he himſelf their Captain, ſaw well that the force and power of this ſo great a magiſtrate was bent againſt them. But they that were not acquainted with thoſe plots and deſigns that tended to the ſetting up of a King, asked one another, what tumult or ſudden war, ſhould require either a

Dictators

A Dictators majesty, or that Quintius after fourscore years of age, should be the only Ruler of the City. With that, Servilius the General of the horsemen was by the Dictator sent to Melius: Who said unto him, The Dictator calleth thee. Whereat he being afraid, asked again, What he would? and Servilius said, That he was to make his answer and purgation, of a crime that Minutius had informed against him, before the Senat. Then Melius began to retire himselfe back into the rout of his followers, and looking about at the first, shrunk only away from him, and refused to obey. At the last the Apparitor at the general of the horsemens commandment, began to force him to go with him: but he being rescued by the standers by, found his feet and began to fly, and besought the aid of the Com-B monalty of Rome: saying, That the faction of the Nobles conspired his overthrow, and persecuted him for the good he had done unto the Commons, and for his liberality bestowed upon them: beseeching them to help him in that extremity, and not to suffer him to be murdered afore their face and in their very sight. As he spake these words, Hala Servilius overtook him, and killed him out-right: and being sprinkled with his blood thus slain, and guarded with a company of tall Gentlemen of the Nobility, he bringeth word to the Dictator, how Melius being cited to come unto him, put back the Apparitor, and raised the multitude: and now had suffered due punishments for his deserts. Then (quoth the Dictator) On forth in this valor and vertue of thine, O C. Servilius, thou deservest great praise, and hast delivered the Common-wealth this day from tyranny. Then XV C as the multitude murmured and made a stir upon some doubt, what they should think of the fact, and what might be the occasion thereof; he commanded them to assemble together, and openly avowed the deed, and pronounced that Melius was justly slain: yea, albeit he had been cleer from seeking to be King: for that being summoned and convented before the Dictator, and that by the General of the horsemen, he refused and came not: "for my self (quoth he) was set judicially to examine and enquire of the cause: and "upon the trial thereof, Melius should have sped no worse then his cause deserved: but "because he went about by violence to withdraw himself from judgment, by violence "therefore was he restrained. Neither was he to be proceeded against as a Citizen, who "being born in a free state, where justice and law were in force: and in that City, where-D "out he was not ignorant that the KK. were sometimes expelled: and where in one and "the same year, Collatinus sisters sons, and the sons of that Cos. that was deliverer of "his Country, detected of a complot and conspiracy of receiving again into the City the "KK. blood, were by their own father beheaded: out of which City, Tarquinius Col-"latinus Cos. for the detestation only of the name, being commanded to give up his office, "suffered exile: in which City, many years after Sp. Cassius for practising and plotting onely "to be King, suffered condigne punishment: wherein also of late time, the Decemvirs, "for a tyrannical pride, where deprived of their goods, banished their country, and bereft "of their lives. That in the same City (I say) Sp. Melius should conceive any hope "of reaching to a Kingdom? And a man (I pray you) of what quality and condition? And E "yet, no gentility of birth, no dignities nor deserts were sufficient to make way to any "for lordly rule and tyranny. Howbeit, the * Claudii and Cassii, by reason of the Consul- "ships and Decemvirships of their own, by reason of the honourable estate and reputati- "on of their ancestors, and the worship and glory of their linage, took upon them, be- "came haughty and proud, and aspired to that, whereunto Sp. Melius had no such means "to induce him: who might have sit him down, well enough, and rather wished and "prayed to God, then hoped once for so much, as a Tribunship of the Commons. And "supposed he, being but a rich corn-master, that with a quart (or measure of corn of "two pounds) he had bought the freedom of his fellow Citizens? or thought he by ca- "sting morsels of bread and victuals afore the common sort, that the victorious people, F "conquerers of all nations about them, might be allured into thraldom? and whom the "City could hardly brook to be a Senator, him they should endure their King, to have "the regal ensigns and the government of Romulus, the first founder of the City, de- "scended first from the gods, and to them ascended up again; why, it was a thing not so "wicked as monstrous. Neither was this act sufficiently satisfied for, with the shedding "of his blood, unless the house and walls, within which so horrible madness was conceived "and forged, were cast down and razed: and unless these goods, which were tainted and "infected with the prices and hire that should have purchased the Kingdom, were forfeit "and confiscate. He commanded therefore the Questors, to sell those goods, and to bring the mony into the common Treasury. And then he caused forthwith his dwel-
G ling house to be overthrown and made even with the ground, that the plot or floor thereof, might be a monument of a wicked attempt, smothered and stifled in the very hope and hatching thereof. This is the place which was called afterwards Æquimelium. As for L. Minutius he had an Ox with guilded horns given him for an honour and reward without the gate Trigemina. The Commons therewith were not miscontented, for that to them he divided Melius his corn, at the price of one * Asse a * Modius. Among some authors

I find, that this Minutius forsook the Nobles and went to the Commons, and was taken in to be the eleventh Tribun of the Commons, and appeased the mutiny that arose upon Melius his death. But it was not like that the Senators suffered the number of the Tribuns to be encreased: and especially, that such an example should be given and taken up by a man of their coat: or that the commonalty would not keep it still, if it had been once allowed, or at leastwise attempt it again. But above all, this confuteth and reproveth the false title of Tribune set upon his image, for that a few years before, it was by a statute expresly provided, That Tribuns might not chuse and take unto them a Colleague in office. Q. Cecilius, and Q. Junius, and Sextus Titinius were the only men of all the Colledge of Tribuns that propounded not the Law for the honour of Minutius, but rather accused unto the Commons, both Minutius and Servilius, and ceased not to make complaint of the cruel and unworthy death of Melius: and in fine prevailed so much, that there should be an election for military Tribuns rather then for Consuls: nothing doubting, but if six were chosen (for so many at that time might be created) some of the Commons also, by promising to revenge the death of Melius, might step in and be elected. The Commons for all they were tossed that year with many and sundry troubles, chose no more then three Tribuns with Consuls authority; and among them, L. Quintius the son of Cincinnatus: Upon the hard conceit and hatred of whose Dictatorship past, they thought to pick some occasion of quarrel and tumult: and Mamercus Æmylius, a man of great credit and reputation, was by voices preferred afore Quintius, and obtained the first place. And L. Julius they created for the third.

Whiles these bare soveraign rule, Fidene the Colony of the Romans, revolted to Lars Tolumnius, the King of the Veientians, and to the State of the Veientians. And besides their revolting, a more horrible fact they committed. For at the commandment of Tolumnius, they slew C. Fulcinius, and C. Julius, Sp. Nautius, and L. Roscius the Roman Embassadors, who came to demand the cause of this their change and sudden alteration. Some here do excuse and elevate the act of the King, saying that upon a lucky cast of dice he uttered a doubtful speech, which was by the Fidenatians so taken, as though he seemed to bid the Embassadours to be killed, and that (forsooth) was the occasion of murdering the Embassadours (a thing incredible, that at the comming in of the Fidenatians, his new allies, who were to consult with him and ask his advice, about a murder that should break the law of Nations, his mind should not be turned away from earnest studying about his game) and so this hainous fact proveth to be but an error. More credible it is, that he had a further meaning and deeper reach: namely, that the people of the Fidenatians should be bound unto him, and only rely upon him, being attaint with the guiltinesse of so foul a murder, and not to look and hope for any mercy or favour at the Romans hands. The statues of these Embassadors which were at Fidene murdered, were set up openly at the charges of the City in the Rostra. [A publick crosse (as it were) or pulpit in Rome, out of which the Magistrates made Orations to the people, beautified with the beak heads of ships and their brasen pikes called Rostra.] Thus was there like to be a cruel conflict with the Veientians, and Fidenates. Who besides that they were people confining on their frontiers, had also in the beginning of their war given so wicked and horrible a cause of quarrel. Therefore when as the common people and their Tribuns, in regard of the care for the publick State, were at quiet; there was no question, but that M. Geganius Macerinus the third time, and L. Sergius Fidenas (named (I suppose) so, upon the war which afterwards under his conduct was fought) should be created Consuls. For this man first encountred with the King of the Veientians on this side * Anio, and gat the victory: but not without much bloodshed of the Romans. So that the grief was greater for the loss of his own souldiers, then the joy for the discomfiture of his enemies. And the Senate, as in all fearful times and dangerous occurrents, ordained Mamercus Æmylius to be created Dictator. Who, out of the brotherhood of Tribuns military in Consuls authority, the year before, named for the General of his horsemen, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, who had been a Tribun with him, a toward young Gentleman, and a worthy son of so worthy a father. To those souldiers that were by the Consul mustered and levied, were the old Centurions, experienced and skilful warriers, adjoined: and the number of those, which in that last battel were slain, was supplied. The Dictator commanded to follow him as Lieutenants, Quintius Capitolinus, and M. Fabius Vibulanus. This greater power and authority, and the man likewise nothing thereto inferiour, drave the enemies out of the Roman ground, and set them farther off, even beyond Anio. Who removing their camp still backward, seized upon the hills between Fidene and Anio: neither durst they come down from thence into the open plains, before that the Legions of the Falisci came to succour. Then at length, the Tuscans encamped themselves under the walls of Fidene. And the Roman Dictator likewise rested and abode upon the banks of the Confluent (where both rivers run into one) and flanked himself thereby. And when he had cast up a trench and rampart afront, reaching across from the one river to the other, the morrow after he brought his power forth, and set them in order of battel. The enemies

A mies were of ſundry minds. The Faliſcians, who hardly could away long with military ſervice farre from home, and truſting withal in their own ſelves, that they were good enough, required battel. The Veientians and Fidenates had more hope in drawing out the war on length. Tolumnius, albeit the advice of his own men liked him better, yet becauſe the Faliſcians ſhould not endure lingring warfare, ſendeth a trumpet, and proclameth battel againſt the morrow. The Dictator and the Romans, for that the enemies for the preſent ſhifted off fight, took more heart unto them: and on the next morning, when as now the ſouldiers gave out brave words, and menaced, That unleſſe they might have battel, they would aſſault both the Camp and the Town: the armies of both parts came forth
B into the midſt of the plain, between the two Camps. The Veientians, as being more in number and having to ſpare, ſent covertly out certain companies to fetch a compaſs behind the Hills, who in the time of the conflict ſhould ſet upon the Roman Camp. And in this order ſtood the main Army of three Nations together embattelled. The Veientians kept the right point, the Faliſcians the left, and the Fidenates the middle of the battel. The Dictator in the right point advanced his ſtandard againſt the Faliſcians, and on the left Capitolinus Quintius charged the Veientians: and againſt the main battel between both, marched the Coronel of the Cavalry, with his Cornets of horſe. Thus as they ſtood arranged in battel array, for a pretty while was there ſilence on either ſide, and all quiet. For neither would the Tuſcans begin firſt, unleſſe they were urged: And the Dictator looked ever and C anon backward toward the Capitol of Rome, that the Augurs ſhould ſet up a ſignal aloft (as it was agreed between them) ſo ſoon as the flight of fowls gave approbation accordingly: which he no ſooner eſpied, but he put out preſently the men of arms, with a great ſhout againſt the enemies. The army of the footmen followed hard after in the tail, and ſeconded them with a luſty charge. But on no hand were the Tuſcan legions able to abide the force of the Romans. The Cavalry ſtood hardeſt to it, and made head ſtill. For the King himſelfe, the beſt horſeman and moſt valiant of them all, when as on every ſide his enemies charged and preſſed ſore upon him, rode afront them, held out and maintained fight. There chanced then to be among the Roman horſemen, a Tribune or Marſhal, one A. Cornelius Coſſus, a goodly tall man of body, and as valiant and ſtrong with-D al, who ſet before his eyes the noble houſe from whence he was deſcended, and carried this mind, as it was right honourable already by his anceſtors left him, ſo to recommend the ſame to his poſterity more glorious and renowned. This man ſeeing the troops of Romans waving to and fro, for fear of the violence of Tolumnius, which way ſoever he bent and turned; and knowing him by his rich and royal furniture, wherein he bare himſelf like a brave Knight, riding all over the battel. "Is this (quoth he) the forſworn breaker of "humane league, is this he that hath violated the laws of arms, and of nations? Now "will I preſently, if it be Gods will that any thing in the world ſhould remain wholly and "inviolate, be his Prieſt, I will ſacrifice and betake him to the ghoſts of our Embaſſadors "deceaſed. Herewith, ſetting ſpurs to his horſe, with bent ſpear in reſt, he rode full a-E gainſt that one enemy, ſingled from the reſt; ſmote him, and diſmounted him from his horſe. Then bearing upon his ſtaff, alight preſently on foot, and as the King was getting up again, he overthrew him backward with the boſs of his target, and laid him ſtretching long & after many wounds given him, at length faſtned him with his ſpear to the very ground. And when as he was once dead, he diſarmed and diſpoiled him, and ſtruck off his head: and carrying it aloft on his lance, preſented a fearful ſpectacle to the enemies of their King ſlain, and ſo diſcomfited them. Thus was the ſtrength of the horſemen defeated alſo, which only had made the battel doubtful. The Dictator having put likewiſe the legions of footmen to flight, purſued them ſtill, and drave them to their fort, killing them all the way in the chaſe. Many of the Fidenates which knew the coaſts of the Country, fled into the F mountains, and eſcaped. Coſſus with his horſemen paſſed over Tyber, and brought home into the City a great booty out of the country of the Veientians. As this battel was in fighting, there was a skirmiſh alſo in the Roman camp, with that part of the forces, which (as it is aforeſaid) was ſent by Tolumnius to ſurpriſe it. Fabius Vibulanus firſt defended the rampart, ordering his men all within, in compaſs like a garland: and while the enemies were wholly bent about the aſſault, he with the Triarii or ſouldiers of the rereward, ſuddenly iſſued forth at the gate, called Principalis, on the right hand, and gave an hot charge upon them; Upon which they were affrighted, but there enſued the leſs ſlaughter, becauſe the number was ſmaller. Howbeit, they fled no leſſe in diſarray, than thoſe in the very battel. Thus the Dictator having proſperous ſucceſs every where, returned with triumph into the City, by G the decree of the Senat, and grant of the people. In which triumphs the greateſt ſhew and goodlieſt ſight of all, was Coſſus, bearing the rich & royal ſpoils of the King, ſlain by his own hand. For of him the ſouldiers chanted divers rude ballads without rime and metre, comparing him in their ſongs with Romulus. Which ſpoils with a ſolemn manner of dedication he beſtowed and hung up in the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, neer unto thoſe of Romulus, which were the first and only spoils, until that time, called Opima Spolia. And as he went he with- H drew from the Dictators chariot, the eyes of all the people unto himselfe, and hee in manner alone, carried away the magnificence and glory of that festival day. The Dictator by order from the people, presented in the Capitol for the honour of Jupiter, a

Thus have I set down (as following all other writers before me) that Aulus Cornelius Cossus, a Colonel or Marshal, brought into the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the second royal spoils. Howbeit, over and besides, that those spoils onely are by right accounted Opima, or royal, which a General hath taken from a General, and we acknowledge none I for General, but him under whose conduct an high Commission a war is managed, the very title also written upon the spoils, doth check and reprove both them and me. The words whereof are these, [That Cossus being Consul, won those spoils.] When I once heard say, that Augustus Cæsar himself, the founder or repairer of all Temples, entred into the house of Jupiter Feretrius, which he re-edified, being by injury of long time fallen to decay, and read it so written in a linnen Jack or Curaze: I thought it little better then sacrilege, to discredit and cancel the testimony of Cossus himself concerning his own spoils, and of Augustus Cæsar, the benefactor of that very Temple. Which error, if it grow hereon, That so ancient Records and Chronicles, and that the Books of the Magistrates, which being of linnen, and laid up in the Temple of Moneta, Macer Licinius doth very often quote and K cite as his Authors, do represent unto us Aulus Cornelius Cossus, the seventh year after Consul, with Titus Quintius Pennus: let every man abound in his own sense, and have his opinion by himself freely. For more then all this may be alledged to prove, that so famous a battel could not be transferred to that year: because that for three years space about the Consulship of Cossus, there was no war at all, in a manner, by reason of pestilence and dearth of corn: so as some records, as it were, mourning, and bewraying the calamity of the time, deliver unto us nothing but the bare names of the Consuls. In the third year, after that Cossus was Consul, he was military Tribun in Consuls authority, and in the same year General of the horsemen also: in which government he fought another notable battel with horsemen. But hereof a man may conjecture and guesse what he will. L
But (as I think) we may toss these things of small importance to and fro, according to every mans opinion: and when all is done, the author of this battel his own selfe, having set up these fresh and new spoils in a holy place, in the sight of Iupiter himselfe standing thereby, to whom they were vowed, and Romulus also, two witnesses, not to bee despised nor abused with a false title, hath written himself, [A. Cornelius Cossus Consul.]

When Marcus Cornelius Maluginensis and Papyrius Crassus were Consuls, the Armies were led forth: the one into the Veientians Country, and the other into the Falisians, and booties both of people and cattel were from thence driven and carried away. As for the enemies themselves, no where in the Country were they to be seen, nor any battel was M fought: and yet for all that, the towns were not assaulted, because the people at home died of the pestilence. And within the City, Sp. Melius Tribune of the Commons sought occasions and pretences to move seditions, but without effect. Who supposing by the popular favour of his name to prevaile and raise some mutiny, both arrested Minutius to make his answer, and also put up a bill for the confiscation of the goods of Servilius Hala: laying hard to Minutius his charge, that Melius was falsely accused and circumvented by him: and burdening Servilius with the murdering of a Citizen uncondemned. All these surmises were with the people of less credit and importance, than the author himselfe. But the violence of the sickness still encreasing more and more, troubled them: besides the fearful and strange prodigious tokens: but especially, the fresh news that divers houses in the N Country were by many earthquakes cast down. Whereupon the people went in solemn procession and made their supplications, whiles the Duumvir going afore pronounced the prayers, and the people said after him word for word. But the year following, when C. Iulius the second time, and L. Virginius were Consuls, was more contagious by reason of the plague, and caused both in Town and Country, so great a fear of utter desolation, that not only there were none set forth in any roads without the territory of Rome to raise booties, whiles the Nobility and Commons had no mind of making war: but the Fidenates also of their own accord, who before time had kept themselves either within their Towns, or Mountains, or Fortresses, entred now into the lands about Rome, and forraged all the Country. After this, having gotten also unto them a power of the Veientians (for the Falisci- O ans could not be induced either by the calamity of the Romans, or prayers of their confederates, to take arms again) these two Nations passed over Anio, and not far from the gate Collina displayed their ensigns. So the fear was no lesse within the City than in the Country. Then Iulius the Consul bringeth the forces abroad, and placeth them upon the rampart and

A the walls: whiles Virginius assembled the Senate in the Temple of Quirinus, for to ask their opinion. Where agreed it was, to create for Dictator, A. Servilius, surnamed (as some say) Priscus, or as other, Structus. Virginius making no longer stay than until he had consulted with his Colleague, by his permission declared the Dictator in the night season. And he nominated for his General of the Cavalry, Posthumius Ebutius Helva. The Dictator commanded every man to be ready without the gate Collina, by the break of day: and so many as were able to bear arms were in a readinesse. The Standards and Ensigns were taken forth of the treasury or chamber of the City and brought to the Dictator. Whiles these things were in doing, the enemies were retired and withdrawn to the higher grounds and B and places of advantage; and thither marched the Dictator with his army in order of battel. And encountring with them not far from Nomentum, he discomfited the legions of the Tuscans, and drave them into the town of Fidene, and cast a trench about it. But neither could the town be scaled for the high site thereof and the strong walls about it: and to lay siege unto it might not avail: for that they had corn not only to suffice the ordinary need of men besieged, but also plenty to spare, of their old store and provision gathered aforehand. Thus the Dictator being without all hope both of winning it by assault, and also of forcing them to yeeld by composition, purposed in certain places for the neerneſse to him well known, at the backside of the City which was slenderly guarded, most neglected, and for the natural situation the surest, to undermin unto the Castle. And he him-
C self in places fartheſt off from thence, approached close under the walls, with his army divided into four parts, to succeed one another by turns in order: and so, by continual skirmishing day and night, he kept the enemies at a bay and withdrew them from all perceiving and intelligence of the work under ground: until such time as by digging through the hill from the Camp, there was a way and passage made straight up into the Castle. And when as the Tuscans were wholly amused upon the vain threatnings, and bravado's of their enemies before them, nothing minding the present danger wherein they stood: behold, the alarm of their enemies even over their heads, made an out-cry, that the town was taken. In this year Cn. Furius Pacilus and M. Geganius Macerinus, Censors, appointed and dedicated the Large Hall, named Villa Publica in Mars field: and there first by them was D held the Sessing and numbring of the people. I find in Macer Licinius, that in the year following, the same Consuls were made again, namely, Julius the third time, and Virginius the second time. But Valerius Antias and Q. Tubero, do name M. Manlius and Q. Sulpitius for the Consuls that year. Howbeit in so different report, both Tubero and Macer professe that they followed the linnen Records: and neither of them both conceal that which the ancient writers have set down, namely, That the same year were Tribuns military, in Consuls authority. Licinius without doubt is addicted to those linnen Registers, and Tubero is uncertain of the truth. But among other antiquities, not known by reason of long time, this also is left in doubt and not cleared.

Fidene won by a Stratagem.

Villa Publica.

After the winning of Fidene, great was the fear in Hetruria: whilest not only the Veien-E tians were scared, fearing the like destruction: but the Faliſci also, remembring the war began first with them, albeit they were not assistant in their rebellion. When as therefore these two States had sent their Embassadours abroad to the twelve Cities about them, and obtained a Diet or General Parliament of all Hetruria should be assembled at the Temple of Votumna*: the Senat, as if some great troubles were like thereof presently to ensue, thought good that Mamercus Æmylius, should be created Dictator the second time. By whom, A. Posthumius Tubero was named General of the horsemen. And with so much greater endeavor made they preparation of arms than in the last war afore, by how much more danger there was from all Hetruria banded together, than had been from two nations combined and no more. But this business was much more quiet than all men looked for. When F as therefore news came by Merchants, that the Veientians were flatly denied help, and bidden to end that war by their own means and forces, which they had begun on their own heads: nor seek to embark them in the association of their misery and adversity, unto whom they had not imparted their mind & hope in their upright state, and when they were in their height: then the Dictator, to the end he should not seem to be created in vain, seeing all matter of acquiring renown by war was cut off, desirous yet in time of peace, to doe some notable piece of work for a monument, setteth in hand to abate and diminish the Censorship: either supposing it to be too high an office, or else offended not so much with the greatneſse of the honour, as with the continuance and length thereof. Having therefore assembled all the people together: "For as much as the immortal Gods (quoth he) have under-G "taken to govern the Common-Weale abroad, and performed all safe and sure: I for my part "concerning that which is to be done at home within the walls, will take order and pro-"vide for the freedom of the people of Rome. great applause and consent of the people, the next day after, he both published the law and enacted it. And now that ye may (quoth he) O Quirites, know in very deed, how I mislike of these long lasting offices, here presently I render up my Dictatorship. Thus having given over his own place, set a limitation to the rule of others, and absolutly ended one, with exceeding congratulation and favour of the people he was brought home to his house. The Censors taking it grievously that Mamercus had abridged an office of the people I of Rome, displaced him from his own Tribe, laying on him an eightfold tax in the subsidy Book, disfranchised and disabled him from giving his voice, and made him no better then a Tributary. Which disgrace (they say) he took with a noble stomack, looking rather to the cause of this shameful note, than to the ignominy it self. Moreover, the Lords of the Senate, albeit they were willing enough that the Censorship nails should be pared and their power taken down, were offended yet, with this example of the rigour and severity of those in place: for as much as they all saw plainly, that they should be both longer time and oftner under Censors, then Censors themselves. But so great an indignation of the people (by report) grew hereof, that by the authority of no man but of Mamercus himselfe, could they be restrained from offering violence to the very persons of the Censors. And the Tri- K buns of the Commons, with their continual Orations and Remonstrances, prohibited the Election of Consuls. When as the matter was well neer brought to the point of an Inter-reign, they obtained at length with much strife and contention, that there should be military Tribuns chosen, with Consular authority. But reward of this their victory, whereat they shot, could they get none: namely, that a Commoner might be chosen for one. They were all of the Nobility that were created, to wit, M. Fabius Vibulanus, M. Folius, and L.

Sergius Fidenas.

The plague that year was the occasion of quietness from all other troubles. A Temple then was vowed to Apollo for the health of the people. Howbeit, great loss was there both in town and country, by the the mortality of men and murrain of cattel, one with another L indifferently. And fearing left the husbandmen of the country should be famished, they sent for corn into Hetruria and the country of Pomptinum, to Cumes, and at last even into Si- cily. And not a word all this while about the election of Consuls. So there were military Tribuns elected, with Consuls authority, all again of the Patritii, namely, L. Pinarius Ma- mercus, L. Furius Medullinus, and Sp. Posthumius Albus. That year the violence of the sick-nesse abated: neither was there any danger or fear of scarcity of Corn, because they had made provision aforehand. Great sitting and consultation there was in the general Diets of the Vol-scians and Æquians, and in Hetruria at the aforesaid Temple of Votumnia about making war.
There, the matter was put off for one whole year: and by an Act or Decree it was provided, that no Assembly or Parliament during that time should be held: notwithstanding the M people of the Veientians complained but all in vaine, that the same fortune was like to happen unto Veii, which had fallen already upon Fidene, even the utter subversion of the State. In this mean season, at Rome the chiefe heads of the Commons having aspired and gaped now a long time, but still in vain, after higher place of dignity and honour, took their vantage whiles all was quiet abroad, and began to have their conventicles and meetings in the houses of the Tribunes, and there entertained secret Counsels. Some complained that they were much despised of the common people: for whereas in so many yeares, There were Tribunes Military created with Consuls authority, yet never was there any one of the Commonalty advanced to that Dignity. Our forefathers (say they) in great wisedom and deep fore- N cast, have done well to take order, that none of the Nobility at any time should have acces to any office of the Commonalty: for if that were not, the Commons should have had ere this some of the Patritii for their Tribuns: so odious are we become to those of our own coat, and are as little set by of the Commons as of the Nobles. Others excused the people, and laid the fault upon the Senators: by whose ambition, by whose crafty fetches and subtil policies it came to passe, that the Commons were stopped from the highway to advancement and promotion. But if the Commons might have any respit or breathing time, and not be sollicited and tempted by their prayers interlaced with threats: they would remember themselves and those of their own calling, in giving of their voices: and having once gotten assistance unto them, would also win the highest pitch and soveraign type of authority. For O the abolishing therefore of this ambitious seeking and standing for offices, they agree and resolve, that the Tribuns should prefer and publish a Law, that no man might wear white more then ordinary, or refresh the bright hue of his upper garment. while he sued for any dignity. A

A not be ſollicited and tempted by their prayers interlaced with threats: they would remember themſelves and thoſe of their own calling, in giving of their voices: and having once gotten aſſiſtance unto them, would alſo win the higheſt pitch and ſoveraign type of authority. For the aboliſhing therefore of this ambitious ſeeking and ſtanding for offices they agree and reſolve, that the Tribuns ſhould preferr and publiſh a law, that no man might wear white morethen ordinary, or refreſh the bright hue of his upper garment, while he ſued for any dignity. A ſmall matter now adays and may ſeem ſcarcely worth the debating in ſerious counſel, which notwithſtanding at that time, ſet both nobles and commons in a great heat of contention. Yet obtained the Tribuns ſo much, that this law paſſed: and it appeared,
B that the Commons when their blood was once up, would affect their own, and wholly incline to them in their ſuffrages. But to the end that they might not have their full ſcope and put it in practice, an Act of the Senate was, that there ſhould be held an Election of Conſuls. The occaſion thereof, was a tumult or commotion: which, as the Latins and Hernicks advertiſed them, aroſe from the Æquians and Volſcians. T. Quintius Cincinnatus, the ſon of Lucius (ſurnamed alſo Pennus) and C. Julius Mento were elected Conſuls. Neither was this fearful news of war entertained any longer. For the enemies having by a ſacred law (which amongſt them was of greateſt force to levy an army) muſtered their power, ſet forth two mighty armies from both parts, into Algidum, and there met. Where the Æquians and Volſcians, ſeverally by themſelves encamped ſtrongly, and more earneſtly C ſtudied the Captains to fortifie their camps, and to train and exerciſe their ſouldiers, than at any time afore. Whereupon, the news was more fearful that the meſſengers brought to Rome. So the Senate agreed to create a Dictator. For, although thoſe nations oftentimes had been vanquiſhed by them, yet now they rebelled in more forcible manner, and with preparation, than at any time before. Alſo, by reaſon of the late ſickneſs, the youth and flower of the Romans was ſore diminiſhed. But above all, the private diſcord of the Conſuls one with another, and the debate and difference in all their counſel terrified them moſt. There be that write, how theſe Conſuls had but unlucky fortune, and loſt a field in Algidum: and that it ſhould be the cauſe of making a Dictator. But this one thing is certain, that howſoever elſe the Conſuls diſagreed, yet they jumped in one to croſs the wills of the D Senators, in that they would not nominate a Dictator until ſuch time as after news brought, ſtill worſe and worſe, and yet the Conſuls would not be ruled by the Senators: one Quintus Servilius Priſcus, a man, who right worthy and honourably had born the higheſt offices, made this ſpeech: "My Maſters, ye that are Tribuns of the Commons (quoth he) in this "exigent and deſperate caſe, the Senate calleth for your aſſiſtance, that in ſo great hazzard "of the Common-weal, ye by vertue of your authority, would force the Conſuls peremptorily to make a Dictator. Which ſpeech being once heard; the Tribuns ſuppoſing now they had good occaſion offered, to ſtretch and extend their power to the full, departed aſide: and in the name of their Colledge or ſociety, pronounced, That it was their pleaſure and will, that the Conſuls ſhould be obedient unto the Senat: and in caſe they proceeded to E do farther, then the conſent of that moſt honourable Houſe would bear them out, they would command them to ward. The Conſuls choſe rather to be over-ruled of them than of the Senat: ſaying yet withal, that the prerogative of the higheſt government was by the Senators betrayed, and the Conſulſhip made thrall and ſubject to the Tribuns power, if ſo be the Conſuls might be compelled to do ought by vigour of the Tribuns authority, and (than which, a private perſon could fear no more) be ſent alſo to ward, or committed to priſon. The lot fell to T. Quintius (for in this alſo they could not agree between themſelves) to nominate the Dictator: who named A. Poſthumius Tubertus, his wives father, a grim Sir, and a man of moſt ſevere and ſtern government. By whom was L. Julius nominated for General of the Cavalry: Herewithal was proclamed a vacation or law-ſteed, and that through-
F out the whole City they ſhould go in hand with nothing but war. The taking knowledge of ſuch as pretended to be freed and exempt from ſouldiery, was put off until the war was ended. So that they that were before doubtful, ſuffered themſelves to be enrolled: and ſouldiers were levied out from the Hernicks and Latins, who from both places obeyed the Dictator to their uttermoſt. All theſe things were diſpatched with exceeding expedition. Then the Dictator having left C. Julius the Conſul, for the defence of the City, & L. Julius the General of the horſemen for all ſudden occaſions incident unto wars, that they might not be to ſeek for any thing whereof they had need in the camp, took with him Aulus Cornelius the High Prieſt, & ſaying after him certain prayers, word for word, he vowed great and ſtately playes, in regard of this tumultuous and troubleſome war: and thus departing from the City, and dividing his whole G army between himſelf and Quintius the Coſ. at length he approached the enemies. And like as they had diſcovered the two camps of their enemies, a little ſpace diſtant one from another, ſo they alſo, about a mile from the enemy, intrenched themſelves: the Dictator neer to Tuſculum, and the Conſul to Lanuvium. So theſe four Armies, and as many fortified camps, had a ſpacious and large plain in the middle, ſufficient not only for ſmall excurſions to skirmiſh in, but alſo to diſplay their armies of both ſides. And all the time that they lay encamped encamped one againſt another, they ceaſed not to make light skirmiſhes: for the Dictator H was well content, that his men by making proof, and comparing their ſtrength and puiſſance with their enemies, and aſſaying by little and little to try the event of theſe skirmiſhes, ſhould conceive aforehand ſome hope of the entire and general victory.

The enemies therefore having no hope left, to ſpeed well in a ſet field and pight battel, aſ-ſailed by night the Conſuls camp, and put all to the hazard of a doubtful iſſue. The ſudden cry and alarm, awakned not only the Conſuls, Sentinels, his corps de guard, and ſo his whole army, but the Dictator alſo out of their ſleep. And where need was of preſent help, there failed not the Conſul, either in courage or counſel. Some ſouldiers ward and defend the gates, others compaſs the trench, ranged in a round array. In the other camp of the Dicta- I tor, look how much leſs ſtir there was, ſo much more leaſure had they, and ſtudied what was moſt needful to be done. Forthwith aid was ſent unto the Conſul his camp, under the leading of Sp. Poſthumius Albus, a Lieutenant. The Dictator himſelf in perſon, with part of his power, fetching a ſmall compaſs about, gained a place moſt apart from all noiſe and tumult, and from whence at unawares he might charge upon the back of the enemies. And leaveth as Vicegerent in the leaguer Q. Sulpitius: and to M. Fabius a Lieutenant, he com-mitteth the conduct of the horſemen, commanding him not before day to ſtir with his horſe, as being unruly and hard to be managed in tumults and troubles of the night. And all things elſe, that a provident and induſtrious Captain in ſuch a caſe might command and do, that commanded he, and did orderly. But for one thing above the reſt, he ſhewed ſingular K proof of policy and courage, and worthy no mean praiſe: in that he ſent out firſt M. Geganius with certain choſen Squadrons to aſſail that camp of the enemies, from whence he knew by his eſpials there was departed a greater part of the forces. Who after that he ſur-priſed the enemies there, amuſed wholly upon the event of other mens danger, careleſſe and ſecure for their own ſelves, and therefore neglecting their ſcouts and guards; wan their hold, in manner before the enemies knew well it was aſſailed. From whence the Dictator having deſcried a ſmoak (which was the ſignal agreed between them) crieth aloud, that the enemies camp was won, and commandeth news thereof to be carried every way. Now it waxed broad day light, and all was clearly to be ſeen: by which time both Fabius with the horſemen, had given the charge, and the Conſul alſo had made a ſally out of the camp, up- L on the enemies that now already were ſcared. But the Dictator on the other ſide, charging upon the rereward and the middle battel, came on every ſide with his footmen, and horſemen in train of victory againſt the enemies: who were forced to turn round and fight every way, according to the diſſonant outcries, and ſudden alarms. Thus being environed round about, they had in the midſt died for it every one, and ſuffered puniſhment due for their rebellion, had not Vectius Meſſius, one of the Volſcians, a man more renowned for his valiants acts, then noble by his parentage, rebuked with a loud voice his fellows, being ready now to caſt themſelves into rings, and ſaid: "What? will ye here without making your deand compelled the victors to loſe ground, until ſuch time as the Dictator came to ſuccour his N men thus diſtreſſed, and now ready to retreat: and ſo he bent thither all the force of the whole battel. In one only man, Meſſius, reſted all the hope and fortune of the enemies. Many a man was there hurt on both parts, and many a one ſlain outright, and left dead in the place. So as now the very Roman Commanders, fought not without bloodſhed. Only Poſthumius being ſmitten with a ſtone, which had broken and bruiſed his head, went out of the throng: for neither the Dictator, wounded as he was in the ſhoulder, nor yet Fabius, albeit his thigh was almoſt nailed to his horſe, nor the Conſul, for all his arm was quite cut off, once retired or departed out of that dangerous combat. But Meſſius amidſt the enemies that there lay dead on the earth, with a guard about him of moſt hardy & tall men paſſed through in forcible manner, and eſcaped clear to the Volſcians leaguer, which as yet was not loſt: and O ſo the whole battel inclined thither. The Conſul, after he had chaſed them, ſcattered in parties here and there, even as far as to the trench, aſſaileth the very camp and the rampart.

Thither alſo bringeth the Dictator his power to another ſide. Neither was the aſſault leſs hot there then the fight was ſharp afore. It is ſaid moreover, that the Conſul threw an enſign within the rampart, to animate the ſouldiers, that they might more eagerly get up after it:

A and ſo by recovering the banner again, was the firſt breach and entrance made. Thus the Dictator having broken through the mure, came to cloſe fight and hand-ſtroaks even within the camp. Then began the enemies every where to fling from them their weapons, and to yeeld themſelves priſoners. So being themſelves and their pavillions taken, they were all ſold, but thoſe of Senators calling. Part of the pillage was reſtored to the Latins and Hernicks, namely, to as many as knew their own goods: part thereof the Dictator ſold in port-ſale. And leaving to the Conſul the charge of the camp, rode himſelf triumphing into the City, and gave over his office. Of which his noble and famous Dictatorſhip, they blemiſh the memorial, who write, that A. Poſthumius (the Dictator his ſon, for that upon advantage offered of a fortunate ſervice, he departed without leave from B his quarter and guard) was after his victory atchieved, by his fathers Commandment beheaded. But I liſt not to believe it. And lawful it is for me ſo to do, among ſo divers opinions: and a good proof it is on my ſide, that ſuch imperious and rigorous proceedings were called Imperia Manliana, and not Poſthumiana. For like it is, that he who had given the firſt example of ſuch cruelty, ſhould have gotten afore all others, that noted title of cruelty. Beſides, Manlius it was, that was ſurnamed Imperious. But Poſthumius is not marked with any odious note at all. Imperia Manliana.

C. Iulius Conſul, in the abſence of his Collegue, without any caſting of lots, dedicated the Temple of Apollo. Quintius having diſcharged his army, when he was returned into the City took not that well. But it was no boot to complain in the Senat houſe. Moreover, in this notable year, ſo full of brave and worthy acts, there is recorded one thing, that was thought in thoſe days no-C thing pertinent to the State of Rome, namely, that the Carthaginians (ſo great and mortal enemies in time to come) paſſed the ſeas then firſt: and (upon the occaſion of civil diſſention and diſcord among the Sicilians) with a power landed in Sicily, for to take part with a ſide and faction. In the City of Rome the Tribuns of the Commons laboured, that Military Tribuns might be with Conſuls authority choſen: but it could not be obtained. Conſuls were made, Lu. Papyrius Craſſus, and L. Iulius. The Æquians Embaſſadors ſuing to the Senat for a league, and for that league, pretending very often to yeeld themſelves, and be in ſubjection, obtained a truce only for 8. years. The Volſcians after their overthrow in Algidum, fell to continual debate and contention, whiles ſome perſwaded peace, and others war: ſo long, until at length they grew to brawls and mutinies. So on every ſide the Romans were at reſt. The Conſuls underſtanding that the Tribuns of the D Commons were complotted (for one falſe brother among them bewrayed and detected all) to put up a bill, and make a law, concerning the eſtimation of fines and penalties (a thing right pleaſing and acceptable to the people) they themſelves prevented them, and preferred it. Then were Conſuls, L. Sergius Fidenas, the ſecond time, and Hoſtius Lucretius Tricipitinus. In whoſe year nothing was there done worthy of rehearſal. After them ſucceeded Conſuls, A. Cornelius Coſſus, and Titus Quintius Pennus the ſecond time. The Veientians made rodes into the lands of the Romans. And a rumor went, that ſome of the Fidenatian youths were acceſſary unto them, and had their hands therein. For which were appointed as Commiſſioners to make inquiſition, L. Sergius, Quintus Servilius, and Mamercus Æmilius. Some of them were confined to Hoſtia, for that they could make no ſound excuſe, and juſtifie their abſence for certain days out of Fidene. So E the number of the inhabitants there, was encreaſed; and their lands, who were ſlain in the wars, aſſigned unto them. An act for fines and penalties.

In that year hapned an exceeding great drouth. For not only there wanted rain water from above, but alſo the very earth lacking her natural moiſture, ſcarcely ſufficed to maintain the running ſtream in main rivers. The ſcarcity of water beſides about ſprings that were dried up, and the ſmall rivulets and brooks cauſed a great death and mortality of cattel for default of drink: whereof ſome died of the ſcab: by contagion whereof the people alſo were diſeaſed generally. The malady firſt began among the ruſtical ſort, the bond-ſlaves and hinds: and afterwards ſpread into every corner of the City. Neither were men only tainted and diſeaſed with this infection: but their minds alſo were troubled and poſſeſſed with ſundry ſorts of ſuperſtitions religions, and F thoſe for the moſt part ſtrange and forrain: whiles upon vain and fooliſh propheſies, they brought new rites and ceremonies of ſacrificing into mens houſes; and made good gain of ſuch as were given to ſuperſtitious devotion, and made conſcience of every little thing: until ſuch time as now it grew to a publick offence, and the chief of the City were aſhamed to ſee in every ſtreet and chappel, ſtrange and unaccuſtomed purgatory ſacrifices and expiations, for to procure the favour and mercy of the gods. Whereupon the Ædiles had in charge and commiſſion, to look ſtreightly to this diſorder: and that no other gods were worſhipped, then thoſe of the Romans: nor after any other manner than had been uſual in their native country. So their anger againſt the Veientians, and deſire of revenge, was put off unto the next year following, when C. Servilius Hala, and L. Papirius Mugilanus were Conſuls. And even then, they made ſome ſcruple to proclaime
G war immediately, or to make out any power againſt them: but they thought good to ſend their Heralds afore, to make claim for their own and challenge reſtitution. For whereas of late years there had been a field fought with the Veientians before Nomentum and Fidene: whereupon there followed no peace but only a truce concluded: both the time was now expired, and alſo before the day they had rebelled. Yet were there Heralds ſent unto them. And when they had demanded amends by a ſolemn oath and other ceremonies according to the ancient manner, they might have no audience, neither were their words regarded. After this there aroſe ſome queſtion, whether the war ſhould be proclamed with the peoples allowance & ſuffrages A great drought about Rome, and much mortalitie thereupon.

Rome addicted to ſuperſtitions.

or the Senates decree were alone sufficient. The Tribuns by giving out and threatning that they H would stop the musters, obtained in the end, that Quintius the Consul should propound this matter concerning the war unto the people. And it passed clear through all the Centuries. Herein also had the Commonalty the better of it, for that they prevailed that there should be no Consuls chosen the year following. So there were four Tribuns military created with Consuls authority, T. Quintius Pennus immediately from his Consulship. C. Furius, M. Posthumius, and Cornelius Cossus: of which Cossus had the charge and government of the City. The other three after they had mustered, took a journey to Veii, and made good proof how hurtful in war is the rule of many Commanders. For whiles every man was inclined to his own counsel and advice, and took divers courses one from another, they made way for the enemies and gave them advantage. For I the Veientians taking their opportunity and time, entred upon the army thus distracted, whiles some commanded to sound a retreat, others the alarm and to strike up the battel. Whereupon they were disordered and put to flight. But for as much as the camp was neer at hand, thither they retired themselves in safety: so, as the shame they gat was more then the harm in this defeat. The City was pensive and hereupon sorrowed, as not used to take foiles and overthrows. The Tribuns they hated, and required a Dictator; in whom rested ever the whole hope and stay of the City. And when as even in that behalf, they made a matter of conscience, because there might not be any Dictator nominated, but by a Consul, the Augurs were consulted withal: who resolved them of that doubt and rid them of their scruple. So A. Cornelius (a consular Tribun) nominated Mamercus Æmilius Dictator: by whom he was himself also pronounced Grand Ma- K ster of the horsemen. At such default was the City then, of right valour and true vertue, that notwithstanding the prejudice by the Censors, yet there was no remedy, but the whole government of the state should rest upon that family, which had been wrongfully disgraced and unworthily noted by the Censors.

Four military Tribuns in Consular authority.

The Veientians proud of their late good success, albeit they sent their Embassadors about all the nations of Hetruria, boasting and vaunting that in one battel they had discomfited three Roman Generals, yet could not they with all their solliciting, perswade any to be seen to take part with them in publick action: but they procured divers from all parts for hope of spoil, voluntarily to aid and assist them. The people of Fidene only agreed to rebel. And as though it had been in no wise lawful, to begin any war but with some wicked, heinous and execrable fact: like as afore they J had embrewed their hands, and bathed their swords in blood of Embassadors, so then, they began with murdering their new received Coloners: and so banded themselves with the Veientians. Then consulted the Princes and States of those two nations, whether they should make Veii or Fidene the seat town of the war. Fidene was supposed the fitter and more commodious. So the Veientians passed over the Tyber, and translated the war to Fidene. Great fear was there at Rome to see the army of their enemies removed from Veii, and implanted at Fidene. And being shrewdly danted by their late overthrow besides, they encamped even before the gate Collina. On the walls were armed souldiers placed, vacation in all courts of law was ordained, shop windows shut up, and all more like a Leaguer then a City. Then sent the Dictator the Criers about into all streets and lanes, to summon the Citizens thus terrified, to a general assembly. Where he rebuked them M for carrying such wavering and doubtful hearts upon so small accidents and events of fortune, having received but a slight loss and smal foil: and that, not through the manhood of the enemy, or cowardise of the Roman army, but only through the disagreement and difference of the Leaders. "Also for that they were afraid of the Veientian enemy, whom five or six times afore they "had put to the worst and vanquished, and especially of Fidene, which had been oftner in a man"ner won, then assaulted. As for the Romans and their enemies (saith he) they are even the "same still that always for so many hundred years, they had been: bearing the same minds, the "same bodily strength, and the same armor: and even my self am the same Mamercus Æmilius,
"and no other, who heretofore discomfited at Nomentum, the Veientians and Fidenatians, with "the Falscians power also adjoined unto them. And as for A. Cornelius, he wil no doubt be the N
"same General of horsemen in this battel, as in the former war he was: at what time he being a "Knight Marshal, slew Lars Tolumnius the King of the Veientians, in the sight of two armies:
"and brought into the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the rich armor of him despoiled. Wherefore
"ye ought to remember this, that we have on our side triumphs, spoils and victory: whereas
"with the enemies remaineth the wicked and detestable fact of killing the Embassadors, against "the law of all nations: also the massacre of the Fidenatian inhabitants, in time of peace: the brea"king of truce, and their revolting now seven times to their ruin and overthrow. Take weapon
"therefore in hand like men: for I trust assuredly that so soon as we shall join our camps together,
"and encounter these most wicked enemies, they shall have no long joy of the shameful discom"fiture of the Roman army. And the people of Rome shall understand, how much better they O
"have deserved of the Common-weal, who made me Dictator now the third time, than those,
"who for clipping the Censors wings and abridging them of their kingly rule, had distained
"and disgraced my second Dictatorship with the shameful blot of ignominy and reproach.
After this speech, when he had made his vows accordingly: he encamped a mile and an half on this side Fidene, flanked on the right hand with the hills, and on the left with the river Tyber. And commanded T. Quintius Pennus his Lieutenant, to gain the hills afore, and be possessed secretly of that cape or hill, which was on the back part of the enemies. Himself the next morrow

A when as the Tuſcans, (full of pride and ſtomack for the proſperous ſucceſs of former dayes, which was much better than their ſervice in fight) came forth into the field: after he had ſtayed a while, until the ſcouts and eſpials brought word, that Quintius was gotten ſafely unto the Hill top near adjoyning to the Cattle or fort of the Fidenatians, he advanceth forth his ſtandards: and with his footmen ranged in battel array, marched againſt his enemies with full pace: commanding his General of the Horſemen not to charge without his warrant: for that he himſelf "as need ſhould require, would give the ſignal for the aid of his cavalry to come in, willing him "then, to quit himſelf like a brave Knight in remembrance of his glorious combate with a King: "of his rich preſent and oblation: and of Romulus and Jupiter Feretrius. Thus the legions aſſail B one another and encounter right hardily. The Romans kindled and enflamed with rancour and malice, termed the Fidenatians, wicked and godleſs wretches: the Veientians, Robbers and Theeves; truce-breakers both, polluted with the abominable murder of Embaſſadors: ſteyned with the execrable maſſacre of their cohabitants: faithleſs and treacherous allies, cowardly and daſtardly enemies: thus both in word and deed they ſatisfied their hatred to the full; And at the very firſt ſhock forced their enemies to ſhrink. At which inſtant all at once, there iſſued out of the open gates of Fidene a ſtrange army, not heard of nor uſual, before that day; A mighty number armed with fireworks; and ſhining all over with burning lights, after a fanatical and mad manner, ran as if they were carried with ſpirits, upon their enemies: and with the uncouth ſight of this kind of fight, amaſed the Romans a prety while. Then the Dictator buſy in fight, ha- C ving ſent both for the General of the Cavalry with his troups of Horſemen, and alſo for Quintius from the mountains, haſtened himſelf to the left point: which being terrified with a ſcarefire more like than a battel, had given place unto the flame, and ſtepped back. Where with a loud voyce he thus ſpake: "What? will ye be overcome with ſmoak like a ſwarm of Bees, and loſe your "ground, and retreat from your naked and unarmed enemies? will ye not put out this fire with re- "doubled ſtroke of brandiſhing ſwords? And will ye not every man for his part, if we muſt needs "fight with fire, and not with weapons, pull from them their torches and firebrands, and fling "them again at their own heads? Go to, I ſay, like hardy men, mindful of the renown of Ro- "mans, remembring the proweſs of your Fathers, and your own ſelves. Turn this fire upon your "enemies City, and conſume Fidene into aſhes with her own flames: this diſloyal Fidene, which D "by no favors and good turns of yours, ye were ever able to win and pacifie. The bloud of your "Embaſſadors, the bloud of your Coloners thither ſent to people their City, your Frontiers and "Borders by them waſted, put you in mind of no meaner revenge. At the Dictators commandment, the whole battaillon was moved and encouraged. Some catch the firebrands as they flew; others by force ſnatch them from them, ſo that now both battels were armed with fire. The General of Horſemen for his part, renueth the Horſe ſervice: commanding them to pluck the bitts out of their Horſes mouths; and was the firſt himſelf, that ſetting ſpurs to, rode with bridle in Horſe neck, into the midſt of the fire: and the other Horſes alſo being pricked forward, and eaſed of their bridles, carried the riders with full carier againſt the enemy. The duſt riſing together with the ſmoke, took the light from mens eyes, and Horſes both. And that ſight which had terrified the E ſouldiers, nothing at all affrighted the Horſes. Whereſoever therefore the men of arms rode they bare down all afore them as if ſome Houſes had come tumbling upon their heads. Herewith happened a new alarm to be heard, which having cauſed both armies to wonder and liſten thereunto, the Dictator cryeth out aloud, That Quintius the Lieutenant and his Regiment, came upon the back of the enemies: and himſelf reenforcing the ſhout, advanceth his enſigns forward more freſhly. When as now two armies, and two divers battels preſſed ſore upon the Tuſcans, and environed them both before and behind: and that the enemies could neither flye back to their camp, nor yet retire or withdraw themſelves unto the mountains, from whence a freſh ſupply of enemies, made head, and affronted them: and that the horſes being unbridled, carried the riders every way hither and thither the moſt part of the Veientians ran ſcattering in diſorder, and highing F them apace, toward the Tyber: and the Fidenatians that remained to the City Fidene. But in that fearful flight they ran upon their own death. Some were killed on the banks of the River, others were driven into the water, and the ſtream and whirlepits carried them away. And even they that were cunning ſwimmers, what with wearineſſe, and what with faintneſs of their wounds and with fright, ſunk and were drowned: ſo that few of many ſwam over in ſafety. The other army fled through their camp into the City. The ſame way alſo the Romans followed forcibly after: and Quintius eſpecially, together with them who erewhile came down from the mountains, and were the freſheſt ſouldiers for fight (as who came laſt into the battel) and ſo afterwards entred pell-mell among their enemies into the gate, climbed upon the walls, and from the walls ſet up a banner to their fellows, in token that they had won the Town. Which as ſoon as the Dictator G eſpied, (for now by this time had he made an entrance into the forlorn, and abandoned camp of his enemies) he brought the ſouldiers, upon deſire to run to a ſpoil, and hoping of a greater ſaccage in the City, ſtreight unto the gate. And being gotten within the walls, marcheth directly forward to the Caſtle, whereinto he beheld the multitude to flye for refuge and ſafety. The execution in the City was no leſs than in the field: which continued untill they threw away their weapons, and craving nothing but life yeelded themſelves to the Dictator. So both City and camp was ſpoiled and ſacked. The morrow after, the Dictator diſpoſed of his priſoners thus; He drew them by lot, and gave to every Horſeman and Centurion one, and to as many as had done more valiantly than other, two apeece: the reſt he ſold in portſale. And ſo with triumph brought home H to Rome his victorious army, enriched with a great booty: and having commanded the General of the Horſemen to reſign up his office, himſelf alſo ſurrendreth his own, upon the ſixteenth day ſtate he had received.

There be ſome that have recorded in their Chronicles, that there was a battel fought with the Veientians at Fidene by ſhips upon the water. A thing verily, no leſs impoſſible than incredible.
Conſidering that even at this day, the river is not broad enough for ſuch a purpoſe: and at that time, (as by ancient men we have learned) it was far narrower than now it is. Unleſs haply in croſſing over the river ſome veſſels or bottoms, that were put out to meet and to receive them, I were mayed. And ſo, men making the matter greater (as uſually it cometh to paſs) have deſired a vain title of a naval victory at Sea. The year following, there were military Tribuns, with Conſuls authority, A. Sempronius Atratinus, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, L. Furius Medullinus, and *L.
Horatius Barbatus*. Then was there a truce granted unto the Veientians for twenty years, and to the Æquians for three years, whereas they had made ſuit for more. Reſt there was alſo from all ſeditions and broils in the City. The year following, having neither war abroad, nor yet ſedition at home, was famous yet for the playes which in time of war had been vowed: both in regard of the great preparations that the Military Tribuns made, as alſo for the frequent reſort and concourſe of the Nations adjoyning. The Tribuns with Conſuls authority, were Cl. Craſſus, Sp. Nautius Rutilius, T. Sergius Fidenas, and Sextus Julius Tullus. The ſight of theſe games and paſtimes, K whereunto thoſe ſtrangers were come by publick conſent of their States, was unto them more acceptable in regard of the courteſy of thoſe friends that gave them intertainment. 'After theſe

" men would employ themſelves to enterpriſe the ſame, if for the adventuring of great exploits,
" there might be propoſed as great rewards. But, that any Tribun of the Commons ſhould run de-
" ſperately and blindly into a world of brawls and troubles, with great hazard of his perſon, and " no hope at all of fruit and profit in the end: for which contention, he might be ſure that the No" bles againſt whom he ſtrived would perſecute him with deadly and irreconciliable malice: and " at the Commons hands, for whom he thus contended, he ſhould be honored and advanced
" never the more. it was a thing neither to be expected, nor required. The only means to get
" courage and magnanimity, is advancement to high place of honor and dignity. And as for them,
" they would not diſdain the meaneſt commoner that was, if they themſelves might be no more M
" deſpiſed. To conclude, the matter were worth the tryal in one or two, whether any commoner
" were ſufficient to bear a great office of ſtate; or whether it were a wondrous thing and ſtrange
" miracle, that a valiant and hardy man ſhould ariſe out of the commonalty. With much a do
" (ſay they) we got and obtained that Tribuns military with Conſuls authority might likewiſe be " choſen out of the commonalty: and men approved both in war abroad and in affairs of State
" at home had ſued therefore. In the firſt years they being nipped by you, and ſo having the re-
" pulſe, were had in derition of the Nobility: ſo that at length they forbare to give themſelves
" thus contumeliouſly to be miſuſed and made fools. We ſee no cauſe therefore, why that law al-
" ſo ſhould not be repealed wherein a dignity was granted, and never like to be obtained. For " leſs ſhame would there ariſe, if the law were not indifferent nor reſpective unto them, than as N
" unmeet perſons and unworthy, thus ſhamefully to be paſſed by and take the repulſe. Theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches were heard with ſo good an ear and general applauſe, that ſome of them were incited forward to ſue for the Military Tribunſhip: whiles every one promiſed in the time of his office to do great matters, and to propoſe, ſome one thing, ſome another, for and concerning the benefit of the Commons. Pretending great hopes of dividing the common Lands, and planting of colonies abroad, and laying tributes and impoſitions upon landed perſons, for to pay ſouldiers wages. But the Tribuns military then in place, deviſed to ſpye out a time, when upon ſome occaſion of the abſence of much people departed out of the City, the Senators by a privy and ſecret warning, ſhould at a certain day be called home: and then, whiles the Tribuns of the Commons were away, an act of Senate ſhould paſſe in this form: That for aſmuch as it was O noiſed that the Volſcians were entred into the Lands of the Hernicks to forrage and rob, the military Tribuns ſhould go to ſee whether it were ſo or no, and that in the mean while there ſhould be held a general aſſembly for the Election of Conſuls. The Tribuns military took their journey accordingly, and left Appius Claudius the Decemvirs ſon, Governour of the City, a ſtout young Gentleman and a forward, who from his very cradle bare an inward grudge and hatred againſt the Tribuns and the Commons. And bootleſs it was either for the Tribuns of the Commons to find themſelves grieved with thoſe, who made the decree, now that they were abſent,

A abſent, nor yet had they cauſe to quarrel with Appius Claudius, becauſe the thing had been contrived and paſt afore his time. So, Conſuls were created, C. Sempronius Atratinus, and Quintus Fabius Vibulanus. XXXVII

A forrein matter, but yet worthy to be remembred and here inſerred, is reported to have happned that year: to wit, that Vulturnum a City of the Tuſcanes, which now is Capua, was by the Samnites taken: and that it came to be named Capua of one Capis their Captain, or (which foundeth more like a truth) of the champian field. But they wan it by this means. For upon occaſion that the Tuſcans were wearied with former wars, they were admitted into the ſociety of their City and territory. And on a ſolemn feaſtival day, when as the citizens had filled their bellies, and B were ſonnd aſleep, theſe new Coloners the Samnits, ſet upon the old inhabitants, and in the night ſeaſon ſlew them all.

But now to return. Things paſſing thus (as I ſaid before) the Conſuls abovenamed upon the *Ides of December, entred their government. By which time not only they which were of purpoſe ſent to learn the news of the Volſcians, brought word that war was at hand, but Embaſſadors alſo from the Latins and Hernicks, gave intelligence of the ſame. And namely, that never at any time afore, the Volſcians were more buſy and occupied, either in chuſing of good Captains, or in levying an army, giving out theſe ſpeeches abroad and in every place, That the time was now come, either to forget warfare, and lay away ſouldiery, and for ever make account to bear the yoke of thraldom; or elſe not to give one foot, nor come behind thoſe with whom they ſtrove *13 of December.
C for ſoveraignty, either in manhood or in painful travel, or in Diſcipline of warfare. And ſurely they were no vain tidings that thoſe meſſengers reported. But the Senators would take no ſuch knowledge, nor be greatly moved at the matter. And withal C. Sempronius, unto whom the charge of that war was allotted, preſuming upon fortune, as if ſhe were alwayes right conſtant and at command, and leading an army of a people uſed to victory, againſt thoſe that were wont to be overcome, did all things raſhly and negligently. So as to ſpeak a truth, there was more Roman Diſcipline in the Volſcian hoſt, than in the Roman. And ſo, fortune (as oftentimes elſe) went with vertue. At the firſt encounter, which by Sempronius was unheedfully and unadviſedly begun, before that either the battaillons were reinforced and ſtrengthened with freſh ſupplies of ſuccour, or the Horſemen ranged in convenient place, they ran together, and came to handſtrokes. And the firſt
D token which way the victory would encline, was the manner of ſhout at the firſt charge; which by the enemy was more loud, more ſhrill and continual: but by the Romans diſſonant, unequal, dead and cold, often begun, and often renued: and by their uncertain and variable noiſe, they bewrayed the inward fear of their hearts. Whereupon the enemies ſo much the more eagerly charged them, preſſing upon them with their ſhields, and laying at them thick with their bright ſwords: on the other ſide, the Romans helmets wag, and their creſts nod every way as they look about them: and as they were to ſeek what to do, ſo they tremble and run together on heaps: one while the enſigns ſtand ſtill, and were abandoned of the formoſt fighting in the vanguard, another while they retired in again amongſt their own ſquadrons. Yet was not the flight certain, nor yet the victory. The Romans ſought more to cover and ſhrowd themſelves than to fight: to ward E blows rather than to ſtrike. The Volſcians ſet forward their enſigns, preſſed upon the main battel, and ſaw more enemies under foot ſlain than running away. And now in all places the Romans retired, notwithſtanding Sempronius the Conſul both rebuked and alſo exhorted them to ſtick to it: for neither his commandment nor the authority and Majeſty of his countenance availed ought. And immediately had they all turned their backs on their enemies, if Sex. Tempanius, a Decurion of Horſemen, had not in this deſperate caſe, with a reſolute courage and ready adviſe, helped at a pinch; Who cryed with a loud voyce, that thoſe Horſemen which would the ſafety of the common-wealth, ſhould diſmount off their Horſes. And when the Cornets of Horſemen beſtirred themſelves at his words no leſs than if the Conſul had given commandment; "Unleſs (ſaith he) this troup of men of arms, ſtay the violence of the enemies, we ſee the laſt of the XXXVIII

F "Roman Empire. Follow therefore in ſtead of banner diſplayed, the point of my lance: let "both Romans and Volſcians ſee, that no nation is comparable to you, either for foot or "Horſe. Whoſe encouragement being approved and received with a ſhout, he advanceth forward, bearing his ſtaff aloft: and what way ſoever they go, they enter and make room with forcible ſway: and where they ſee their fellows in greateſt diſtreſs, thither they make ſpeed, oppoſing their targets afore them. And thus in every place whereas they thruſt themſelves forcibly, was the fight renued: and doubtleſs the enemies had turned their backs, if poſſible it had XXXIX been, for ſo few to have performed every thing at once. Now when as the General of the Volſcians, ſaw his men not able to withſtand them, he gave a ſignal and charge to give way to this new band of enemies, to wit, theſe Targettiers: until ſuch time as they had put themſelves ſo for-G ward that they might be excluded from their fellows. Which being done, theſe Horſemen were enclоſed on every ſide: neither could they break through that way which they went, becauſe the enemies were there thickeſt, where they had made their lane before. The Coſ. then, with the legions of the Romans, having loſt the ſight of thoſe that had been a ſhield of defence and bulwark erewhile to the whole army, leſt that ſo many hardy men thus invironed ſhould be overpreſſed by the enemies; reſolved to adventure any peril or hazard whatſoever. The Volſcians were likewiſe diverſly occupied & troubled. For on the one ſide they bare off the Coſ. and legions: on the other ſide they affronted Tempanius fore, & the Horſemen: who ſeeing that after many aſſayes and offers they could not break forth to their fellows, gat up unto a certain little Hill, and caſt themſelves into a ring and ſtood to their defence, not without doing ſome miſchief to their enemies: neither gave they over fighting until night. The Conſul alſo maintained the battel ſo long as he could ſee, and kept the enemy play. So the night parted them aſunder, and uncertain it was who had the upper hand. And for that the event was unknown, who ſped the better, ſo great a terrour came upon both parts in their camps, that leaving the wounded and a great part of their cariages behind, both armies as taking themſelves loſers, recovered the mountains that were next unto them. Howbeit the Hill or bank aforeſaid, continued ſtill beſet round about, until midnight. But when word was brought thither to the Aſſailants, how that their camp was abandoned: they thinking their fellows vanquiſhed, were alſo for their part affrighted, and made ſhift and fled in the dark as well as they could. Tempanius, fearing an ambuſhment, kept his men there together until day light. Then went he down with a few to diſcover the coaſts: and finding by enquiry made of the wounded enemies, that the tents of the Volſcians were left and forſaken: he was full glad thereat, and called down his ſouldiers from the mount, and entreth into the Roman camp. Where ſeeing all void and forlorn, and finding the ſame deſolation which was amongſt the enemies: before that the Volſcians upon knowledge of their errour ſhould return again, he took with him thoſe hurt ſouldiers that he could: and not knowing to what quarters the Conſul was gone, marcheth forward the next way to the City of Rome. And thither already the bruit of this unlucky fight, and of abandoning the tents, was arrived. But above all the reſt, thoſe Horſemen were bewailed, and great moan and lamentation was made for them as well in private as in publike. The Coſ. Fabius, ſeeing the City alſo terrified with this news, kept ward before the gates: by which time, they might diſcover the Horſemen aforeſaid afar off: but not without ſome fear of their parts, doubting who they were. But being ſoon known, they cauſed ſo great contentment after former fear, that in moſt joyful manner, the noiſe went through the City, how the Horſemen were returned ſafe with victory. And out of thoſe mourning and ſorrowful houſes, which a while afore had bid adieu to their friends and kinsfolk, and bewailed their death, they ran into the ſtreets and high wayes by heaps. The fearful dames alſo and wives, forgetting, for joy, all decent and womanly modeſty, went out to meet the army, fell every one with open armes upon their own husbands and ſons, took them about the neck, clipped and kiſſed them, and with all their hand and heart received them; yea, and for exceeding joy were almoſt paſt themſelves.

The Tribuns of the Commons, who had challenged and accuſed M. Poſthumius and T. Quintius, for that by their default, there was an unlucky fight before Veij: ſeemed to have good occaſion and opportunity offered now, by bringing the Conſul Sempronius into freſh and new hatred and diſgrace, for to renue the conceived diſpleaſure and malice of the people againſt them. Having aſſembled therefore the people together, with open mouth they declared, that the Commonwealth was betrayed firſt, at Veij by the leaders, and afterwards, becauſe they went clear away withal, and unpuniſhed, therefore the army in Volſci was likewiſe loſt by the Conſul: and that a troup of moſt valiant knights were thus caſt away and given to be murdered, and the camp ſhamefully left and forſaken. Then C. Julius, one of the Tribuns, commanded Tempanius the Horſeman to be called, and before them all ſaid, "I would know of thee O Sextus Tempanius, whether thou "think that C. Sempronius the Conſul, either began battel in good time, or ſtrengthned his bat- "taillons with good ſuccors and ſupplies? or whether thou thy ſelf, when as the Roman legions "and footmen were diſcomfited, of thine own head and policy, cauſedſt the Horſemen to alight "on foot, and thereby reenforced the fight? Afterwards, when thou and thy men of arms were "ſhut out from our battel, whether either the Conſul himſelf came to reſcue, or ſent any ſuccor "unto thee? Laſt of all, whether the morrow after, thou hadſt any aid or reſcue at all? Whe- "ther thou and thy troup of Horſemen brake through into the camp by your own hardineſs and "valor? And whether ye found in the camp any Conſul or army, or rather the pavilions aban- "doned, and the ſouldiers left behind, hurt and wounded? To theſe premiſſes and points, "haſt thou to ſpeak this day upon thy vertue, and the faith of a ſouldier: by which only, in this "war-ſervice the Common-weal hath ſtood preſerved. Finally, where C. Sempronius, and where "our legions be? Whether thou went forſaken thy ſelf, or whether thou forſookeſt the Conſul "and the army? And to conclude, whether we have loſt or won the field? To theſe demands, Tempanius made (as they ſay) no fine Oration, but a grave pithy ſpeech like a ſouldier: not full of ſelf-praiſes, nor ſhewing any gladneſs for the fault of another, and anſwered in this wiſe: How great skill (quoth he) of martial feats, and what ſufficiency is in C. Sempronius, it is not for me a ſouldier to judge, nor yet to make any eſtimate of my General: but it was for the people of Rome to determine thereof, at what time as by their ſuffrages and voyces, in a ſolemn Election, they choſe him Conſul. "And therefore ye are not to enquire of me, and to be informed, either of the "policies of a General Captain, or vertues and duties of a Conſul: deep points to be examined, "weighed, and diſcourſed by great wits, reaching heads, and high minds. But for that which I "with mine eye ſaw, I am able to make report and teſtify; namely, That before himſelf was ex- "cluded out of the battel, I beheld the Conſul fighting manfully in the vanguard, encouraging "his men earneſtly, and even amongſt the Roman Standards, and Pikes of the enemies, buſily "employed. After which I was carried from the ſight of my fellows, howbeit by the ſtir, noiſe and "ſhouting, I well perceived, that the conflict continued until night. Neither was it poſſible (as "I thought) for them to break through unto the Hill which I kept, by reaſon of the multitude

A "of enemies between. As for the army, what is become of it, I know not: But I ſuppoſe, that "as I my ſelf in an extremity and fearful caſe, defended my ſelf and my men, by advantage of the "ground: ſo the Conſul for to ſave the army, took ſome more ſafe place to encamp in. Neither "think I verily, that the Volſcians ſtood in better terms than the Romans fortune was. And the "darkneſs of the night (no doubt) cauſed errour and confuſion on every ſide, and in all places. After which ſpeech when as he beſought them, not to hold him any longer, wearied with travel, and faint of his wounds: he was with exceeding praiſe both of his valiant ſervice and alſo of his modeſt ſpeech, licenced to depart.

Whiles theſe things thus paſſed, the Conſul by that time, had marched by the way of Lavicum B as far as to the Temple of Quies: thither were wains, draught-beaſts and ſumpter Horſes ſent from the City, to receive and eaſe the army, toiled out with fight, and tired by journying all night. Within a while after, the Coſ. entred into the City: who endeavoured not more, to put the fault from himſelf, than to extol Tempanius, and give him his due deſerved praiſes. Now whiles the City was ſad and heavy for this hard hap, and angry alſo with the Captains: behold, M. Poſthumius, who before had been accuſed, was now preſented unto the people, for to wreak their choler and malice upon. He had been a Tribun Military in place of a Coſ. at Veij, and now was condemned, & a fine ſet on his head of ten thouſand Aſſes of braſs. But as for Titus Quintius, 31 lib. 5 ſh. ſter. his fellow in government, becauſe that among the Volſcians he had ſerved fortunately as Conſul, under the conduct of Poſthumius Tibertus the Dictator: and likewiſe at Fidene, as Lieutenant of C the other Dictator Mamercus Æmylius, and laid the whole fault of that other time from himſelf upon his collegue before condemned: he was found unguilty and acquit by all the Tribes. It is ſaid that the freſh remembrance of his father Cincinnatus, late a right worſhipful citizen, helped him much: Yea, and Capitolinus Quintius a very aged man, did him no hurt, who humbly beſought them that they would not ſuffer him, having but a while in this world to live, for to be the carrier of ſo heavy news unto Cincinnatus. The Commons made Tribuns of the commonalty, Sex. Tempanius, A. Sellius, Sex. Antiſtius, and Sex. Pompilius in their abſence: whom alſo the Horſemen had choſen for their Captains or Centurions, in the former exploit, by the adviſe and counſel of Tempanius. But the Senators, becauſe now for hatred of Sempronius, the name of Conſuls miſliked and offended them, determined that military Tribuns with Conſuls authority, ſhould be created. So D there were choſen L. Manlius Capitolinus, Q. Antonius Merenda, L. Papyrius Mugilanus.

In the very beginning of the year L. Hortenſius the fifth Tribun of the commonalty, accuſed C. Sempronius the Conſul of the former year. And when as his other four fellows in office, in the ſight of the people of Rome beſought him, not to trouble their guiltleſs Captain, in whom nothing could be blamed or found fault withal, but adverſe fortune: Hortenſius could hardly abide, but thought it was but to prove and trye his reſolute conſtancy: and that the party accuſed, truſted not upon the prayer and interceſſion of the Tribuns, which only for a ſhew was pretended, but upon their ſupport and aſſiſtance. And therefore turning one while to Sempronius himſelf, demanded what was become of that hauty courage and ſtomack, ſo ordinary in thoſe of Senators calling? and where was that magnanimity which reſted and relied upon innocency? ſince that he ha- E ving been a Conſul, was fain to ſhelter and ſhrowd himſelf under the ſhadow and protection of the Tribuns? Another while directing his ſpeech to his fellow Tribuns: but you my Maſters (quoth he) what will ye do? if I proſecute mine action againſt him ſtill, and convict him in the end: Will ye take from the people their right, and overthrow the authority of the Tribuns among the Commons? When they again ſaid and inferred, that the people of Rome had abſolute power to do what they would, both with Sempronius, and all others: and that they neither would nor could abridge the people of their judgment. But if (ſay they) our prayers in the behalf of our General, who was to us in ſtead of a father, may not avail, then will we together with him change our weed for company. Nay, God forbid (quoth Hortenſius) The Commons of Rome ſhall never ſee their Tribuns arrayed in ſoiled and mournful apparel. And as for C. Sempronius, I have now no F more to ſay to him, ſince that he hath carried himſelf ſo, whiles he was General, as that he hath gained thus much, as to be ſo dearly beloved of his ſouldiers. Neither was the kindneſs of thoſe four Tribuns more acceptable to the Commons and Nobles, than the good nature of Hortenſius, who at their reaſonable requeſt, was ſo eaſy to be pacified and intreated.

It was no long time that fortune fawned upon the Æquians: who embraced the doubtful victory of the Volſcians, and took it as their own. The next year after, when Cn. Fabius Vibulanus, and T. Quintius Capitolinus, the ſon of Capitolinus, were Conſuls: by the leading of Fabius, unto whom was allotted that Province, nothing was done there worthy of remembrance. For when as the Æquians had made ſemblance of a battel, and brought their army only in ſight, they were in fearful wiſe ſoon diſcomfited, and ſhamefully fled, miniſtring no matter of great ho- G nor to the Coſ. And therefore was he denied triumph. But yet becauſe the ignominy of the loſſe which happened by Sempronius, was partly allayed it was granted that he might enter Ovant into the City. [A General was ſaid to enter Ovant into the City, when ordinarily without his army following him he went on foot, or rode on Horſeback only, and the people in their Acclamations for joy, redoubled Ohe. or Oho. So that Ovatio is as much as Ohatio: Howſoever, ſome think that Ovatio took the name of ſacrificing a ſheep. But he rode in triumph, when his ſouldiers attended him in his chariot, crying Io Triumphe. In this he caried a branch, or ware a garland of lawrel, in the other of Myrtle. So that the Ovation was a leſs honor than the Triumph. And it was granted granted to inferior persons, and for meaner desert. Whereas, none usually might triumph, unless H he were Dictator, Cos. or Pretor, and had slain in field 5000 enemies at the least, won much spoil and pillage, and augmented the State of the Roman Empire.] Like as the war was dispatched with less ado than they feared: so in the City, after a calm and peaceable state, there arose between the Commons and Nobles, a world of discords and troubles more than they expected. Which began upon occasion of doubling the number of Questors. For when the Consuls had propounded, that besides two Questors or Treasurers of the City, there should be other twain ready to attend upon the Consuls, for all services and charges belonging to war: and when the Nobles also with all their power had approved it, the Tribuns of the Commons entred into a contention with the Consuls, and required that some of the Questors (for until that time they had been cre- I ated from out of the degree of the Patritij only) might be likewise of the Commons. Against which demand, at the first, both Consuls, and also the Nobles, laboured with might and main.

But afterwards having granted thus much, That as the use and practise was in creating of Tribuns with Consuls authority, so in like manner, in the Election of Questors, the people should have their free liberty to chuse. And seeing they gained little thereby, and could effect no good, they wholly let fall their former matter, about increasing the number of the Questors. But although it were thus by them given over, the Tribuns took it in hand again, and set it on foot: yea, and other seditious actions besides very often sprang forth, and among the rest, those also concerning the Law Agraria. Upon which troubles, when as the Senate was of mind, that there should be for that the Tribuns kept the Patritij from meeting and packing together. Now when as the greater part of the year following was spent, with much strife and contention between the new Tribuns and certain Interregents, whiles one while the Tribuns stayed the Nobles from assembling together about the chusing of an Interregent, and another while crossed the Interregent for High Court held for choosing soveraign Tribuns: and Tribuns there were created in Consular authority, all of the Nobility; namely, L. Quintius Cincinnatus the third time, Sex. Furius Medul- and a brother besides to another Tribun, one Sex. Pompilius stood for the dignity, among certain other of the Commoners: neither all their own means that they could make, nor all the voyces they could procure, were able to prevail, but that the people preferred persons to the place, according to their gentry and high birth: namely, whose fathers and grand-fathers they had seen Con- N Complaining that by his injurious and indirect dealing, their friends had taken the foil. When as therefore they might not by any violence touch his own person and attach him, being fenced with innocency in this Action, and secured by vertue of the office which then he bare: they wreaked their selves and discharged their choler upon C. Sempronius, the cousin germain of Atra- tinus by the brother: and with the help of M. Canuleius, one of their collegues, arrested him for the ignominious service in the Volscian war. Ever and anon, also the same Tribuns made some words and motion in the Senate-house, concerning the division of Lands, and revived the law

Agraria

A Agraria (which C. Sempronius at all times moſt ſharply and eagerly had withſtood. Supporting, as it fell out indeed, that the accuſed perſon ſhould either by giving over the cauſe, be leſs eſteemed of the Nobles: or if he ſtood to it ſtill until the time of judgment drew near, he ſhould diſpleaſe and offend the Commons. But he choſe rather to be the object of the diſpleaſure and malice of the people, that were oppoſed and bent againſt him, and ſo to wound his own private eſtate: than to betray the common and publike cauſe: and perſiſted reſolute in the ſame minde ſtill, that there ſhould no bribing donative be granted, that might win and procure favour unto thoſe three corrupt Tribuns: "For it is not land and living (quoth he) that they ſhoot at, for the benefit of the "Commons; that is not their ſeeking: but their drift is to work and procure diſpleaſure unto me: B "and therefore I will for my part, abide that ſtorm and tempeſt with a reſolute mind. And the "Senate ought not to eſteem either of me, or of any citizen elſe ſo highly, as to buy the ſparing "of one man ſo dear, even with the harm and dammage of the whole ſtate. The day of judicial tryal came. When as he had pleaded for himſelf, and ſeemed nothing daunted at the matter: yet for all that ever the Nobles could do, who tryed all means, but in vain, to mitigate and delay the heat of the Commons, condemned he was in *fifteen thouſand Aſſes. The ſame year Poſthumia a Veſtal Nun, was called in queſtion for incontinency and inceſt, and came to her anſwer. A Virgin guiltleſs for any deed done: but ſcarcely of good name and fame: by reaſon that ſhe was ſuſpected for her apparel and going more light and gariſh in her attire: yea, and for her wit, more conceited and pleaſant, than became a maid, and nothing reſpective of the ſpeech of the world. C Her tryal was put over to a farther day, and ſhe (after ſhe had twiſe pleaded) in the end was acquit: only the high Prieſt by the adviſe, and in the name of the whole colledge, ſchooled her, and gave her warning to leave her ſports, taunts, and merry conceits: and in her rayment to be ſeen not ſo gay as devout, and wear her garments rather ſainctly than ſightly. The ſame year was Cumes, a City inhabited at that time by the Greeks, taken by the Campanians.

The year following had military Tribuns with Conſuls authority, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, P. Lucretius Tricipitinus, Sp. Nautius Servilius. A year, by the happineſs and good fortune of the people of Rome, more notable for a danger eſcaped, than for any harm received. Certain bond-ſervants had conſpired to fire the City in divers places far aſunder: for this intent, when the people ſhould be buſily occupied, here and there, to ſave their houſes, then by force and armes to D ſurpriſe the Caſtle and Capitol. But Jupiter turned away and diſappointed their wicked deſigns. For by the peaching and information of twain, the reſt of the malefactors were taken and executed. But thoſe that diſcloſed and revealed the conſpiracy, had ten thouſand pound in braſs mony (which was in thoſe dayes thought to be great riches) weighed them out of the City chamber, and freedom beſides, for their reward.

After this, began the Æquians to renue war: and word was brought ro Rome by credible perſons, that certain new enemies alſo, to wit, the Lavicans, joyned together in counſel with the old. Theſe Æquians, were good neighbours: for once a year ordinarily, they uſed to put the City of Rome to the pains of warring with them, and not miſs. Embaſſadors then were ſent to Lavicos, who brought doubtful anſwers from thence: whereby it appeared that neither at that inſtant they E were ready to war, nor yet were like to continue long in peace. The Tuſculans were charged, to take good heed, and have an eye that way, that no new ſtirs and troubles ſhould ariſe at Lavicos. There came Embaſſadors from Tuſculum, to L. Sergius Fidenas, M. Papyrius Mugillanus, and C. Servilius, the ſon of Q. Servilius Priſcus: (by whom, being Dictator, Fidenæ was won) who were Military Tribuns in Conſuls authority the year following. Theſe Embaſſadors brought news that the Lavicans were out, and in armes, and joyning with the Æquians army, had forraged the country of Tuſculum, and encamped themſelves in Algidum. Then was war proclaimed againſt the Lavicans. And when by a decree made by the Senate, that two of the Conſular Tribuns ſhould go to war, and one manage the affairs of Rome: there aroſe a contention on a Sunday, among the ſaid Tribuns. Every one thought himſelf the meeteſt and moſt ſufficient man, to be General of F the war, refuſing the charge of the City, as a baſe, diſhonourable, and thankleſs office. As the Senators muſed and wondred, to ſee amongſt thoſe that were fellows in government ſo undecent a ſtriſe and contention; then Q. Servilius: "Seeing that (quoth he) there is no reverent regard, "either of this honorable houſe, or of the Common-wealth: the father his countenance and "dread Majeſty, ſhall end this debate. My ſon without any lot caſting, ſhall govern the City as "Preſident. God grant, that they which love war ſo well, may manage it with more diſcretion "and concord than they wiſh it. As for a general muſter to be levied out of all the people indifferently, that was not liked of. So ten Tribes were drawn by lot, out of which, the yonger ſort were preſt forth to war under the conduct of the two Tribuns. The ſtriſe which began to be kindled among them in the City, through the ſame deſire ſtill of ſoveraignty, brake forth and G grew much hotter in the camp. In nothing agreed they, ſtriving whoſe opinion ſhould ſtand: each one would have his own way: his own commandments obeyed and none elſe: one deſpiſed another, and were deſpiſed one of the other: until at length, upon the Lieutenants reproof, they grew to this point, and this order was taken: That they ſhould each other day, rule one alone by himſelf abſolutely. Which news being brought to Rome, it is reported that Q. Servilius, a man for his years and long experience right skilfull, prayed of the immortal Gods, that by the variance and diſcord of the Tribuns, the Common-wealth not more harm, than they had received at Veios. Ad as if there were no doubt, but that ſome great loſs and overthrow was

Neither proved he a falſe and vain Prophet. For by the leading of L. Sergius, whoſe day it was to rule, when as the enemy under a colour of fear, withdrew unto the trench, and ſo trayned them thither upon a fooliſh hope to win the camp, even under the very camp of the enemies in an uneven ground of diſadvantage, they were ſuddenly charged by the Æquians, diſcomfited and chaſed down the valley: and many in their fall, which was greater than the flight, were trod under foot and ſlain, and with much ado that day kept they their own tents. The morrow after, when as now the enemies had beſet a great part of the camp, they ſhametully fled away, at the back gate, and forſook the camp. The Captains, Lieutenants, and the ſtrength remaining of the army, which kept to their enſigns and colours, went to Tuſculum. Other that were ſcattered here and there I about the fields by ſundry wayes, made haſt to Rome, and reported there the overthrow to be greater than indeed it was. Leſs was the trouble and ſorrow, becauſe men looked for no better iſſue and ſucceſs: and alſo for that, there was help and ſuccour (which they were to have an eye unto in ſo fearful a caſe) provided by the Tribun aforehand. At whoſe commandment, when as the tumult was by the inferiour Magiſtrates appeaſed in the City, eſpials were ſent out in haſt: who brought word that the Captains and the army was at Tuſculum: and that the enemy had not removed his camp. And then (which encouraged them moſt of all) by the Senates decree, Q. Servilius Priſcus was choſen Dictator, a man whoſe Providence over the Common-weal, the City as many other times afore, ſo in the event of that war had experience of: for that he only ſuſpected the contention of the Tribuns afore this unhappy foil. Who having nominated Gene- K ral of the Horſemen, his ſon (as ſome ſay) by whom being military Tribun, himſelf was declared Dictator (for others there be that write how Servilius Hala was that year General of the Horſe) went forth with a freſh army to war, and having joyned unto him thoſe which were at Tuſculum, he pitched his tents, two miles from the enemy. But ſee the fruit of good ſucceſs. The pride and negligence which had been amongſt the Roman Captains, went from them to the Æquians. Therefore in the firſt beginning of the conflict, when the Dictator with his Horſemen whom he ſent againſt them, had diſordered and put out of array the formoſt ranks of the enemies, then commanded he the enſigns of the legionary footmen with all ſpeed to follow hard upon: and one enſign-bearer of his own, who made ſome ſtay, he ſlew with his own hand. Then were they ſo earneſtly ſet to give an hot charge, that the Æquians could not abide their force: and being in L fight overthrown, when as they fled all amain to the camp, the aſſault thereof was both ſhorter and with leſs ado, than was the battel. When the camp was taken and ſpoiled, and that the Dictator had given the pillage unto the ſouldiers: and that the Horſemen, which chaſed the enemies from the camp, had brought word back, that all the Lavicans were overthrown, and a great part of the Æquians were fled to Lavicos: the day following was the army alſo led thither, and the Town compaſſed and beſet round about, ſcaled, and ſacked. The Dictator having brought home to Rome his victorious army, upon the eight day after he was choſen, gave over his office. And in very good time, before there was any ſedition ſtirred up about the Law Agraria, by the motion of the Tribuns of the Commons, for the diviſion of the Lavicans Lands: the whole body of the Senate appointed that a Colony ſhould be ſent to Lavicos. So there were ſent from the City M a thouſand and five hundred to inhabit there, and two acres apiece given them of Land.

After the winning of Lavicos, there were created Military Tribuns with Conſuls authority, to wit, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, and L. Servilius Structus, with P. Lucretius Tricipitinus (all three the ſecond time) and Sp. Veturius Craſſus: and the year following A. Sempronius Atratinus, the third time, and theſe twain, M. Papyrius Mugillanus, and Sp. Nautius Rutilus the ſecond time: for theſe two years there was peace abroad, but diſcord at home about the Laws Agraria. They that troubled the people, were Sp. Mecilius, who now the fourth time, and Metilius, who the third time were made Tribuns of the Commons, both abſent. And when they had publiſhed their Act, That all Lands conquered from the enemies, ſhould be divided by the poll: by which Ordinance, the poſſeſſions of a great part of the Nobility became confiſcate, (for ſince their City was N ſcituate and built in a ſtrange ground, there was in a manner no Land lay to it, which had not been purchaſed by the ſword; neither enjoyed the Commons any, but that which either had been ſold or aſſigned to the Commons) this ſeemed to be a bone caſt between the Nobles and the Commons, to ſet them together at ſtrife and contention. Neither knew the Military Tribuns any way to take counſel in this caſe, albeit one while they aſſembled the Senate, and another while met in private conference with the Nobility. Then Appius Claudius, (the nephew or grandſon of notorious Appius the Decemvir, created for the making of Laws) the puny of all the counſel of the Nobility, made (as it is reported) this ſpeech, and ſaid, "That he would impart unto them "that which he had received by tradition from his anceſtours, to wit, an old deviſe, and appro- "priate to his houſe, for that his great grandſire Appius Claudius, had ſhewed unto the Nobles O

And "when they ſee once their fellows poſſeſſed firſt afore them of the cauſe, and thereby crept wholly

A "into all the favour with the Commons, and that no room is left for themſelves to have any "part thereof, they will be willing enough to enc line and condescend unto the Senate, and take "their part: by means whereof, they might wind into the love and good grace of that univer- "ſall ſtate, and particularly with the principal Lords of the Nobility. Which ſpeech, when they all had approved, and eſpecially Q. Servilius Priſcus, who praiſed the young Gentleman for that he was not grown out of kind, nor degenerate from the ſtock and race of the Claudij, then every man was ſet about this buſineſs, to ſee whom of the Colledge or company of Tribuns they could win and draw to croſs and ſtop the Act for going forward. The Senate now being broken up, the chief of the Nobles caught hold of the Tribuns, and were in hand with them perſwading, ex-
B horting, and aſſuring them, that they ſhould every one in private gratify not only, but alſo the whole body of the Senate in general: and never gave over, until they had procured ſix of them to interpoſe their negative, and to croſs the Law. The morrow after, when as of purpoſe a matter was propounded afore the Senate, about the ſedition which Mecilius and Metilius had raiſed, by a Largeſs of dangerous conſequence; ſuch ſpeeches were by the principal of the Nobles delivered, that each one for himſelf confeſſed, that now they were to ſeek for counſel, and ſaw no other help nor remedy but in the authority of the Tribuns: to the protection and ſafegard of which Magiſtracy, the Common-weal betook her ſelf, and fled for ſuccour, as being beſet with danger, like ſome poor private perſon, and had no other means to ſave her ſelf: ſaying, That it would be both for themſelves, and alſo for their authority an honorable thing if it might appear, that the C puiſſance of their Tribunſhip were not more imployed in moleſting the Senate, and making diſcord among the States than in reſiſting the peeviſh wilfulnes of their collegues. Whereupon aroſe a great noiſe through the whole company of the Senators, whiles out of all parts of the Court there aſſembled, they called upon the Tribuns for their helping hand. Then after ſilence made, they (who for the favour of the Lords of the Senate were made aforehand to their cauſe) declared and confeſſed, that they were ready to croſs that act, by their fellows publiſhed, ſeeing the Senate judged it to be prejudicial to the Common-wealth. Theſe Tribuns for the offer of their good ſervice, were by the Senate highly thanked. But the Authors and Patrons of the Act aforeſaid, calling together an aſſembly of the Commons, when they had inveighed againſt their fellows moſt ſharply, terming them betrayers of the Common-wealth, and ſlaves to the Nobles: and u-D ſing other bitter ſpeeches, gave over their action and ſuit.

Two grievous wars had continued all the year next following (wherein P. Cornelius Coſſus, C. Valerius Potitus, Quintius Cincinnatus, and M. Fabius Vibulanus, were military Tribuns in Coſſ. authority) but that the Veientian war was deferred by the ſuperſtitious fear of their own Princes; whoſe grounds, Tybris (overflowing the banks) had ſpoiled, and overthrown alſo the villages and houſes that ſtood thereupon. The Æquians likewiſe by reaſon of their loſs received three years before, made no great haſt to aid and aſſiſt the Volans, a people of their own nation. For they had made certain rodes into the Lavicans Country, confining upon them, and warred upon the inhabitants, lately there planted. Which treſpaſs by them done, they hoped to have been able to maintain, by the banding and aſſiſtance of all the Æquians: but being forſaken of their allies, they E loſt both their Town and territory, only by ſiege, and one light skirmiſh, and never fought for it any memorable war. L. Sextius alſo Tribun of the Commons, aſſayed to make an Act, that there might be ſent to Vola as well as to Lavicos, Coloners to people it: but by the negative of his Aſſociates, who ſhewed, that they would not ſuffer any Statute of the Commons to paſs without the aſſent of the Senate, it came to nothing.

In the year following, the Æquians having recovered and won again Vola, and brought a Colony thither, fortified the Town with a freſh power, at what time were Tribuns Military in Conſuls authority at Rome, Cn. Cornelius Coſſus, L. Valerius Potitus, Q. Fabius Vibulanus the ſecond time, and M. Poſthumius Regillenſis. The war againſt the Æquians, was committed to this Poſthumius, a man of a crooked diſpoſition, as his victory ſhewed more than the whole courſe of the F war. For having levied an army in haſt, and brought it before Vola, after ſome ſmall skirmiſhes, he tamed the Æquians, and at length entred the Town. And when he had done with the enemies, he began to quarrel with his own ſouldiers: for whereas during the time of the aſſault, he had given out by Proclamation, That they ſhould have the ſaccage after the Town was once won: he brake promiſe with them. For I am induced to believe that this was the cauſe rather why the army mutined and was diſcontented, than for that in a Town lately ſacked before and in a new Colony, there was found leſs ſpoil than the Tribun made boaſt of. But this diſpleaſure and anger once conceived was made the worſe after that he returned into the City: for being ſent for by his fellows, upon occaſion of the Tribunitian ſeditions, there eſcaped him an indiſcreet ſpeech I muſt needs ſay, yea, and without all ſence, wit, and honeſty. Which he let fall in an aſſembly of the G Commons: wherein it hapned, that as Sextius a Tribun of the Commons, was preferring the law Agraria, and ſaying withal, That he would propoſe an Act that Coloners ſhould likewiſe be ſent to Vola, for that they were worthy to have both the Town and Lands of Vola, who had by ſword and ſpear conquered the ſame. Poſthumius caught the word out of his mouth: And that ſhall my ſouldiers, deerly abide (quoth he) unleſs they be more quiet. Which word being overheard, offended not ſo the Com. preſently there in place aſſembled, as the Lords of the Senate awhile after. Moreover the Tribun aforeſaid, an active man and eloquent withal, having among his adverſaries met with a proud humorous ſpirit, and an inſolent and intemperate tongue, which walked so freely and so long by his provocation, that he uttered these speeches, which bred not only ill will and displeasure to himself, but also wounded the cause, and the whole state of the Patritij. H

This Sextius (I say) was busy, and quarrelling with none of all the Military Tribuns, more than with Posthumius. And even at that time, taking advantage of the same cruel and inhuman speech of his: Hear ye not, O ye Commons (quoth he) how he threatneth mischief unto his souldiers, as unto bondslaves? "And yet this beast ye will think more worthy of so great dignity wherein "ye have placed him, than those that indue you with house and land, that send you abroad to in- "habit Colonies, that provide habitation for you against old age, that tendring your wealth, take "part and defend you against so cruel and proud adversaries. Begin now henceforth to marvel "why so few take in hand to maintain your cause: For what may they look for, and hope at I "your hands? for honors, which ye bestow rather upon your adversaries, than those that are "affectionate defenders of the people of Rome. Ye sighed even now and groaned again, at the "words uttered out of this foul mouth. But what matter makes that? If ye were now to go to "an election, and to give your voyces, ye would no doubt for all that, prefer this man (who "threatneth to mischief you) afore them that are willing and desirous to establish your Lands, "your dwelling places, and the whole state of your substance and living. But when that lewd language of Posthumius was reported once to the souldiers, it bred a far greater indignation (be sure) within the camp. How now? (say they) is he, who hath intercepted our booty, and defrauded us poor souldiers of our due, not content therewith, but must menace mischief besides unto us, as his varlets? When as therefore they openly muttered thereat, and the Questor or K Treasurer P. Sestius thought that the mutiny might be restrained with the same violence by which it was first raised: he sent an Officer to one clamorous souldier, that kept a noise above the rest. Whereupon arose an outcry and a brawl: and he got himself a good rap with a stone for his labour, that he was fain to go out of the presse. And he that smote him, spake aloud besides, and bad the Questor take now that for his pains in a mischief which the General had threatened his souldiers. Posthumius in this hurliburly was sent for, and he, when he was come, made all worse and worse with his sharp examinations, tortures, and cruel punishments. At the last, when he could not see to make an end nor bridle his choler: they all ran on heaps together, at the lamentable cry of those whom he commanded to be choked in the mire and killed under the hurdle: and he half besides himself full foolishly stept down in more hast than good speed from the Tribunal L seat, to chastise one that contested with him, and made a great brawling. Now when as the Lictors and Centurions every where laid about them to make way, and ill intreated the multitude in the throng they moved their patience so much, that in that furious fit of the souldiers, the Military Tribun was by his own army stoned to death. Which horrible act, after it was noised at Rome, and the Military Tribuns by the Senates authority, were about to sit in commission for the examination of the death of their collegue, by way of rigour and torture: the Tribuns of the Commonalty opposed themselves, and resisted them. But that contention depended upon another quarrel. For the Senate doubting lest that the Commons for fear of those examinations intended, would in their anger create Tribuns military from out of their own body and degree; were very careful, and studied all they could, that Consuls might be chosen again. But whenas the Tri- M buns of the Commons would not suffer an act of the Senat to pass, and hindred also the election of the Consuls the matter came to an Interreign. But in the end the Nobles had the upper hand. For when as Q. Fabius Vibulanus the Interregent, held a Court for the said Election, there were created Consuls A. Cornelius Cossus, and L. Furius Medullinus.

Posthumius stoned to death by his own souldiers.

In the beginning of these Consuls year, the Senate made a decree, that the Tribuns with all speed possible should propose unto the Commons, concerning the inquisition of Posthumius his death: and that they should make chief Commissioner and Judge whom they would. The Commons by the consent of the whole people, gave the Consuls commission to see it done, and performed accordingly. Who notwithstanding, that with exceeding moderation and lenity, they dispatched and ended the matter, by punishing a few, who (as it was credibly thought) made N themselves away: yet could they not for all that bring about, but the Commonalty took it very hainously, and in the highest degree, saying. That the Acts and Ordinances, which had been propounded concerning their weal and commodities, those lay a long time asleep in the deck, and nothing done: but an order granted for their bloudshed and death, that was presently put in execution. Of so great force and importance was it. Now this had been the fittest time, that after these mutinous souldiers were chastised, the division of the Volane territory, should have been offered unto them for to comfort their poor hearts again. By which deed (no doubt) their hot desire and longing after the law Agraria, had been abated, which tended to dispossess at length the Nobles of the common grounds, which they injuriously were seized of. But this indignity stuck in their stomacks, and was taken neerer to the heart, when they saw the Nobility so stiffly O bent, not only to keep the common grounds in their hands, which they held by force: but also unwilling to divide among the people so much as the wast and void ground, lately gotten by conquest from the enemies: but that it was like, within a while (as all the rest) to be a booty, and divident, to be shared among a few.

An inquisition about the murder of Posthumius.

The same year were the legions led by Furius the Consul, against the Volscians: who forraged the borders of the Hernicks. But finding not the enemy there, they wan Ferentinum, whither a great number of the Volscians had retired themselves. The booty there was less than they hoped for:

A for: by reaſon that the Volſcians, ſeeing ſmall hope of keeping the Town, truſſed up and carried away both bag and baggage in the night, and quit the Town: which was won the morrow after, being left well near deſtitute and empty. All the Lands were given freely to the Hernicks. When this year now was paſſed in good quiet by the modeſty and peaceable carriage of the Tribuns, then in place: there ſucceeded another Tribun of the Commons, L. Icilius, when Q. Fabius Ambuſtus and C. Furius Pacilius were Conſuls. Whiles this man in the very beginning of his year, was buſy in ſtirring new ſeditions (as if it had been a task impoſed upon his name and linage) by propoſing of the Agrarian laws: behold, there aroſe a peſtilence, more fearful than hurtful, which turned away mens minds, from their publick aſſemblies and accuſtomed contentions, to tend their B houſes, and to care for the cheriſhing of their bodies. And (as men verily think) the ſickneſs was leſs dangerous than the ſeditions were like to have been. When as the City was now excuſed, as it were, and well eſcaped with the ſickneſs only of many and death of very few: preſently after this peſtilent year, followed (as it is commonly ſeen) a great dearth of corn, by reaſon of the neglect of tillage. M. Papyrius Atratinus, and C. Nautius Rutilius being Conſuls. This famine would have been more grievous than the plague, had they not provided well for corn, by ſending forth their Embaſſadors to the neighbour nations all about, inhabiting along the Tuſcan Sea and the Tyber, for to buy grain. Proudly were the Embaſſadors prohibited all commerce and traffique with the Samnits, who held at that time Capua and Cumes: but contrary-wiſe bountifully were they relieved by the Tyrants or Potentates of Sicilie. And ſuch was the willing endeavour of C Hetruria, that great ſtore of victuals came down the Tyber. In what deſolation the City was, during this affliction, the Coſſ. tryed by this: that when they could not furniſh an Embaſſage, but with one Senator, they were compelled to adjoyn two Knights unto them. And ſetting aſide the ſickneſs and dearth, there was no trouble either at home or abroad for thoſe two years. But when theſe ſtorms were once overblown, and that care paſt: then began again the old troubles wherewith the City had uſually been diſquieted: diſſention at home, and war abroad.

A famine.

When M. Æmylius and C. Valerius Potitus were Conſuls, the Æquians made preparation for wars, and handed with the Volſcians. Who albeit they took arms by no publick commiſſion; yet ſuch as would of themſelves ſerve for hire or wages, followed the wars. At the bruit of which enemies (for they were already come over into the Country of the Latins and Hernicks) whiles Va- D lerius the Conſul muſtered his men and levied ſouldiers: M. Menenius a Tribun of the Commons, and a publiſher of the Agrarian laws, oppoſed himſelf againſt him. And when as by reaſon of the protection and aſſiſtance of the Tribun, no man would be compelled to take a ſouldiers oath againſt his will: ſuddenly news came, that the Caſtle of Carventus was by the enemies forced. This diſhonor thus received, as it was a cauſe that Menenius was hated among the Noblemen, ſo it gave to the reſt of the Tribuns, who were already framed and prepared to withſtand the law Agraria, more juſt cauſe to reſiſt their collegue. The matter being thus for a long time protracted by much debating, the Conſuls called both God and man to witneſs, that whatſoever ſhame or loſs either had been already received, or were like to be ſuſteined by the enemies: the blame ſhould be imputed to Menenius, who hindred the muſtering. And Menenius proteſted again aloud, that if the E unlawful Landlords, would ſurrender the tenure of the common fields which they unjuſtly deteined, he would not ſtay the muſters. Then the nine Tribuns, by ſetting down a decree between them, made an end of the ſtrife: and pronounced by authority of their colledge, that they would aſſiſt C. Valerius the Coſ. (all contradiction of their collegue notwithſtanding) to award any penalty reſtreint or chaſtiſement, upon them that refuſed to be enrolled for warfare. The Coſ. being armed with this decree and warrant, after he had cauſed ſome few to be had away by the neck and laid faſt, that called upon the Tribun for help, the reſt for fear were ſworn to ſerve. Thus the army was led forth to the Caſtle of Carventus. And although the ſouldiers were as odious to the Conſul, as wickedly bent againſt him, yet at the very firſt coming, having manfully and luſtily diſpoſſeſſed the garriſon, they recovered the fort. The ſouldiers who were ſlipt away from the hold, and F gone a plundering, by their negligence gave the Romans a opportunity to enter and to ſurpriſe it. And a good booty there was: by reaſon that they had continually gotten prizes, and laid up all there as in a place of ſafety. Which being ſold in portſale, the Conſul commanded the treaſurers for to bring the mony into the common Chamber of the City: giving out theſe words withal, that the army ſhould then have part of ſpoil, when they denied not their ſervice in war. Hereupon both Commons and ſouldiers were more angry with the Conſul. And therefore when as by a decree of the Senate he entred the City Ovant, in a pety triumph, the ſouldiers according to their licentious manner (in that caſe permitted) followed after with ſongs and ſonnets, anſwering one another in rude rime and groſs meeter, by alternative ſtaves. Wherein the Conſul was greatly blamed, but Menenius the Tribun, his name was ſet out to the height, his praiſes were blaſoned and G extolled aloft: and at every time that he was named, the affectionate favour of the people that ſtood in the ſtreets appeared, by clapping of hands and great applauſe, ſtriving much to exceed the ſongs chanted by the ſouldiers. Which cauſed the Nobles to look to it, and troubled them more than the malapert ſaucineſs of the ſouldiers with their Conſuls, which is an ordinary and uſual faſhion among them. And Menenius (who doubtleſs had been one of the Military Tribuns, if he had ſued for it) was excluded from that dignity by an Election of Conſuls. So there were created Conſuls, Cn. Cornelius Coſſus, and L. Furius Medullinus the ſecond time.

Never took he Com. the matter more to the heart, that the Election of Tribuns eſcaped their hands:

hands: which grief of theirs in the Election of Questors, they both shewed and revenged. For H this was the first time that the Questors were made of the commonalty: so that in chusing of 4.
there was but one place left for C. Fabius Ambustus, a Nobleman: and 3 of the commonalty, Q.
Silius, P. Ælius, and P. Pipius, were preferred before young Gentlemen, of most noble houses. I find that the perswaders of the people to use their full liberty in bestowing their voyces, were the three Icilij, (descended of that house, which ever was most malitiously bent against the Nobles) who were for that year chosen Tribuns of the commonalty, and possessed the peoples heads with a world of great matters, after which they gaped greedily: but so, as they flatly gave out and said, They would not stir at all, if the people had not courage enough, so much as in the election of Questors, which only the Senat had left indifferent to the commonalty and Nobility, to effect I that which so long they had desired, and now by law was warranted. Thus the Commons assured themselves hereby of a mighty great victory: and esteemed not the dignity of Questorship to be the end and type of honor, but that thereby they seemed to have made a way and overture for new risen upstarts, to be advanced to Consulships and triumphs. The Nobles contrary-wise stormed, not for that their dignities were made common and imparted to other, but for the utter losse thereof: protesting that if things went so on end, they would neither get, nor bring up children any more: who being put from their Ancestors place, and seeing others in possession of their dignity, should be disabled for bearing rule and authority in the state, and be good for nothing but only to be made Priests for Mars, and Flamines for Jupiter, imployed about nothing else but to sacrifice (forsooth) for the people. Thus on both parts were their minds netled and provoked, K whiles the Commons took heart, and had three champions of great reputation to back them, and maintain their cause: and the Nobles, seeing all would prove like to the Questors Election (if it lay in the peoples choice) addressed themselves to the Election of Consuls, which as yet was not so free, and indifferent both for Commons and Nobles. Contrary-wise, the Icilij persisted still, and urged the point, that in any hand Tribuns Military should and must be created. For now it was more than time that the Commons had their part in offices of state. But no Action hitherto belonging to the offices and charge of the Consuls had been presented unto them, by the hindering whereof they might wring from them, that which they desired and sought for. But see, how even then, in wonderful good opportunity, word was brought that the Volscians and Æquians were departed out of their own Confines, and made an expedition into the Latine pale for to rob L and spoil. To the which war, when as by vertue of an order from the Senat, the Consuls began to muster: the Tribuns laboured tooth and nail to hinder it: giving out that this occurrent fortuned happily on their sides and the Commons. Three there were of them, and all most quick, active and courragious men: yea (and for commoners) of good birth, and worshipfully descended. Whereof twain took in hand, by their continual travel to attend and watch the Consuls, to keep them awork, and either of them to hold one occupied: the third, was appointed to entertain the commonalty: and in all assemblies, with their Orations, one whiles to rein them in, another while to give them the head, as occasion required. But all this while, neither Consuls went through with the musters, nor the Tribuns with the election which they desired. But afterwards when fortune began to incline to the Commons side, Messengers came with news, that whiles the souldiers that M lay in garrison at the Castle Carventana, were stept aside to get a booty, the Æquians having slain a few warders that kept the hold, entred it: and that all the souldiers were slain: some as they ran into the fort again, others as they were scattered in the fields. This thing falling out so cross against the whole State, gave strength yet unto the designments of the Tribuns. For being dealt withal, that now at length they would surcease from hindering the war, nothing would prevail:
for that they neither gave place to the publick calamity and necessity, nor yet regarded their own private peril of displeasure: and they obtained in the end that an Act of Senat was granted for to chuse Tribuns Military. Howbeit with this expresse proviso, it was capitulated; That none of them who had been Tribuns that year of the Commons, should be eligible and propounded: no, nor chosen again Tribuns of the Commons for the year following. Whereby no doubt, the Senat N noted and pointed at the Icilij, whom they charged to seek to be Consuls, for a reward of their seditious Tribunship. Then went the mustering forward, and preparation of war, by consent of all the States.

Sundry Authors write diversly and make doubt, whether both the Consuls went to the Castle
Carventana or whether one of them stayed behind in the City for to hold the foresaid Election.
In this they disagree not, but set down for certain: that when they had assailed the Castle a long time without effect they were compelled from thence to remove: and that Verrugo in the Country of the Volscians by the same army was recovered, and that great forraging there was, and driving of booties, both in the Country of the Æquians and also of the Volcians. Now at Rome, as the victory of the commonalty rested in this, that they had the Election which they desired: so O in the issue and successe of the Election, the Nobles had the better. For besides all mens hope and expectation, there were three Tribuns Military chosen with Consuls authority, all of the Nobility, C. Julius Tullus, Cn. Cornelius Cossus C. Servilius Hala. Men say that the Nobles used a subtile practise and cunning device, which even then the Icilii charged them with: to wit, that by intermingling a many of unworthy and unmeet competitors with others of mark and quality, they had alienated the peoples hearts from the commoners, seeing them to be men of no worth, and loathing the notable baseness that appeared in their persons.

After

A After this, tidings came, that the Volſcians and Æquians (were it that the Caſtle of Carventus which they held and guarded ſtill, put them into ſome hope: or their garriſon and fort loſt at Verrugo drave them into anger) were up in arms, with all force ready to make war: that the Antiats were the principal and chief in this intended action: that their Embaſſadors had ſollicited the people of both nations, rebuking their cowardize, for keeping within their walls, and ſuffering the Romans the year before, to forrage and drive booties in their territories, and the garriſon of Verrugo to be ſurprized and loſt. Moreover, that not only hoſts of armed men were ſent againſt them, but Colonies alſo were planted in their frontiers and marches: and that the Romans not content to divide their lands and goods among themſelves, had beſtowed upon the Hernicks
B the town Ferentinum, which they had won from them. At theſe ſpeeches they were kindled and ſet on fire: and in all places whither they went to ſollicit, the younger ſort and able men in great number were levied. So the youth and manhood of all thoſe nations, gathered together to Antium, where they encamped themſelves, and expected the enemy. Which tidings being brought to Rome, cauſed more fear then need was. And the Senat preſently (which in all fearful occurents was ever their laſt remedy and refuge) gave order that a Dictator ſhould be created. Which thing Julius and Cornelius, two military Tribuns (they ſay) took in great diſpleaſure. And hereof enſued much heart-burning and diſſention, whiles the LL. of the Senat of one ſide complained in vain of their grievances, That the Tribuns Military would not be ordered by the authority of the Senat: and at the laſt had recourſe to the Tribuns of the Commons for help: alledging withal, that the very C Conſuls power upon the like occaſion had been by their authority overruled and ſet down. And the Tribuns of the Commons on the other ſide, rejoycing at the diſcord of the Senators, made anſwer again, and ſaid, "That for their parts, they were not able to yeeld any ſuccour at all, who "were of no reckoning themſelves, being reputed neither in the roll of Citizens, nor yet ſo much "as in the number of men. But if to be (ſay they) dignities and honors were communicated to "us, then would we provide and take order, that by no pride of any magiſtrate whatſoever, the "Senats decree ſhould be made fruſtrat and diſanulled. And in the mean whiles, ſeeing the No-"bles were exempt from all reverence of laws, and regard of magiſtrates, let them of themſelves "alſo exerciſe the Tribuns authority if they would. This diſcord falling out ſo unfitly, when ſo great war was in hand, occupied and poſſeſſed mens heads a long time: whiles Julius and Corneli-
D us one after another, thus reaſoned and diſcourſed: That ſeeing they themſelves were Captains good enough for the conduct of ſuch a war, it was not meet that the honour once beſtowed upon them by the people, ſhould be made void and taken from them. Then Servilius Hala, who alſo was a Tribun Military ſpake and ſaid: "I have been ſilent thus long, not for that I was doubt-"ful in mine opinion, or to ſeek what to ſay, (For what good Citizen (quoth he) would have his "advice by himſelf, and go from the publick Councel?) but becauſe I had rather, that my bre-"thren of their own accord ſhould give place to the Senats authority, than to ſuffer the Tribuns "power to be called for, againſt them. And even now alſo, if the caſe would permit, I could wil-"lingly give them time and ſpace to retract their too too obſtinat, perverſe and peremptory opi-"nion. But ſeeing that the neceſſities of war, wait not upon human counſel, I will have more re-
E "ſpect and conſideration of the Weal-publick, than of the favor of my brethren. Wher-fore, if the "Senat perſiſt ſtill in that mind and reſolution of theirs, I will the next night following nominat a "Dictator. And if any one withſtand me, I will ask no more, than the power and vertue of the Se-"nats Act. By which ſpeech of his, having won deſerved praiſe and thanks of all men, he declared Publius Cornelius Dictator, and was himſelf by him nominated General of the horſemen. A ſingular example to teach as many as beheld him and his Collegues, That otherwhiles favour and honor ſooneſt fall to them that leaſt deſire the ſame. The war was ſmal and nothing memorable: for in one eaſie and ſlight battel were the enemies overthrown and ſlain at Antium. The army upon this victory waſted the Volſcians Country, won by force the Caſtle upon the lake Fucinus, and within it took three thouſand priſoners: having chaſed all the reſt of the Volſcians within their walls, F not able to keep their frontiers. The Dictator, after he had performed this war in ſuch ſort, as only he might not ſeem to neglect his wonted fortune but keep it ſtil in ure, returned into the City with greater felicity than glory, and reſigned up his place.

The Oration of Servilius Hala.

The Tribuns Military, making no words at all of the chuſing of Conſuls (for anger, I ſuppoſe, that a Dictator had been created) publiſhed the election of Tribuns Military. But then the Senators were in greater care and perplexity, ſeeing their cauſe betrayed even by thoſe of their own company. Wherefore, as in the former year, by foiſting in the baſeſt of the Commons for competitors, they had cauſed even men of good worth to be deſpiſed: ſo, now by procuring the principal of the Nobility, both for honour and for favour, to ſtand for the dignity, they obtained all the places to themſelves: ſo as no one Commoner could be choſen. So there were created four,
G all having afore born that Magiſtracy, L. Furius Medullinus, C. Valerius Potitus, Cn. Fabius Vibulanus, and C. Servilius Hala. This man was choſen again to the place, as well in regard of other vertues and worthy parts, as for the late favour which he won by his rare moderation, and ſingular carriage of himſelf.

In that year, for as much as the time of truce with the Veientian Nation was expired, they began by Embaſſadors and Heralds of Arms to challenge of them amends and reſtitution. Whom as they entred into their territory, the Embaſſage of the Veientians encountred in the way requeſting them not to go forward to Veii, before they had preſented themſelves to the Senat of Rome.

Who being thither come, obtained of the Senat, that for as much as the Veientians were at civil diſcord among themſelves, they would not claim any amends at their hands. Lo, how far they were from ſeeking their own vantage by other mens diſtreſs and calamity. Alſo at the Volſcians hands they ſuſtained damage by loſs of their garriſon at Verrugo. But (ſee what a thing it is to ſlack the time) For whereas the ſouldiers beſieged there, by the Volſcians and ſending for aid in due time, might have been reſcued if ſpeed had been made, the army which was ſent for ſuccour, came too ſhort, and after the fray was ended. Only this exploit they did: The enemies, who after their freſh maſſacre committed upon the garriſon, were gone abroad ſtragling for to raiſe booties, were by them overtaken and put to the ſword. The cauſe of this ſlackneſs was imputed to the Senat, rather than the ſoveraign Tribuns: who becauſe intelligence was given, that they in the garriſon reſiſted and defended themſelves moſt manfully, little conſidered, That there is no proweſs of man whatſoever, but by valour again it may be overmatched. Moſt brave and valiant ſouldiers they, that neither whiles they lived, nor after death were unrevenged.

The year following, when P. and Cornelius both ſurnamed Coſſus, C. Fabius Ambuſtus and L. Valerius Potitus were Tribuns Military in Conſuls authority, began the Veientian war by occaſion of a proud and arrogant anſwer returned by the Senat of the Veientians: Who commanded that the Embaſſadors which came to claim amends, ſhould take this for their diſpatch: That unleſs they departed preſently out of the City and Country, they would ſerve them as Lars Tolumnius had done others before. The Senators of Rome hardly could digeſt that: and therefore decreed, that the Military Tribuns ſhould propoſe unto the people as ſpeedily as might be, even the day before to morrow, concerning proclamation of open war, and ſending defiance to the Veientians. Which as ſoon as ever it was noiſed and publiſhed, the younger ſort and men of ſervice, murmured and muttered in this manner: "That as yet they had not fully ended the war with the Volſci-"ans: that even of late two whole garriſons were loſt, and their throats cut, and the forts kept ſtil "with danger and great hazard. There is not (ſay they) a year paſſeth over our heads, but one field "or other is fought: and as if we had not work and trouble enough already, there was now in-"tended new war with a moſt mighty nation confining upon us, and which was like enough to "raiſe againſt us all Hetruria. And as they were forward enough of themſelves to conceive thus, "and utter theſe ſpeeches, ſo the Tribuns of the Commons were not behind to buzze more mat-"ters into their heads, and ſet all on a light fire: Who gave out ſtill, That when all was done, the "greateſt warring was between the Nobles and Commons: and that the Commons on purpoſe "were to be toiled out with travel or warfare, and expoſed to the enemies for to be murdered: "and that they were to be kept far off from the City, and as it were confined and ſent out of the "way: leſt by being quiet at home, and minding their freedom and Colonies, they ſhould con-"ſult and deviſe, both how to diſpoſe of the common grounds, and to give their voices freely. "And ever as they could meet with any old beaten ſouldiers, they would hold them with talk, "take them by their hands, reckon up how many years they had done ſervice in war, fall to tel-"ling of their gaſhes and ſcars, asking them what whole place they had left in their bodies to "receive new wounds, and what blood was behind to ſpend and ſhed, in the quarrel of the "Common-wealth? When as by iterating theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches, both in their private talk and conference, and alſo other whiles in their publick aſſemblies, they had turned clean away the hearts of the Commonalty from taking war in hand: the foreſaid Act propounded, was put off until a farther day, and lay ſtill for the time. Which no doubt, had been nipt in the head, and never would have paſſed farther, in caſe it had been referred and ſubject to the hard opinion and conceit of men, as then they ſtood affected. In the mean whiles agreed it was, that the military Tribuns ſhould conduct an army into the Volſcians country. Cn. Cornelius alone was left at Rome. The three Tribuns, after that they perceived the Volſcians in no place encamped, and nothing minded to try a battel, parted themſelves three ways to waſte and forrage the frontires. Valerius he marched to Antium, Cornelius to Ecetre. And every way as they went, they ſpoiled all before them, both houſe and field, and all to amuſe & keep the Volſcians occupied that way. But Fabius without any forraging at all, came directly to aſſault Anxur, which was the ſervice moſt deſired. Now Anxur was that, which at this day is called Tarracine, a City ſeated upon mariſhes. And on that ſide Fabius made ſhew of aſſault. But there were four cohorts under the leading of C. Servilius Hala ſent out to fetch a compaſs: who having gained the hill that over-looketh and commandeth the town from that higher ground, with a mighty ſhout and outcry aſſailed the wall, where it was diſfurniſhed of guard to defend it At which ſudden alarm, they were amazed who manned the wall of the baſe town againſt Fabius: and ſuffered them to ſet ladders to, and to ſcale. By which means every place was full of enemies. And upon the walls for a good while there was nothing but killing, as well thoſe that fled, as thoſe that reſiſted, armed and unarmed, one with another. So that, albeit they were too weak, yet forced were they to fight: becauſe in yeelding they ſaw no way but one. But upon proclamation once made, that none but armed men ſhould be killed, all the multitude beſides willingly were diſarmed. Of which number there were upon 2500. taken alive. From the ſaccage Fabius kept the ſouldiers, until his Colleagues were come: ſaying, that Anxur was taken as well by thoſe armies, which had driven away the reſt of the Volſcians from the defence of that place, as by themſelvs. Who being come, the three armies jointly ranſacked it, & had the pillage for their labor of that rich town, that had gathered wealth a long time.

Which

A Which courteſie and bountifulneſs of the commanders, was the firſt thing that reconciled Commons and Nobles together. Over and beſides this munificence of the Rulers, the Nobles alſo began in a moſt happy hour to be liberal unto the multitude. For before that either the Commons or Tribuns made the motion, the Senat decreed, that ſouldiers might have their pay out of the City chamber; whereas before that time, every man in that ſervice had born his own charges. Never was there any thing, by report, ſo joyfully accepted of the Commons: who ran by heaps together to the Councel houſe: took the Senators by the hands as they came forth, and ſaid, "They were now truly called Patres, i. Fathers, confeſſing that now the day was come that in the "quarrel of ſo bounteous a City, there was no man would ſo long as his breath laſted, ſpare ei-
B "ther limb or life. Seeing that this commodity they ſhould have to help them, namely, that du-"ring the time that their bodies were imployed, and buſily occupied in the defence of Common-"weal, their private eſtate ſhould ſtand at one yet and not decay. And forasmuch as it came of "themſelves, and never moved by any of the Tribuns of the Commons, nor called for and cra-"ved importunatly, by their importune ſpeeches; that was it, that multiplied their joy and made "the boon it ſelf much more acceptable. But the Tribuns of the Commons (who only had "not their part in this common joy and concord of all States) came in with their opinion, and "ſaid, that it would not prove ſo joyous and happy to the Nobles all in general, as they ſuppoſed: "that this courſe and order taken, was at the firſt ſight better then it would be found in the pra-"ctiſe and execution. For how could that money poſſibly be made and raiſed but by levying a tri-
C "bute or payment of the people? they were therefore liberal; but of other mens purſes. But "admit, or ſay, that the reſt would bear it, yet thoſe neither could nor would endure it, who "were paſt war-ſervice, and lived upon their penſions and annual ſalary: who would grudge and "repine, that others hereafter ſhould ſerve in war for more gain then they had in their time "done; who having been charged with the pay of their own ſervice, ſhould now again be put "to contribute to the wages of others. With theſe words they moved part of the Commonalty. Laſt of all, when there was a levy exacted, the Tribuns alſo proclamed, That they would bear as many out, as would not contribute to the ſouldiers pay. The Nobles continued ſtill to maintain that which they had ſo well begun, and were the firſt that opened their purſe, and for that as yet they had no ſilver coin, ſome of them carried groſs pieces of braſs in Wains to the treaſure
D houſe, and made a goodly ſhew of Contribution. When as the Nobles had moſt faithfully paid according to the rate of their wealth: the chief of the Commons alſo, friends of the Nobility, as it was afore agreed, began to lay their penny to theirs: whom when the common ſort ſaw both to be commended of the Nobles, and to be admired and reverenced of the ſouldiers as good Citizens: they all upon a ſudden, refuſing the Tribuns aſſiſtance, began to ſtrive who ſhould pay firſt. And the decree or act being once paſſed, of proclaming war againſt the Veientians, the new Tribuns Military led an army to Veios, conſiſting much upon voluntary ſouldiers. Now the Tribuns were T. Quintius Capitolinus, P. Quintius Cincinnatus, C. Julius Tullus the ſecond time, A. Manlius, L. Furius Medullinus the third time, and M. Æmylius Mamercus. And theſe were the firſt that beſieged Veii.

E About the beginning of which ſiege, when the Tuſcans held a Councel in a ſolemn aſſembly at the Temple of Votumna, they could hardly agree upon this point, Whether the Veientians ſhould be defended by general war of the whole Nation, or no. The year following was the ſiege not ſo hot, by reaſon that ſome of the Tribuns, and part of the forces, were called away to the Volſcian war. The Tribuns Military in Coſſ. authority, that year were C. Valerius Potitus the third time, M. Sergius Fidenas, P. Cornelius Maluginus, Cn. Cornelius Coſſus C. Fabius Ambuſtus, Sp. Nautius Rutilius the ſecond time. With the Volſcians there was a pight field fought between Ferentinum and Ecetra; wherein the Romans had the day. Then the Tribuns began to lay ſiege to Artena a Town of the Volſcians: where, by reaſon of a ſallying forth by them attempted, the enemies were driven back into the town, and the Romans took occaſion and vantage thereby, F to break in with them pell mell, and ſo they won all, ſave only the Caſtle. Into this fort naturally fenced, a good company of armed men betook themſelves: but beneath the Caſtle, many a man was either ſlain or taken priſoner. Afterwards was the fortreſs beſieged alſo. Neither could it by aſſault be forced, for that there was a guard ſufficient to man it, conſidering the bigneſs of the place: nor gave the aſſailants any hope of yeelding, for before the town was loſt, they had conveyed all their publick proviſion of corn into the Caſtle. So that the Romans had for very wearieſomneſs departed from thence, but that a bondſlave betrayed it unto them; who let in certaine ſouldiers at a ſteep high place, and thoſe were they that won the fortreſs: for when the warders were by them ſlain, the reſt of the multitude with ſudden fright were ſoon overcome, and yeelded. Thus, when both the Caſtle and town of Artena was ſacked and ſpoiled, the legions were G brought back from the Volſcians, and all the Romans power imployed againſt Veii. To the traitor aforeſaid, there was given beſides liberty, the pillage of two houſholds for a reward. And he was named ever after Servilius Romanus. There be that think Artena was a town of the Veientians, and not of the Volſcians: the occaſion of which error is, for that there was a town of that name between Cere and Veios. But that town the Roman Kings deſtroyed: and it belonged to the Ceretes, and not to the Veientians: but this other, whereof we have reported the deſtruction, was in the country of the Volſcians.

The fifth Book of T. Livius.

WHen peace elſewhere was obtained, the Romans and Veians were at war, with ſuch mutual malice and hatred; that it ſeemed, whether part were vanquiſhed, ſhould come to final deſtruction. The aſſemblies for the election of the Rulers of both Nations, far differed one from the other. The Romans augmented the number of Tribuns Military in Conſuls authority: for eight of them (ſo as never afore) were created: M. Æmylius Mamercus the ſecond time, L. Valerius Potitus the third time, Appius Claudius Craſſus, M. Quintilius Varus, M. Julius Tullus, M. Poſthumius, M. Furius Camillus, and M. Poſthumius Albus. The Veientians contrariwiſe, being weary of ſuing for dignities every year (a cauſe ſometimes of civil diſcord) made themſelves a King. Which offended the people of Hetruria: who as they abhorred all regal government, ſo they hated the perſon of the King himſelf. He had aforetime oppreſſed that nation, in regard of his greatneſs and pride withall: in that he had violently put down their ſolemn playes, the intermiſſion whereof was held unlawful and deteſtable. For upon a time, in an anger that he received a repulſe, and by the ſuffrages of the twelve Nations, another was preferred before him to be high Prieſt, in the very midſt of their ſolemn Games and ſports, he took from them the very Players and Actors, whereof a great ſort were his own ſervants. That people therefore given to ſuperſtition above all other, and ſo much the rather for that they excelled in the skill of religious obſerving the ſame, decreed to deny the Veientians their aid, ſo long as they were governed under a King. This decree was ſuppreſſed and not ſpoken of at Veii for fear of the King, who would accompted him that ſhould report ſuch rumor, for a ſower of ſedition, rather then an author of news. The Romans, albeit they heard that all was quiet from Hetruria, yet becauſe they were advertiſed that in all the Diets and Councels of that Nation, the queſtion was on foot and much debated, made their fortifications at Veii, ſo as they ſtood two wayes: ſome looked towards the City againſt all ſallies and eruptions of the townſmen: others fronted Hetruria, to ſtop all ſuccours that haply might come from thence. But the Roman Captains having greater hope in long ſiege, then in quick aſſault, began to build wintring harbours (a ſtrange thing to Roman Souldiers.) Their intent was all winter time to keep continual war. Which after it was told at Rome to the Tribuns of the Commons

A Commons (who now a long time could find no matter and occaſion of troubles and alteration) they leapt forth into the aſſembly of the people, ſounding and ſolliciting the minds of the Commons, and often ſaying, "That this was the only matter, why a ſet pay was appointed "for the ſouldiers: and that they were not ignorant, that the gifts of enemies would prove to be "beſmeared with poiſon: That the freedom of the Commons was bought and ſold: That their "young men were ſent away far off, and as it were baniſhed from the City and Common-wealth, "ſo that now they had not ſo much ſpare time as winter nor any ſeaſon elſe of the year for to vi-"ſit home and ſee unto their eſtate. What think ye (ſay they) is the cauſe of continuing this "warfare? No other verily ſhould they find it but this, left by reaſon of the frequent number of B "thoſe young men, in whom the whole ſtrength of the Commonalty conſiſted, there might be "ſomething dealt in, and effected, concerning their commodities. Over and beſides they com-"plained how they were much more hardly uſed, then the Veientians. For as for them, they ſpent "the winter within their own houſes, defending their City, fortified both with goodly walls, and "alſo by natural ſituation of the place: but the Roman ſouldiers abode by it ſtill in labour and "travel, ſhrouded under booths of poor hides, overwhelmed with ſnows and froſts, not lay-"ing away their harneſs and weapons, ſo much as in winter the ordinary time of reſt from all wars "both by ſea and land. This manner of hard bondage, neither the Kings, nor thoſe proud and "imperious Conſuls (before the Tribuns authority was ordained to take them down) nor yet the "Lordly ruling Dictator, nor the inſolent and unſupportable Decemvirs, ever enjoined; thus to C "dwell in continual ſouldiery, as theſe Tribuns Military do: who exerciſe upon the Com-"mons of Rome, an abſolute and kingly authority. What would they do another day, when "they were Conſuls or Dictators indeed, who now but repreſenting only the Conſuls govern-"men (as Vice-Conſuls) are ſo cruel and unreaſonable? But we are well enough ſerved, and juſt-"ly have deſerved no leſs. For that there was not ſo much as one place for a Commoner amongſt "eight Tribuns. Afore time, the Nobles were wont with much labour and toil, to fill but three "rooms: and now they go eight in a rank together, to obtain all charges and dignities of "State and Government: and in that throng, a Commoner cannot have a place amongſt them, "to put his Colleagues in mind (if he did nothing elſe) that they that go to warfare were free-"men yet, and Citizens with them, and not bondſlaves. Who in winter at the leaſt, ought to D "be brought again to their houſes and homes, and once a year viſit their loving parents, their "ſweet children, and beſt beloved wives: to make ſome uſe of their liberty, and chuſe their "Magiſtrates: Theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches, whileſt they broadly uttered and multiplied, they met at length with an adverſary that was able to match them, Appius Claudius, left for the purpoſe at home by his brethren in office, to reſtrain the Tribuns ſeditions: a man ever from his tender youth trained up in the broils and contentions of the Commons. Who certain years before (as we have ſaid) gave ſhrewd and unhappy counſel to diſſolve and put down the Tribuns authority, by the contradiction and inhibition of their own Colleagues. This man being not only in wit prompt and ready, but alſo exerciſed by long practice, made at that time this or ſuch like ſpeech: "If ever doubt were made, O Quirits, whether the Tribuns of the Commonalty have The Oration of App. Claudius.
E "for love of your good or their own particular vantage, been always the authors and beginners "of diſcord and diſſention, this year I know aſſuredly, ye need no more ſtand in doubt. And "as I rejoice ye are at length come to an end of this your long wandring, ſo I congratulate "both you, and the Common-weal for your ſake, that this error is cleared, and eſpecially in the "midſt of your proſperity. Is there any man maketh queſtion now, that the Tribunes of the "Commons were not offended, nor took ſnuff ſo much at the injuries at your hands received "(if haply there have ſometimes been any) as at the bounty of the Nobles, towards the Com-"mons, in allowing pay to thoſe that ſerve in war? What think ye elſe, either they feared then, or "would at this day diſturb and diſquiet: but only the concord and agreement of the States? Which "they ſuppoſe tendeth moſt, and is ſufficient, to aboliſh and overthrow the Tribuns authority.
F "And verily, as naughty Artiſans or lewd leeches, ſeek for work ſtill, and would be ever doing: "ſo they likewiſe deſire to have ſomething or other out of frame and amiſs, in the Commonweal, "that to the repair and cure thereof, they might be ever ſent for and emploied. Fo whether do ye "(and ſpeak truth) maintain or impugne the commonalty? Are you the adverſaries or the advo-"cates of them that ſerve in the wars? Unleſs peradventure this be your ſaying, Whatſoever the "Nobles do, it miſliketh us, be it for the good of the common people, or to the prejudice and "dammage. And even as maſters forbid their own ſervants and ſlaves, to have any dealing at all "with ſtrangers, and think it meet and reaſon, that they medle neither hot nor cold with them: "even ſo forewarn ye the Nobles from all commerce and entercourſe with the Commons: to "the end, that neither we by our courteſie and liberalitie, ſhould allure and win them; nor they G "again become dutiful and obeiſant to us. How much more ought you (I pray you) if there were "any ſpark (I ſay not) of civilitie, but of common humanitie and good nature in you, rather to "favour, and as much as lieth in you, foſter and cheriſh, as well the gracious kindneſs of the No-"bles, as the willing ſervice and obedience of the Commons? Which accord, if it were perpe-"tual, who would not undertake to warrant, that this Seignory and Empire within a while, might "prove the mightieſt and moſt renowned of all thoſe States that border hard upon our confines? "As for this purpoſe intended, and plot deviſed by my Colleagues, whereby they would not have "the army withdrawn away from the ſiege of Veii, before the ſervice were brought to an end;

"how it would not be only profitable, but alſo neceſſary, I will hereafter argue and prove. Now H
"for this time, I liſt rather to treat and ſpeak of the preſent condition and ſtate of thoſe, that are "employed there in warfare. Which Oration of mine, if it were pronounced not before you only,
"but alſo in the camp, and there canvaſſed and ſcanned of by the very army it ſelf, I ſuppoſe, would "ſeem equal, and be received for good and reaſonable. Wherein, if nothing elſe ſhould come in-
"to my head to ſpeak, I would content my ſelf, and reſt ſatisfied with the only ſpeeches given "out by the very adverſaries. They ſaid of late, That pay was not to be allowed to the ſouldiers,
"for that never before it had been allowed. How then can they now be offended, and to male-
"content, if they who have ſome new commodity coming to them, be enjoined alſo new labour "proportionably? For never lightly is there travel any where without gain, nor gain common- I
"ly without travel and employment. Pains and pleaſure, things of themſelves in nature moſt un"like, yet by a natural kind of ſociety (I know not how) are linked together. The ſouldier (afore-
"time) thought much to beſtow his labour & ſervice upon the Common-weal, at his own pro"per charges: yet was he glad with all his heart, that one part of the year, he might look to home,
"husband his land, and get maintainance to find himſelf and his, both at home in City and abroad
"in war. Now, taketh he contentment, and is well pleaſed, that the Common-weal is gainful to "him: and with joyful heart receiveth his wages. Let him likewiſe be content, with patience to
"to forbear his houſe and family (ſince he is at no great charge) ſomewhat longer than ordina"ry. Might not the Common-wealth, if ſhe would call him to a reckoning, juſtly ſay: Yearly "pay thou haſt, perform therefore thy yearly ſervice? Doſt thou think it reaſon, to receive full K
"wages for the whole year? and to be employed but ſix months for it? Much againſt my Sto"mach, O Quirites, enforce I this point, and dwell ſtill in this one part of my Oration: for
"in this wiſe ought they to reaſon that have mercenary and hired ſouldiers: but we will uſe
"them as fellow Citizens, and think it meet likewiſe that they entreat us kindly, and ſpeak unto "us as to their native Country. Either it behoved us, not to have begun the war at all; or elſe
"to proceed forward, now it is begun: yea, and for the honour of the people of Rome, to finiſh
"it with all ſpeed poſſible. And finiſhed it will be, if we preſs upon our enemies thus beſieged:
"if we depart not afore we have accompliſhed our hope, by the winning of Veii. And ſurely, if "there were no other cauſe but this, even the very ſhame and indignity of the thing, might force
"us to continue ſiege unto the end. In old time the whole power of Greece laid ſiege full ten years L
"to one City, and that for one only woman: How far (good god) from their own home? how "many lands and ſeas between? Are we then loth and weary being within 20. miles of our dwel"ling place, and almoſt in the ſight of our own City, to endure the toil of one years ſiege? Be"cauſe (forſooth) we have but ſmall cauſe given us to war: and not griefs enough that might "juſtly provoke us to abide and ſee the end. Seven times already they have rebelled: In peace
"never were they true. Our Country have they ſpoiled and waſted a thouſand times. The Fide-
"nats they have cauſed to revolt from us. Our inhabitants there by us placed, they have ſlain: and
"againſt all law of nations they were the principal inſtruments of that unworthy and unhuman "murder of our Embaſſadors. All Hetruria would they have raiſed up againſt us, and at this day "about it they go. And when our Embaſſadors came to demand amends, they had like to have M "run upon them and killed them. And ought we then with theſe kind of men to ſtand at a bay
"and to war coldly and by leaſure? But if ſo juſt an hatred as this move us not: do theſe things
"(I pray you) nere awhit move you neither? Their City is environed and beleaguered with deep "trenches: blocked with mighty ſconces, whereby the enemy is pent up and pinned within his "own walls. His fields he cannot till, and what ſo ever was afore tilled, hath been deſtroyed by "war. If we diſlodge and withdraw our army back, who doubteth, but that they (not for deſire
"only of revenge, but upon neceſſity alſo and conſtraint to prey of other mens goods, having loſt
"their own) will invade and over-run our country? So that by this means we defer not the war, "but bring it within our own borders and confines. But now as touching that which properly "indeed concerneth ſouldiers (of whom our good Tribuns of the Commons would now in all N
"the haſte ſeem to have ſo great regard, from whom erewhile they would have wreſted their wa"ges:) but what is that (I ſay?) A trench they have caſt, a rampart and platform they have raiſed, "(matters of exceeding travel and labour) ſo far about: ſconces at the firſt a few, but after as "their army encreaſed, they have erected very thick in every place. Forts they have built, not "only to command the town, but alſo looking toward Hetruria, to impeach any relief, if any aid
"ſhould from thence come. What ſhould I ſpeak of the rolling frames and towers, the man-
"tilets and other Fabricks? What ſhould I ſpeak of the Tarraces, Tortoiſes, Rams, and all other
"engins of aſſault and battery? Think ye it meet, that after ſo great toil and pains taken, now "that the works at length are brought to an end, theſe things ſhould be left and abandoned, that "againſt ſummer we ſhould be new to begin again, and ſweat afreſh about the ſame? How O
"much leſs travail rather is it to keep theſe munitions already made? to be inſtant, and con-"ſtant to endure, and abide? yea, and to rid our hands of all the care at once? For ſurely we may "ſoon diſpatch the ſervice, if it be plyed throughly and followed on ſtill without ſtay; and if we "our ſelves by theſe intermiſſions and reſpits between, make not a long piece of work of it, and "draw our hope at length. Thus much of the labour and loſs of time. What elſe? Conſidering
"theſe ſo many Parliaments, theſe Diets and Councels continually in Tuſcany, about ſending "aid to Veii, can we forget the danger that we incur by deferring the War? Indeed (as things

A "now preſently ſtand) I confeſs the Tuſcans with the Veientians are angry, they hate them and
"deny to ſend: and for any thing by them done, we might win Veii out of hand. But who dare "warrant, that if the war be delayed, they will hereafter be of the ſame mind? Seeing that if the "Veientians have any reſt and breathing time given them, they are like to ſend oftner their Em"baſſages, and thoſe more honourable than heretofore. Alſo the King who newly is ſet up and "created at Veii (the only thing that now offendeth the Tuſcans) in proceſs of time, may be chan"ged for another governor, either by agreement of the State (thereby to reconcile the hearts of "the Tuſcans) or of his own accord: who will not peradventure that his princely regiment ſhould
"be hurtful to the ſafety of his ſubjects. See how many things, how many inconvenien es fol-
B "low and enſue upon that courſe and manner of proceeding. The loſs of the fabrick and fortifi"cations, with ſo great labour already prepared and atchieved: the imminent and preſent waſting
"our own borders: the Tuſcans war inſtead of the Veientians. Theſe your devices, O ye Tri-
"buns, are much what like to his, that offering a ſick man ſome kind of meat or drink, for the "very preſent to gratifie him withal, to pleaſe his palat and to content his taſte, maketh his diſ"eaſe long, and peradventure incurable: who might have been recovered out of hand, in caſe at "once, he would have reſolutly endured the right cure of a skilful Phyſitian. And ſurely, if it "were not material to the managing of this war in hand, yet would it import much to martial
"diſcipline, that our ſouldiers ſhould be acquainted, not only with the ſweet fruit of a victory
"atchieved. but alſo if occaſion required longer time, to abide this tediouſneſs: and to wait for C "the end of their hope, be it never ſo long: and if war be not finiſhed in ſummer, to ſtay for win"ter: and not as ſummer birds by and by in the fall of the leaf, to look about and ſeek for houſing,
"harbour and covert. Conſider, I beſeech you, and ſee. The love and pleaſure of hunting carri-
"eth men into mountains, woods and forreſts; through froſt and ſnow, after their game: ſhall "not we then uſe the like ſufferance in the needful exploits of war, which paſtimes ſports, and de"lights, are wont to draw and fetch out of us? Think we the bodies of our ſouldiers ſo effeminate,
"their hearts ſo tender and delicate, that they cannot for one winter abide in a camp, and forbear
"their home, but muſt needs war as men at ſea, watching times and ſeaſons, and obſerving the "quarters of the year? Cannot they endure both parching heat and chilling cold? They would
"bluſh and be abaſhed verily, if a man ſhould therewith charge them: and they would ſtand ſtifly D "in this, and avouch, That they had both in body and mind manlike ſufferance and patience: and "that they were ſouldiers as well for winter as ſummer: and that they ſet not the Tribuns a work
"for any patronage of cowardiſe and ſhelter of idleneſs: but remembred well enough, that their "forefathers were not under ſhade for fear of ſun-burning, nor had their houſes over their heads "for taking cold, when they firſt created and ordained that magiſtracy of Tribuns. This rather is "beſeeming the valour of your ſouldiers, this fitteth well the name of Romans, not to have their "eye upon Veii only, and this war now in hand, but to ſeek for fame and glory both by other "exploits, and alſo with other nations in time to come. And think ye that there would enſue
"hereupon a ſmall crack of credit, and hazzard of reputation? Would ye have the neighbor nati"ons confining upon us, conceive thus of the people of Rome, That if a City could receive their E "firſt brunt, and abide their aſſault for a very ſmall while, it need not after to fear any more; Or "rather ſhould not this dread and terror of our name ſpread all abroad, both far and neer, That "no wearifomneſs of long ſiege and aſſault, no violence of bitter winter, is able to raiſe the Ro"man army from any town once by them inveſted? as knowing no other end of war but victo"ry? and whoſe manner of ſervice is not by way of violent force more then of obſtinate continu"ance, which (as in all other military occaſions) ſo in beſieging of Cities is moſt needful: the "greateſt number whereof, being either by ſtrong bulwarks and other fortifications, or by natural
"ſituation impregnable, yet by famine, by hunger and thirſt, proceſs and tract of time only doth "force and overthrow. As it will (I doubt not) Veii at length: unleſs the Tribuns of the com"monalty ſuccour our enemies: unleſs that the Veientians find that relief and aid at Rome, which F "they ſeek in vain throughout all Hetruria. For can there ought happen to the Veientians ſo "wiſhed for, as that firſt the City of Rome ſhould be full of variance, and then the Camp (as "it were by a contagion from thence) as full of mutinies? But contrariwiſe I aſſure you, amongſt
"the enemies, ſo good order there is and government, that neither the tediouſneſs of long ſiege, "nor yet the loathing of Kingly rule, hath cauſed any ſtir or commotion among them. No nor the "denial of help from the Tuſcans hath one whit troubled and diſtempered their minds: but "die he ſhall forthwith, that is the author of ſedition. Neither ſhall any man there be ſuffered to "ſpeak thoſe words, which are ſpoken here amongſt you without any puniſhment or controlling.
"He deſerveth the baſtanado, to be dry beaten and wel cudgelled, that forſaketh his Colours, or "departeth from his guard and quarter. But here, in open aſſemblies, they that perſwade and G "counſel not one or two ſouldiers, but whole armies to leave their Standards and Enſigns, and "abandon the very camp, have audience with applauſe. Inſomuch, that whatſoevera Tribune of "the Commons ſpeaketh, although it were to betray the City, and undo the whole State, ye are
"uſed to hearken and give good ear to him: and being raviſhed and carried away with the ſweet-
"neſs of that authority, ye ſuffer under it to lurk any miſchief whatſoever. There remaineth now
"no more but this, that the words they give out here with open mouth, the ſame they might "iterate in the camp among the ſouldiers, to corrupt the army, and not ſuffer them to obey their "Captains. For to ſuch licentious liberty they are grown at Rome, that they fear and reverence neither

" neither Councel nor Magiſtrate, neither Laws nor ancient Cuſtoms, neither Decree of Senators, H
" nor yet the Diſcipline of Military ſervice.

Now was Appius with his Orations good enough for the Tribuns, and able to meet them at every turn: But ſee; (a thing that no man would have thought) a loſs and foil received before Veii m de Appius to have the better hand of the cauſe, wrought a greater unity among the States, and kindled an ardent deſire to aſſail Veii more hotly, and to beſiege it with more reſolution. For when they had raiſed up a mount neer unto the City, and approached in a manner to the walls thereof, with their rolling towers and roofed mantlets, whiles (I ſay) they were not ſo vigilant in the night ſeaſon to tend and watch theſe Fabricks, as they were buſie and earneſt in the day time to rear and plant them; behold, all of a ſudden the enemies opened a gate, and armed in great I numbers, eſpecially with burning firebrands, ſet all on a light fire: and in the ſpace of one hour conſumed both the mount and the mantlets, which had coſt ſo long time in making. And many a man beſides that came to help (but in vain) by ſword and fire loſt his life. Which being reported at Rome, made all men heavy and ſad, and cauſed the Senators to take care and fear, how upon this accident, they might poſſibly prevent and ſtay, either commotion in City, or mutiny in camp: doubting leſt that the Tribuns would have inſulted over the Common-weal, as if they had gotten a great conqueſt. At what time, they that were by calling Gentlemen and ſo aſſeſſed, and had no horſes of ſervice aſſigned them from the City, after ſome conſultation together among themſelves, ſuddenly came into the Senat: and having liberty granted of ſpeech, promiſed to ſerve in the wars with horſes of their own. After that the Senat had right honourably thanked and given them K moſt gracious words, the news thereof was no ſooner bruited through the market place and whole City, but behold, all on a ſudden the Commons came running unto the Councel houſe, ſaying, that as they were then to ſerve as footmen, ſo they offered their ſervice to the Commonweal extraordinarily without muſtering, whether they ſhould be led, either to Veii, or to any other place whatſoever. And if they were conducted to Veii, they would not return again (they ſay) from thence, before they had won that City from their enemies. At which words, the Senators ſo exceedingly joyed above meaſure, that hardly they could temper themſelves. For they took not order, as they did by the Gentlemen and horſemen afore, that they ſhould be praiſed by the mouth of the Magiſtrates thereto appointed, nor called them into the Councel houſe, there to give them an anſwer, neither could they keep themſelves within the Councel houſe L door. But every one of them in his own behalf, ſo well as he could ſignified from aloft, both by word of mouth, and geſture of hand, unto the multitude ſtanding in the Comitium, a general joy conceived: ſaying, That the City of Rome in that concord and unity would be happy, invincible, and perpetual: commending the horſemen, praiſing the footmen, extolling and magnifying that very day, and confeſſing that now they had ſurpaſſed the courteſie and bounty of the Senat. So that Nobles and Commons both, for joy wept again who could weep moſt, until the Senators were recalled into the Court: where a decree was made, That the Tribuns Military ſhould aſſemble the people, and give thanks both to horſemen and footmen, and promiſe in the name of the Senat, that they would be mindful of their affectionate kindneſs to their Country: and to ſignifie that it was their pleaſure, that they all, who had offered extraordinary ſervice ſo willing- M ly, ſhould have their pay notwithſtanding: yea, and for the horſes alſo there were aſſigned a certain rate and proportion of wages. This was the firſt time that the Gentlemen began to ſerve on horſeback for money. This voluntary army marched to Veii, and not only repaired again the works which had been deſtroyed, but alſo went in hand to erect new. And from the City was proviſion of victual brought, with greater care of convoy than afore, that nothing might be wanting to an army ſo well deſerving of the Common-weal.

The year following had for their Military Tribuns in Conſuls authority, C. Servilius Hala the third time, Q. Servilius, P. Virginius, Q. Sulpitius, A. Manlius the ſecond time, and M. Sergius the ſecond time. In theſe Tribuns time, whiles every mans care was bent to the Veientian war, the fort of Anxur being neglected, by occaſion that the garriſon ſouldiers were disbanded and N ranged much abroad, and commonly received Volſcian Merchants into the town, was ſuddenly ſurpriſed, by reaſon that the warders of the gates were betrayed. Leſs company of ſouldiers there were ſlain: becauſe that all of them (beſides thoſe that were ſick) found themſelves occupied and traded all the country over, and in the Cities adjoining, like to lawleſs lackies that follow the Camp. Neither was there better ſucceſs at Veii, wherein reſted the chief care now, of all their publick affairs. For not only the Roman Captains were more angred one at an other, than courageous againſt the enemy: but alſo the forces of the enemies were encreaſed by the ſudden comming of the Captains and the Falſcii. Which two nations of Hetruria, becauſe they inhabited next, ſuppoſing when Veii ſhould be forced and loſt, that their turn would be next to be warred upon by the Romans: and the Faliſcians beſides, upon a ſpecial grudge and old quarrel of O their own, for that aforetime in the Fidenat war, they had intermedled and intereſſed themſelves, ſent their Embaſſadors to and fro, and by binding themſelves by a ſolemn oath one to the other, came unlooked for with their power to Veii. And by chance they aſſailed that ſide and quarter where M. Sergius a Military Tribun had the charge of a ſconce. Who gave a great alarm and cauſed exceeding fright: becauſe the Romans ſuppoſed certainly that all Hetruria was raiſed out of every part, and there preſent, with all the power they could make. The ſame imagination animated the Veientians alſo within the City, to make a ſally. So was the Camp of

A the Romans aſſailed on both ſides. And whiles they ran together up and down, and turned their enſigns every way, and could hardly keep the Veientians within the ſtrength of their fortreſſe, nor yet repulſe the violence from their own fortifications and ramparts, and defend themſelves from their forraign enemies behind: their onely hope was to have help from the greater leaguer: that the legions in ſundry places might make head, ſome againſt the Capenats and the Faliſci, others againſt the ſally of the townſmen. But Virginius had the charge of that main camp, one that bare a privat grudge and inward malice againſt Sergius, and was hated again of him. This man, when word was brought that moſt of the Fabricks and bulwarks were aſſaulted, that the ramparts and trenches were won, and that the enemies on both ſides charged luſtily, kept his B ſouldiers well appointed in arms: ſaying, that if there were any need of help, his Colleague ſhould ſend unto him, if he would. And he for his part was not ſo arrogant and inſolent, but the other was as peeviſh and wilful. Who becauſe he would not ſeem to ſeek unto his adverſary, nor crave aid at his hand, choſe rather to be vanquiſhed of his enemy, than to overcome him by help of a fellow-Citizen. Thus between them for a good while the poor ſouldiers went to wrack, and were ſlain. At the laſt, forſaking their ramparts, a very few of them eſcaped into the maine camp. But the moſt part, with Sergius himſelf, went through to Rome. Where when he had laid all the fault upon his fellow in government, it was thought good that Virginius ſhould be ſent for out of the camp: and that in the mean while their Deputie, and Lieutenants ſhould command the forces. Hereupon was the matter debated in the Senat, and the two Tribuns kept a C taunting and reviling: and many hard tearms were dealt between them. Few there were that tendered the common good, but took part either with the one or the other, as each of them were fancied and beloved. Howbeit the LL. of the Senat thought good, howſoever that ſo ſhameful chance hapned either through the default, or unlucky fortune of the Captains, not to expect the ordinary full time of the election, but that preſently there ſhould be new Tribuns military created, to enter into their office on the * Calends of October. To which opinion when they were all agreed, the other Tribuns military nothing gainſaid it. But Sergius and Virginius (for whoſe ſake it appeared that the Senat was weary of the Magiſtrates that year) at the firſt made means & beſought them not to diſgrace and diſcredit them ſo: and afterward aſſayed to croſs the decree: denying that they would give over their place, before the * Ides of December, which was the ſet and uſual day D of entring yearly into new offices. Amid this buſineſs, the Tribuns of the Commons, who had kept ſilence even againſt their wills, ſo long as men were at unity and the affairs of the City proſpered, upon a ſudden brake out and threatned ſharply the two Tribuns Military, that unleſs they would ſubmit themſelves, and reſt in the authority of the Senat, they would commit them to ward. Then C. Servilius Hala, a Military Tribun, ſtood up and ſaid, "As for you and your threats, "O ye Tribuns of the Commons, in good faith, I would gladly ſee once, that there were no more "power and authority in theſe here, then will and ſtomack in you. But who ſeeth not that there "is no ſtriving againſt the authority of the Senat? And therefore hold ye content: and forbear "you to ſeek opportunity and occaſion upon our variance to offer wrong. And my brethren for "their parts ſhall either do that which the Senat thinketh good: or elſe if they ſhall continue E "ſtubborn ſtill in their contumacy, I will preſently nominate a Dictator, to force them to leave "their office. This ſpeech was approved with a general accord. And the Senators being glad that without the terrors and affrightments of the Tribuns authority, there was found out another greater power to bridle magiſtrates: the two military Tribuns aforeſaid, were overweighed with the conſent of all parties, and held a new election of military Tribuns, to begin their government on the * Calends of October: and before that day they reſigned up their places. Thus were L. Valerius Potitus the fourth time, M. Furius Camillus the ſecond time, M. Æmilius Mamercus the third time, Cn. Cornelius Coſſus the ſecond time, C. Fabius Ambuſtus, and L. Julius Tullus, Tribuns military in Conſuls authority.

* 1. day of October.

* The 13. day of December.

* 1. day of October.

In whoſe time many worthy Acts were performed both at home and abroad. For not onely F they had war in ſundry places at one time, namely, at Veii, at Capena, againſt Falerii, and with the Volſci, to the end that Anxur might be won again and recovered from the enemies: but at Rome alſo, what about muſters and paying the tribute for ſouldiers pay, there was much trouble. Beſides, there was ſome variance, about taking in certain Tribuns of the Commons to the reſt: and the two arraignments of thoſe, who a little before had governed in Conſuls authority, cauſed no ſmall ſtir. But the principal care of the Tribuns military, was that the muſter ſhould go forward. Neither were the younger ſort and ſerviceable men only preſt forth, but the elder alſo compelled to give their names, and to keep watch and ward in the City. But look how much greater was the number of ſouldiers, ſo much more money they needed for their payment. And the ſame was levied by a contribution: but unwillingly of as many as tarried at home. For that beſides the levy G they were enjoined to become ſouldiers alſo, in defence of the City and to ſerve in perſon for the Commonwealth. Theſe things, grievous as they were of themſelves, ſo by the ſeditious Orations of the Tribuns in their aſſemblies, they ſeemed more grievous and heavy. Who argued and diſcourſed thus, "That wages was appointed for ſouldiers to this end, only that what by warfare, "and what with exactions and impoſitions, they might undo the Commons, and make an end of "them at once for ever. One war (ſay they) hath now continued three years, and the ſame, on "ſet purpoſe, ill managed, that it might be drawn out the longer. Again, in one muſter there were "armies enrolled for no fewer than four wars, whereunto beardleſs boyes and old craſie men, were

" were taken up and haled forth. Now there was no difference of winter or ſummer: ſo as the H " poor Commons at no time can have any reſt. Who now at laſt are taxed alſo and racked to the " uttermoſt, ſo that after they have brought home with them their bodies overtoyled with travel, " weakned with wounds, and laſt of all, waſted and ſpent with age: and finding all things at " home unhusbanded by reaſon of the long abſence of the maſters and owners, they muſt be fain
" to pay tribute even out of their poor decayed quick ſtock, and repay again with great uſury to " the Common-wealth, their wages received in war, as it were upon intereſt.

Between the muſters of one ſide, and the levy of ſouldiers pay on the other ſide, and their minds occupied about greater affairs, at the election of Tribuns of Commons, the number could not fully be made up: Whereupon there was great labour made, that into the rooms that were void, I there ſhould be ſome of the Nobility taken in and admitted. When that could not be obtained, yet to impeach and overthrow * the Tribuns law, it was effected or brought to paſs that they ſhould aſſume unto them for Tribuns of the Commons, C. Lacerius, and Marcus Attilius, by the might and practiſe no doubt of the Patritii. It hapned, ſo that the ſame year C. Trebonius was a Tribun of the Commons, who would ſeem to undertake the patronage and defence of the Law Trebonia, and diſcharge it as a duty to that name and houſe belonging. He ſpake aloud and ſaid, " That " whereas the Tribuns Military had won that, whereof ſome of the Nobles had born the repulſe " in their firſt ſuit, and that the Law Trebonia was diſanulled, in that certain Tribuns of the Com- " monalty were taken into their fellows, not by ſuffrages and free voices of the people, but by the " rule and commandment of the Nobles: and that the matter was come to that paſs, that either K " Noble men, or their favourites and followers were to become Tribunes of the Commons: that " their ſacred laws were taken from them perforce, and the Tribuns authority wreſted from out " of their hands by violence: all theſe inconveniencies he complained to have hapned through " the fraudulent practiſe of the Nobles: and the miſchievous lewdneſs and treachery of his own " companions in office. Thus whiles there grew great heart-burning among them, and that not the Nobles only, but alſo the Tribuns of the Commons, as well they, which were elected, as they that were electors, were hardly thought of by the people: Then three of the Company, P. Curiatius, M. Metilius, and Minutius fearing ſome ſhrewd turn, like to fall upon Sergius and Virginius, (the Tribuns military of the former year) and by ſerving proceſs, giving them a day to anſwer, turned from themſelves the anger and diſpleaſure of the Commons, upon thoſe two perſons: L publiſhing openly, " That whoſoever were grieved for the muſters and the Tribute, whoſoe- " ver thought the war long, and the continual ſouldiery tedious, whoſoever ſorrowed for the " dammage and diſcomfiture received at Veii, whoſoever for the loſs of their Children, Bre- " thren, Kinſfolk, or any of their alliance had heavy and mournful houſes: to them they offered " liberty and power to vent their publick and privat grief, upon theſe two guilty perſons and of- " fenders, Sergius and Virginius, the very cauſes of all the miſchiefs and calamities that were hap- " ned. For why? the adverſary charged them with no more then was confeſſed by the very par- " ties: who finding themſelves both faulty, laid the blame one upon the other: whiles Virginius " reproached Sergius with running away, and Sergius laid treaſon to Virginius his charge, in that " he denied his help in time of need. For to ſay they were both of them ſo inconſiderate and M " fooliſh only, were to ſpeak beyond all compaſs of belief. But much more likely it was, that " there was ſome packing rather, and that the matter was contrived, and practiſed of ſet pur- " poſe, and by an ordinary and common fraudulent plot of the Patritii. By whoſe means both " at the firſt the Veientians gat opportunity to fire their works, thereby to draw out and pro- " long the war, and alſo now the army was bought and ſold, and the Roman camp betrayed to " the Faliſci. And all this to no other end, but that the youth and flower of the City might wax " old at Veii, and that the Tribuns might not propoſe and conſult with the people about the di- " ſtribution of lands, or any other commodities of the poor Commons, or in frequent and full " aſſembly of Citizens intend and follow their publick actions, and withſtand the conſpiracy of " the Gentry and Nobles. Moreover there is already (ſay they) a prejudice paſſed againſt theſe N F " offenders both by the Senat and people of Rome, and alſo by their Colleagues. For as they " were diſplaced and depoſed from their office, by an Act of the Senat: ſo when they refuſed to " give over, they were for fear of a Dictator forced by their own companions to reſign up their " government: and the people of Rome had created other Tribuns military to enter into their " charge, not upon the uſual day which was in the * Ides of December, but forthwith in the Ca- " lends of October: as who would ſay, the Common-wealth had not been able to ſtand any lon- " ger, if theſe men had remained ſtill in place. And yet for all this, theſe perſons thus convicted " and fore-condemned by ſo many prejudices, come now to be judged of the people: thinking " they are ſufficiently quit, and diſcharged, yea, and have ſuffered puniſhment enough, in that " they were two months ſooner then ordinary, made private perſons; and perceive not, that O G " thereby was taken from them the power only to do any harm, and no puniſhment inflicted up- " on them. For as much as even their very Colleagues, who had not offended, were likewiſe " diſcharged as well as they; Let the Quirites therefore and people of Rome, take that heart to " them again, which they had upon the late overthrow freſh and bleeding new, when they be- " held the army running in fearful flight, ſore wounded and agaſt, arriving at the gates, bla- " ming no fortune, nor any of the gods, but only theſe their two brave leaders. And as for us, " we know aſſuredly that there is not one of all them here preſently aſſembled, who that day cur-

The invective ſpeech of C. Trebonius againſt Sergius and Virginius.

* The 13. day of December.

A "sed not in his heart and deteſted the head, the houſe, and whole eſtate of L. Virginius, and M.
"Sergius. Neither is it convenient, that upon whom, erewhile every man prayed that the anger "and vengeance of God would light againſt them now when they both may and ought, they "ſhould not extend their full power with rigour. Since that even the very gods never lay hand "themſelves upon ſinners and offenders: but it ſufficeth that they arm the wronged and oppreſ-
"ſed perſons with means and opportunity of revenge. The Commons upon theſe ſpeeches mo"ved with indignation, condemned theſe two offenders in * 100000. brazen Aſſes a piece: not- * 26. lib. 5. ſo.
withſtanding that Sergius pleaded for himſelf, blamed the common fortune of war, and laid all ſol.
upon fortune: and Virginius beſought them (but both in vain) that he might not be more un-B happy, and ſpeed worſeat home, than abroad in war. Thus the peoples wrath being diverted upon theſe two, obſcured and darkned the remembrance both of the aſſumption and admitting of the Tribuns aforeſaid, and of deluding and diſanulling the Law Trebonia. The Tribuns thus having got the upper hand, to the end that the Commonalty might have a preſent reward for awarding this doom, publiſh the Law Agraria, and forbid the levying of the Subſidy for ſouldi-ers pay: ſeeing there was need of pay for ſo many armies: and ſped ſo well they had, in the managing of warfare, as they were like to come to an end, without any warring at all. For at Veii the pety camp which was loſt, being recovered again, was fortified with ſtrong bulwarks, and fur-niſhed with good guards. The Tribuns Military, M. Æmylius and Q. Fabius, had the charge there. And as for M. Furius in the Faliſcan, and Cn. Cornelius in the Capenat Country, they could C meet with none enemies without their town walls. But they drave away booties, and waſted their marches, by firing their villages and their corn: but as for their towns, they neither aſſaulted nor beneged them. But in the Volſcian country, after their territory was waſted, Anxur alſo was aſſaulted (but in vain) for that it was ſituate on high. Whereupon Valerius Potitus, who had the charge of that province, ſeeing that force would not prevail, began by trench and rampart to lay ſiege to it, and inveſt it round. The affairs of war abroad ſtanding in theſe tearms, there aroſe domeſtical ſtrife and ſedition at home: and the ſame was followed more earneſtly and with greater ado, than the wars were managed without. And when by reaſon of the Tribuns there could no ſubſidies and exactions be gathered, nor money for ſouldiers pay ſent to the Generals, and that the ſouldiers called on them hard, and were haſty for their wages: the camp alſo had like to have D been troubled and infected with the contagion of thoſe civil mutinies. During theſe heats and angry fits of the Commons againſt the Nobles, albeit the Tribuns of the people ſaid, That now the time was come of eſtabliſhing their freedom, and tranſlating the chiefeſt dignity from the Sergii and Virginii, to the Commoners, ſuch as were men of valour and action: Yet they prevailed no more then thus, that one only of the Commonalty, (as it were to make entrie and take poſſeſſion in the right of that dignity) to wit, P. Licinius Calvus, ſhould be created Tribun Military with Con- P. Licinius Cal- ſuls authority: the reſt were all of the Nobility, Pub. Manlius, and P. Titinius, P. Melius, L. Furius vus the firſt Medullinus, and L. Popilius Volſcus. The very Commons themſelves marvelled that they had ob- Commoner tained ſo great a thing, and not he only who was created, a man that aforetime had never been advanced to in place, and born no magiſtracy, yet an ancient Councellor of State, an elderly perſon, and well ſoveraign go- E ſtept in years. Neither as yet is it for certain known, why he firſt and above all others was coun- vernment. ted a meet man to have hanſel, or make eſſay of this new dignity and promotion. Some think, that for his brother Cn. Cornelius his ſake, who had been the year afore a Tribun Military, and had given to the horſemen triple pay, he was through favour drawn in, and called to ſo great honour. Others, for that himſelf had picked out a convenient time, and made a plauſible Oration, that both Nobles and Commons liked very wel, concerning the agreement and unity of the States.
The Tribuns of the Commons rejoicing highly for this their victory in the Election, remitted and called in the Inhibition of the ſubſidy or impoſition aforeſaid, the thing that moſt of all prejudiced the ſervice of the Common-wealth. By means whereof paiment was made in all dutiful obedience, and ſent it was unto the army. Then within ſhort time was Anxur (in the Volſcians F Conntry) recovered: by occaſion that on a feſtival holy day, the watch and ward of the City was neglected. This was a year notable and famous for the cold and ſnowy winter, ſo as the high ways were choaked up, and Tyberis was unnavigable; Howbeit, by reaſon of proviſion brought in aforehand, the price of corn aroſe not. And for becauſe P. Licinius, as he entred his government without any troubles, and with greater joy and contentment of the Commons than indignation of the Nobles; ſo alſo ruled and executed it all the year long accordingly: therefore their teeth watered at the next election alſo, to make Tribuns military of their own body. Only M. Veturi- us, of all the Nobility that ſtood in ſuit for the dignity, had a place among them. But as for the other Tribuns Military in Conſular authority, all the Centuries in a manner choſe Commoners, to wit, L. Titinius, P. Menenius Racilius, Cn. Genutius, and L. Attilius.

G After this hard Winter, either by reaſon of a diſtemperature and diſpoſition of the weather, ſuddenly changed to a contrary, or upon ſome other hidden and unknown cauſe there followed preſently a contagious and dangerous ſummer, by occaſion of a peſtilence, noiſom to all kind of living creatures. Of which incurable malady, when as neither the reaſon could be found, nor any end thereof ſeen, the Books of Sibylla, were by a decree of the Senat peruſed: and Duumvirs appointed for Divine Rites and Ceremonies, by celebrating a Lectiſtern (then firſt inſtituted in the City of Rome) to appeaſe and pacifie Apollo, Latona, and Diana, Hercules, Mercury and Nep- tune; feaſted them (as it were) for the ſpace of eight days together, & for that purpoſe they ſet out three three beds or banquetting tables, with as magnificent and ſtately furniture as could be for that time poſſibly deviſed. Which ſolemnity was privatly alſo performed. All the gates and doors through the City ſtood wide open: al ſorts of viands were ſet out abroad to be uſed in common: open houſe kept for all comers, one with another, as well unknown ſtrangers as their acquaintance, with all friendly welcom, and entertainment. Kindly, and courteouſly would they talk and deviſe, even with their adverſaries: all chiding and brauling was laid aſide and put under foot. The priſoners alſo for that time were enlarged, yea, and conſcience made afterwards, that any ſhould be laid or kept in irons, unto whom the gods had vouchſafed that gracious meed. H

But all this while much trouble there was, and many alarms before Veii, by reaſon that three wars were joyned now in one. For when as all at once the Capenats and the Faliſci came (in maner as afore, about the fortifications and trenches of the Romans) for to reſcue the beſieged, they were forced to make head, and hazzard a doubtful battel againſt three armies. But the beſt help they had, was the remembrance of the late condemning of Sergius and Virginius. Therefore having conducted by a neerer way, their forces from the greater camp (which before lay ſtil and would not come to ſuccour) they ſet upon the Capenats backs, as they turned againſt the rampart of the Romans. The battel there begun, made the Faliſci alſo afraid: in which affright of theirs they ſuddenly ſallied out of the leſſer hold, in ſo good time that they forced the enemies to turn their backs, all quaking for fear. And having got the upper hand, they followed the train of the victory, and in the chaſe made a very great ſlaughter and deſtruction of them. And not long after, the forragers that waſted the land of the Capenats, as they ranged abroad here and there, encountred the reſidue and remnant of this battel, as if fortune of purpoſe had preſented them to their hands, and ſwept them up clean. Alſo many of the Veientians as they fled back into the City, were cut in pieces before their very gates: whiles they within for fear leſt the Romans at once ſhould ruſh in, made the gates faſt and ſo ſhut out the hindmoſt of their own men. Theſe were the atchievances of this year. I K

And now approached the Election of the Tribuns military, whereof the nobles had in a manner a great care then of the war: as who ſaw now that the ſoveraign rule was not only parted with the Commonalty, but welneer on their own behalf quite loſt. Therefore albeit of ſet purpoſe they had prepared moſt noble and excellent men to ſtand in ſuit, whom to paſs by and let ſlip, they thought the people would have been aſhamed: yet nevertheleſs they themſelves (as if they had been the parties that ſtood) tried every way, and not only ſought the help of men, but alſo craved it at the hands of the gods: making it great ſcruple and a matter of conſcience: and alledging that the elections for two years paſt were not according to the wil of God: as appeared by this, ſay they, that in the former year there was an intollerable winter, and ſuch as portended ſome heavy judgements from above; how alſo the year following, there were no prodigious tokens ſhewed aforehand, but even the very events and effects thereof, were ſeen and felt: namely, the peſtilence both in Country and City, through the very indignation, no doubt, of the gods, for that in the fatal Books of Sibylla it was found out, that they ought to have been pacified, for the diverting away of that peſtilent influence. As if in thoſe ſolemn aſſemblies which ought in the name of the gods & religiouſlly to be held, the gods thought it an indignation and unſeemly thing, that the honorable offices of ſtate ſhould be made common: no diſtinction of degrees, no difference of horſes obſerved, but all confuſed and ſhuffled together. The people therefore being driven into amaze, not only in regard of the Majeſty and Dignity of thoſe that were competitors, but alſo of a very remorſe of conſcience, choſe for Tribuns military in Coſſ. authority, all of the Nobility: and a good part of them, the moſt honorable perſonages of the reſt, to wit, L. Valerius Potitus the firſt time, M. Valerius Maximus, M. Furius Camillus the third time, L. Furius Medullinus the third time, Quintius Servilius Fidenas the ſecond time, Quintus Sulpitius Camerinus the ſecond time. Howbeit in this year no great exploit worthy of record, was performed at Veii under theſe Tribuns. All the ſervice that was, conſiſted in forraging and waſting. The two Lord Generals raiſed huge booties, to wit, Potitus from Falerii, Camillus from Cæna: leaving behind them nothing whole and untouched that might be ſpoiled by fire or ſword. In this mean time, many fearful prodigious tokens were reported, the moſt part whereof were ſlenderly credited, for that of each there was but one only author: and becauſe there were no ſoothſayers, by whom they might make procuration therefore (ſince that the Tuſcans were now profeſſed enemies) they were altogether neglected. But one eſpecially there was, which all men had an eye and regard unto, namely, for that a certain pool within the Alban forreſt, without extraordinary rain from above, or any other occaſion which might make the thing ſeem leſs miraculous and wonderful, was riſen unto an unuſual height. Certain Orators therefore were ſent to the Oracle of Delphi, to know what the gods foreſignified by that prodigious token. But they, as god would, met with an interpreter of the Deſtinies neerer home, to wit, an ancient Veientian. Who (upon a time, when as the ſouldiers, both of the Romans and Tuſcans, let fly one at the other taunts and ſcoffs from their ſtations and guards) thus ſpake in prophetical wiſe: That until the water were drained and let out of the Alban poole, the Romans ſhould never be maſters of the town of Veii. Which ſaying of his was at the firſt contemned as a fooliſh word raſhly let fall from him: but after, it began to be much talked of, ſo long, until a certain Roman ſouldier, from out of his ward, enquired of a townsman that warded next unto him (for now by reaſon of long war they had entercourſe of ſpeech one with another) what he was who had caſt out ſuch an ambiguous riddle of the Alban Lake? L M N

The Alban lake riſen to a wonderful height. O

A When he heard that he was a ſouthſaier, being himſelf alſo a man not without ſome ſenſe of religion, he trained that wiſard forth to communication, pretending that he would gladly be reſolved himſelf, as touching a particular prodigious object that troubled his mind: & therefore requeſted him at his good leiſure, to take ſo much pain as to confer with him, and give him counſell about the expiation and diverting the danger thereof. Now when they were both gone a good way from their fellows, unarmed, and without all fear and ſuſpition one of the other, the Roman being a luſty tall young man, caught the feeble old fellow in the ſight of them all, and notwithſtanding a great ſtir that the Tuſcans made (but all in vain) had him away perforce to his own company; Who being brought before the General, was ſent afterwards to Rome unto the Senat And being de-B manded what the meaning of that ſhould be, which he had prognoſticated and preſaged concerning the Alban lake, anſwered thus: "Certainly the gods were offended with the people of Veii that day on which they put this into his mind to bewray the fatall and inevitable deſtruction of "their State and country: and therefore that, which as then he being ſtirred by divine inſpiration "had propheſied, neither might he call back again and unſpeak: and beſides, happily by conceal- "ing thoſe things, which the immortall gods would have to be publiſhed, there might be commit- "ted as great ſin, as by diſcloſing myſteries to be concealed. Thus therefore (quoth he) is it writ- "ten in the fatall books of fortunes, and thus in the Tuſcans learning, to us is delivered, That when the Alban water overflowed, if then the Romans with due and religious ceremonies let it out, they ſhould have the victory of the Veientians: but before that, the gods would not forſake the wals of the C Veientians. Then went he on ſtill, and ſhewed what was the ſolemn and right maner of deriving the water. But the Nobles ſuppoſing authour to be the light of credit, and not of ſufficient account in ſo weighty a matter to beleeved, reſolved to expect the Embaſſadors, and the anſwer of the Oracle of Apollo. But before theſe meſſengers were returned from Delphi, or any expiation found out for this Alban miracle, the new Tribuns Military with Conſuls authority, L. Julius Tullus, L. Furius Medullinus the fourth time, L. Sergius Fidenas, A. Poſthumius Regillenſis, P. Cornelius Maluginenſis, A. Manlius, began their government.

The propheſie the Deſtruction of Veii.

In that year there aroſe new enemies, the Tarquinians; they ſeeing the Romans buſied with many wars at once, with the Volſcians at Anxur, who laid ſiege to the fort there: with the Æquians at Lavicos, who aſſaulted the colony of the Romans: beſides, with the Veientians the Fa-D liſcians and Capenats: and that within the City there was no greater quietneſs, by reaſon of variance between the Nobility and Commons: ſuppoſing, I ſay, that hereby they had good opportunity to do ſome injury and harm, they ſend forth certain bands of ſouldiers lightly appointed, into the territory of Rome, to forrage and make ſpoil: thinking that the Romans would either put up that wrong at their hands without revenge, becauſe they would not charge themſelves with a new war: or encounter them and make head with a ſmall power and the ſame but ſlender and diſfurniſhed. The Romans was more offended at the indignity of theſe bravadoes, then they cared much for the ſpoil done by the Tarquinians. And thereupon they neither made much ado about the matter, nor drove it out any long while. A. Poſthumius and Ln. Julius levied a power without any ordinary muſter (for letted they were by the Tribunes of the Commons) even in a man-E ner of voluntary ſouldiers, whom they had procured with good words and comfortable ſpeeches. And paſſing throughout the country of the Carits by croſs & crooked waies, ſurpried the Tarquinians upon the ſudden, as they returned from plundering, & laden with great prizes. Many they ſlew, all they eaſed of their loading: and thus having recovered the ſpoils of their lands, they returned to Rome. Two daies were allowed for the owners, every own to own his proper goods: & on the third day, ſuch goods that were unknown (whereof the moſt part belonged to the enemies) were ſold in port-ſale: and that mony which was made thereof was divided among the ſouldiers. All other wars, and eſpecially the Veientian, had doubtfull iſſue. For now the Romans deſpairing of all mans help, regarded and expected only the courſe of deſtinies and the will of the gods. By which time the Embaſſadours were retuned from Delphi, bringing the anſwer of the Oracle, agreeable F to the former anſwer made by the wiſard, with was taken priſoner: and it ran in this forme: Beware O Romans that the Alban water be not kept too long in the pool. Bewar thou let it not diſcharge it ſelf into the ſea. Let it forth and wtear the fields therewith, by ſundry rivulets or ſtreams thou ſhalt waſt it and draw it dry. Then aſſault valiantly the enemies wals, remembering that out of that City which ſo many years thou haſt beſieged, victory is promiſed to thee aſſuredly, by thoſe deſtinies which now are revealed. And after the war ended and conqueſt atchieved, ſee thou bring unto my temple, an ample and honourable preſent: and perform the ſacred ceremonies of thy country according to the old cuſtome, and renew thoſe a freſh Which have of late time been neglected. Here grew this captaine prophet above ſaid to be greatly accounted of: and the Tribunes military, Cornelius and Poſthumius, began to take his counſel and G advice, about the procuration of the Alban miracle, and to appeaſe the gods in due order. And found it was at laſt where it was that the gods blamed the neglect of ceremonies & for letting the ancient ſolemnities and ſacrifices: and that certainly it was nothing elſe, but that there was an errour committed in creation of the Magiſtrats: and they ſo created, had ſolemniſed the Latine holidaies wrong and celebrated the ſacrifices in the Alban mount amiſſe. The only purging or expiation wherof was, that the Tribunes military ſhould give over their office, and that they ſhould take new Auſpices againby the flight & ſinging of birds, and ſo to proceed to an Intetreign. All which things were according to a decree of the Senat performed. Whereupon there interregens gents ſucceeded one after another. M. Valerius, Q. Servilius Fidenas, M. Furius Camillus. But all this while no end there was, nor intermiſſion of troubles and diſſentions. For the Tribunes of the Commons diſturbed and ſtaid the aſſembly for the election ſo long, untill it was agreed that the greater par of the Tribunes military ſhould be created from the Commons. H

During theſe affaires, the Tuſcans held certain Diets and Councels at the Temple of Voltumna: where when the Capenats and Faliſci required that with one common aſſent and reſolution, all the people of Hetruria ſhould raiſe the ſiege from Veii, this anſwer was returned: "That here- "tofore they had denied the Veientians their help in this regard, that they were not to ſeek for "aid at their hands, from whom in ſo weighty a matter they had not ſought for counſell: but now "their own fortune made anſwer for them. For ſuch was the difficulty of their preſent eſtate, I "That if they would, yet they well could not: conſidering eſpecially how into that part of He- "truria there were newly arived to ſeat themſelves there, the Gauls, a ſtrange nation unto them: "with whom they neither had aſſured peace, nor yet certain war to truſt unto. Howbeit for bloud- "ſake, and for the very name, and in regard of the preſent perils of their kinſmen, they would "grant thus much: that if any of their youth would go forth to the war willingly and of them- "ſelves, they would be no hindrance. Now was it noiſed at Rome, that a mighty great number "of theſe enemies were come to raiſe the ſiege. Whereby the civill diſcords of (as it is commonly ſeen upon a generall fear) began to wax more calm and to ſlake. For the principall Tribe that had the prerogative to give their firſt voice, choſe P. Licinius Calvus Tribune Military, without his own ſuit (but not againſt the will of the Nobles) a man of approved good carriage, and moderati- K on in his former government, but exceeding old. And it appeared evidently, that all the reſt for that year, ſhould be choſen anew after him, out of the Colledge of thoſe that had been Tribunes Conſular beforetimes: namely, L. Titinius, P. Menenius, Cn. Genutius, L. Attilius: who before they were elected and pronounced, P. Licinius Calvus ſpake in this manner (by the permiſſion of the Interregent) unto the other Tribes, that were called in their right and orderly courſe, to their ſuffrages. "I ſee well, my maſters O ye Citizens of Rome, That in this election, wherin ye have in remembrance our former Magiſtracy, ye gueſſe and preſage happily againſt the year enſuing, "concord and unity: the only thing at this time of all others moſt profitable: in caſe I ſay, you "chuſe again, thoſe who by experience alſo are become now more ſufficient. But as for me, you "ſee I am not the ſame man I was: but a bare ſhadow and name only is all that is left of P. Lici- L "nius. The ſtrength of my body craſie, and feeble, the ſenſe of my eies and ears dim and dull: "my memory faileth, the quickneſſe of my ſpirit grown heavy and lumpiſh. But behold (quoth "he, laying hand on his ſon) this young man, the very image and portraiture of him, whom ye "afore time made Tribune Military, the firſt that ever was out of the commonalty. Him trained and "brought up after my own order and diſcipline, in ſtead of my ſelf, I bequeath, I give, I dedicate "unto the commonweal. And I beſeech you O Quirites, that the dignity which of your ſelves you "have offered unto me, without my ſeeking, you would beſtow upon him at his own humble ſuit, "and the rather ſhew him this favour at my earneſt requeſt in his behalf. The father had his deſire granted. And ſo his ſon P. Licinius, was with them, whom before we named, declared Tribune Military in Conſuls authority. Titinius and Genutius Tribunes Military, made an expedition M againſt the Faliſci and Capenats; Who managing the war in greater heat and courage, than with ſage adviſe and counſel, plunged themſelves headlong into an ambuſhment of their enemies. Genutius paid for his raſhneſſe, and made amends by an honorable death; For he was ſlain even before the enſignes, valiantly fighting in the vanguard of the battell with the formoſt. But Titinius, having after much fear rallied his ſouldiers, retired himſelf unto an high hill, and made head again. Howbeit he durſt not encounter the enemy on even and plain ground. The ſhame of this defeat was greater than the loſſe otherwiſe. And yet it had like to have turned into a right great damage and overthrow. So great was the fear, not at Rome only, whither much news came diverſly reported: but alſo in the camp before Veii, that hardly could the ſouldiers be kept from running away. For it was noiſed all over the camp, that the Capenats and Faliſcians had got the vi- N ctory, ſlain the Generals and the whole army: and that all the flour and ſtrength of Tuſcany was not far off. But at Rome there was much more hurli-bury: For there it was verily beleeved, that the leaguer about Veii was aſſaulted, and that, part of the enemies already were coming in warlike maner againſt the City: ſo as they came running on heaps to man the wals. And even the very matrons and dames of the City, whom publike fear had cauſed to leave their houſes, fell to their beads and ſupplication in the churches: beſeeching the gods to avert and divert deſtruction from the houſes, Temples, and wals of the City of Rome, and to turn away that fear from them upon Veii: if they renued aright their feſtivall daies, if they made ſatisfaction by ſacrifice for the prodigious ſights, and no otherwiſe.

The Oration of Licinius Calvus to the people.

Now by this time were the ſolemn plaies & the Latine holidaies renewed, now was the water O let out of the Alban lake into the fields, now Veii drew neer to her final end, haſtned by the courſe of the Deſtinies. Therefore there was created M. Furius Camillus Dictator, the fatall captain, predeſtined to deſtroy that City, and to ſave his own country: who appointed P. Cornelius Scipio Colonell of the horſmen. The change of the General made a change ſoon of all things elſe. The hopes of men were other than afore, the minds of men were altered, yea, the fortune of the City ſeemed not the ſame. But firſt of all, he proceeded by martiall law againſt them, who in that fearfull fright

A fright at the laſt al'arm, were fled from Veii: and taught his ſouldiers not to fear their enemies moſt, but likewiſe to ſtand in awe of their own Commander. And after he had publiſhed to take muſters upon a certain day, himſelf in the mean while rode poſt to Veii, there to encourage the hearts of the ſouldiers. From thence he returned to Rome, for to levy a new army: and there was not one that refuſed to ſerve under his ſtandard. For even the youth of the forrainers both Latins and Hernicks, came & offered their ſervice in that war. Unto whom, when as the Dictator had in the Senat houſe yeelded thanks, and that all things now were in ſufficient readineſs, by a decree of the Senat he made a vow, that when he had won Veii, he would incontinently celebrat the great games, and reedifie and conſecrat anew, the Temple to dame Matuta, which afore time had been
B dedicated by King Servius Tullius. Thus when he was gone forth from the City, and his army on foot, with greater expectation of the people then hope: firſt he fought a field with the Faliſcians and Capenats in the Country of Nepet, [called at this day Nepe] where he ordered all the exploits with as great diſcretion and policy as might be: and as it commonly falleth out he ſped as well and fortune favoured his deſignes. He not only defeated his enemies in battell, but alſo drave them out of the field, and gained a huge booty, whereof the greateſt part came to the Treaſurer his coffers; and ſomewhat (though not much) was given to the ſouldiers. From thence he marched with his armour to Veii, and there he cauſed more ſconces and baſtillons to be made, and to ſtand thicker together. And having made proclamation, that none ſhould fight without ſpeciall commandment, he withdrew the ſouldiers to the making of trenches and rampiers, from their skir-
C miſhes that they made oftentimes, and that raſhly, between their camp and the wall of the town. The greateſt work of all the reſt and moſt laborious, was the undermining that was begun into the Caſtle of the enemies. And to the end that this work ſhould not be intermitted, nor yet the continuall labour ſtill under the ground might over-toil them: he divided the pioners into ſix parts, and each of them wrought ſix hours round by turns, ſo that both night and day, they never gave over before they had wrought a way to the Caſtle. The Dictator ſeeing now the victory as it were in his hands, and a moſt rich City ready to be taken, and that there was like to be ſuch ſaccage, as never had been the like in all the wars put together aforetime: leſt that he might incur either any mutiny and anger of the ſouldiers in pinching and ſcant parting of the pillage, or diſpleaſure and diſcontentment of the Rulers and Nobles of Rome, by ſo prodigall a largeſſe in ſharing all: diſ-
D patched his letters to the Senat, to this effect, "That wheras by the goodneſſe of the immortall "Gods, his own policy and direction, and the travell of his ſouldiers, the City Veii was now in "a maner at his devotion; what they would advite, ſhould be done with the rich ſpoils thereof. "There were two divers opinions that mightily diſtracted the Senat: the one of the old P. Licinius, whoſe mind being asked of his ſon, ſpake firſt (by report) and ſaid: that his opinion was, there ſhould a proclamation be publiſhed abroad among the people, that whoſoever would be partaker of the booty, ſhould go to the Leaguer before Veii. The other of Ap Claudius, who finding fault with this new, prodigall, unequall, and undiſcreet largeſſe, in that they thought it unlawful and unfit, that the treaſure got of the enemies ſhould come once at leaſtwiſe to the common purſe of the City, which had been emptied ſo often by reaſon of wars: was of advice, "That the ſoul-
E "diers ſhould have their pay out of it, that the Commons thereby might be eaſed, in the "charges of the ſubſidy levied of them: for ſo ſhould every mans houſe equally feel the ſo- "ciety and part of that benefit, and the hands of idle perſons remaining at home in the town gree- "dy now of rifling, and who would be fingering of Pillage, ſhould not pluck from the hardy "warriors their due rewards. For as much as it is uſually ſeen, that as the valianteſt man "commonly aimeth at the greateſt part of travell and perill, ſo the more coward alwaies reach- "eth at the biggeſt portion of the ſpoil, and hath his hand deepeſt therein. Contrariwiſe, Li- "cinius, alledged that ſuch mony laid up would be alwaies ſuſpected and odious, and would mi- "niſter matter unto the Commons of criminations & finding one fault or other, whereof ſeditions "and commotions may ariſe, and would give occaſions of new laws to be preferred: and there-F "fore better it were: that by this gift and boon the hearts of the Commons were won and recon- "ciled: who being ſpent and eaten out by reaſon of their charges of ſo many years, herewith "might be well relieved. And that they ought to taſt the fruit and ſweetneſſe of the booty out "of that war, in which they had ſpent their years, and were waxen old men. And that it "would be more welcome and acceptable, that every man ſhould be his own carver, and with "his own hand catch from the enemie what he could, and bring it home with him, than if they "ſhould receive much more by a great deal at the diſcretion and pleaſure of another. And the "Dictator himſelfe (ſaith he) hath avoided as neer as he could, the diſpleaſure, hatred, and offence "that might ariſe thereof, and therefore poſted it off to the Senat: the Senat ought likewiſe "ſeeing the matter is put to them, to let the Commons alone therewith, and permit every man to G "have ſuch ſhare as the fortune of war will allot him. This advite which made the Senat grati- "ous with the people, was thought to be the ſafer and better of the twain. Whereupon procla- "mation was made, That whoſoever would have part of the ſpoil of Veii, ſhould ſhew himſelfe "before the Dictator in the camp. So there went a huge multitude, that they filled the camp againe. Then the Dictator after ſacrifice done, and advice taken of the lucky ſignes of birds, went forth and commanding his ſouldiers to take armes and weapons in hand, ſpake theſe words "and ſaid: "By thy conduct and the inſtinct of thy divine power O Pythius Apollo, I let for- "ward to the winning of the town of Veii, & now to thee I vow the tenth part of the ſpoils there-

Difference in the Senat about the pillage of Veii.

"And thee withall (ô Queen Juno) who at this hour doſt inhabit within the compaſſe of theſe H
"wals, I beſeech, that thou wouldſt vouchſafe, to follow us after conqueſt into this city, ours
"now, and thine within awhile: whereas thou maieſt be ſhrined in a Temple meet for thee, and "the grandeur of thy majeſty. Having made theſe praiers, with an exceeding multitude he inveſt-ed the city, and aſſaulted it round on all parts: to the end that they within might have leſſe perce-vance of the peril intended towards them from the undermining. The Veientians little knowing that they were betrayed, partly by their own prophets, and partly by the Oracles abroad, and that ſome of their gods were invited and bidden to part of the ſpoil and ſaccage, and other by vowes and praiers trained and called out of their own city; began to look after the temples of their enemies & their new habitations: little weening that this was their laſt day, & fearing nothing leſs than that I their wals ſhould by undermining be overthrown, and that their Caſtle was full already of enemies:
every man for himſelf ran armed to the wals, marvailing what the matter ſhould be, that whereas for ſo many daies ſpace no man ſtirred out of the Romans Leaguer, then of a ſudden (as if it were in a wood rage) they ran upon head ſo raſhly to the aſſault. But hereto belongeth a tale; That when the Veientian King was at ſacrifice, this voice of the Southſaier was overheard out of the mine under ground, That he whoſe hap was to cut forth the Inwards of that ſacrifice ſhould obtain victory, and moved the Roman ſouldiers, to break out of the undermning, and to catch up the entrails and bowels, and carry them to the Dictator. But as in things of ſo great antiquity, it ſufficeth me, that thoſe which carry ſome likelyhood of truth, be received for true: ſo for fabulous matters fitter indeed to make a ſhew in a ſtage play (where people take delight in ſuch miracles) K then to be ſadly beleeved, it will not quit for the pains either to avouch them, or diſavow them.
The mine or cave at the ſame time (no doubt) full of choſen ſouldiers, yeelded forth all at once armed men into the Church of Juno, which was in the caſtle of Veii, and ſome of them ſet upon the backs of their enemies that were on the wals: others pluck up the portcullis of the gates: ſome of them, whiles from the houſes the women and ſervants flung down ſtones and tiles, caſt fire abroad. So that every place was full of cries and voices, partly of them that fright-ed others, and partly of thoſe that were affrighted, with a confuſed ſcreecking of women and children. When as now in a moment, the armed ſouldiers were thrown down from the wals every where, and the gates ſet open: whiles ſome entred marching in aray, others ſcaled the naked The City of Veij won by Camillus wals, the city was filled with enemies: and skrmiſhes there were in every place. After great maſ- L ſacre and execution committed, the fight began to quail: and the Dictator commanded the Bedles to proclame and give commandment, to ſpare the unarmed. Thus the bloudſhed ended. Whereupon the unarmed people began to yeeld: and by permiſſion of the Dictator the ſouldiers ran to the ſpoil. Which being brought in ſight of the Dictator, of greater price and value a good deal, than either was hoped or looked for: it is ſaid that he ſtretched forth his hands towards heaven and praied, "That if his own fortune and the felicity of the people of Rome were thought by any
"god or man to be exceſſive, the envy belonging thereto might be mitigated with as ſmall
"privat loſſe of his own in particular, and with as little common calamity of the people of "Rome in generall, as might poſſibly be. And it is recorded, that in this maner praying and worſhipping, as he turned himſelf about, he ſlipt forward and caught a fall. And as men afterwards M gueſſed by that which fell out, it was ſuppoſed that the ominous token preſaged the condemnation of Camillus himſelf, and the ruin of the city of Rome, which hapned within a few years after to be forced and ſacked. Thus was that day ſpent in the ſlaughter of enemies, and in rifling of that moſt wealthy city. The morrow after, the Dictator ſold in portſale the bodies of as many as were freeborn. That mony only came into the common treaſury not without ſome anger and repining of the Commons. And as for that booty and ſpoil which they brought with them away, they counted themſelves beholden therefore, neither to the Generall himſelf (who to colour and excuſe his own nigardiſe had referred the matter to the Senat: wherein he might have uſed his own liberty and diſcretion) nor to the Senat: but unto the houſe of the Licinii, whereof, the ſon propounded the matter before the Senat, and the father was the author of ſo popular an over- N ture.

When as now worldly and earthly riches, were carried forth and tumbled out of Veii by heaps, then began they to remove and have away the ſacred gifts and oblations of the gods with the gods themſelves, but after the maner of devout worſhippers, rather than of greedy ſpoilers. For choſen there were out of the whole army, certain youths in the flower of their age, who having their bodies clean waſhed, and being arraied in robes, had in charge to carry Queen Juno to Rome, and entred into the Church with great adoration and reverence: and at the firſt very charily and religiouſly laid hand upon her, for that (after the Tuſcan maner) there uſed none to handle that Image but the Prieſt of one certain tribe. After this, when as one of them, whether it were upon a certain divine inſpiration, or in ſome youthfull ſport, caſt out theſe words, Wilt thou march to Rome dame Iuno? The reſt with one voice cried aloud, That ſhe gave a nod, and ſeemed thereto to give aſ- O ſent: whereupon this alſo was added to the tale, that ſhe was heard to ſay, I will. But for certain it is reported, that ſhe was ſtirred out of her footſtall, with the help of a ſmall lever, and that as ſhe willingly was diſplaced, ſo ſhe was eaſily removed & tranſlated, and ſo ſafe and ſound conveied into the mountain Aventine, there to abide and remain for ever; which was the place aſſigned unto her by the vows of the Roman Dictator. And there Camillus according to his vow, dedicated to her afterwards a temple. This was the finall end and fall of Veii, the richeſt City of all the Tuſcans,

A Which even in the laſt and utmoſt calamity ſhewed her mightineſs, and having been beſieged round about continually the ſpace of ten ſummers and winters, & in that time done much more annoiance and hurt then it receiued, was now at laſt through the neceſſity of fatall deſtiny, gained rather by long ſiege and ſecret undermining, then won by forcible aſſault and violence.

When tiding came to Rome of the winning of Veij, albeit both the prodigious ſights that were ſeen, had been expiat by ſacrifice, and that the anſwers of the Prophets and wiſemen, yea, and the Oracles of Apollo were well known: and that ſo far forth as mens counſel and policy might help, they had choſen for Generall M. Furius, the moſt noble captain and warrior of all other: yet conſidering they had there warred ſo many years with variable fortune, and receiued many loſſes and B overthrows, their joy was exceeding great, as if a thing had hapned unlooked for. And before that the Senat could make a decree, all the churches were full of the dames of Rome giving thanks to their gods. And the Senat ordained by an act, that ſuplications ſhould continue for four daies, the like as never had been before time in any war. The Dictator alſo was met upon the way as he came home by all degrees and eſtates in great number, and was more welcomed and honoured then any man afore time, to that day. And the triumph far exceded the uſuall maner of the ſolemnity to that day belonging. But moſt of all was he himſelf all goodly to be ſeen, entring into the city in a chariot drawn with white ſteeds. And that was thought an honour, not only unmeet for the quality of a citizen, but hardly beſeeming the condition of any man whatſoever. For they made it a matter of conſcience, that their Dictator ſhould be equall with Jupiter, and the ſun, in reſpect of their horſes: for which only cauſe eſpecially, the triumph was more glorious than gra-
C cious, and taken in good part. Then aſſigned he & ſet out to Queen Juno a church in Auentine hill, and dedicated another to dame Matuta, and ſo having atchieved and performed thoſe divine and humane deeds, he reſigned up his Dictatorſhip.

The temple of Queen Juno. The temple of Matuta.

After this began ſome ſpeech about the Preſent to Apollo. Unto whom, when as Camillus ſaid that he had vowed the tenth part of the ſpoil: and the Prieſts and Prelats thought good that the people ſhould diſcharge their conſcience in that behalf: there could no ready mean be found how to command them to give back again the ſpoil, that the due portion thereout might be ſet apart for the holy oblation. At the length they grew to this point, which was thought the eaſieſt courſe of all, that whoſoever would acquit himſelf and his houſe in conſcience, ſhould, after he had made an eſtimat to himſelf of his own ſhare in the ſpoil, bring the value & price of the tenth part into the D common Cheſt: that thereof might be made a golden oblation, meet for the ſtate of that Temple, beſeeming the power of that god, and anſwerable to that dignity of the people of Rome. Yet even this contribution alienated the hearts of the people from Camillus.

A mid theſe affairs there came Embaſſadours from the Volſcians and Æquians, to treat for peace, and peace obtained they, rather becauſe the city, wearied with continuall wars, might now take reſt and be at quiet, than for any deſerts of them that ſued for it. After Veij was taken, the yeat following had ſix Tribunes Military in Conſuls authority, two P. Cornelij, namely, Coſſus and Scipio, M. Valerius Maximus the ſecond time, C. Fabius Ambuſtus the ſecond time, L. Furius Medullinus the ſecond time, and Q. Servilius the third time. Unto the Cornelij fell out by lot the Faliſcan war, to Valerius and Servilius the Capenats. Who neither aſſaulted their cities by force, nor E wearied them with ſiege: but forraged the countries, and drave booties away of ſuch things as were in the fields, not a tree that beareth fruit, not any fruitful things beſides, eſcaped their hands. This diſtreſſe and calamity ſubdued the Capenats: who thereupon ſued for peace, and had it granted. But amongſt the Faliſcians the war continued ſtill. In the mean time, at Rome there were ſundry ſeditions. For the appeaſing whereof, it was thought good to ſend a Colony to Volſci, and thither three thouſand citizens were appointed in checkroll. And Triumvirs were thereto choſen, who divided to every man three acres of ground and a half, and one twelfth part. That began to be deſpiſed, becauſe they thought it but a poor comfort offered to ſtop their mouths withall, and to put them beſide a greater hope. For why ſhould the Commons be ſent away into the Volſcians land, ſeeing there was Veij within their eye-ſight, a moſt fair city, and the land about more plen-
F tifull and large than that of Rome? And as for the city it ſelf, they preferred it, either for the ſite, or ſtate of privat or publick buildings and other places, before the city of Rome. Moreover a motion alſo was made (which, after that Rome was won by the French, was more hotly followed) concerning a General tranſmigration and removing to Veij for ever. Marry, they intended that Veij ſhould be inhabited, partly by the Commons, and partly by the Nobility: ſaying, That the people of Rome might well enough inhabit two cities joyntly in one ſtate of Commonweath.
"Againſt all this, the LL. of the Senat laboured what they might, and plainely ſaid, they "would ſooner dye in the ſight of the people of Rome, than any of thoſe matters ſhould paſſe.
For why? if there were now in one city ſo much diſſention, what would there be in twain? Would G "any man be ſo mad, as to prefer a conquered city, before his own country that had conquered
"the ſame? and ſuffered Veij after it is won to be in better eſtate then it was afore, even when "it was at the beſt? Finally, well might they be forſaken at home in their own country by their citi"zens, but to forſake their country and citizens, they would never be brought by any force what"ſoever. They would not follow to Veij, T. Siccinius as their founder, (for he amongſt the Tribuns "of the Commons perſwaded this Act) and leave their god Romulus the ſon of a god, the firſt ſtockfather and beginner of the city of Rome. Whiles theſe matters were in handling with foule ſtir and much debate and variance (for the nobles had won to their opinion ſome of the Tri-Tribunes) there was nothing else that staied the Commons hands from outrage, but this, that H when there was an outcry made to begin the quarell, and to set them together by the ears, the chiefe and principal Senatours first came forth to the multitude, and offered themselves to be laid at, smitten and slain. In regard of whose age, dignity, and honour, they forbearing to do violence, were likewise for shame staied in their mood, for any the like attempts besides. Camillus taking vantage hereof, ever and anon in all places, made speeches unto the people, and said: "That it "was no marvell truly, that the city was in a rage and madnes, which being charged with a vow,

"made more care of all things else, then to discharge their conscience thereof, and see it perform"ed. As for the collation and gathering of a small donative, rather then a tithe, he said nothing of "it: seeing that every man privatly bound himself thereto, and the body of the people stood fre- I
"ed therefrom. But one thing there was that his conscience would not suffer him to hold his peace,
"that out of that booty only which was of moveable things, the tenth was appointed to be levi"ed: as for the city and ground that was won, which also was compriſed within the vow
"there were no words at all made. When as the debating of this matter, which to the Senat seemed doubtfull and hard, was put over to the Priests and Prelats: their colledge calling to them Camillus, thought good, that whatsoever the Veientians had before the vow made, and whatsoever after the vow, came into the hands of the people of Rome, the tenth part thereof should be consecrated to Apollo. So both the city and the lands were valued: and mony taken forth of the city chamber. And the Tribunes military Consular enjoyned therewith to buy gold. Whereof there being not store enough, the dames of the city, having their assemblies and meetings by themselves K for to consult therabout, by a common decree made promise to the Tribunes military, and brought into the exchequer their own gold, and all the ornaments and jewels they had. This was as acceptable a thing, and as well taken of the Senat, as ever any had been: and for this liberality (men say) they had this honour granted unto them, as to ride to church and to plaies in hanging or ship-coaches, and as well on working daies as holidaies, to be at their wagons. When the gold was of every one received by weight and prised to the worth, that they might again be paid mony therfore: it was agreed that a standing cup of gold should be made therof, and presented as an oblation to Apollo at Delphi. So soon as they had eased and disburdned their minds of this religious vow, the Tribunes of the Commons began sedition anew. So as the multitude was incited and stirred up against all the peers, but above all other against Camillus; charging him, that what by con- L fiscating and consecrating the booty of the Veientians, he had brought it to just nothing. Those nobles that were absent they blamed and they cried out against mightily, but of such that were present in place, and offered themselves unto them in their anger, they had some reverence. Now so soon as they saw the matter in question to be deferred and continued past that year, they chose again for the year following, those Tribunes of the Commons, which were the authors of that act and law. The Nobles likewise endeavoured the same for those that should oppose themselves against the law. So the Tribunes of the Commons (a good part of them) were chosen the very same again.
But at the Election of the Tribunes Military, the Patritij after very much ado got at length, that Furius Camillus was created. They made semblance and pretended, that they would be provided of a Generall for war, but indeed their purpose was to be furnished of an adversary to withstand M the acts and proceedings of the Tribunes. Together with Camillus were made Tribunes Military in Consuls authority, L. Furius Medullinus the sixt time, C. Æmylius, L. Valerius Publicola, *Sp.
Posthumius*, P. Cornelius the second time.

In the beginning of the year, the Tribunes of the Commons stirred not untill M. Furius Camillus was gone against the Falisci, as his charge required for that war. And by delaies afterwards the matter was well cooled. As for Camillus, whom of all other they most feared to be their adversary, he waxed great and glorious, by his service against the Falisci. For when as at the first, the enemies kept themselves within the wals, thinking it the safest way: he by wasting their country, and setting fire upon their villages, forced them to come forth of their town, howbeit they feared to be too bold, and to go far forward: and encamped themselves a mile and lesse from the town; N reposing their safety and security in nothing else, but in the dangerous and hard passage, the waies all about being rough, ragged, and stony, in some places straight and narrow, in other up hill and steep. Camillus having tak en a prisoner out of the fields, and being guided by his direction, late in the night dislodged his camp, and betimes in the morning at break of the day, shewed himself upon the higher rounds a good deal. The Romans on three sides, fell to fortifie by trenching and casting rampiers, whiles the rest of the army stood ready ranged for the batrell. And whereas the enemies assaied to hinder the work, he discomfited them and put them to flight, whereupon the Falisci were so frighted, that as they fled amain in disaray, they passed beyond their own camp, which was neerer; and made as fast as they could to the town. Many were slain and many wounded, before that in this affright they could hit upon the gates. Their camp being taken, O the booty thereof came into the Questors coffers, with the great gruding and anger of the souldiers. Howbeit yeelding to the severity of discipline and good government: the same virtue which they had hated before, they now honoured and held in admiration. After this was the city besieged, and sconces and platforms raised about it. Otherwhiles also, as occasion was offered, the townsmen would sally forth and assaile the Romans camp, and make light skirmishes. Thus the time passed without any great good hope of either side: for that they within the town besieged, had of their former provision more store of corn & other necessaries than they

that

A that lay at ſiege without. And it ſeemeth they would have had as long a peece of worke there, as they had at Veij, had not fortune yeelded to the Romans General, both a trial of his approved vertue in war and alſo ſpeedy victorie.

It was the manner among the Faliſcians, to entertain for the government of their Children one that ſhould teach and inſtruct them in ſchool, and withall bear them company whereſoever they went: and many children together (as the guiſe continued ſtill even to this day in Greece) were committed to the charge and tuition of one man. As for the Nobles and principall mens ſons of this City (as it is uſually every where elſe) a ſpeciall man had the teaching of them, ſuch an one, as was thought moſt learned and the greateſt clerk of all other. This man, having in time of peace
B begun to bring the children forth before the town ſide, to diſport and exerciſe themſelves, gave not over his wonted manner now in time of war. And uſing ſtill to train them abroad one while neerer, an other whiles further off from the gate: it fell out ſo, that one day what with paſtime, and what with pleaſant talk and diſcourſes, he drew them further then he accuſtomed: and ſeeing his time, went forward as far as the enemies corps de gard, and ſo forth on, till he had brought them within the compaſſe of the camp, and even to Camillus his pavilion. Where to his wicked intended act, he added alſo a more graceleſſe ſpeech, ſaying, "That he yeelded * Falerij into the Monte Fiaſcone.

But ſee what a change it wrought in their hearts. They who a while before were with hatred and anger ſo cruelly ſet, as that they wiſhed rather in a maner to be deſtroied with the Veientians, then to accept of peace as the Capenates had done: now through out the whole city required to be at accord with the Romans. No talk in the Market place, no ſpeech in the Councel houſe, but of the faithfulneſſe and truth of the Romans, and of the juſtice of their General. And with one generall conſent of all, Embaſſadours were ſent to Camillus, into the camp. And from thence by permiſſion of Camillus to the Senat of Rome they went, to deliver up Falerij: and being admitted into the Senat houſe, in this wiſe (by report) they ſpake: "In that victory (right honourable) which neither God nor

F with mony for that years pay, that the people of Rome might be freed of their ſubſidy. Thus when peace was granted, the army was brought back again to Rome.

When as Camillus was returned after this conqueſt of his enemies into the City, with much better commendation, than when as in triumph he rode in a chariot drawn with white horſes through the city, as being now famous for his juſt dealing and faithfulneſſe: ſecretly the Senat was abaſhed for very reverence of the man, and could no longer bear, but without further delay to acquit him of the vow he made. So there were ſent L. Valerius, L. Sergius, A Manlius as Embaſſadors in one galley unwafted, to preſent unto Apollo at Delphi by way of obligation, a ſtanding cup of gold. Who not far off from the narrow ſeas of Sicily, were encountred & borded by certain Liparenſian G pirats or men of war, and had to Lipara. Now the maner was of that city, as common rovers uſe to do) for to divide the prize among them. Haply the chief officer or Magiſtrat for that year, was one Timaſitheus, a man more like to the Romans than his own countrimen. Who having himſelf ſome reverent regard of the name of Embaſſadours, and the preſent of the god to whom it was ſent, and the occaſion thereof: poſſeſsed the multitude alſo (which alſo rightly reſembleth their governor) with due religion and prick of conſcience. This head ruler brought the Embaſſadors into their logding, & entertained them courteouſly at the cities charges, waſted them with the convoy of a ſufficient fleet: accompanied them in perſon to Delphi, and from thence conducted them home again safe to Rome. Whereupon by an act af the Senat, there was a contract made with him of amity and mutuall entertainment, and gifts bestowed upon him at the cities cost. The same year there was doubtfull war with the Æquians, so it was uncertain both in the army and at Rome whether they had won or lost the victory. The Generals for the Romans, were of the Tribunes Military, C. Æmylius, and Sp. Posthumius. At the first they warred both together, but after, when the enemies were in fight discomfited, it was agreed, that Aemylius should keep Verrugo with a garison, and Posthumius wast the borders. Where, as he marched somewhat negligently with his army out of order, as presently after field won, the Æquians set upon him, and having put him in fear chased him to the hils next hand. The fright whereof came from thence to the other garrison also at Verrugo. Posthumius, after that he had retired his men into safty and assembled them together, and there in an Oration greatly blamed and cried out upon their fear and running away: and that they were discomfited by a most dastardly fugitive enemy: the whole host cried out with one voice, that they deserved to be told of it, and confessed that they had committed a foul fault: but they themselves would make amends therefore: and promised that the enemies should carry it neither to heaven nor hell, nor joy long therewith. Requiring that he would conduct them presently to the enmies camp (which in sight was pight upon a plain) protesting to refuse no extremity of punishment, if they were not masters of it before night. He then commended them, and willed them to refresh their bodies, and to be ready at the relieve of the fourth watch. Now lay the enemies likewise in the passage, to intercept the Romans, as they fled by night from the hill, even in the way which leadeth to Verrugo. And before day they encountred together (but you must think the moon shone all night) and saw how to fight, as well as by day light. But the noise being heard to Verrugo, strake so great fear amongst them, thinking the camp of the Romans had been assailed, that for all Aemylius could do to hold them, and to beseech them to the contrary, they fled scattered unto Tusculum. From whence the news came to Rome, That Posthumius was slain, and his army lost. But he riding about the host (after that in the morning betimes the day light shewed them that followed apace on every side, that there was no fear of ambushments and forlayings) charged them with their promises, and set them in such a heat, That the Æquians could no longer abide their violence. Then slew they the enemies in the chase every one, and made havock of them as they fled, more like men that do things a in fury and rage then by plain valour. And presently from the Tidings from Tusculum (which put the city in a vain & causeless fright) there came from Posthumius letters, dight with lawrell; importing news, that the Romans had the victory, and the Æquians the overthrow.

Because as yet the actions and sutes aforesaid of the Tribuns of the Commons could come to no end: but the Commons laboured to continue the Tribuneship in them that were the maintainers of the law preferred, and also the Nobles endeavoured to make those rulers again that had opposed themselves against the same law. But as the Commons in their own Election prevailed and had the better: so the Nobles were revenged of them againe for this griefe they tooke, by an Act of the Senat, that Consuls (hated Magistrates of the Commons) should be created. Thus after fifteen yeares were Consuls reelected, L. Lucretius Flavus, Servius Sulpitius Camerinus.

In the beginning of this year, when as the Tribunes of the Commons bestirred themselves stoutly to go through with their law, for that none of their brotherhood was about to deny and nip the same: and whiles the Consuls for that very cause resisted them as earnestly, and the whole city was here-about amused: the Æquians won Vitelia, a Colony of the Romans, seated within their own country. Most part of the Coloners (because the town being by night betraied and won, yeelding unto them free passage to escape away on the back side) fled safe to Rome. So that service befell unto L. Lucretius the Consul; Who went with a power and vanquished the enemies in fight, and with victory returned to Rome to a greater conflict a good deal. Aulus Virginius, and Quintus Pomponius, two Tribunes of the Commons the two years past, were accused: for whose defence it was for the Credit of the Senat, That the Nobles should agree and stick close together. For no man laid to their charge either dishoneſt behaviour in life, or corrupt carriage of themselves in their office, but only this, that to please and gratifie the Nobles, they had set themselves against the Tribunes law. Howbeit the anger of the Commons went beyond the favour of the Senat, and (that which was a most shamefull precedent) they (guiltlesse men) had fine set on their heads of * ten thousand pound of brasse coin; Whereat the Nobles took great displeasure. Camillus openly blamed the Commons for this their wicked part: who now setting themselves against "their own patrons, perceived not that by a perverse proceeding in judgement against their Tribunes, they had lost their liberty of opposing themselves with their negative voice: and take that away once, and farewell all authority of the Tribunes for ever. For where as they hoped "that the Nobles would endure the unbridled and licentious liberty of that office, they were much "deceived: for if these hard courses of the Tribunes might not be restrained by help of the same "Tribunes, the Nobility would find some other weapon to fight withall. He rebuked the "Consuls also, for that they suffered those Tribunes to faile of their protection and safe conduct, "who had done and said nothing but by the authority and warrant of the Senat. Whiles openly he used to make these and such orations to the people, he thrust himself daily more and more into mens anger and displeasure. But to stir up the Senat against the foresaid law, he ceased not still: willing them, that when the day came of proposing the law, they should come into the Common Hall, with no other mind but this, to remember they were to fight for god and country

Camillus rebuketh the Commons.

Camillus his speech in the Senat.

A try, for the temples of the gods, and the very ſoile wherein they were born. And as for his own ſelf privatly, if it were lawful for him amidſt theſe civil troubles of his native country, to "think upon and reſpect his own proper glory, it were right honourable for him, to have the city "which he had won, peopled and reſorted unto : and daily to behold and enjoy the memorable "monument of his own glory : to ſee before his eies the very City, whereof the counterfeit was "born in the pomp of triumph : and that all men elſe ſhould tread in the ſteps of his noble acts. "But he thought it a ſhamefull and abominable thing, that a City left and forſaken of the immor-"tall gods, ſhould be inhabited : and that the people of Rome ſhould dwel in captive ſoil, and to "make this exchange, to leave a naturall country which hath conquered, for it that hath been con-
B "quered With theſe perſwaſions & exhortations were the chief rulers excited, the Nobles old and young, came in multitudes, (when as the law ſhould be propounded) into the Hall. And as they were diſperſed and ſorted into Tribes, every one taking hold of thoſe of his own tribe, began to beſeech them even with tears, not to forſake that Country now, in the quarrell whereof they and their fathers had fought moſt valiantly and happily : ſhewing herewith ever and anon the Capitoll, the Temple of Veſta, and other Temples thereabout of the gods : that they ſhould not therefore drive the people of Rome, as exiled and baniſhed out of their native ſoil from their own home and houſegods, into their enemies City, nor bring the matter thus about, that it had been better that Veii had not been won, rather then Rome ſhould be abandoned. Becauſe their dealing was nothing but by way of praier and perſwaſion, and in their praiers much mention and naming of the gods, C the moſt part of them were touched in conſcience : ſo as more Tribes nipped that one law forgoing forward, than gave their voices to approve it. Which victory was ſo joyfull to the Nobles, that the morrow after, by the motion of the Conſul a decree was made, That amongſt the Commons ſhould be a diviſion of ſeven acres for a man out of the Veientian lands : and not for houſeholders only, but that conſideration and reckoning ſhould be had alſo in every houſe of all free born perſons : to the end, that they ſhould be willing to breed up children to the like proof, and for the hope of like commodity. When the Commons by this bountifull gift and liberality, were well pacified and ſtilled, there was no ſtir at all to hinder the election of the Conſuls. So there were created Conſuls, Lu. Valerius Potitus, and M. Manlius, who afterwards was ſurnamed Capitolinus.

Theſe Conſuls ſet out the great ſolemn games and plaies, which M. Furius, the Dictator had D vowed in the Veientian war. In the ſame year the Temple of Juno Regina vowed by the ſame Dictator and in the ſame war, was dedicated. And it is reported, that the dedication thereof was celebrated with exceeding great reſort and forward endeavour of the dames of Rome. War there was (but not greatly to be ſpoken of) Algidum with the Æquians, for that the enemies were in a maner diſcomfited before that they joyned battel. Valerius becauſe he followed ſtill and killed the enemies in chaſe, was allowed by decree to triumph at full : and Manlius, that he ſhould enter into the city only Ovant, in petty triumph. The ſame year aroſe a new war with the Volſcians: againſt whom by reaſon of a famine and peſtilence that grew about Rome upon exceeding drought and heat, an army could not be led forth. For which cauſe the Volſcinians puffed up with pride, joyning unto them the Salpenates, invaded firſt the country about Rome. Whereupon war was E proclamed againſt both nations. C. Julius the Cenſor departed this life. In whoſe room M. Cornelius was ſubſtituted. Which after bred ſome ſcruple of Religion, for that Rome in that five years ſpace was taken. So that never after that is there any Cenſor choſen into the place of the deceaſed: And the Conſuls alſo being ſick and thereby diſabled to govern, it was thought good to take new counſell & advice of auſpices or tokens of birds, by an Interreign. When as therfore by an act of the Senat, the Conſuls had reſigned their office, M. Furius Camillus was created Interregent. Who named after him P. Cornelius Scipio : and he afterwards Lu. Valerius Potitus to be Interrex. By whom were made ſix Tribunes Military with Conſuls authority : that in caſe any of them ſhould be ſick and craſie, yet the Common-wealth ſhould have governours enough. The firſt day of July entred they into their office : namely, L. Lucretius, Servius Sulpitius, M. Aemylius, Lu. Furi-
F us Medullinus the ſeventh time, Agrippa Furius, C. Aemylius the ſecond time. Of theſe L. Lucretius and C. Aemylius had in commiſſion to go againſt the Volſcians : but Agrippa Furius, and Servius Sulpitius againſt the Salpinates. And firſt were the Volſcians fought withall. A great war in reſpect of the number of enemies : but for the conflict and battell, nothing fierce and ſharp. For their army at the firſt encounter was put to flight, and eight thouſand ſouldiers were by the Roman horſemen environed, whereupon they threw their weapons away and yeelded. The tidings of this war cauſed the Salpenates not to adventure upon fight : but they kept themſelves armed within the wals, and ſtood upon their gaurd. The Romans then all abroad drave booties both out of the Salpinats Country, and the Volſcians, and no man withſtood their violence: ſo long untill the Volſcians wearied with war, and truce granted unto them for twenty years, upon this con-G dition, to make reſtitution again to the Romans of their goods, and to pay the ſouldiers for that year their wages.

The ſame year one M. Caditius a commoner, gave notice to the Tribunes that in the new Cauſey, where now there ſtandeth a Chappel above the Temple of Veſta, there was in the ſtil time of the night a voice heard, louder than any mans, willing that the governours might have intelligence, that the Gauls were coming. This, by reaſon of the baſeneſſe of the author (as commonly it is ſeen) was not credited : beſides, they were a nation far remote, and therefore leſs known and of ſmall accompt. Thus were not only the advertiſements of the gods deſpiſed, when as their fatal time of destruction was toward: but also the help of man (which rested only in Furius Camillus) they rid out of the City. Who being arested to appear at a day by L. Apuleius a Tribune of the Commons, and to make answer for the saccage of Veii, and having buried about the same time his son, a towardly young Gentleman, sent for home to his house, those of his own tribe, his skinfolk and followers, wherof a great part were of the Commons. And when he had sounded their minds, and received this answer from them, That they would defray and lay down so much, as he should be condemned in: but as to acquit him, that they could not possibly. Hereupon he departed in exile: praying to the immortall gods, that as he was guiltlesse and wrongfully dealt withall, so they would with all speed, cause that unthankful City to stand in need, and to have a misse of him. In his absence condemned he was in * fifteen thousand pounds of brasse coine. When this citizen was thus expulsed, who if he had tarried still, (so far as we may make reckoning of any earthly security) Rome could never have been won: behold, embassadors came come from the Clusines, requesting aid against the Gaules.

M. Furius Camillus goeth into the exile.

* 39 lib. 7 ss. 6 d sterl.

This nation (as it is reported) allured with the sweetnesse of corn and wine especially (dainty chaffer and a new delight in those daies) passed over the Alps, and possessed those countries which had been aforetime by the Tuscans inhabited. The voice goeth, that there was one Arunx a Clusine, who had brought wine into Gaul, to entise that people withall, upon an anger and displeasure that his wife had been defloured by one Lucumo (whose guardian Arunx himselfe had been) a young gentleman of great might and power, and whom Aruns could not chastise and bridle, without assistance of forrein forces: This man was the Gauls guide in passing over the Alps, and the principal instrument to set them a work for to assault Clusium. I would not for my part deny, but that the French were brought to Clusium by Aruns or some other Clusine: but most certain it is, that they who assaulted Clusium, were not the first that passed the Alps. For the Gauls two hundred years before they assaulted Clusium and won the City of Rome, came over into Italy. Neither fought the Gauls first with this nation of the Tuscans, but long afore, and that oftentimes, with those that dwell between Apenninus and the Alps. For, the Tuscans had all soveraign command, both by land and sea, before the Roman Empire was erected. The names of upper and nether sea, wherewith Italy is compassed about, as it were an Island, may be a sufficient proof, how great and puissant they were: seeing, that the one is by the generall name of the Nation, called of Italians, the Tuscan sea: & the other the Adriatick, of a town of colony or the Tuscans called Adria. The Greeks do call the self same seas that (a) Tyrrhene and the Adriaticke seas. These Tuscans bending to both seas, inhabited those countries, consisting of twelve Cities: having sent before on this side Apennine, toward the nether sea, and afterwards beyond the (b Apennine, as many Colonies in number according to the Princes at the first beginning, and held in possession all those parts beyond the Po unto the Alps, except that Angle only of the Venetians, that are seated about the gulf of the Adriatick sea. And doubtlesse, the Nations about the Alps, especially the Rhetians, had their beginning thus: whom the very country it self made savage, so they as retained nothing of old, but the sound of their language, and the same broken and somewhat corrupted. Now for the coming of the Gauls over into Italy, thus much we have learned. In the daies of Priscus Tarquinius King of Rome, the (c) Celtes which are a third part of the Gauls, were under the rule of the (d) Bituriges who chose a King over the Celtes, named Ambigatus, a great potentat and mighty, both in regard of valour and vertue, and also of his own privat wealth and publick weal: for that under his regiment, Gaul was so fertile of corn, and grew so populous, that the exceeding number of the people could not well be governed. This man being of great age, and desirous now to disburthen his Realm of that pestering multitude, declared that he would send Bellovesus and Sigovesus his sisters sons (two forward young men) to seek adventures, into what lands soever the gods and goddesses should by their token direct them: giving them commission to gather what number of men they would, to the end that no nation might withstand their coming. So it fell to Sigovesus lot, for to enter the forrest and woodland country of Hercinia. Bellovesus his fortune was a good deal better, to take his way (by the gods guidance) unto Italy: and he leivied of the Bituriges, (e) Averni (f) Senones (g) Hedui (h) Ambarri (i) Carnutes and (k) Aulerci, those that might be spared out of those Countries: and setting forward with a mighty power of footmen & horsmen, came unto the (i) Tricastides. Now stood the Alps full against them in their way, which I marvel not were thought & insuperable impassable, as having not as yet any way made over them, (so far as any constant record maketh date) unlesse we list to beleeve the tales of Hercules. Now when as the Gauls there, were hemmed in as it were on every side with those high montains, and that they looked every way about them how they might get over those high hils reaching up to the heavens, and so passe (as one would say) into an other world; they were staied there and went no further, upon scruple of conscience, for that it was reported, that certain strangers seeking land to inhabite, were by the people of (m) Sallies set upon and assailed. These strangers were the (n) Massilians, who sailed from Phocis. This the Gauls supposing to be a fortunate presage of their successe helped them forward, and took part with them: so as what place first they gat after they were landed, they fortified within the wide or broad forrests. They themselves passed through the Country of (o) Taurini, and over the straights of the Alps, called (p) Julia: and having vanquished the Tuscans in fight not far from the river (q) Ticinus, hearing that the Country wherin they abode and setled, was called Insubrium (after the name of a territory and shire of the Heduans) they following and imbracing the lucky name of that place, so conformable to the other of their own, builded builded a City and called it (r) Mediolanum. Afterwards another power of Germans with their captain Elitovius, following the steps of the former Gauls, by the same streights (with good leave and favour of Bellovesus) passed over the Alps, and remained there: and where now (s) Brixia and (t) Verona two towns stand (the (u) Libui than inhabited those parts) made their abode. The Clusines terrified with this new war, advising well both their number and the unaccustomed looks, and visages of the men, which they had not seen afore, and the strange armour withall: & hearing besides that the legion of the Tuscans both on this side the Po and beyond, had been oftentimes by them discomfited: Albeit in the Romans they had no interest at all in regard of any league or amity, only this, that they had not maintained their kinsfolk the Veientes against the Romans, sent their Embassadors to Rome, to crave aid of the Senat. Aid they obtained none: Embassadors there were sent three, the sonnes of M. Fabius Ambustus, who in the name of the Senat and people of Rome should treat with the Gauls and perswade with them, not to set upon the confederats and friends of the people of Rome namely, such as at whose hands they had received no wrong: saying moreover, that if they would put the Romans to it, The Romans were to defend Gauls by war, howbeit they thought it better, if it might be, to have no wars at all: but that the them a new-come nation should grow into knowledge and accquaintance, rather by peace than by war. The embassage was mild and mildest enough, but the Embassadors themselves were over fierce & hasty, and more like Gauls than Romans; Who having done their message in the assembly of the Gauls, were thus again answered. "Although the name of the Romans was but of late heard of, yet they, yet they were perswaded that they were hardy men, at whose hands the Clusines in their fear, sought and requested succour. And whereas they choose rather to defend their allies by way of embassage, than by open war, they likewise neither disdained nor refus'd peace which they offered: If the Clusines would grant the Gauls (which wanted ground to inhabit) a part of their marches, whereof they held in possession more than they did well people and occupy: Otherwise, no peace would be had. And hereof would they have an answer whiles the Romans were in place: and if they were denied ground, they would also fight even before the Romans face, that they might make report at home, how much the Gauls went beyond other men in valour & chivalry. And when as the Romans demanded again what right they had to require ground of the owners or to threaten war? For what interrest or title had the Gauls in Tuscany? They again stoutly made answer; that they carried their right in their swords point, and that valiant men were Lords of all the world. So they were on both sides so set on fire, that they ran to their weapons & skirmish'd with the Tuscans. Then against all law of nations (a thing that hastned the destruction of the Roman City) the Embassadours took arms. Neither could this be so secret but it was known; For even before the ensignes of the Tuscans, there were seen three most noble & valiant knights of the Romans for to fight: so far exceeded the valour of those strangers above all the Clusines. Moreover and besides, Quintus Fabius riding out of the battell on horseback charged his lance upon the captain of the Gauls, as he fiercely assailed the ensignes and battel of the Tuscans, ran him through and slue him: and as he rifled and disarmed him, the Gauls took knowledge of him, and throughout the whole host notice was given, that it was an Embassadour of the Romans. So, leaving their quarrell against the Clusines, they sounded the retreat, and threatned the Romans. There were of them, that thought good presently to advance forward to Rome: but the elder sort prevailed, that there should be sent Embassadors first to complain of the injuries, and to require that for the law of arms broken, the Fabii should be yeelded unto them. When as the Gaul Embassadours had declared their message according to their commission, the Senat nothing liked of the Fabians deed, and thought the barbarous Gauls required nothing but just and reason. Howbeit suit of friends and privat respects, would not permit to make an act of that, in personages of so great mark and nobility, which they deemed meet and requisit. Therefore to the end it might not be imputed to them & they blamed, if peradventure any foil or overthrow should hap unto them, by warring with the Gauls: they referred the hearing and discussing of the Gauls demands unto the people. Where might and favour so much prevailed, that even they who were in question to be punished, were created for the year following Tribunes Military in Consuls authority. At which the Gauls being offended (as good cause they had) with open threats and menaces of war returned again to their company. There were with the three Fabii, P. Sulpitius, Longus, Quintus Servilius, the fourth time, and P. Servilius Maluginensis. When as now so great danger was towards and neer at hand (see how fortune blinded mens eies, when as she will have her sway and not be hindred) that City which against the Fidenat & Veient enemy & other nations bordering thereby, tried the utmost help, and oftentimes made a Dictator: now being threatned with a strange enemy never heard of before, coming to war upon them from the Ocean sea, & the farthest parts of the world, sought neither for governor nor help more then ordinary. Even those Tribuns by whose rash dealing that war was first caused, had the managing of all: and made no more choise, nor musttring H of souldiers than usually had been in common wars: making but a light matter of it and of no consequence, & setting little by, and elevating the rumour of the war. The Gauls in the mean time (having heard, how on set purpose those breakers of human law were soon advanced to honour, & how their embassage was deluded and dallied with, all on fire, as they are a nation that way impatient and in anger outragious) pluckt up their standards forthwith and marched with all expedition on their voiage. At whose noise and hurliburly (as they passed by in such hast) when as the towns thereby were put in fear, and ran to their weapons, and the country peasants fled away: they with open mouth gave out and signified, that they went to Rome. All the way as they journied, what with horse and men, both in length and breadth, they took up a mighty room in their march. But I what with the fame that went before, and the messengers of the Clusines and of other people that followed one at the heels of another, this speedy coming of the enemies brought right great fear and terrour to Rome. For notwithstanding, that they went with a power of men in all hast suddenly mustered, hardly met they them at eleven miles end, where as the river Allia running down from the hils of Crustuminum, with a very deep channell (not much beneath the highway) dischargeth it self into the Tyber. And now by this time the whole country before them, and all the coasts about were overspread with the enemies. And (as they are a nation naturally given to vain tumults and therein born and bred) with an hideous and dissonant kind of singing (like a black Santus) they filled also about with a fearfull and horrible noise. There the Tribunes Military without getting aforehand a convenient place to pitch their tents in, without fortifying the same with any trench K or rampiers, whereunto they might safely betake themselves, even without any regard of God, whom at leastwise they should have been mindfull of, if they had forgotten man, without Auspices and bird-tokens, without reconciliation to God by sacrifice, full unhappily and in an ill hour, ranged their battels divided into wings, for fear of being compass'd with multitude of enemies. Yet might not the vanguard answer the breadth of the enemies, not withstanding they made their ranks and files so thin, that the middle ward of the battell was weak, & scant joyning close together. On the right hand there was a little higher ground, where they thought to bestow men for supply, which as it gave the first occasion of fear and running away, so was it the only safety of them that fled. For Brennus the Duke or Prince of the Gauls, fearing exceedingly in that small number of the Romans, some stratagem, and supposing that the higher ground was for this purpose kept, L

That when the Gauls should have encountred with the forefront of the legions, then the rescues would charge them both upon their backs and their flanks, displaied and advanced his standards against those in rescue: nothing doubting but if he had once driven them from their hold upon higher ground, on the plain he should soon have the victory, considering that in number he overwent them. See how the Barbarians had not only luck, but policy also on their sides! Contrariwise, the Romans in their camp were nothing like themselves, either for captains or souldiers, Their minds were so possessed with fear and thinking of running away, and so forgetfull besides, that the greater part of them chose rather to flie to Veii, (their enemies City) although the Tyber were full in their way, then to take the streight course to Rome, to their wives and children. For a while, the advantage of the ground defended those that were for rescue: but in the rest of the M host, so soon as they that were next, heard the shout from the sides, and those that were farthest off from behind, before any stroke strucken, and before they were once touched, they fled from their unknown enemie, in a manner before they saw him. And so far off they were from trying fight, that they answered them not so much as with a countershout again. So as there were not any slain in fight. But they were killed behind at their backs, even by occasion of their own selves, who with their hurrying hindred one another in their flight. About the bank of Tyber, whereunto the whole left wing was fled down, and had flung away their weapons, there was a great slaughter; For many of them that could not swim, and were weak by reason of their weighty corselets and other harnesse, were drowned and swallowed up of the surging whirlpools. Howbeit, the most part escaped safe to Veii. From whence they came to Rome, not only no succour to guard the City, N but not so much as a messenger to bring news of this their overthrow. But from the right wing which kept farther from the river, and the more under the hill, they all went to Rome. And finding not so much as the gates of the City shut, they all fled into the Castle. The very Gauls themselves astonied at so wonderfull and sudden victory, stood still at the first in a great amaze, as who knew not what had hapned, and wist not what to make of it. Afterwards they feared some ambush, and at length fell to gathering the spoils of them that were slain, and to lay all their armor and harnesse upon heaps, as their maner is. At last, seeing no enemy nor shew of bostility, they put themselves in their journy forward, a little before sunsetting, and marched to the City of Rome. Where, upon word brought by the foreriders, that the gates were not shut, nor any ward kept afore the gates, nor armed men upon the wals, they stood in the like amaze as before, upon so strange and wondrous O a thing. But fearing the night and the situation of a City unknown, they set them down, and rested between Rome and Anio, having sent their espials and scouts about the wals and gates, to understand what their enemies meant to doe in so desperat a state. The Romans, for that a greater part had taken their way to Veii, then to Rome, and weening that there was none left alive, but those that were fled back to Rome; bewailing and bidding adue, both to those that were deand those alive, set the whole City almost a weeping and lamenting. But afterwards the publick fear astonied them, and took all sense away of their privat sorrows, when they heard

A once that the enemies were come. And within a while, as these barbarous people coasted and ranged about the walls by troups, they might hear their yelling, their houting, and uncouth confused hideous cries. So were they held all the time in suspence of mind, untill the second day after: one while thinking, that at their first coming they would have surprised the City, for unless they had so meant, they would have tarried (they thought) at Allia still: again, a little before sun-setting (because the day was well-nigh done) they supposed they would enter upon them before night. But anon they feared that they deferred this enterprise untill night was come, to the end they might strike a greater fear & terror amongst them. And last of all, the day light approaching, astonied them clean: so as they were in a continual agony, even until the mischief came indeed which they so long B doubted. & that now the bloudy banners of their enemies were displaied before their gates. Howbeit neither that night nor the day following, was the City in the like fear, as when they fled so fearfully at * Allia. For being past hope that the City could be defended with so small power as remained, they determined that with their wives & children, all their serviceable youth, such as were meet to bear arms, yea, and the more able men, and strength of the Senat should retire themselves into the Castle & Capitol: and after they had thither brought their armor and corn, from thence as from a defensible place to protect their gods, their men, and the Roman name: to save from fire and sword (so far as they could) the Flamin of Jupiter, the vestal Nuns, and sacred images, and holy reliques of the City: and not to abandon the worship and due solemnity unto them, so long as any were left alive, to do them honour and worship. For thus they conceived, That if the Castle & Ca-C pitol, being the seat of their gods, if the Senat, which is the head & chief of their publike counsel, if the hardy and fighting yong men remained after that imminent ruin and fall of the City, the less would be the loss of the aged folk, a number, (God wot) left behind of purpose in the City, no otherwise like but to perish. And to the end that the multitude of the common sort might bear this more patiently, the elders that had triumphed aforetime, and been Consuls, openly gave out and said, That they would live and die together with them. Neither would they with those bodies of theirs which were unmeet to bear armour, and to defend the City, surcharge and pester the company of able and armed men, in this their penury & want of victuals. These and such like were the consolations and comforts of the ancients among themselves now resolute to end their lives. After which, they turned their exhortations to the companies of the young and lusty men, whom D they followed into the Castle and Capitol, recommending unto their manhood and to their youthful courage, all the estate remaining of that City, which for the space of three hundred and threescore years, had in all their wars been victorious, and gotten great conquests. Now when they, in whom rested all hope and help were departed, and had taken their leave of them, that resolved fully not to survive the winning and destruction of their City: as the very thing in it self, and the sight thereof was a lamentable and woful spectacle unto them, so the pitious weeping of women, and their uncertain running up and down, following now after one, and now after another: and asking their husbands and children, to what end, to what fatal destiny they betook them, was as dolorous a pageant, as could happen to any earthly creature. Nevertheless, a great sort of them accompanied their friends into the Castle, and no man either bad or forbad them. For al-E though it was good and commodious for the besieged, namely, to diminish the number, and discharge themselves of the feeble multitude, yet it seemed unto them an inhuman and unkind part. The rest of the common people especially, whom so small an hill was not able to receive, and could not possibly be kept in so great scarcity of corn & victuals, departed by heaps out of the City: and marching as it were in one company together in a row took their way to Janiculum. From thence they divided themselves sundry waies. Some slipt into the fields and country, some to the next Cities there bordering, without any Captain, without any common consent: every one following his own hope, his own head and wit now that all publike counsel was in despair, and past remedy. In this mean while, the Flamin of Quirinus, and the religious Vestal virgins leaving the regard of their own private affairs, consulted with themselves what sacred Images to carry with them, and F (seeing their strength would not serve to rid away and save all) what to leave behind them, and what place was meetest to bestow and lay them up most safely. They agreed at length and thought it best, to put them in small barrels or rundlets, & within the ground to bury them in a little chappell, standing next to the Flamins house: which place for very devotion unto this day, may not for any thing be spit upon. All the rest they parted amongst themselves. And every one carrying her own burden, took the way, which over the wooden bridge leadeth to Janiculum. Upon the ascent or rise of that hill, when L. Albinus (a Commoner of Rome) saw them going, as he among other company (which unmeet for war, departed out of the City) carried his wife & children in a wain: he making even then in that hard calamity, a difference yet between divine and humane things, and thinking it an impious part, and void of all religion, that the publike Priests with the sacred G Images of the people of Rome should go on foot, whiles he and his were seen riding at ease in a wagon, caused his wife and children to alight and come forth, and set the Nuns with their holy Images in their room, and brought them to Cære, to which place they minded to go. All things now being set at Rome (as in such a time could be) in order sufficiently, for the defence of the Castle; the aged persons above said being returned to their houses, waited for the comming of the enemy, with hearts prepared and resolved to die. Such of them as had born offices of the chair, to the intent, that they might end their daies in the ornaments & robes of their former estate and honour, and according to their vertue and deserts: in their most stately garments and habiliments, H which they wear when they carried their sacred chariots upon festival daies, or wherein they rode in triumph, now sat upon their ivory chairs in the very midst and entry of their houses. There be that write, how they willingly devoted and bequeathed themselves to die for their Country and Citizens of Rome: and that M. Fabius the High Priest read and pronounced unto them a certain hymn and prescript form of prayer, to that purpose. The Gauls, both for that now they had rested from fight a whole night, and so their choler was somewhat cooled, and also because they had not in any place fought a bloudy and dangerous battell with them, nor even at that time won the City by any assault or force, entred the morrow after into the City, without anger and heat of furious rage, by the gate Collina, standing wide open, and so passed forward to the common place of I assemblies, casting their eyes about them towards the Temples of the gods, and to the castle, which only presented some shew of war. And there leaving a sufficient guard, lest haply from the Castle and Capitol they should be violently assaulted, after they were once asunder parted, they fell to ransack and rifle: and meeting none at all in the void streets, some rush by heaps into the houses next hand, others go to those that were furthest off, supposing them at least wise to be untouched, full of riches, and fit for to fill their hands. From thence again (as frighted by reason of such desolation, and fearing lest haply any fraud of the enemy might entrap them as they wandred one from another) they returned round in a ring together, into the market place, and the places near therto.

Where, when they saw the Commoners houses fast shut to & locked, and contrariwise the stately palaces of the Noblemen and chief Senators standing wide open, they were at a stand, and doub- K ted more in a manner to enter upon the open places than the shut. And they beheld as it were with capping and crouching after a reverend manner, certain ancient personages sitting in the porches and entries of their houses, who besides their ornaments and apparel, above the ordinary estate of men, for a certain majesty which they carried in their countenance and gravity of visage, resembled the gods. And when as they turned to them, & stood looking upon them, as if they had been Idols and sacred Images, M. Papyrius, one of them, when a Gaul began to stroke his beard (which then they used all to wear long) with his ivory staffe (as they say) gave him a rap on the pate, and moved his patience. Whereupon he was the first that was murdered, and so the rest were all killed as they sat in their chairs of state. After this massacre of these honourable personages of the Nobility, they fell upon all the rest, and spared no creature: they ransacked their houses, and L when they were empty, set fire on them. But whether it were that they were not all of them desirous to destroy the City utterly, or that it was the mind of the Leaders and chief of the Gauls, that for a terrour there should be seen some scarefires (if haply for the love of their houses, they that were besieged, might be induced to yield themselves:) or that all their houses were not burned at once, to the end that the remainder of the City might be as a pawn and pledge to mol-lifie their enemies, and make their hearts to relent; howsoever, I say it was, the fire for the first day (as usually in Cities forced and won) spread not all abroad every where, to make a generall havock. The Romans from the Castle, seeing the City full of enemies, and in every street running up and down, and in all places fresh calamities and miseries one in the neck of another, were not able to conceive the same in mind and spirit, no, nor so much as to have the right use M of their ear: and eyes. For to what place soever the shouts and noise of the enemies, the howling and wailing of women and children, the noise of fire, and the ratling and cracking downfals of houses turned them aside in exceeding fear, thither they bent their minds, their faces, and eyes, as men by fortune set up aloft, as upon a stage or scaffold, to behold the fall and ruin of their Country: reserved to save nothing of all their wealth and substance, but only their own bodies: by thus much, more miserable and pitifull above all others that ever were besieged, in that being shut out from their native Country and City, they were besieged and beheld it, and all that they had, in the enemies hands. Neither as ill as the day was spent, followed there a better night. Yea & when after this troublesome night the like morrow was come, there was no time but ministred still some heavy object: and one spectacle or other of new and fresh calamities. And N albeit they were loaden and over-whelmed with so many miseries, yet they nothing at all let fall or abated their courages, but resolved still, notwithstanding they saw all fired, all ruinate and laid even with the ground, manfully to defend that poor naked little hill which they held, and was their only hope left them to recover their freedom. And now seeing the same desolations daily happen they were so inured to misery, that past all sense and feeling of their own state and private fortune, they regarded nothing but their armour on their backs and swords in their hands, as the only remnants and reliques of their hope. The Gauls likewise for certain daies, had made war with the poor houses only of the City, and all to no purpose: and when they perceived in all this burning and ruins of the City, so conquered, nothing now left but armed enemies, who were not, for all so many calamities, one jot terrified, nor their minds once enclined to yeeld without fur- O ther force and violence were used; they determine to try the utmost, and to make an assault upon the fortress. So on the morrow morning very early at sound of trumpet, all the whole multitude of them, arranged themselves in the market place. From whence with an out-cry and shout, under a fence of targets over their heads, they approach the Castle. Against whom the Romans behaved themselves, neither unadvisedly, nor fearfully, strengthning their wards and quarters, with a good Corps de guard against all Advenues: and whereas they saw the banners displayed,

A that way they oppoſed their ſtrongeſt guards: and ſuffered the enemies to climb up the hill, ſuppoſing that the higher they were got up, ſo much the eaſilier they might be beaten down. And being come up to the midſt of the cliff, there they ſtaied: and thence from the higher ground, which of it ſelf in manner bare out againſt the enemy, with all their force they charged upon the Gauls, overturned them, and ſent them down headlong: ſo as never after that, e ther any part of them, or all together would attempt that kind of ſervice. Being therefore paſt hope to get up by force and arms, they make preparation for long ſiege: whereof until that time they had no mind: both for that the corn which was within, they had conſumed in burning of the City, and in the mean ſpace, that which was in the country about, was carried and brought to Veii. Whereupon they divided B their Army, purpoſing with one part thereof, to forrage and drive booties all about the nations thereby adjoyning, and with the other to inveſt the Caſtle: to the end, that the forragers abroad might bring in corn to ſerve them that lay at the ſiege. Now as thoſe Gauls departed from the City, it was their hap and fortune to come to Ardea (where Camillus abode in exile) there to make triall of the Romans valour. This Camillus being more penſive in the behalf of the publike calamity, than carefull of his own: ſpending his ſpirits and waſting his body with crying out upon gods and men: thus fretting and chafing with himſelf, and wondring what was become of thoſe valiant and hardy men, who under his conduct won Veii and Faleriis, and who had fought other wars more valiantly alwaies than fortunately: of a ſudden he heard that the Army of the Gauls approached, and that the Ardeates in great fear, fell to conſultation thereabout what to do: and C even as if he had been inſpired from God above, he put himſelf forward and entred into the midſt of the people aſſembled, who heretofore, had abſtained and forborn ſuch publike meetings and conſultations. And thus he ſaid: "You my Maſters of Ardea, mine old friends ſometime, "and now my new neighbours and fellow-Citizens, for ſo it is fallen out by your kindneſs & de- "ſerts, and by mine own fortune and condition: let no man think, that I, forgetfull of mine own "eſtate, am come forth hither into this audience. But the preſent object and publike danger for- "ceth every man to utter and bring forth in ſo fearfull a time and buſineſs as this is, what help he "can. And when ſhall I ever be thankful unto you for your favours and demerits, if now I ſtand "ſtill and do nothing? Or where ſhall I ever ſtand you in ſtead, if not in war? By my skill herein, "I flouriſhed in my Country, and being in war invincible, was in peace by unthankfull neigh-D "bours and unkind Citizens baniſhed. And now have ye good occaſion offered, and opportu- "nity (O ye Ardeates) both to make recompence, for thoſe ſo great pleaſures and curteſies in "times paſt received of the people of Rome, as your ſelves do well remember, (and therefore be "it ſpoken without upbraiding and reproaching of any mindfull perſons) and alſo to win great "honour of war, unto this City, by defeating a common enemy unto both. This nation, which "thus cometh towards us with a diſſolute and diſordered army, are thoſe to whom God and na- "ture hath given bodies more big and corpulent than ſtrong and able, hearts more ſtout and cou- "ragious than conſtant and reſolute: whereby they bring with them alwaies into the field more "ſhew of terrour, than true valour and execution. Whereof, the late foil and diſcomfiture of the "Romans may be a ſufficient proof and triall. They won the City when the gates ſtood open unto E "them: a ſmall power from the Caſtle and Capitoll was able to withſtand and repell them. And "weary already of the tediouſneſs of ſiege, they are fain to depart, ſtragling up and down, and "wandring along the country. Their manner is when they have filled their bellies with wine and "good victuals, (which they devour full greedily and haſtily whereſoever they can come by it:) "ſo ſoon as night cometh on, without any place of defence, without watch or ward to lay them- "ſelves along like bruit beaſts, here and there by the waters ſides. And now upon their good ſuc- "ceſs, are they more ſecure and retchleſs, than they were wont to be. If ye be diſpoſed to defend "your wals, & not all to turn French, gather your ſelves together & at the firſt watch of the night "arm, and to your weapons: Follow me to a maſſacre, and not to a skirmiſh: for if I do not deliver "them unto your hands faſt aſleep to be hewn in pieces like ſheep and oxen, I refuſe not to ſee the F "ſame end of mine eſtate at Ardea, that I have found already at Rome. There was not one there, howſoever affected he was, friend or foe to Camillus, but was perſwaded that the like warrior was not in thoſe daies to be found again. The aſſembly being broken up, they refreſh their bodies, ready to fight ſo ſoon as ever the Signall ſhould be propounded. Which being put forth, in the beginning and firſt watch of the night, they were ready with Camillus at the gates. And gone they were not far from the town, but they found (as it was foretold them) the Gauls camp without Corps de guard, neglected on every ſide: and it with a mighty cry they aſſail. There was in no place fight, but killing every where: and their naked bodies (as they lay faſt aſleep) were hacked and cut in pieces. Howbeit, ſome of thoſe that were furtheſt off, being ſcared out of their couches, not knowing what violence or from whence it was, took to their heels and fled: other-ſome ſtumbled at una-G wares upon the very enemy. A great part of them being come into the territory of Ardea, were by the townſmen, who ſallied out upon them as they were diſperſed, environed and ſlain. The like ſlaughter to this there was of the Tuſcans in the Country of Veii: who had ſo little pity and compaſſion, to ſee a City which well near for four hundred years ſpace bordering upon them, was now ſurpriſed by a ſtrange enemy not heard of afore, that even at that very time they made rodes into the Territory of Rome, and laden with booty from thence, purpoſed to aſſail even Veii alſo and the garriſon, being the only place and means of reſcue, and the laſt hope of the Roman name.

The Oration of Camillus in the Aſſembly of the Ardeates.

The Roman ſouldiers that lay in garriſon there, had eſpied theſe Tuſcans ranging about the coun- H try, and gathered together in a body to drive booties afore them: and withall they deſcried their Camp pitched not far from Veii. Where, at firſt they pitted their own eſtate, but after, they fell into an indignation and anger that the Tuſcans alſo, from whom they had diverted the Gauls war upon themſelves, ſhould in their calamities thus ſcorn them and have them in deriſion: ſo as they could ſcarcely temper themſelves and forbear, but preſently ſet upon them. But being ſtaied perforce by Captain Coditius, a Centurion whom they themſelves had made their Ruler, they put off this exploit untill night; Only their Commander and Leader was not to be compared with Camillus: elſe all the ſervice was atchieved in the ſame order, and with as good ſpeed and happy ſucceſs. Over and beſides, by the guidance and direction of thoſe priſoners which remained unſlain I over-night, they went forward as far as Salinæ, to another power of the Tuſcans, and in the night following, upon a ſudden they made a greater havock and ſlaughter of them, and ſo in joyous manner with double conqueſt they return to Veii. At Rome in this mean time, the ſiege for the moſt part was but cold and ſlack, and all quiet on both ſides: whiles the Gauls regarded and looked to this only, That none of their enemies ſhould make an eſcape through their guards. At what time a certain valiant yong Roman behaved himſelf ſo, as his own countrimen and enemies too had him in great admiration. There was a ſet ſacrifice or ſolemnity to be celebrated by the houſe and linage of Fabii, in the Mount Quirinalis. For the accompliſhment whereof, Caius Fabius Dorſuo in his holy robes, after the Gabins faſhion, bearing in his hand the holy complements thereto belonging, came down from the Capitol, paſſed through the midſt of the enemies corps de K guard, and nothing moved whatſoever was done or ſaid to terrifie him, went on forth right to the mount Quirinal. And when he had there performed and diſpatched all ſolemnities, returning the ſame way with like conſtant countenance and comly pace, hoping aſſuredly, that the gods would be merciſull and gracious unto him, whoſe worſhip he had not left undone for any fear of death: he retired again to his company into the Capitol: whether it were that the Gauls were aſtonied at his wondrous boldneſs, or rather were touched in conſcience with a reverent regard of Religion, wherein that nation is very zealous and devout. At Veii in the mean while, they gathered not only heart every day more than other, but ſtrength and forces alſo; for that not only Romans thither repaired out of the country, ſuch as either in diſcomfiture of the battell, or for the calamity of the City now taken, had been ſcattered: but alſo out of Latium divers of their own accord L had flocked thither, to have their ſhare in the pillage. Now they thought it high time to return to their country again, and to deliver it out of the enemies hands. The body was ſtrong enough, but without an head it was. The very place put them in mind of Camillus, and a great part of the ſouldiers were ſuch as had atchieved proſperous exploits under his leading and conduct. And Coditius gave out plainly, that no god or man ſhould make him give over his government, but would himſelf as mindfull of his own place, call for a General. So by general conſent it was agreed, that Camillus ſhould be ſent for from Ardea, but with the advice before of the Senat which was at Rome. So modeſt were they in all their carriage, and ſo preciſely obſerved they (even in their deſperate caſe) the due reſpect and regard of every action. Now to paſs through the wards of The adventure of Pontius Cominius. their enemies, was an hard and dangerous adventure. To this exploit therefore, Pontius Cominius, a valorous young man, promiſed his ſervice. Who bearing himſelf upon a bark or corke under M him, hulled along the Tyber down the water to the City; and ſo the next way from the ſtrand, over a ſteep cliff (which was negligently or not at all guarded by the enemy) he paſſeth through the Capitoll, and being brought to the Magiſtrates, declareth there his meſſage from the Army. When he had received the Senates decree to this effect: Imprimis, That Camillus ſhould be called back again out of exile by a Ward-leet, or the ſuffrages of the Curiæ: Item, that by the voices of the people he ſhould be created Dictator out of hand: and that the ſouldiers might have for their Camillus choſen Dictator. Generall whom they deſired: the meſſenger returned the ſame way back again to Veii. And Embaſſadours were ſent to Camillus at Ardea, who conducted him to Veii. But I would rather believe that he departed not from Ardea, before he had certain intelligence of the Act of the Senate. N
And for that neither without the will of the people, he might change the place whereto he was confined, nor unleſs he were named Dictator, have the conduct of the Army; there paſſed an Act of all the Wards, and Dictator was he declared in his abſence. Whiles theſe things were a doing at Veii, the Caſtle of Rome and the Capitoll was in very great danger. For the Gauls, either having found out a mans footing, that way as the meſſenger went from Veii, or eſpied at the cliff of Carmentis, an eaſie place to climb up: in a clear night ſent a man before unarmed to aſſay the paſſage, & then gave him up his armour, and where it was ſteep, one helped, lifted up, and drew up another, as the difficulty of the place required. So as they got up to the top with ſuch ſilence, that not only the Sentinels were not aware of them, but alſo the dogs (a watchfull creature at every noiſe in the night) were not once awakened therewith. But they could not ſo eſcape the geeſe, O which were conſecrated unto Juno, and for all the ſcarcity of victuals, were ſpared and not killed up. And this it was that ſaved them all. For with their gagling and fluttering of their wings, M. Manlius who three years before had been Conſul, a right hardy and noble warrior, was awaked. Who taking weapon in hand, ſpeedily went forth and raiſed the reſt withall to take arms. And whiles all elſe made haſt in a great fright, he ſtroke the Gaul who now ſtood upon the top, with the boſs and pike of his buckler, and turned him down. The fall of whom overturned them that

A were next. Then ſlew he others, (whiles they were in fear) who had laid their weapons out of hand, and took hold of the ſtones whereto they clinged cloſe. By which time, the reſt being come together, ſome flinging darts, others caſting down ſtones, tumbled their enemies back, and the whole power of them loſt their ſure footing and fell down headlong. This tumult being appeaſed the reſt of the night (ſo far forth as men might with troubled minds, ſeeing that even the danger, paſt diſquieted them) they gave themſelves to ſleep. When day was come, the ſouldiers by ſound of Trumpet were ſummoned to aſſemble before their Tribunes, and conſidering there was reward due both to well-doing and miſ-doing: Manlius firſt for his valour was commended and rewarded, not only by the Tribunes military, but alſo by conſent of all the ſouldiers. Upon whom,
B they amongſt them all, beſtowed and brought home to his houſe (which ſtood upon the Caſtle hill) wheat-meal by the half-pints, and wine by the quarts. A matter of ſmall reckoning to be ſpoken of: but in that ſcarcity this might be an argument of their love and affection, when every man beguiled his own belly, pluckt from himſelf and the neceſſities of his life, and conferred the ſame to the honour and recompence of that one man. Then were ſummoned to appear the ſentinels of that place where the enemy climed up undeſcried. And when as P. Sulpitius a Tribune Military, had pronounced that he would exerciſe martial law upon them all, the ſouldiers cried out with open mouth, and laid all the fault on one watchman: and ſo for fear of a mutiny he ſpared all the reſt: and with their generall conſent and approbation, he cauſed that undoubted guilty perſon to be thrown down from the rock. Whereupon they were more careful and circumſpect
C in their watch, both amongſt the Gauls (becauſe it was commonly noiſed that there paſſed meſſengers to and fro between Veii and Rome: and alſo amongſt the Romans, for the remembrance of the late danger by night. But above all other miſeries that follow war and ſiege, the famine was ſore in both the Armies. The Gauls were plagued with peſtilence beſides: for that they had pitched their tents in a place lying between two hils; exceeding hot by reaſon of the fires, and full of ſmoak, carrying both duſt and aſhes, when any wind was ſtirring: which be things that of all others, that nation cannot abide, as being uſed to wet and cold. Thus being ſmothered with heat, and therewith ſtifled and choaked again, they died with contagious diſeaſes like rotten ſheep. And now for idleneſs that they would not bury them ſeverally one by one, they laid the dead bodies on heaps one with another, and ſo burnt them: and made that place famous and no-D table by the name of Buſta Gallica, i.e. Gaulbury. Hereupon, they grew to make ſome truce with Buſta Gallica. the Romans, and emparled together by ſufferance of the Generals. In which parlies, when as the Gauls very often alledged the famine, and upon that extremity perſwaded them to yeeld: it is ſaid that the Romans for to put them by that opinion of them, in many places from the Capitol flung out loaves of bread into the very ſtations and corps de guard of the enemies. But at length neither could their hunger be diſſembled, nor ſuſtained any longer. Therefore, whiles the Dictator muſtereth a power at Ardea by himſelf, he commandeth the Generall of horſemen L. Valerius, to have away the Army from Veii: and maketh ſo good preparation, and furniſheth himſelf ſo, as he might be able to match his enemies, and to charge upon them. In the mean ſeaſon, the army of the Capitol wearied out with watching and warding, having ſurmounted all humane miſeries beſides E hunger, which only of all others, nature would not ſuffer to be overcome: looking day by day for ſuccour from the Dictator now at laſt when not only their food, but their hope alſo failed them, and were grown to that weakneſs, that when they went to keep their guard, they could hardly bear the weight of their armour, they agreed and gave conſent either to yield or to ranſome themſelves upon any condition, they cared not what. Whiles the Gauls alſo gave forth plainly, and ſaid, they might be entreated for a ſmal conſideration to give over ſiege. Then the Senat went together, and gave Commiſſion to the Tribunes Military, to bargain and go through with them. So by a parley or treaty had between P. Sulpitius Tribune Military, and Brennus the Duke of the Gauls, a concluſion was made, and that people, who within a ſhort time ſhould be Lords of the world, were valued and eſteemed at a * thouſand pound weight of Gold. This in it ſelf was * 36000 lib. English.
F a moſt odious and ſhameful thing, but there was adjoyned thereunto a foul indignity. For the Gauls brought forth falſe weights and uneven ballances. And when the Tribune refuſed them, behold, the inſolent and proud Gaul would needs have his ſword weighed too for vantage, adding this ſpeech moreover, (which was intolerable for the Romans to hear) Woe worth men conquered, and down with them ſtill. But neither God nor man would abide the Romans to live ranſomed. For by good hap, before that ſhameful ſum of money by compoſition was paid, before (I ſay) that upon ſome wrangling that fell between, all the Gold was weighed out, cometh the Dictator in the manner, and commandeth the gold to be had away, and the Gauls to void. And when as they made reſiſtance and pleaded the capitulation and bargain, he again replieth, and ſaith, That the compoſition was not good, nor ought to ſtand, which after he was made G Dictator, had been by an inferiour Magiſtrate concluded, without his commandment & warrant: and withall warneth the Gauls to prepare themſelves to fight: commanding his own ſouldiers to caſt all their bag and baggage down on a heap, to put on their harneſs, to make ready their weapons, and by dint of ſteel, and not by weight of ſword to redeem their Country, having in ſight before their eyes the Churches of their gods, their wives and children, and the ſoil whereon the City ſtood (deformed now with miſeries of war) and all things elſe which they ought by good reaſon to defend, recover, and be revenged for. Hereupon he marſhalled his battell as the ground would give him leave, being the plot only of a City half ruinate and lying along, and with- H all of it self naturally uneven. Forecasting and providing for all things with special choice and preparation to serve his souldiers turn, as far as martiall skill could possibly reach. The Gauls affrighted at this so strange an occurrent, betook them to their weapons, and in a furious fit of anger rather than with any considerate discretion, they ran upon the Romans. Now had Fortune turned her wheel: now Gods help and mans policy assisted the Romans. Therefore at the first encounter the Gauls were discomfited with as little difficulty, as they themselves had atchieved the victory at Allia. Afterwards also, in another more set battell in the way of Gabes, about eight miles from Rome (to which place they were fled) they were vanquished by the conduct and leading of the same Camillus. For there were they slain in every place, their Camp taken, and not I so much as one left to bring news of their overthrow. The Dictator having thus delivered his Country out of the enemies hand, returneth again with triumph into the City. And in all the sports and pleasant ditties which the souldiers rudely after their manner devised, he was stiled Romulus the father of the Country, the second founder of the City, which were no vain titles of commendation.

When he had saved his Country thus in war, he preserved it afterwards again undoubtedly in time of peace, namely in gainsaying their transmigration to Veii: whiles both the Tribunes enforced that matter more earnestly, now after the burning of the City, and the Commons also of themselves were more enclined thereunto, than before. Which was one cause, that after his triumph he resigned not up his Dictatorship: being requested also by the Senat not to leave the City in so K doubtful terms of perplexity. And first and formost (as he was evermore a most precise devout man and religious) he proposed those things which concerned the immortall gods: and causeth an act of the Senat to be made. Imprimis, that all the Temples (for that the enemies had held and possessed them) should be repaired, bounded out new, and purged. Item, that the manner of cleansing them should be searched out of the books of Sybilla by the Duumvirs. Moreover, that with the inhabitants of Care, there should be made a league of publike and mutual hospitality, for receiving the sacred Images and Priests of the people of Rome: by the means and favour of which people, the honour and service of the immortal gods was not forelet and discontinued. Item, That there should be set out the Plaies called Capitolini, for that Jupiter Optimus Maximus had stil defended and preserved his own seat, and the Refuge of the people of Rome, in that fearful L time of trouble. And that M. Furius should ordain a guild, or fraternity out of those that dwelt in the hill of the Capitol, for the celebration of those plaies. Finally, to the end there should be also some satisfaction and expiation made of that night voice which being the fore-messenger and warning-giver of their destruction before the coming of the Gauls, was heard and yet neglected, a motion was made, that a Temple should be erected in the new causey to Aius Locutius. The Gold which was recovered by force from the Gauls, as also that which out of other Temples in that fearful hurly-burly, was brought into the chancel or chappel of Jupiter, because they could not call to mind precisely into which Churches they were to carry it again accordingly, was all judged holy and sacred to Jupiter; and order taken that it should be bestowed and laid up under his shrine. And how devout the City was, appeared before in this, That when there was not gold M enough in the common chest, to make up the full sum of the ransom that was agreed upon between them and the Gauls, they took that which the matrons and wives of Rome contributed, and all to spare and save the gold appointed to holy uses. The Matrons were therefore thanked, and this honour besides done unto them, That after their death they as well as their husbands, should be openly praised in a solemn funeral Oration. When those things were once accomplished which appertained to the Gods, and all that belonged to the Senate for to do: then and not afore, upon the stirs that the Tribunes kept with the Commons continually, with their speeches in all their assemblies, soliciting them to leave the ruins of the City, and to remove with all they had to Veii, a town readily furnished to their hand: then (I say) and not before, Camillus accompanied with the whole Senat, came up into the common place of audience, and there before the N people spake in this wise. "So grievous to me, O Quirites, is all contention and variance with the "Tribunes of the Commons that while I lived at Ardea I found no other comfort and solace, in "that most heavy and woful banishment of mine but this, That I was far enough off from those "debates and jars. In regard whereof, I would never have come again, I assure you, but that you "called me back, both by act of Senat, and also by approbation of the people. And it is not in me "any change of mind but your calamity and distressed estate, that hath forced me to return again
"unto you. For this was the very point that you stood upon, namely, that our country might con"tinue still and keep her ancient place: and not Iwis, that I should remain and dwell therein a"gain. And even now verily, would I be still and keep silence willingly, but that this quarrel also
"is in the behalf of my foresaid country: the which to fail (so long as life doth last) for others O
"might be a shamesul reproach, but for Camillus it were most impious & abominable. For to what "end have we returned to it again? To what purpose, when it was besieged have we delivered it "out of the enemies hands, if when we have recovered it, we our selves abandon and leave the "same? And when as the gods and men of Rome kept still, and inhabited the Capitol and the ca"stle, notwithstanding the Gauls were Lords, and possessed of the whole City, is it possible that "both Castle and Capitol, after the City is regained, should be forsaken and abandoned of the "Roman

The Oration of M. Furius Camillus to the people of Rome.

A "Roman victors? And shal our prosperous hand over our enemies bring greater desolation to our "City, than adversity hath? Verily, if it were so, that we made no reckoning of that religion and di"vine solemn service, instituted even with the foundation of our City: & that we counted all va-
"nities that have been delivered unto us by tradition from our ancestors: yet so evident a power
"of God hath assisted the Romans, that I must needs think, that men can now no longer neglect
"the worship of God. For consider with me I pray you, either the prosperity or the adversity of "these years late past, one after another; ye shall find, that as long as we served God and followed "his will so long we prospered & went forward: and all the while that we despised the same, we "ever went backward and fell to decay. And first and formost the Veient war (reccunt I beseech B "you) how many years lasted it? how troublesome and painful was it? And ended it was not, be"fore that by the direction and advertisement of the gods, the water was let out of the Albane
"pool? What shall I speak of this late & strange calamity of our own City? Began it (and say truth)
"before that voice which came from heaven was made so light of, concerning the coming of the "Gauls? before the law of nations was by our Embassadours broken? and before that through the "same neglect of the gods, that fact was by us winked at and put up, which indeed should have "been punished and revenged? This was the cause that we were vanquished, made captive, put to "our ransome, and suffered such condign punishment both at Gods hand and at mans, as that we "are made an example and amazement to the whole world. Then our adversity and affliction put "us in mind of our religion, and the fear of the gods. We fled into the Capitol to the gods, even C "to the very seat of Jupiter Optimus Maximus: and when our own privat estate went to havock,
"the sacred monuments yet and holy Images, some we hid in the earth, some we conveyed away "into the neighbour Towns, and removed them out of our enemies sight. And albeit we were "forlorn and given over both of God and men, yet gave not we over, nor discontinued the ser"vice of the gods. And therefore gave they us our country again, they gave us victory, and the "ancient honour of war which we had lost: and upon our enemies heads, who (blinded with co"vetousnes) in the weighing of gold brake both covenant and fidelity, they have turned all fear-
"fulnes, all flight & slaughter. Considering then, O Quirites, by these so great and apparent signs, "& testimonies in the course of this world, what it is to serve God, & what it is to dishonor him,
"perceive ye not what wickedness we go about to plunge our selvs into, being scarcely got forth D "and escaped out of the shipwrack and perill of our former sin and calamity? A City we have "founded and built, by the will of God and due observation of Augury and Auspices, no corner
"therein, but full of religion, full of divine Majesty: and for solemn sacrifices, there are set daies
"when they shall be celebrated, there are places also appointed wherein they ought to be perfor"med. And are ye about then, O Quirites, to leave all these gods both publike & privat? how sor-
"teth this deed of yours with that, which lately during the time of the siege, was seen with no less "admiration of our enemies, than our own selves in that Noble young Gentleman C. Fabius?
"when through the pikes of the Gauls, he departed out of the Castle, and performed a solemn "duty of the house of Fabius, even upon the mount Quirinal? What, can ye allow and like that
"the sacred ceremonies of privat families, should not so much as in time of war be intermitted: E "and suffer now the publike sacrifices and the Roman gods, in time of peace to be neglected, and "the City abandoned? That our High Priests and Flamins should be less curious and precise in
"the publike service of God, than a private Citizen was in the Anniversary feast of his family "and kindred? But peradventure some one may say, We will do the same at Veii, or we will send "from thence our Priests hither for to execute that ministry. Neither of which can be done, sa"ving the due observance of holy ceremonies. For, to say nothing in general of all other holy
"daies, and of all the gods besides; In that one high feast and solemn dinner of Jupiter, can a Pul-
"vinar be celebrated, or a sacred Table be spread and furnished in any place, but in the Capitol?
"What should I speak of the eternal fires of Vesta? and of that Image, which as a pawn and secu"rity of our imperial state, is kept within the safegard of that Temple? What should I speak of F "those your Ancilia and Scutcheons? O Mars Gradivus, and thou father Quirinus: are ye well "contented that all these festivall and sacred solemnities, which are all of equal time with the Ci"ty, yea, and of more antiquity (some of them) than the foundation of the City, should be forsa"ken in a profane place: But see what ods there is between us and our ancestors? They left un"to us certain solemn feasts and sacrifices to be celebrated in the Alban mountain and in Lavini-
"um. Was it then a matter of conscience and religion, that some festival solemnities were brought
"unto us from our enemies Cities to Rome? And shall we translate the same from hence to our e"nemies City Veii, without a great and hainous offence, that would require expiation? Do but call "to mind I pray you, how often our feasts and sacrifices have been renewed and reformed clean,
"for that some one old accustomed ceremony, either by chance or for want of taking heed, hath G "been over-slipt and left out. And even of late, what was it else that (after the strange miracle of "the Alban Pool) relieved our Common-weal so distressed with the Veient war, but the reforma"tion of our divine service, and renewing of our Auspices? And more than this, we as it were in "remembrance of antient religion and devotion, have both brought unto Rome forrain gods, "and also have instituted and devised new. What a notable and festival day was that (in regard of "the exceeding zeal and forward affection of the Matrons) upon which Queen Juno late tran"slated from Veii, was dedicated in Aventine? And to Aius Locutius, for a voice from heaven heard

" heard in the new cauſey, we cauſed a Temple to be erected. The Capitoline plaies have we ad- H
" ded to other ſolemn feaſts & thereto we have ordained and founded a newguild or fraternity,
" even by the advice of the Senat. And what need was there, that we ſhould have done any of theſe " things, if we meant, together with the Gauls, to leave the City of Rome? If we abode not in " the Capitol (ſo many months while we were beſieged) willingly and without conſtraint? And " if we were for fear of our enemies, held back from going elſewhither? Thus much of our feſtival
" daies and temples. But what ſhall become now, I pray you of our Prieſts? Never think ye once
" of it, what a unfull deed you are about? As for the Veſtall Votaries and Nuns, it is certain this " is their only place, forth of which nothing ever could drive them but the winning of the City.
" The Flamin of Jupiter may not lie forth of the City one night: and will ye make theſe Prieſts I " of Romans to become Veientians? And ſhall thy virgins indeed, O Veſta, leave thee now? and " ſhall the Flamin dwelling in a ſtrange place, for every night he is abſent, taint with ſo great im-
" piety, both himſelf and the Common wealth? As for other matters, which we do with great ſo" lemnity by the direction of the Augurs (and all well near within the Pomery or compaſs of the " City) how can we forget or neglect them? Namely, the Ward-leet or aſſembly of the Curiæ for " matters of war: alſo the other of Centuries, wherein ye chuſe your Conſuls and Military Tri" bunes, where can they be held (if we reſpect the will of the gods and regard the Auſpices) but in " the places accuſtomed? Shall we remove all theſe to Veii? or ſhall the people repair hitherfrom
" thence with ſo great trouble and inconvenience, to a deſolate City, forſaken of God and man, " whenſoever they would hold thoſe aſſemblies? But the preſent neceſſity (they will ſay) forceth us K
" to leave a town that is waſted with fire, and wholly ruinate, and to go to Veii, where all ſtands
" ſafe and ſound, and not to put the poor Commons to the toile and charge of new building. That " this is a pretence and cauſe rather deviſed, than meant in earneſt, if I ſhould ſay nothing, I think
" appeareth manifeſtly unto you already, O Quirites, who remember that before the coming of " the French men, whiles your publike buildings and privat houſes were whole, and whiles the " City ſtood upright on foot, this ſelf-ſame motion was made and debated, as touching the remo" ving to Veii. Conſider now ye Tribunes what difference there is between mine opinion and
" yours: ye are of mind, that if it had not then been meet to be done, yet now verily it were " good and requiſit: I contrariwiſe (but marvel not I pray you before you hear what I will ſay) am
" of opinion, that albeit we might have then gone, whiles our whole City flouriſhed, yet now we L " were not to leave it thus ruinate & decayed. For at that time we had ſome cauſe to remove into " a conquered City, namely, Victory, a glorious thing to our ſelves and our poſterity: but this re" moving now, were reproachfull and ſhamefull to our ſelves, but glorious and honourable to the " Gauls. For we ſhall not be thought to have left our country as conquerours, but to have loſt it as " conquered. And ſhall it be ſaid, that our running away at Allia, the winning of our City, the be-" ſieging of the Capitoll hath impoſed this neceſſity upon us, as to leave our houſe and home and " to make ſhifts, to ſeek our own exile and departure out of that place which we are not able to " defend? And were, indeed, the Gauls able to pull down and raſe that City of Rome, which the " Romans ſhal not be thought able to reedifie and ſet up again? What remaineth now in caſe they
" ſhould come upon us afreſh, with a new power of men, for certain it is that their multitude is M " incredible) & were willing to dwell here in this City by them conquered & by you abandoned;
" but that ye gently permit and ſuffer them? Nay, What and if not the Gauls, but your old enemies
" the Æquians and the Volſcians would remove and come to Rome, would you be willing to have " them become Romans, and your ſelves Veientians? Would ye not rather, that this deſert and " waſt ground as it lieth, were yours, than to be a City peopled by your enemies? For I cannot ſee,
" I aſſure you, whether of the twain, were more to be deteſted. And becauſe (forſooth) ye are loath
" to fal to building, are ye reſolved to abide theſe miſchiefs & theſe ſhamful reproaches? If through" out the whole City there might not be built a more commodious or ſtately houſe, than is that " cottage there of our founder, were it not better to dwel in cottages like ſhepherds & peaſants, ſo
" it be among your ſacred monuments and houſhold gods, than all at once generally to go into N
" exile? Our anceſtors and forefathers being a mixture of divers countries, and no other than herd-
" men, finding in theſe parts nothing but woods and bogs, in a ſhort time built a new City out of " the ground: and are we loath, having yet our Capitol, our caſtle ſafe, the Temples of our gods
" ſtanding ſtill, to reedifie it now that it is burnt. That which every one of us would have done, if " our houſes had been fired, refuſe we altogether to do in the common ſcarefire of the City? Give " me leave a little. What & if by ſome villany, or by miſchance there ſhould be a ſcarefire at Veii &
" by reaſon of the wind (as it is often ſeen) the flame ſpred & catch, and ſo conſume a great part of " the City, ſhall we go from thence by and by, and ſeek to Fidenæ or Gabii, or ſome other City " near at hand to remove unto? Is the very native ſoil of our country, and this ground which we " call our mother, of no power at all to keep us here, but doth the whole love and affection of O
" our country reſt in the ſuperficial outſide, and in the timber and rafters of our houſes? Verily, " confeſs I will unto you (although I take leſs pleaſure to remember the wrongs you did me than " the calamity which I endured) when I was abſent and in exile, ſo often as I thought of my coun" try, all theſe things ran in my mind: the hils, the plain, the Tyber, the coaſts all about, which was " my daily proſpect, and this air, under which I was born and brought up. All which, O Quirites, " let them move you rather now with an affection to them for to tarry ſtil in this your habitation, than

A "than disquiet you hereafter, and torment you for the want and miss of them, when you have "once left and forgone them. Not without good cause both God and man chose this place for "the building of this City: most healthy and wholsome hils: a very convenient and commodi"ous river; to bring in corn and other fruits out of the inland parts, to receive provision and o"ther victuals from the sea-coasts: the sea it self near enough for commodities, and not exposed
"and open by too much nearness to the dangers of forrain navies: the very heart and centre of "all Italy, a place as a man would say, naturally made, and only for that City to grow and encrease
"in. And that doth the very largeness and greatness of a City so newly founded, plainly prove.
"It is now three hundred threescore and four years, and not above, since the foundation there-B "of, O Quirites. Amongst so many Nations of greatest antiquity, thus long ye have made war:
"and all this while (to say nothing of particular Cities) neither the Volscians together with the "Æquians peopling so many towns, and those so strong, nor all Hetruria so mighty by sea and "land, and containing the whole breadth between the two seas, are in war to you comparable.
"Which being so, what reason have you (in the devils name) when ye have had sufficient proof
"already of it, to try again new experiments? considering now, that albeit your valour and vertue
"may go with you elsewhither, yet surely, the good luck and fortune of this place can never de"part and remove from hence? Here is the Capitoll, where sometimes upon the finding of a
"mans head, answer was made by diviners and wizards, That in that very place should be the "head of all puissance, and the imperiall seat of the whole world. Here, at what time as the Ca-C "pitoll, by the direction of the Augurs should be voided and cleared of all other Chappels, Lady
"Juventus, and god Terminus, to the great joy of our forefathers, would not suffer themselves to "be stirred out of their place. Here are the fires of Vesta, here be the Scutcheons come down from "heaven, here are all the gods, favourable & gracious still unto you, so long as here ye make abode
"and remain. Camillus in all his Oration throughout moved them much: but that part thereof
"touching religion (by report) was most effectuall. But that which struck it dead, and put all out "of doubt, was a certain word that fell out to be spoken fitly to the purpose. For at wat time as "the Senat a while after was gathered together in the Court Hostilia, to debate about these things
"and certain companies of souldiers that returned from their guards, chanced in the mean time
"to march through the market place, one Captain hapned to speak in the Comitium, and said, D "Pitch down thy ensign standard bearer, here will be our best abode. Which voice was not so soon
"heard, but both the Senat being come out of the Council House, cried with one accord, That "they took that omen for good luck, and happy presage: and also the Commons all gathered "thereabout, approved the same. After this, when the foresaid Act of transmigration was once "clean dashed and abolished, the City began to be built confusedly, and without order. Tile was "allowed at the common charges: to dig either stone, or hew timber, every man had liberty
"where he could, putting in sureties, that within the compass of that year they would finish their "buildings. The haste they made, caused them to have no regard of drawing out the streets di"rectly, whiles every man built in the void places without respect of his own or other mens "ground. Which is the cause that the out-sinks and vaults which first were conveyed through E "the common streets, now run every where under mens houses, and the form of the City seemeth
"as if it were built at random (as every man could catch a place for himself) rather than distinct"ly ranged, and set out in good order unto them.

IT containeth the fortunate wars against the Æquians, the Volscians and Tuscans. Four Tribes were added to the former, Stellatina, Sabbatina, Promentina, Arniensis. M. Manlius, who had defended the Capitoll from the Gauls, whiles he discharged the debs of those that were in danger of their creditors, and released such as were then imprisoned, was convicted of aspiring to be King, and thrown down from the cliff Tarpeia. In whose reproach a decree was made by the Senat, that none of the house of Man-Sextius, Tribunes of the Commons, proposed a law, that Consuls also might be chosen out of the Commons, who were created before from among the Nobles only. And albeit the Senators withstood them with earnest endeavour, yet by reason that for five years space the same Tribune continued the only Magistrates of the City, they went through with that law and got it enacted. And L. Sextius was created the first Consul that ever was of Commoners. A second Law there passed likewise, That no man might possess above five hundred acres of land.

The Recapitulation of the former five Books.

WHat acts from the building of the City of Rome unto the taking of the ſame, the Romans have atchieved, firſt, under the government of Kings, afterwards of Conſuls and dictators, Decemvirs, and Tribunes Conſular, as well in the wars abroad as ſeditions at home; I have in five books declared. Matters obſcure, both in regard of exceeding antiquity (as things that a far off hardly be diſcerned:) and alſo for that in thoſe daies there were very few writings and monuments, the only faithfull ſafegard, and true remembrancers of deeds paſt: and beſides, whatſoever was regiſtred in the Commentaries of the Prieſts, and in other publike or privat records, the ſame for the moſt part, when the City was burned periſhed withall. But now from henceforward, their civill affairs of policy, and martiall exploits in war, enſuing after a ſecond beginning of the City (as ſpringing again with more freſh ſhoots and fruitfull ſprouts from the root of the old ſtock) ſhall be delivered in more plain and certain manner. I

Camillus bare the Dictatorſhip a whole year, which otherwiſe was limited within ſix months.

And to begin withall, look by whom the ſtate firſt was underpropped and ſet upright, upon him (as chief and principall) it ſtill bare and reſted, and that was M. Furius: whom the Romans would not ſuffer to give up his Dictatorſhip before one year was fully expired. As for thoſe Tribunes (Conſular) in time of whoſe government the City was loſt, they liked not that they ſhould call and hold an aſſembly for Election of Magiſtrates the year following. So the matter came to an Interreign. Now while the City was buſie in continuall work and labour, about reedifying and repairing their buildings, Q. Fabius ſo ſoon as he was out of his office, was by C. Martius, a Tribune of the Commons, arreſted to make his anſwer at a day appointed. Who laid to his charge, That he contrary to the Law of Nations, had fought againſt the Gauls, unto whom he was ſent in embaſſage, and as an Orator only. But he avoided his judiciall triall, by his death: and died ſo juſt againſt the time, that many men thought it was voluntary and wrought by his own hands. Then P. Cornelius Scipio firſt entred upon the Interreign: and after him M. Furius Camillus the ſecond time. He created Tribunes Military in Conſuls authority, A. Valerius Publicola the ſecond time, L. Virginius, P. Cornelius, A. Manlius, L. Æmylius, and L. Poſthumius. Theſe men preſently after the Interreign, were not ſo ſoon entred into office, but before all other things, they conſulted with the Senat in matters concerning Religion and conſcience. And firſt of all they commanded, that all the inſtruments of leagues and confederacies, the ordinances and laws alſo (& thoſe were the twelve tables & certain Statutes made by the Kings) ſhould be ſought up as many as could be found extant. Whereof ſome were publiſhed abroad, even amongſt the Common people: but ſuch as pertained properly to holy Rites, and divine ſervice, were by the Prieſts and Prelates ſuppreſſed; eſpecially, of purpoſe to hold the minds of the people in a reverent awe of religion and devotion. Then began they to reaſon and debate about the diſmal daies. K

Diſmal daies. † 18 of July.

And the fifteenth day before the * Calends of Auguſt, ſo notorious for a twofold loſs and overthrow; upon which day at Cremera the Fabii were all ſlain, and after at Allia an unfortunate field was fought, even to the utter ruin and deſolation of the City, they named of the latter misfortune, Allienſis: and ſet this unlucky mark upon it, That it ſhould be reputed unmeet and inconvenient for any buſineſs as well publike as private. Some think, becauſe upon the next day following the * Ides of July, Sulpitius the Tribune Military could not by ſacrifice find any tokens of happy ſpeed, nor obtain the grace and favour of the gods; whereupon three daies after, the Roman hoſt fell ſhamefully into the hands of the enemies: therefore, the morrow alſo after the Ides was interdicted, and men were commanded to forbear and abſtain from doing ſacrifice: and thereupon likewiſe, the day next following the Calends and the Nones, were by tradition held as ominous and diſmall as the other. L M

But long they might not quietly ſit about the deviſing of means to reform the Common-weal, and ſet it upright again after ſo grievous and dangerous a fall. For of the one ſide, the Volſcians, their old enemies, took arms, intending the finall deſtruction of the Roman name. On the other ſide, the Merchants brought news, That the Princes and chief of all the Nations of Hetruria were banded and confederate together in a Diet held at the Temple of Voltumna, to make war upon them. Beſides a freſh and new fear came upon them by reaſon of the rebellion of the Latines and Hernicks, who after the battell at the pool Regillus, for the ſpace almoſt of an hundred years, had continued faſt in loyall league and amity with the people of Rome. Therefore being thus greatly affrighted on every ſide, that all the world might ſee apparently that the State of Rome was not only hated of her enemies but deſpiſed alſo of her allies: it was thought good and reſolved upon, that by his direction and rule, the Common-wealth ſhould now be maintained and defended, by whoſe conduct and guidance it was relieved and recovered: and that M. Furius Camillus ſhould be created Dictator. He being declared Dictator, named Q. Servilius Hala for Generall of the Horſemen. And having proclaimed a law-ſteed (or vacation from Courts of Law) he took muſter of all the younger ſort and ſerviceable men: but ſo, as the elder people were not left out, as many as were of ſtrength ſufficient for ſervice. Unto whom he likewiſe miniſtred the military oath of Alleageance, and enrolled them by hundreds in the muſter book. When he N O

A had thus levied a power of men, and furnished them with armour, he divided them into three parts. The one he opposed against Hetruria in the Country of Veij: another he commanded to lie encamped before the City. Over these A. Manlius a Tribune military was made Captain: those which were sent against the Tuscans had L. Æmylius for their Commander. A third part he himself led against the Volscians: and not far from Lanuvium (the place is called Ad-Metium) he began to assault their Camp. The enemies had put themselves on this their journey, with a kind of scornful contempt, as thinking the whole manhood in a manner of Rome, was by the French clean spent and wasted. But when they heard once, that Camillus was the Lord General, it stroke such a fear and terrour among them, that they were glad to defend themselves by the strength of B their trench and rampier, yea, and to fence it round about with huge-piled heaps of wood and trees, that their enemies might have no passage to enter in upon their munitions. Which when Camillus perceived, he gave order to set on fire that Barricado which stood in his way. And as good hap was, the wind was big and high, and blew full upon the enemy. So that not only he made way by fire, but also with the flames thereof that went toward the Camp, with the vapour likewise and smoke, and the crackling noise of the green wood, he so amated & astonied the enemies, that the Romans had less ado to pass the trench and pallisado, into the Camp of the Volscians, than in getting over the mound and enclosure consumed with fire. Having thus defeated and slain his enemies, and won withall the Camp in the same brunt, the Dictator gave the whole spoile unto the souldiers: which to them was so much the more welcome, as they less hoped for it at their
C General his hand: who was never known to be lavish of gift, and over-liberal in dealing rewards. After this he followed them that fled, in chace, wasted and forraged their whole country, and at length (in the seventieth year of the war) he wholy subdued the Volscians, and forced them to yield subjection. After this conquest, he departed from thence against the Æquians, who likewise made preparations for war. Their forces he surprised and defeated at Bola, and assailed not only their Camp, but also forced the City, and at the first assault won both.

But whiles fortune smiled thus, what way soever Camillus went, as being the only stay of the Roman state: so on another side the fear of peril greatly encreased. For the Tuscans well near all up in arms, lay before Sutrium, and besieged it being in league with the people of Rome. Whose Embassadours came unto the Senat to entreat for succour in their distress, and had a decree granted unto them, that the Dictator with all speed should rescue the Sutrines. But being so straightly D beleaguered, that they might not abide the delay of this their hope, for that the townsmen, who were but few in number, were over-wearied with working, watching, and bloudy fighting, (all which lay still upon the same men without intermission) they were driven by composition to surrender up the City to the enemies: and being disarmed and sent away with a single sute of apparrel (after a piteous sort all a-row) departed the town, & left their dwelling places. But see, it fortuned that Camillus at the same time came in the very manner with the Roman Army and met them. At whose feet the multitude all sorrowful lay prostrate: their Nobles and chief men in this extremity fell to beseech him to be good unto them: the women and children which went along with them, as partakers and companions of their exile, seconded them with woful tears and lamenta-
E tions. But he willed the Sutrines to forbear their mourning plaints, and give over their dolefull moan: saying that he brought the Tuscans heavy and weeping cheer. Then caused he his souldiers to lay down their packs and load, the Sutrines likewise there to abide with a mean guard, and his men to follow him with armour and weapons only. Thus marched he forward with his Army lightly appointed for ready expedition, and advanced before Sutrium. Where; according to his expectation, he found the enemies all careless and secure (as commonly it falleth out upon a prosperous success.) No warders, no corps de guard quartered before the walls, the gates wide open, the Conquerours here and there sacking, rifling and flinging the goods out of their enemies houses. So was Sutrium in one day twice won. The Tuscans (for all their former victory) were hewn in peeces on every side, by a new-come enemy. They had no time to cast themselves
F round nor gather together into one place, no, nor to take weapon in hand: whiles every man for life, made in all haste to the gates, if haply any way they might escape into the fields. But when they came thither, the gates they found fast shut, for so the Dictator had given order afore-hand. Hereupon some betook themselves to their weapons: others (namely, such as hapned to be armed when this sudden tumult surprised them) fell to call their fellows together for to begin a skirmish: which no doubt in that desperate case of the enemies had been hotly fought, had not the Criers and Trumpets which were sent into all parts of the City, made proclamation to lay down their weapons, to spare them which were unarmed, and that none should have any harm but those that were found in arms. Upon this, even they who in that extremity and despair were fully bent to fight it out, for hope of life on all hands flung away their weapons: and thus disar-
G med as they were (for as the case stood, it was the safer course) presented themselves to the enemy. A great number of them were bestowed in several places, and were attended upon with good guards. And before night the town was delivered again unto the Sutrines, safe and sound without any hurt at all done unto it, as being not won by force, but surrendred upon composition. Camillus then returned with triumph into the City of Rome, victor at one voyage in three sundry wars. The greatest number by far, of prisoners, whom he led before his chariot in triumph, were Tuscans: whom he sold in port-sale at the spear, and raised such a sum of mony, that when he had had out of it repaid the dames [of Rome] to the worth of their gold, there were of the ſurpluſage H thereof three bouls made of maſſie gold: which with the title and inſcription of Camillus his name, were for certainty, before the Capitol was burnt to be ſeen in the chappell of Jupiter ſet up and beſtowed at the feet of Juno.

The ſame year, there were enfranchiſed and made Citizens of Rome, ſuch Veientians, Capenates and Faliſcians, as in the time of thoſe wars were fled to the Romans: and for theſe new Citizens were certain lands ſet out. Thoſe alſo, who for idleneſs loath to build at Rome, were gone to Veii, there to inhabit the vacant houſes, were by an Act of the Senat recalled home from thence. And they at the firſt, grumbled & refuſed to obey: but after that a day was ſet them, & they threatned upon pain of death to return again to Rome; as ſtout as they were, and obſtinate all of them I together, now for fear every one became obedient. As Rome now increaſed in number of inhabitants, and became well peopled: ſo on all hands in every place they fell to building new edifices: whiles the Common-wealth ſomewhat eaſed them of charges, and the Ædiles by vertue of their office called hard upon them, haſtning them forward as to a publike work; yea, and every man pri-
Rome new built. vately made all ſpeed poſſible, according as each ones need required, to make an end and finiſh his own houſe. So as within the year the City was new built and ſtood on foot again.

At the years end was the great Election held for Tribunes military in Conſuls authority. Wherein were created T. Quintius Cincinnatus, Q. Servilius Fidenas the fifth time, Julius Tullus, L. Aquilius Corvus, L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, Ser. Sulpitius Ruffus. One army they ſet out and led againſt the Æquians, not to war with them (for they granted themſelves conquered) but upon K meer ſpight and deadly hatred, to waſte all their borders utterly, and to leave them no power and ſtrength to enterpriſe any new rebellion. The other, into the territory of Tarquinii. Where, two towns of the Tuſcans, Cortuoſa and Contenebra, were by aſſault won and raſed. At Cortuoſa was no reſiſtance made. For the Romans ſurpriſed them on a ſudden, and at the firſt ſhout and impreſſion they were maſters of it: The town was ſacked and burned. As for Contenebra, it endured the aſſault for ſome few daies: but the continual labour, ſlacking neither day nor night overcharged them: wheras the Roman Army divided into ſix parts, fought ſix hours in their ſeveral turns round one after the other. And the townſmen being but few, and thoſe overtoiled, were fain without any ſupply, ſtill to maintain freſh skirmiſhes. Whereupon at laſt they retreated back & yielded, giving the Romans leave to enter the City. The Tribunes were of mind and thought good, that the L ſpoil ſhould be confiſcat and go to the common treaſury: but the commandment and proclamation was more ſlack than their purpoſe on that behalf. For whileſt they lingred and protracted time, the ſouldiers already had ſeiſed in their prizes: and taken from them again without much offence and hatred, the booty could not be. In the ſame year, becauſe the City ſhould not flouriſh in private buildings only, the Capitol was alſo built of ſquared aſhler ſtone: A piece of work even The Capitoll built of ſquare ſtone. in this ſo glorious eſtate, and magnificence of the City, to be had in price and eſteemed excellent. And now before this time, the Tribunes of the Commons, whiles the City was buſied about their buildings, began often to move for the Laws Agrariæ (about the diviſion of the lands) in all their aſſemblies and ſpeeches before the people. For to draw them on and to ſet forward their hope, they preſented unto them very often the Pomptine Territory, which then above all others, ſo pre- M ſently upon the ſubduing and ſubverſion of the Volſcians by Camillus, was, no doubt, the rightfull poſſeſſion of the people of Rome. Complaints were made, that thoſe grounds ſuſtained much more detriment and damage by the Nobility, than they had received before from the Volſcians. For they, ſo long only as they were able to bear arms and maintain war, made inrodes thither: but the Noblemen forcibly entred and made havock in the poſſeſſions of the common lands: and unleſs (before they had ſet ſure footing there, and got all into their hands) a diviſion were made, the Commons ſhould never enjoy one foot of ground there. Theſe Remonſtrances of the Tribunes little moved the Commons, both becauſe few of them reſorted to the common place of aſſemblies, whiles they plied their building: and alſo for that money was away, and their purſes ſo emptied in the charges of workmen, that they had little mind of holding thoſe lands, which to ſtore N and ſtock they were not able.

The City was now given much to their devotions and religions, and the rulers alſo ſomewhat ſuperſtitious upon their late calamity: Inſomuch as they minded to renew the Auſpicia [or the ſolemnity of preſages taken by bird-flight] for ſome errour ſuppoſed therein: and therefore they agreed that the government ſhould return to an Interreign. So there were Interregents one after

Valerius Potitus*. Valerius at length held the aſſembly for to elect Tribunes Military in Conſuls authority, and created L. Papirius, Cn. Sergius, L. Æmylius the ſecond time, L. Licinius, T. Valerius Publicola the third time. Theſe preſently after the Interreign, began their government. That year, the Temple of Mars vowed in the Gauls war was dedicated by T. Quintius, a Duumvir deputed for the executing of holy duties. O Four new Tribes adjoyned to Rome. Four Tribes of new Citizens were now adjoyned, Stellatina, Pomatina, Sabbatina, Arnienſis. and theſe made up the number of the 25 Tribes. And now L. Sicinius a Tribune of the Commons, was in hand with the people in greater number aſſembled together, about the Pomptine lands: and more enclined they were and forward to hearken after grounds, than they had been afore. And whereas it was moved in the Senat houſe, to make war upon the Latines and the Hernicks, that matter was not followed, but put off to a further time: by reaſon of preparation for a greater war,

A Hetruria was already up in arms. And all was laid again upon Camillus his ſhoulders, who was made Tribun Military with Conſuls authority, and had five other brethren in office joyned unto him Ser. Cornelius Maluginenſis, Q. Servilius Fidenas the ſixth time, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, L. Horatius Pulvillus, P. Valerius. In the beginning of the year, the minds of men were turned clean away from the careful regard they had of the Tuſcan war, by reaſon that a number of people that fled out of the Pomptine country, came all of a ſudden in great haſt to the City, and brought word, that the Antiates were up in arms, that the nations of the Latins had ſent their able youth to that war cloſely underhand, thereby diſavowing it to be any action of the State and ſtanding upon this point, that by the covenant there was no proviſo, but that voluntary ſouldiers might ſerve B in what wars ſoever they would. Now had the Romans been well taught, and learned, to ſet light no more by any wars. The Senat therefore thanked the Gods, that Camillus was in place of government, who if he had been a privat perſon, was no doubt to have been nominated and created Dictator: yea, and his companions in office confeſſed frankly that he was the only man to have the ſoveraign and abſolute Regiment of all, in caſe there were any fearful and dangerous war toward: and were fully reſolved, to yeeld up all their intereſt in government unto him, thinking it no diſparagement at all unto them, nor any loſs of their own honour and reputation, in conferring the ſame upon the Majeſty of ſo worthy a perſon. The Senat highly commended the Tribuns, and Camillus was much abaſhed in his mind, howbeit he gave them hearty thanks, and ſpake in this wiſe. "A weighty burthen (quoth he) I ſee is impoſed upon me by the people of C "Rome, in that they have elected and nominated me Dictator now the fourth time: a greater "charge is enjoyned me by the Senat; the whole ſtate and body of which order, hath delivered to "ſingular good opinion and judgement of me: but the heavieſt load of all is laid upon me by the "exceeding kindneſs and obſequious benignity of theſe my honourable brethren and collegues. "If any painful travel of mine therefore, and watchful care may be redoubled, I wil earneſtly en- "deavour, I wil ſtrain and ſtrive to anſwer thereunto: that the opinion which the City with ſo "great conſent hath conceived of me, right as it is exceeding great, ſo it may continue ſtill and be "perpetual. As to that war of the Antiats, there are more brags and threats than any danger "and peril from thence. But as I would counſel and adviſe you to be afraid of no war, ſo I would "not have you to be careleſs and ſecure of any. The City of Rome is beſet on every ſide: partly D "envied, and partly hated of her neighbour borderers. Need there is both of more Captains, and "alſo of more armies, to manage the affairs of the Common-weal. I think it good therefore "(quoth he) O Valerius, that you aſſiſt me in government and counſel, and have the leading to- "gether with me of certain legions againſt the Antiat enemies. That you Q. Servilius, with an- "other army wel appointed, and in readineſs, lye encamped hard by the City ſide, having an "eye and good regard, leſt either Hetruria in the mean while, (as of late dayes) or the Latins and "Hernicks (who trouble us now afreſh) break out and make ſome riſing. Aſſured I am, that you "wil behave your ſelf, and quit you in this ſervice ſo worthily, as may anſwer the famous me- "mory of ſuch a father and grandfire as you have had, may beſeem your own honourable per-E "ſon, and thoſe ſix Tribunſhips which you have already performed. As for L. Quintius, let "him leavy a third power of men, conſiſting of thoſe that are by reaſon of ſickneſs or otherwiſe "excuſed for warfare, and are above the ordinary age for military ſervice, to be in ſtead of a gari- "ſon for defence of the City and the Walls. Let L. Horatius provide harneſs, weapons, corn, and "other neceſſaries for war, at all occaſions whatſoever. Finally, O Sergius Cornelius, we your fel- "low Tribuns, ordain you Preſident of this publick Councel, the Cuſtos and keeper of Religion "and Church-matters, of general aſſemblies, of the Laws and all other civil affairs of policy what- "ſoever. Now when they had all made promiſe, and that moſt willingly to do their endeavour in performing their ſeveral charges, Valerius whom he had joyned with himſelf in commiſſion, added moreover and ſaid, That as he would take M. Furius to be Dictator, ſo would he F be unto him again in ſtead of his Coronel of Horſemen. And turning to the Lords of the Senat, exhorted them, that what opinion they had of one only Soveraign General, the ſame hope they would conceive of the whole war. The Senators hereat took great joy and contentment, giving out willingly with one accord, that they hoped exceeding wel of war, of peace, and generally of the State. Neither ſhall the Common-weal (ſay they) ever ſtand in need of Dictator, ſo long as ſuch Magiſtrats be in place, ſo jointly agreeing in one mind together, ſo indifferent and ready as well to obey as to rule, and rather yeelding their proper praiſe to the honour of the Common-weal, than diſmembring and plucking from it to their private glory and reputation.

The Oration of M. Furius Camillus to his companions in government.

After a Vacation or Law-ſteed proclaimed, and the Muſters taken and paſt: Furius and Valerius ſet forward to Satricum: whither the Antiats had not only ſent the flour of all the Volſci, G the choice youth out of a freſh fry and new generation; but alſo had raiſed a mighty power of Latins and Hernicks, out of thoſe Nations that by long peace were moſt freſh and luſty. Theſe new enemies and old thus combined together, troubled the minde of the Roman ſouldier, and made him to ſtartle. Which when the Centurions reported to Camillus, as he was Marſhalling and ſetting his battels in array; and that in theſe terms; to wit, that the hearts of his ſouldiers were diſquieted and diſmayed, that they took themſelves but ſlowly to their weapons, made ſtaying and idling when they ſhould come forth of their tents, yea, and that there were ſome of them overheard to ſay, that, They muſt fight one to an hundred, and that ſo great a multitude of their enemies (if they were unarmed) might hardly be encountred, much leſs, being ſo well armed H and appointed: he mounted preſently upon Horſeback, and rode before the enſigns, and then turning himſelf afront his army, traverſing between the ranks and arraies; "What heavineſs is The Oration of M. Furius Camillus to his ſouldiers. "this my ſouldiers (quoth he) what means this ſtrange and unwonted lagging behind? Why?

"Know ye not your enemy? Know ye not me? Or, know ye not your own ſelves? The enemy, "what is he elſe but the perpetual matter and ſubject of your valour and glory? And ye again are "the men, who under my conduct (to ſay nothing of the winning of Falerii and Veii, and of the
"ſlaughter of the Gauls Legions, put to the ſword by us, even when our native City was by them
"taken, and they maſters thereof) of late, and but the other day, made a three-fold triumph, upon
"a triple victory, over the ſame Volſcians, Æquians and people of Hetruria. What, do ye not I
"agnize and accept me for your General, becauſe not as Dictator, but as Tribun, I gave you the "watchword, and put out the banner of battel? For mine own part, I ſtand not much upon ab"ſolute and ſoveraign command over you: no more likewiſe ſhould ye regard ought elſe in me,
"but mine own ſelf. For never yet did my Dictatorſhip make me hauty and ſet me up aloft, no "more than my baniſhment abated my courage and caſt me down. We are the ſame men ſtill all "of us: and ſince we are come to this war, furniſhed with the ſame means that we carried with "us unto the former, let us look for the ſame event of our ſervice, and no worſe. So ſoon as ye
"ſhall encounter and joyn battel with them, perform each one that which he hath been taught "and wonted to: the journey ſurely will be ours, and they (no doubt) ſhall run away. Then after "he had ſounded the battel, he alighteth from his Horſe, and caught the enſign-bearer that ſtood K next him, with his hand, haled him forward againſt the face of the enemy, crying very often aloud, On afore with thy banner, Port-enſign, and advance forward, ſouldier. When they ſaw that Camillus in perſon, a man well ſtept in years, and thereby weak to perform the parts of bodily ſtrength, put himſelf forth againſt the enemy: all at once they preſſed forward, ſet up an outcry and ſhout-ed, every man calling upon his next fellow, to follow their General for ſhame. Over and beſides, ſome ſay that by the commandment of Camillus, there was an enſign flung into the very battel among the enemies. Whereupon they of the forefront, beſtirred themſelves luſtily to recover it again. And thereby were the Antiates firſt diſcomfited, and the fear not only came upon them in the vanguard, but entred alſo and reached as far as the rereward, that ſtood ready for ſupply.
And as the violent force of the ſouldiers, provoked by the preſence of their Captain, much trou- L bled the enemy: ſo nothing more daunted the hearts of the Volſcians, than the very ſight of Ca- millus himſelf, when they chanced to eſpie him. So ſurely carried he the victory with him, which way ſoever he went! And that appeared moſt evidently in this, That when he ſaw the left wing at the point to give back and run away, he took himſelf in all haſt to his Horſe, rode thither with his light footmans buckler, and with his only preſence renewed the fight; ſhewing unto them how the reſt of the battel had the better. Now were the enemies put to the worſt, and the victory enclined to a ſide. But their multitude both hindred themſelves in their flight: and alſo a long peece of work the wearied ſouldiers of the Romans had to put ſo great a number, all to the ſword. But behold, there fell a great tempeſt of rain all of a ſudden, which powred down with ſo mighty winds and ſtorms, that it rather put them by the execution of aſſured victory, than parted any M battel or ſtayed the fight. Whereupon the retreat was ſounded: and the night enſuing, whiles the Romans were at reſt, made an end of the war. For the Latins and Hernicks forſook the Volſcians and departed home, with as ill ſpeed, as their enterpriſe was bad. The Volſcians ſeeing themſelves abandoned and left in the lurch by them, (upon whoſe truſt and confidence they had Satricum won. rebelled) quit the camp and field, and put themſelves within the walls of Satricum; whom Ca- millus at firſt began to beſiege, caſting a trench and rampier about them, raiſing baſtillons and plat-forms againſt the Town. And ſeeing his munitions and fabricks by no ſallying forth of the enemies impeached, he ſuppoſed there was no ſuch courage in them, that he ſhould need to ſtand ſo long about the hope of victory: and thereupon, encouraged his men not to wear themſelves out in a tedious and toilful piece of ſervice, as if they lay at the ſiege of Veii: aſſuring them that the N victory was in their hands already: and ſo with exceeding cheerfulneſs of his ſouldiers, he ſet ladders upon every ſide, ſcaled the walls, and entred the Town. Then the Volſcians flung away their weapons and yeelded themſelves.

But the General his mind was bent upon a greater exploit, and that was the winning of Anti- um, being the ſeat Town of the Volſcians, and from whence the beginning of the laſt war aroſe.
Howbeit becauſe ſo ſtrong a City might not be won without great preparation of artillery, ordinance & engins of battery, leaving his collegue behind him with the army, he went himſelf to Rome, to perſwade with the Senat for to deſtroy and raſe Antium utterly. And whiles he was emparling with them (ſuch was the will of God I believe, that Antium ſhould ſtand ſtill & continue longer) there came Embaſſadors from Nepet and Sutrium, craving aid againſt the Tuſcans, ſaying: That it O was more than high time, that they were ſuccoured and relieved. Upon which occaſion it fell out, that Camillus was withdrawn thither from Artium. For ſeeing that thoſe two Towns ſtood even againſt Hetruria, as it were the very keyes and bar-gates from thence: both the enemies laboured to gain them afore-hand, againſt the time that they went about to make new wars; & the Romans alſo held it a matter of great conſequence, to reſcue and defend thoſe frontier Towns. The Senat therefore thought good to be in hand with Camillus, for to leave Antium, and to undertake the war with the Tuſcans. The City-legions under General Quintius, were appointed unto him.

And

A And albeit, he rather would have had the leading of that army, which lay now in the Volſcians Country, and which he had good tryal of, and were acquainted better with his government, yet refuſed he nothing: only he required to have Valerius his aſſociat ſtill, and joyned with him in commiſſion. So Quintius and Horatius were ſent to ſucceed Valerius in the Volſcian war. Furius and Valerius took their voyage from the City to Sutrium, and found the one ſide of the Town poſſeſſed already by the Tuſcans. On the other ſide, the Townſmen, for that the enemy had ſtopped all paſſages between, hardly able to repel the force of the aſſailants. But the coming of the Roman aids, and the name beſides of Camillus, (ſo highly renowned as well amongſt the enemies as Allies) both for the preſent gave them heart to abide the brunt, and ſtick to it ſtill that B were before at the point to give over: and alſo gained time and reſpit to come in with freſh ſupplies and ſuccours. Camillus therefore divided his forces, and gave direction to his collegue, for to bring about his power, to that ſide which the enemies held, and there to make an aſſault: not ſo much for any hope he had by ſcaling the walls to win the City; as by withdrawing the enemies thither, not only to eaſe the Townſmen of their toil, and give them a breathing time (who were now wearied with aſſaults) but alſo to get himſelf ſome opportunity and vantage, to enter the City without skirmiſh and reſiſtance. Which being put in execution on both hands accordingly, and performed at once: the Tuſcanes beſet with a two-fold fear round about, ſeeing the walls aſſailed moſt fiercely one way: and the enemy got within the Town another way: flung out at one gate (which as it hapned was not beſet) and in great haſt all together ſought to eſcape C away. But as they fled, they were ſlain by heaps both within the Town and abroad all over the fields. The greater number were killed within the walls by Furius his ſouldiers. Valerius his men were more ready and nimble in the chaſe, and gave not over the execution until the night came, that they could not ſee and diſcern them.

Sutrium recovered.

When Sutrium was thus recovered and reſtored again to their allies they led forward the army to Nepet: which Town the Tuſcans held wholly, as ſurrendred already into their hands. Every man thought it would be a buſie peece of work to win that City again: not in this regard only, that it was fully in the enemies poſſeſſion, but alſo becauſe ſome of the Nepeſins, by treaſon had yeelded it up. Howbeit, they reſolved to ſend unto the heads and principal citizens, that they ſhould ſever themſelves from the Tuſcans, and perform on their behalf truſty and faithful loyalty, D like as they had craved and beſought at the Romans hands their friendly help and protection. From whom they received this anſwer again, That it lay not now in them to do any thing at all, for that the Tuſcans kept the walls, and warded the gates. Whereupon they firſt terrified and ſcared the Townſmen with foraging and ſpoiling their territory: after that, ſeeing they made more reckoning of keeping their faithful loyalty to their enemies unto whom they had lately ſurrendred, than obſerving the league with their friends, which they had long before concluded; they provided themſelves out of the fields of a number of faggots, of bruſh wood, and ſuch like trouſs, and ſo approached the City with the army, filled up the ditches cloſe to the walls, ſet ladders to, and at the firſt ſhout and aſſault given, the Town was taken. Then proclamation was made, that all the Nepeſines ſhould part with their armour and weapons, and ſo many as were found unarmE ed, ſhould be ſpared. But the Tuſcans, as well armed as unarmed, were put to the ſword every one. As for the chief authors that perſwaded the Nepeſines to deliver the Town to the enemies, they were beheaded. The harmleſs multitude had their goods reſtored, and ſo the Town was left with a garriſon. Thus the two Tribuns (Conſular) having regained out of the enemies hands two confederat Cities, returned in great glory to Rome with their victorious army.

Nepet taken.

The ſame year the Latins and Hernicks were required to make amends for harms done, and reſtitution of goods wrongfully detained: and the cauſe demanded why of late years, according to a covenant in that behalf provided they had ſet forth no ſouldiers to the Romans wars. Anſwer from both Nations in their ſolemn Councels was returned: "That neither the fault was general, "nor proceeding from counſel of the State, in caſe ſome of their youth ſerved under the Volſcians: F "and yet themſelves had well payd already for their lewd and raſh projects, in that not one of "them was come home alive. And as to the not ſending forth of ſouldiers, the cauſe was, for "that they were in continual fear and danger of the Volſcians: which noiſome plague (as it "were) ſticking ſo cloſe unto their ſides, unleſs they could be rid of, notwithſtanding ſo many "wars one in the neck of another. When relation hereof was made unto the Lords of the Senat, they thought ſo well of their anſwer and excuſes, that they deemed they had quarrel and occaſion good enough to war upon them, if they might have had while and time as well to follow it.

The excuſe of the Latins and Hernicks.

In the year following, when A. Manlius, P. Cornelius, Titus and Lucius Quintius, both Capitolini, and L. Papirius Curſor the ſecond time, were Tribuns Conſular, there aroſe a grievous war G abroad, and a more dangerous ſedition brake forth at home. The war, from the Volſcians, banded with the Latins and Hernicks, that were fallen away and revolted. The ſedition (where it was leaſt feared) from a perſonage of noble linage deſcended, of great name and reputation, M. Manlius Capitolinus. Who being a man of too lofty and hauty a minde, deſpiſed all other of the Nobility, and envied one above the reſt, M. Furius, ſo ſingular, as well in regard of his honourable dignities, as his worthy parts and commendable vertues. He could not brook and endure, that he only ſhould ever be Lord General in the field: who now was exalted ſo high above others, that even thoſe who were created with him in equal authority, he accounted not as his peers and fellows, but employed as his Ministers and Servitors. "Whereas (quoth he) if H

"men would weigh aright, and duly consider every thing, M. Furius could never have delivered "his Country from the siege of the enemies, had not the Capitol and Castle cliff been saved by "me afore. Camillus set upon the Gauls, when they were amused in receiving their gold, when "they were upon terms of peace, and their hearts quiet and secure: whereas my self chased them "away whiles they were in arms, and at the point to win the Castle Hill. In that exploit of Ca-
"millus the souldiers, had each one his share proportionably of the glory, who together with "him did their parts: but in the service performed by me, no earthly creature was fellow and "partner with me. With these conceits he fed his own humour, and puffed up his proud spirit, being withal by corrupt disposition of nature, hot and hasty, arrogant and insolent. Discontented I besides, that of the Nobility, his gifts and qualities were not esteemed of that worth, as in his own judgement they deserved: first, of a Senator he became popular, and began to break his mind, and impart his designs unto the Magistrats of the Commons: finding fault with the Nobility, and complaining of them: soliciting and inveigling the Commons, to cast a liking and favour toward himself: carried away with the vain gale of the peoples opinion: not guided by sage counsel and discretion: and in one word, chusing rather to be of great name, than of good and honest report. And not contenting himself to deal in the Laws Agrariæ, about the division of Lands, which had alwayes ministred to the Tribuns of the Commons matter enough of mutinies and se-ditions; he began to intermeddle between the debtors and their creditors, and to overthrow all keeping of credit. And indeed, deep debts are sharp goads, and prick shrewdly: threatning K not only poverty and shame, but also terrifying the bodies of free men with hard imprisonment, little ease, and Irons. Now there were exceeding many far in debt (a thing most dangerous and hurtful to mens state) even of the richer sort, by reason of their great expenses defrayed in building. The war therefore of the Volscians, which was it self of great importance, but much more, in regard of the Latins and Hernicks Rebellion withal, was in shew pretended, as a cause to seek for to have a more soveraign and absolute power to govern the State: but in truth, these new designments and plots of Manlius, rather than the war, forced the Senat to creat a Dictator. And A. Cornelius Cossus being created, nominated for his General of Horse, T. Quintius Ca- pitolinus. The Dictator, albeit he saw a greater contention toward, at home than abroad, yet (were it that the war required some speedy expedition, or because by victory and triumph, he L thought to make his Dictatorship more mighty and powerful) he took musters, and set forward into the Pomptine Land, into which parts he had intelligence, that the Volscians had proclaimed their forces, to repair.

A digression of the author.

I doubt not, but they that read in so many books already, of these continual wars fought with the Volscians, besides their tedious satiety of reading, will muse also at this (which to my self was likewise a wonder, when I perused the writers that lived neer about the times of these acts) how these Volscians and Æquians, so often vanquished and defeated, were furnished with supply of souldiers to maintain their wars. But seeing by the ancient Chroniclers it hath been overpassed with silence, what should I alledge, but only mine own opinion and bare conjecture, which every man hath liberty to put in for himself? Likely it is, that either between the times of wars (as now M we see in the Roman musters) they used to breed up one supply under another, of the younger sort, to the maintenance and renuing so oftentimes of their war: or that their armies were not alwayes levied out of the same States, albeit the wars go under the name of one and the self-same nation: or that those countries yeelded in those dayes an infinit number of freemen, which now are well near wast and desart, but for some Roman slaves, which keep those parts yet from being void and dispeopled, as having but a very small seminary, or none at all, left, of serviceable souldiers.

Certainly, the Volscians army, as all authors agree, was very great at this time: albeit of late dayes by the leading and conduct of Camillus they were sore weakned, and their strength much abated. Besides, there were with them in field, the Latins and Hernicks, some of the Circeians, and other Coloners from Velitræ. The Roman Dictator having that day pitched his camp, and N the next morrow come abroad with happy tokens of good speed from the Birds: having also slain a sacrifice, and procured thereby the favour and grace of the Gods, in joyous manner shewed himself unto his souldiers: who according as they were commanded, were ready early in the morning, by break of day in arms, attending the sound of Trumpet for battel. The day is ours (quoth he) my valorous souldiers, if either the Gods or their Prophets can foretel future events.

The Oration of A. Cornelius Cossus Dictator to his souldiers.

"Therefore as resolut men of assured hope, and such as shall encounter with far meaner than our "selves, pitch we our javelins down at our feet, and draw our swords only. Neither would I "have you to run out of the main battel, and to give the charge, but to keep your ground, to "stand stedfast, and abide the first shock of the enemy. And when they have spent their volley of "shot in vain, and shall with full force come upon you as you stand, then brandish your swords, O
"and let them glitter in their eyes, and think every man of the Gods, that they will help the Ro"mans. The Gods I say, which in happy hour, by the lucky approbation of their Birds, have "sent us into the field to fight. And as for you, O Quintius, keep your Horsemen close to"gether, marking advisedly the first beginning of the skirmish: and when you see the battels "buckle together pell-mell, and come to hand-strokes, whiles they are busied and occupied one way, fright them another way with your Horsemen, ride among their ranks as they fight, and break their arraies. Thus fought both Horse and Foot according to his direction. And

A as the legions wanted not a worthy Captain, no more misſed the Captain of happy ſpeed. The multitude of the enemies truſting upon nothing but their own number, which they meaſured and compared together only by their eye, interviewing both the one army and the other, raſhly gave battel, and as raſhly gave over again. In ſhout only and ſhot ſhewing themſelves hot and eager at the firſt encounter: but were not able to abide the ſword-fight, the cloſing together foot to foot, and the firy countenance of their enemies, which for the very heat of their courage, ſhined and gliſtered fully in their eyes. So the forefront being put back, a fear came upon them likewiſe, that ſtood behind for ſupply, and withal, the Horſemen for their parts ſet to and fought moſt terribly. Whereupon the ranks of the enemies in ſundry places were broken and all ſet out of B order, ſo as their battailons ſeemed to flote and wave up and down to and fro, in ſuſpence whether to fight or flye. Afterwards, when they ſaw the formoſt ſmitten down and ſlain, and every one thought no other but his own turn was next to be killed, they turned their backs and fled. The Romans came forward ſtill and chaſed them. And ſo long as they went their way armed and thick hudled together, it was the footmens work to purſue them: but when it was perceived once, that they flung away their weapons on all hands, and that the enemies army fled diſperſed all abroad in the fields: then were the troups of Horſemen ſet out after them, with this caveat and charge, to make no ſtay and forlet the time, by killing them one by one, and ſo to give the main multitude of them in the mean while ſufficient reſpit to eſcape: but that they ſhould content themſelves, only to let flye ſome ſhot amongſt them, and by ſcaring them to hinder their running: and when C they were ridden beyond, to croſs upon them and ſtay them, until the footmen might overtake them, ſlay them down right and make an hand of them clean. Thus fled they, and thus were they followed in chaſe until night. The very ſame day was the Volſcians camp taken and ranſacked, and the whole pillage, beſides the bodies of free men, was given unto the ſouldiers. The greateſt part of the priſoners were Hernicks and Latins: and thoſe not of the common ſort, and ſuch as might be thought to have ſerved for pay: but there were found among them certain young Gentlemen of good mark, a plain proof and evidence, that the Volſcian enemies had aid from thence by the publick and general warrant of the State. There were known alſo to be among them ſome of the Circeians; yea, and certain of the Veliterne colony likewiſe. All of them were ſent to Rome. Where being examined before the chief of the Senators, they confeſſed every one in plain terms, the re-D volting of their own Nation like as they had before bewrayed it unto the Dictator. The Dictator ſtill kept his forces together within the ſtanding camp, making no doubt, but that the rulers and Senators of Rome would determine to war upon thoſe countries.

The Volſcians defeated.

But even at that time a greater heap of troubles which aroſe at home, cauſed him to be ſent for to Rome, by occaſion of a ſedition which grew daily more and more: and by reaſon of the Author thereof (a man of quality and note) was more feared than any uſually had been afore time. For now by this, had M. Manlius not by ſpeeches only, but by plain deeds alſo, (which in outward ſhew ſeemed popular and plauſible) ſhewed evidently upon what troubleſome and tumultuous ſpirit all proceeded. For ſeeing upon a time a Centurion, of good worth for his ſervice in war, condemned in an action of debt, and upon an execution of judgement carried to priſon:
E he in the mids of the Forum, came running unto him with a rout and crew of his followers and retinue, laid hand on him, and took him perforce from the officers: and after he had given out ſome words aloud touching the pride of the Senators, the cruelty of the uſurers, the calamities of the Commons, the valour and preſent diſtreſs of the party; Marry then (quoth he) have I done a great deed, to no purpoſe, in ſaving the Capitol and the Caſtle with this right hand of mine, if I could abide to ſee my fellow ſouldier (as if he were taken priſoner of the Gauls by way of conqueſt) had away into bondage and captivity, and laid up faſt in gyves and fetters. And therewith openly in ſight of all the people paid the whole debt downright on the nail, unto the creditor: and ſo after the uſual and ſolemn ceremony by a braſen peece of coin and the ballance, he ſet him at liberty out of the creditor his hands, and let him go at large; "Who prayed hear-F "tily to God and man, for to requite accordingly M. Manlius his only deliverer, and the very "patron and protector of the Commons of Rome. And when he was once got into that unruly "and ſeditious throng, he preſently himſelf ſet all a madding, ſhewing the ſcars of his wounds "received in the Veientians and Gauls wars, and in other ſervices one after another: ſaying, "That whiles he thus followed ſouldiery, and rebuilded his houſe that was deſtroyed, he became "indebted, and that ſo deeply (by reaſon that the intereſt alwayes overgrew the principal, which "he by that means had paid and paid again) that he was not able to creep out of the uſurers book, "but was plunged therein over head and ears. And now behold (quoth he) by the only good-"neſſe of M. Manlius, I have the liberty again to ſee the light of the Sun, to behold the Com"mon place, to look my neighbours and fellow citizens in the face: at his hands I acknowledge G "to have received all the benefits that mine own parents could give me: unto him I vow what"ſoever in me is left, and in his quarrel to ſpend that little life and blood which remaineth in my "body: and in one word look what priviledge I may injoy in right of my country, and in the "communion of the Gods, publick or private, the ſame do I impart and communicate with that "one man. By theſe ſpeeches the Commons were ſet on and pricked forward mightily, as wholly devoted unto one perſon; and who but Manlius now in every mans mouth? And preſently in the nick he entred into another action that tended more effectually to mar all quite, and to ſet every thing out of order. His Land in the territory of Veii, which was the chief and capital

The mutinous ſpeeches of a Centurion.

Manor of his inheritance, even the faireſt flower of his garland, he ſet upon ſale, cauſing it openly H to be cryed; and ſaid withal, I will not O Quirites, ſo long as I have one foot of ground, or any thing elſe left, ſee one of you condemned and upon execution carryed to priſon. This ſet them ſo a flote, that they were ready, as it ſeemed, to follow him as the only protector of their liberties, in any action, were it right or wrong, they cared not which way, all was one with them. Be-ſides, at home in his own houſe, he ſpared not to caſt out ſlandrous ſpeeches againſt the Senators, as if he had been at the open Croſs, making Orations. Amongſt which, without all regard whether he ſpake true or falſe, he let fall theſe words, "That the Senators kept in ſecret certain hid"den treaſures of the Gauls gold, and were not now contented to hold in poſſeſſion the com"mon grounds, but they would alſo embezle the treaſure publick, which if it came abroad, the I "Commons might ſoon be acquit and diſcharged of their debts. This gap being once laid open, and this light given the people, they thought (ye may be ſure) an unworthy indignity, that when there was gold to be levied for redemption of the City out of the Gauls hands, it then ſhould be gathered by a general contribution of all: and the ſame gold, now recovered from the enemies, ſhould be as a prey in the clutches of a few. Therefore they followed inſtantly upon him and were very earneſt to know, where ſo great a maſſe of mony and ſtoln good was hidden. But when he poſted them off, and ſaid he would in due time diſcloſe all: they were not content, but ſetting all other matters apart, their whole care was employed about this buſineſs, and nothing elſe. So as it plainly appeared that neither he ſhould reap a mean thank if he reported a truth, nor incur a ſmall offence and diſpleaſure, in caſe he told a falſe tale. K

Things hanging thus in theſe doubtful terms, the Dictator who was ſent for, returned from the army into the City. The next day he aſſembled the Senat: and after he had throughly ſounded and felt the minds of them, that were there met, he commanded the Senators not to depart from him: and aſſiſted as he was with that company, he cauſed the Ivory chair of eſtate to be ſet in the Comitium or common Hall, and ſent a ſerjeant for M. Manlius. Who being thus peremptorily ſummoned by the Dictators expreſs commandment, gave warning by a token to his complices and favourits, that there was a broil and fray toward: and with a mighty retinue of his followers, he preſented himſelf before the Tribunal. On the one ſide, ſtood the Senators, on the other the Commons: either part beholding their Captain, as it were in a pight field ready to joyn battel.

"haſt put the City in ſome good hope, that by the Gauls treaſure which the principal and chief

"trary-wiſe I would exhort thee, O M. Manlius, to eaſe the Commons of Rome of the uſurers

"out the Uſurers againſt the Commons: and that againſt my ſelf, for the favour that the multi"tude beareth unto me, there is matter deviſed to charge me withal, and to procure my utter "ruin and overthrow. Doth it offend and grieve you indeed, O A. Cornelius, and you my Lords "of the Senat, that the people thus ſtand about me on every ſide? Why do not ye every man for N "his part, by your good deſerts divide aſunder this company, and draw them away with you from "me? Namely, by your mediation and interceſſion, by giving your word for them, by ridding "out of gyves and priſon your fellow citizens, by ſaving them that are condemned, from being "awarded to the thraldom of their creditors, and out of the overplus and ſuperfluity of your own
"living and goods by relieving their preſent need, and ſupplying their neceſſities? But what mean
"I to perſwade you to forgo any thing of your own, and beſtow it upon them? Take another

"citizens and people? Certainly, I can make no better anſwer hereunto, than if one ſhould ask me, O
"wherefore I alone ſaved the Capitol and the Cliff? As I then yeelded my helping hand to all in "general. ſo will I now to my power relieve each one in particular. For as touching the treaſure

"For what need you ask me that which you know already your ſelves? Why lay you not that "open which is in your ſecret boſom, rather than to have it ſifted and bolted out? but that there

A "hide it even from the eyes of those that are watchful and quicksighted. And therefore am not
"I to be forced to reveal and shew where your stoln goods are: but you would be made, if you "were well served, to bring them abroad into the view of the World. At these words, the Dictator commanded him to leave off these fooliſh vapourings and trifling ſhifts: urging him either to go through with his challenge and prove it true: or if he could not juſtify it, to confeſs that he had falſely ſlandred and wrongfully charged the Senat, and ſought to bring upon them the ill will and hatred of men, for a vain ſurmiſe and ſuſpition of Theevery. But as he ſtoutly inferred and replied again, that he would not ſpeak at the pleaſure of his enemies, nor owed them any ſuch ſervice: he commanded him to be had away to priſon and kept in bonds. And as he was B apprehended by the Officer, "O Jupiter (quoth he) Optimus Maximus, O Iuno Queen of heaven, M. Manlius apprehended.
"O Minerva, with other gods and goddeſſes, that inhabit the Capitol and the Caſtle; Suffer ye "your Knight and Defender, to be thus tugged, miſuſed, and evil entreated by his adverſaries?
"And ſhall this right hand wherewith I defeated the Gauls, and drave them from your Chap-
"pels and ſhrines, be now pinnioned and manacled? There was no one man there, that ſaw and heard him, who could indure this indignity. But this City, as moſt patient of all other Cities to abide any juſt, righteous and lawful commandment of the Magiſtrate, contained her ſelf and was content in ſome caſes to be overruled: ſo far forth, that againſt the authority and abſolute power of the Dictator, neither the Tribuns of the Commons, nor the Commons themſelves, durſt either caſt up their eyes to look awry, or once open their mouths. But after Manlius was com-
C mitted, it was for certain known, that a great ſort of the Commoners, changed their weed and put on their worſt apparel and mourning array: many a man let his head and beard grow long; yea, and a number of them with ſad and heavy cheer, kept commonly about the Goaldore.

Now when the Dictator triumphed over the Volſcians, his triumph bred him more hatred and diſpleaſure than honor and glory: for it is commonly ſpoken, that he got it at home and not abroad, and triumphed over a citizen not over an enemy: and this only wanted, (ſay they) to make up his pride to the full, that Manlius was not led before his chariot. Whereupon there was like to grow much ſcandal and very ſedition. For the appeaſing and mitigation whereof, the Senat upon a ſudden, without any motion made, of themſelves became bountiful, and aſſigned 2000.
D citizens of Rome to be ſent to Satricum to inhabit as a Colony. And to every man was ſet out Satricum made a Colony, and peopled with Romans.
two acres and an half of Land apiece. Which the Commoners conſtrued to be a matter of nothing, a ſmall boon beſtowed upon a few, the very hire and reward for betraying Manlius. So that this proved a miſchief for a remedy: and by this ſalve, the ſore rather feſtered and rancled, than healed up, and the ſedition thereby fretted more and more. For now the crew of Manlius his followers made ſhew of greater mourning and heavineſs, in their vile clothes and ſad countenance, after the guiſe of perſons accuſed during the time of their troubles. And when the fear and terrour was once overblown, by reaſon that the Dictator after his triumph reſigned up his authority, then folks hearts were ſet at liberty, and their tongues walked at will. Some were heard in open audience to upbraid the multitude and caſt in their teeth, "That it was their fa-"afterwards, in the very pitch of danger and point of downfal, to forſake and leave them deſti-"tute. Thus was Sp. Caſſius ſerved, that ſollicited the Commons to the diviſion of Lands: thus "was Sp. Melius overthrown, that put his hand to his purſe, and at his own proper charges kept

"extream famine from the hungry jawes of the poor citizens. Semblably, M. Manlius endea"vouring to deliver a great part of the City (drowned as it were and overwhelmed in debt) and "to enlarge them and ſet them abroad at liberty, now for his pains is betrayed unto his deadly
"enemies: ſo that the Commons do feed and frank up, even for the ſhambles and butchers knife
"the fautors and maintainers of their weal and liberty. And ought indeed (ſay they) a Noble
"man, that ſometimes had been Conſul, thus to be miſuſed, if he anſwered not to the good liking

"not a preſent and ready anſwer at the time: was there ever any ſervant and ſlave, for leaſing caſt
"in priſon and laid up in Irons? And how could they forget that night, which was like to have "been the laſt night that ever the Romans ſhould have ſeen: that fatal night of their final deſtru-
"ction for ever? Or how could they chuſe, but have ſtill in their eye the army of the Gauls, climbing up the Cliff Tarpeia? and how M. Manlius in perſon, ſo bravely beſeen in his armour,
"all ſweating, all bleeding, reſcued and ſaved Jupiter himſelf in a manner out of the enemies hands?
"What? Did they think that with half-pound meaſures of wheat meal, they had ſufficiently re-

"to draw his lively breath at the pleaſure of the Hangman? Was he alone able to ſuccour you all,
"and are ye all not able to help him alone? Thus ceaſed not the multitude to exclaim and make their plaints, and would not depart from that place, no, not all the night long, but threatned to break the priſon by force; until ſuch time as they got that remitted, which otherwiſe they would have wreſted, and Manlius by an act of the Senat was releaſed out of priſon and enlarged. Whereby the mutiny was never the more ended, but rather a Captain given them to maintain the Sedition.

About

About the same time the Latins and Hernicks, the inhabitants also of the Colony Circeia, and they of Velitre, who came to excuse themselves for the Volscian war, wherein they were charged to have had their hands, and required to have the captives delivered, for to proceed against them, according to their own Laws, had a heavy answer. But the Coloners received the sharper check and rebuke, because they being Roman citizens, were entred into that wicked plot and abominable action, to combine against their native Country. And they were not only denied their prisoners, but also (wherein the Romans dealt more favourably with the rest that were their Allies) were warned and commanded in the name of the Senat, to avoid and that with speed out of the City, from the sight and presence of the people of Rome; for fear lest the priviledge of Embassage, provided for the security and safe conduct of forrainers and not of citizens, should not serve to protect them. Now when the Sedition of Manlius was set on foot again, somewhat before the end of the year, the great assembly was holden for the Election of Magistrats: wherein there were created Tribuns in Consuls authority Serg. Cornelius Maluginensis the second time. P. Valerius Potitus the second time, M. Furius Camillus the fifth time. Ser. Sulpitius Ruffus the second time, C. Papirius Crassus, T. Quintius Cincinnatus the second time, all of Senators calling.

In the beginning of this year, peace they had with forrain nations; a matter very commodious both for the Senat and the Commons. For the Com. in this regard, that being not called away by any musters, they had some good hope (especially having so mighty a champion) to be rid at once for ever of usury. For the Senators again, because their minds being not distracted by any fear from abroad, might attend about curing and healing the intestine maladies at home. When both parts therefore were now more sharp set, and eagerly bent, they thought out of hand to trie what would be done, and to make either a shaft or a bolt of it. Manlius calling the Com. to his house, devised with the principal heads of them both day and night, to bring in a change and alteration of the State: and fuller of stomack, anger and gall he was now a good deal than aforetime. Netled he was, the rather by his late disgrace and shame, who never before had been touched in credit, nor tasted of any reproach and contumely. Heart he took unto him, for that the Dict. durst not execute that rigor against him, which Cincinnatus Quintius had extended upon Sp. Melius: and it seemed unto him, that not only the Dict. sought to wind himself out, and in resigning up his room, to avoid the offence given by his imprisonment; but also that the very Senat was not able to endure the manner of proceeding. With these imaginations being puffed up and galled too, he failed not withal to prick forward and exasperate the minds of the Commons, who of themselves already, were kindled and set on fire. And with these and such like speeches he entertained them. "How long (quoth he) I pray you, will ye be ignorant, and not know what "ye may do, and what power ye have? A thing that nature it self would not have so much as "the very dumb beasts, but to understand. Do but count how many you are in number your "selves, and how few adversaries ye have against you. If ye were but one to one, yet (I would "think) you should more eagerly strive for to maintain your liberty, than they, to set up their "Lordship. For, look how many favourits ye have been, following and courting one patron, so "many shall ye now be opposed to one enemy. Make but shew only of war, ye shall have peace. "Let them see you once ready to make head and offer violence, soon will they yeeld and part "with their right; Either ye must adventure, all joyntly together to do somewhat, or else make "account each one, to abide and suffer all. How long will ye stand looking from every side upon "me? I for my part, surely, will not fail any one of you. Look ye then to it, that fortune fail "not me. I, even I, that was your redeemer and deliverer, was all at once (when it pleased mine "enemies) taken down and made no body. And ye, all of you saw him led to prison, who saved "every one of you from prison. If happily those mine enemies should attempt to do me more "spight, Where am I then? and what were I best to trust unto? Should I look for that end that "Cassius and Melius came unto? Ye do well to signify how you dread the presage, and "wish the contrary. And the Gods forbid that it should so come to pass. But look not "that ever they should come down from Heaven to protect me. That mind they must "give you, to preserve me from so hard a hap, like as they gave me a resolute heart, both "in mine armour to save you from barbarous enemies, and in my gown to defend you from "proud citizens. Is there so little courage in you (so mighty a people otherwise) as to think "it sufficient, and to stand contented, if you may be backed only, and meet with some help "against your enemies; and to know no other scufling with your adversaries (the Senators) but "wherein you suffer your selves to be commanded in the end? This baseness cometh not to you "by kind. By use and custome only, you are become their vassals and subjects. For what is the "cause ye are so couragious against your enemies abroad, that ye think it meet and reason to rule "and govern them? No other in truth but this, because with them you have been ever wont to "strive for soveraignty, whereas against these ye have been used rather, to make some slight proof "and tryal what you may do by your liberty, than to do your best, and to put your selves forth "for to maintain it and extend it to the most. And yet what manner of captains soever ye have "met withal to lead you, and howsoever affected ye have been your selves, obtained ye have hi-"therto all things that ye shot at, were they never so great: Such was your might, or such was "your felicity. Wherefore now it is high time to give the adventure of greater matters also. "Make but tryal only of your own good fortune, and of my self, whom I hope ye have had happy

"experience

A "experience of already: with leſs ado ſhall ye be provided of one to over-rule and command the " Senators, than ye have been hitherto of thoſe, that were to reſiſt only their imperious govern" ment. Down we muſt with theſe Dictatorſhips and Conſulſhips both, and lay them levell with " the ground: that the commonalty of Rome may once be aloft, and bear up the head. Beſtir
" your ſelves therefore, and play the men. Hinder proceſs and courſe of law for actions of debt.
" I profeſs my ſelf a Patron of the Commons, which name my care over you, my faithfulneſs to " you, hath indued me with. And if you pleaſe to entitle your leader and Captain, with a more glorious * ſtile of honour and Majeſty, ye ſhall find it more potent and available to effect that which you long for and deſire. And ſo from that time forward, began ſome practiſe to ſet up the B Government of a King: But neither who were the agents in this action, nor to what terms theſe plots proceeded, is it plainly enough recorded. But on the other ſide, the Senators ſat in Councel, and debated about the Seceſſion and ſecret meeting of the Commons in the privat houſe of Manlius, and that houſe, which ſtood (as it fell out) upon the Caſtle Hill: likewiſe of that imminent engine and fabrick, deviſed for the overthrow of the preſent liberty. Many were of opinion, and ſpake it aloud, That there was need of a Servilius Hala, who not by commanding a publick enemy of the State to priſon, would provoke him and make him more eager; but by diſpatching of one wicked member out of the way, and cutting him off, might end this inteſtine and civil war.
But they came down at length, and grew to a reſolution, in words milder, yet indeed and effect all one, That the Magiſtrates ſhould have a careful eye, that by theſe miſchievous plots and practiſes of C M. Manlius, the Common-weal incurred no dammage and hurt. Then the Tribuns in Conſuls authority, and the other Tribuns of the Commons (for even they alſo ſeeing, that in the loſſe of the publick liberty of all, their power likewiſe ſhould come to an end, had yeelded to be adviſed and ruled by the Senat) laid all their heads together, and conſulted what courſe was beſt to be taken.
When as no man could bethink of any way, but plain violence and bloudſhed (a peece of work in all appearance, of great adventure and doubtful hazard) then M. Menenius, and Q. Publius, two Tribuns of the Commons ſtepped forth and ſaid. " What mean we to make that, a quarrel be" tween the Senators and Commons, which the whole body united of the City, indeed ſhould un" dertake againſt ſo dangerous and peſtilent a member? Why trouble we our ſelves to ſet upon " him and the Commons with him, whom by the means of the very Commons themſelves, it were D " the ſafer courſe, and leſſe offenſive to aſſail? that being ſurcharged and overweighed with his " own power whereupon he preſumeth, he may fall down and take his overthrow. We are " fully minded to arreſt him, to convent him judicially, and call him to his anſwer. Nothing is " leſſe popular, and more odious to the people, than to hear of Kings government again. The " multitude ſhall not ſo ſoon ſee and perceive, that our quarrel is not with them, but that they " ſhall become his competent Judges, and paſs upon him, who now are his Advocats: alſo, that " his accuſers from out of the Commons, ſhall behold one of the Nobility to hold up his hand at " the bar, and the inditement framed, upon the crime of uſurping the Kingdom: but (be ye ſure
" of it) they will tender and favour the fair looks and perſon of no man, before the cauſe of their " own free eſtate. When all the houſe liked well, and allowed of this adviſe and overture, they E made no more ado, but ſerved Manlius with proceſs to anſwer at a day appointed. Which was not ſo ſoon done, but the Commons at the very firſt, began to ſtorm and be enraged, eſpecially when they ſaw the accuſed man, during his trouble ſo rufully arraied, accompanied with none of the Senators, nor ſo much as one of his kindred and affinity, no, nor his very brethren Au. and T. Manlius. A thing before that day never ſeen nor known, but that in ſo great a danger as this was, the neereſt kinsfolk in bloud, did change their weed. For even when Ap. Claudius his adverſary, yea, and the whole linage and name of the Claudii, were mournfully clad, and poorly apparelled. Now ſurely (ſay they) it is a very compact amongſt them all, that this popular man, ſo gracious and welbeloved, ſhould be confounded and overthrown, becauſe he was the firſt that ever fell away from the Senators to the Commons. When the day was come of his arraignment, F I can find in no author, what was objected againſt the priſoner by his accuſers, directly tending to prove the crime of aſpiring to a Kingdom, but only the conventicles of the multitude, certain ſeditious words, his overmuch largeſs, and his forged ſurmiſe and falſe information of the gold. I doubt not but there was matter of great importance, urged and enforced againſt him, ſeeing that the Commons delay in proceeding to his condemnation, was not long of his cauſe, but occaſioned by the place only. This one thing ſeemeth worthy to be noted, and for all mens learning, that how notable and how great ſoever his honor, worſhip, and commendable parts were; the foul and curſed deſire of tyrannical rule, made not only unpleaſant and without grace, but alſo odious and deteſtable in the eyes of the people. He brought forth, as it is reported, welneer four hundred men, whom he had laid out mony for gratis, and without any intereſt or conſideration: G thoſe whoſe goods he ſaved from port-ſale, and kept from the bondage of their creditors, after they were condemned. Over and beſides, he not only reckoned up, but ſhewed alſo in open ſight, the honorable teſtimonies of his ſervice in the wars: as the ſpoils of his enemies by him ſlain and diſarmed, to the number of 30. gifts beſtowed upon him by Generals in way of reward
40. amongſt which were two goodly * mural garlands for ſcaling and entring upon the walls firſt: eight * civick coronets for ſaving the lives of citizens in danger. Moreover, he preſented there in place, the parties themſelves in perſon, whom he had reſcued out of the enemies hands:
and amongſt them he nominated C. Servilius at that inſtant General of the Horſemen, and now

abſent. And when he had rehearſed his noble feats of arms, and amplified them according to the height of their worth in a moſt glorious and eloquent Oration, as one whoſe words were ſutable and anſwerable to his deeds: at the laſt he ſtript his breaſt bare, and ſhewed the ſcars there remaining of wounds received in the wars: and ever and anon looking to the Capitol, very often he called aloud upon Jupiter and the other Gods, to help him now in this extremity and peril of his ſtate: and prayed that the ſame mind which they had given him to defend the Capitol cliff, and even to the ſafegard of the people of Rome, they would vouchſafe the ſame people, in this diſtreſs of his woful calamity: beſeeching them both all and ſome, to look up to the cliff, and to the Capitol, to turn themſelves toward the Gods there, and ſo to proceed to judgement of him. All the whiles the people were cited and called by their Centuries, and the priſoner ſtretched forth his hands, and converted his prayers from men to the Gods; the Tribuns evidently ſaw that unleſs they freed the eyes of the people from beholding the memorial of ſo great a deſert, it would never be that ſo long as their minds were thus foreſtalled and poſſeſſed with that benefit of his, they would find the enditement, were it never ſo true. So the matter being put off and deferred to another day, the people were ſummoned to aſſemble in the grove Petelinus, without the gate Flumentana, from whence they might not have a ſight of the Capitol. There the accuſation prevailed more than compaſſion, and the matter went againſt him: and ſo with hard and obdurat hearts, they pronounced a heavy and dolorous ſentence, and which the very judges themſelves had in horror. Some there be that ſay there were Duumvirs ordained for the purpoſe, to make inquiſition and ſit upon this treaſon againſt the State. Thus being condemned the Tribuns cauſed him to be thrown headlong down the rock Tarpeia. Which place was the ſelf ſame that yeelded to that one man a monument and memorial both of ſingular glory, and alſo of extream puniſhment and ignominious death. After his death there remained two infamous marks behind him of ſhame: the one publick, occaſioned by his dwelling houſe. For whereas it was ſituate, where now the chappel and work-houſe, or mint-houſe of Moneta ſtandeth, an Act was propoſed unto the people, That none of the Senators linage ſhould dwell on the cliff or Capitol Mount. The other proceeding more properly from his own line and kinred: For that by a general decree of the houſe of Manlii it was provided, That none of that family and race ſhould ever after bear the name of M. Manlius. This was the end of him, who, but that he was born in a free City, had been a right worthy and renowned man.

But the people being now paſt all danger from him, calling to mind and conſidering without all affection, his vertues as they were, found a miſſe of him ſhorly after. Yea, and for the peſtilence alſo which enſued ſoon upon, for that there could be no cauſes known of ſo great mortality, was imagined of many a man, to have grown upon the execution of Manlius: arguing thus, That the Capitol was polluted with the blood of the Saviour thereof: and the Gods took no delight and pleaſure to have (as it were) preſented unto their eyes, the puniſhment of that man, by whoſe means their Temples had been delivered out of the hands of the enemies. Upon this plague and ſcarcity of corn withal, and the common brute that ſpread abroad both of the one and the other, there enſued the year following many wars, when as L. Valerius the fourth time, A. Manlius the third time, Ser. Sulpitius the third time, L. Lucretius, L. Æmylius the third time, and M. Trebonius were Tribuns Military in Conſuls authority. For beſides the Volſcians, who by deſtinie were appointed for ever in a manner to buſy and keep occupied the Roman ſouldiers; beſides the Colonies Circeia and Velitre, which a long time were about to rebel; beſides Latium, that ſtood in doubtful terms and was ſuſpected, the Lanuvines alſo, who had been a moſt faſt and loyal City, all of a ſudden roſe and became new enemies. The LL. of the Senat ſuppoſing all this grew upon contempt, for that the revolting of the Veliterns, who were their natural citizens, had ſo long time eſcaped puniſhment, decreed with all ſpeed to move the people to denounce and proclaim open war againſt them. And to the end that the Commons might be more forward in this Military ſervice, they created certain Quinqueviri for the diviſion of the Pomptine Lands: and Triumviri for the planting of a colony at Nepet. Then they propounded unto the people, that they would appoint and determine of the war to be made. And notwithſtanding the Tribuns of the Com. laboured earneſtly, but all in vain, to diſſwade, yet the tribes throughout generally granted it, and gave their voyces for war. All that year paſſed in preparations only, but no army ſet forth by reaſon of the plague: which protracting of time and long delay, gave the inhabitants of the Colonies reſpit to ſue unto the Senat for peace. Many of them were inclined and ſtood thus affected, to ſend a ſolemn embaſſage with humble ſupplication to Rome: but that (as commonly it falleth out) the publick peril was entangled and intereſſed with the jeopardy of ſome privat perſons: and the authors of the backſliding and revolt from the Romans, fearing leſt they alone ſhould bear all the blame, and be delivered up as a ſacrifice to ſatisfy the wrath of the Romans, turned away clean and alienated the Colonies from all conſultation of ſeeking for peace. And not only in their Councel-Houſe was this Embaſſage then croſſed, but many of the Commons alſo they excited to invade the territories of Rome, to drive booties, and make ſpoil. This new wrong by them offered, clean put them by all hope of peace. In that year was the firſt rumour raiſed, concerning the Rebellion alſo of the Preneſtines. And when the Tuſculans, Gabines, and Lavicanes, into whoſe marches they had made inrodes, complained unto the Senat, and laid much matter againſt them they received at their hands ſo calm and cold an anſwer, that it ſeemed they gave leſs credit to their complaints, becauſe theſe were not willing they ſhould prove true.

Five officers called Quinqueviri created.

A The year following, Sp. and L. Papirius, new Tribuns Military with Consuls authority, led the legions to Velitre, whose four Collegues, Ser. Cornelius Malugmensis the fourth time, Q. Servilius, C. Sulpitius, L. Æmylius the fourth time, were left Tribuns behind for defence of the City; and for fear lest they should hear some intelligence of new and fresh stirs out of Hetruria, where they suspected all would be naught. At Velitre they had the better hand of their enemies: there they found more Prenestins well neer, that came to succour, than the very Coloners themselves. For the City was so neer at hand, that it both gave the enemies occasion to flye the sooner, and yeelded them the only place of safe refuge, after they were fled. The Tribuns forbare to assault the Town, as well in regard of the dangerous enterprise, as also for that they B thought it not good to hold fight to the utter destruction of that Colony. Letters were dispatched to Rome with tidings of victory, implying more sharp informations against the Prenestins than the Veliterns. So by an Act of the Senat and assent of the people there was proclaimed war against the Prenestins; who in the year following joyned with the Volscians, and by force wan Satricum a Colony of the people of Rome, notwithstanding it was manfully and valiantly defended by the Townmen even to the last; where most beastly and cruelly they exercised their victory upon those that they took prisoners, and put them to the sword. The Romans took this in a very ill part: and elected M. Furius Camillus Tribun Military the seventh time: who had for his companions in office, A. and Lucius Posthumius Regillensis, L. Furius and L. Lucretius, and M. Fabius Ambustus.

The cruelty of the Prænestins.

C The Volscian war was appointed to Camillus extraordinarily: and to assist him therein, it fell to L. Furius his lot, one of the State-Tribuns, not so much for the good of the Common-weal, as to minister unto his fellow all matter of honour and renown: as well in publick, (for that he set all upright again, which by the rashness of Lucius was faln down) as also in private, for that out of his errour and misdoing Marcus Furius, rather sought for thanks and love at his hands, than aimed at any vain glory to himself. Camillus was now far grown and stept in years and very aged, and when in the assembly for Election, he was about to take the usual form of oath, for to excuse his feeble and crasy body, the people with one consent would not permit him. Howbeit for all his age, he caried a lively spirit and lusty courage with him still: his senses were all fresh and sound: and the late civil affairs had stirred him up and gave him an edge, who now had no
D great mind to manage martial exploits. So he gathered a power of four legions, consisting of 4000. apiece, and made proclamation that all his forces should be ready the next day, at the gate Esquilina, and then he put himself in his journy to Satricum. The enemy who had won the Colony, nothing dismaid therat, and trusting in the number of his souldiers, wherein he had the better by ods, expected and stayd his coming there. And so soon as he understood that the Romans approached, forthwith came into the field, minding without delay to put it to an hazard and try it out: presuming, that the skill of the Romans General, were he never so singular (in whom their enemies only trusted) would little or naught avail, in regard they were so few in number. The Roman army was as hot as they, and one of their Generals as forward every way. And presently without any stay, had they tried the fortune of a battel, but for the policy and rule
E of one man; who by holding off, and protracting time of fight, sought so to help himself through good order and skill. But so much the more the enemy urged still, and was more sharp set: so as now he not only ranged his men before his own camp in battel array, but also set forward into the mids of the field: and advancing himself with ensigns displayed, neer unto the trench and rampier of his enemies, made a proud bravado and shew of his strength, whereupon he bare himself so confidently. This could the Roman souldiers hardly endure: and L. Furius one of the Tribuns Military, had more ado by far to digest and put up that at the enemies hand. And a venturous Knight he was, both by reason of his youthful years and natural disposition: and also puffed up with hope of the multitude, which commonly taketh heart, and presumeth upon smallest grounds, and buildeth upon greatest uncertainties. And the souldiers being of themselves al-F ready hot enough, he inflamed and set them more on fire, by elevating and making light of his fellows reputation, in regard of his old age, the only thing that he could alledge: giving out ever and anon, "That wars were for young-men, that mens hearts flourished and faded as their L. Furius to his souldiers.
"bodies did; which was seen in Camillus, who of a most valorous and forward warrior, was "now become a draw-back and a temporiser, and one that would take his leisure: and he that "was wont, so soon as he came to a place, with the first assault to win Forts and strong Towns,
"now within his mures and rampier sat still and trifled out the time. And what hopes had he?
"Dreameth he, that either his own power should encrease, or his enemies strength decrease?
"What occasion, what opportunity of time, what place of vantage for ambush laid he for?
"Tush, these policies and inventions of the good old man, are cold and dull, God wot. In faith, G "Camillus, as he hath lived long enough, so hath he gained glory enough. To what purpose then
"(quoth he) should we suffer the whole puissance of a City, which ought indeed to be immor"tal, for to age and wax old with the body of one man, whom all men see to be but mortal. With these and such like words he had drawn away the whole camp after him: and when from all parts thereof, they called hard, and cryed for battel; "We are not able (quoth he) M. Furius, to L. Furius to "keep in and repress any longer the violence of our souldiers: and as for the pride of the enemy, M. Furius.
"whose courage by our delayes we have encreased and who insulteth over us, it is intolerable.
"Give place then, you that are but one man, and yeeld unto us all. Suffer your self to be over-

"full well, that I have a companion joyned with me, in government & rule of equal commission;
"for the prime and lustiness of youth, much above me, and my better. And as to the army, I have
"indeed been used ever to command, and not to be commanded: but yet my fellows authori"ty, I cannot be against. Let him do in Gods Name, what he thinketh good for the Common"weal, and God speed his hand. Only in regard of mine old age I crave this favour, that I may "not be set in the forefront: but for other labours, look what an old man may or ought to do I
"in war, therein surely I shall not fail. And this one thing would I crave at the hands of the im"mortal Gods, that some notable mishap befal not, to make my former counsel good and praise"worthy. But neither would men be ruled by his advise so profitable and wholesome, nor the Gods vouchsafe to hear his prayers so holy and devout. Then Lucius Furius, the author and principal perswader of battel, setteth the vangard in array. Camillus he fortifieth the Regiments and Squadrons for supply in the rereward: but above all, he placeth a strong guard before the camp.
Himself took up his standing on a higher place, to behold and mark the issue of another mans counsel. So soon as at the first brunt and encounter, they rustled and made a noise with their armour, the enemies on purpose (of policy, and not for fear) gave footing and lost ground. Now, there was behind them on their back a prety rising of an Hill, between their camp and the battel: K and by reason that they were well stored of men, they had left behind them in the camp certain strong companies armed and well appointed: with this instruction, that whiles both armies were hard in fight, and when their enemies should come neer their trench and rampier, they might sally out on a sudden upon them. The Romans following out of measure upon the enemies as they retreated, were drawn upon the disadvantage of the ground, and gave occasion and fit opportunity unto the enemy to issue out of the camp upon them. So the terror returned upon the supposed victors, by reason both of the new supplies of the enemies, and also of the fall and descent of the Hill: and forced the battel of the Romans to give back. The Volscians that charged them from out of the camp, and were fresh and lusty, pressed hard upon them: they also that made as though they fled, began now to fight again. The Romans souldiers forgetting now both their late lusti- L backs on all sides, fled amain by heaps, and ran away toward their own camp. Whereat Camillus being by them that attended about his person, mounted upon a good Courser, and with all the speed he could make, opposing the Squadrons of the rereward against the enemy: "Is this (quoth

"he) the fight, you souldiers, that ye so called for? what God, what man can ye lay the weight
"on now? It was your rashness and fool-hardiness afore: and it is your dastardly cowardise
"now, and nothing else, that is the cause of all this. Followed ye have already one General.
"Follow Camillus now a while: and as ye have been alwayes wont by my leading, once more "win the victory. What look you toward the hold and the camp? there is no coming thither, "there is no being there for any of you without victory. At the first they were ashamed, and M stayd themselves from farther flight: but after that they saw once the ensigns wheel about, and the Squadrons turn again, they made head, and charged the enemy amain. And the General himself, a man renowned for so many triumphs, and besides, for his venerable age so revered, even amongst the formost ensigns, amid the greatest perils, and most distresses, advanced forth in person. Hereupon every one for his part, set the better leg forward, provoked his fellow withal, and encouraged one another, so as with a cheerful and lively shout, the whole field rang again. Neither was the other Tribun behind hand for his part: but being sent by his Collegue unto the Horsemen (whiles he in the mean time marshalled again the Footmen in order) not by way of chiding (for what might he avail thereby, so long as he was himself in fault as well as the rest?)
but laying aside all Lordly command, fell wholly to entreating, and besought them both all and N

"sage advise of one. Camillus (come what will of it, speed you well, or speed you ill) seeth the "glory will be his: but I, unless the battel be revived, shall take such part as you all, (a most mi"serable and pitious case) but the shame will redound and light upon my head and none else.
Well, at length they agreed, and thought it best to abandon their Horses to bestow them among the waving and disordered companies, and on foot to make head upon the enemies. Thus they go both together, as bravely minded with resolution, as they were richly and gorgeously armed. And in what part soever they saw the footmen most distressed, there wanted neither in the Generals O nor in the souldiers, courage in the highest degree to fight it out lustily. Well was it seen by the happy event, that valorous endeavours speed ever well. For the Volscians the same way that erewhile they made semblance of giving ground upon a counterfeit fear, now fled in good sadness The Volscians defeated. as hard as they could. A great number both in the conflict, and after in the chase were slain. As for the rest that remained in the camp, which presently at one brunt was won, more of them were taken prisoners than killed. In the view & account taken of the captives, there were some of them known to be Tusculans, who were severed apart from the rest, and brought before the State-

A State-Tribuns. And upon examination, confeſſed flatly, that they ſerved by the publick warrant of the City. Camillus herewith diſquieted, for fear of war from ſo neer neighbors, ſaid he would forthwith have thoſe priſoners with him to Rome, that the Lords of the Senat might not be ignorant how the Tuſculans were revolted from their ſociety. In the mean while, his brother Tribun might, if he ſo pleaſed, have the regiment of the leaguer and the hoſt. That days work had taught him now, not to prefer his own ways before the better counſel of another. And yet neither he himſelfe, nor any man elſe in the army, thought that Camillus would quietly digeſt this fault of his, whereby the State of the Commonwealth was driven upon ſo dangerous a point of downfal. And as wel in the hoſt, as alſo at Rome, it was riſe and currant in every mans mouth:
B that whereas the fight with the Volſcians was variable, and the ſervice doubtful: for the ill ſpeed, the diſcomfiture, and the running away, L. Furius was all in fault: but for the good ſucceſs, Camillus only had all the honour.

When the captives were brought into the Councel Houſe, and the Lords of the Senat were of opinion and determined war againſt the Tuſculans, and had laid the charge thereof upon Camillus, he requeſted to have an aſſiſtant joined with him in Commiſſion: and being left to his own choice to take whom he would of all his Companions in office, contrary to all mens expectation, he choſe L. Furius. By which moderation of his affections, and good carriage of himſelf, he both delayed the infamy of his Collegue, and wan himſelf great glory and commendation. Yet for all this, proceeded not they to any war with the Tuſculans. For they by their conſtant obſervation The prudent diſſimulation of the Tuſculans:
C of peace, kept off the violence of the Romans, which by force of arms they had not been able. When the Romans entred and invaded their territory, they went not ſo much as out of thoſe places that lay neer the high way, whereas the enemy marched: they forlet not the tilling of their grounds, but kept the gates of their City wide open, came forth ſolemnly in their long gowns to meet with the LL. Generals in the way, and brought victuals right courteouſly to ſerve the army, as well out of the City as Country. Camillus having pitched down his tents before the gates, and deſirous to know, whether there were the ſame appearance of peace within the wals, as bare ſhew abroad in the Country, entred the City: and ſeeing the doors ſtanding open, the ſhop-windows up, all kind of wares ſet out to ſale upon the bulks: the Craftſ-men and Artiſans buſily every one occupied at his work: the Grammar ſchools ringing again with a chirm of ſcholars, learning and D ſaying their leſſons; the ſtreets full of women and children amongſt the other common people going to and fro about their buſineſs: he could perceive no where about him any thing that carried a reſemblance of fearful men, no, nor ſo much as of thoſe that made any wonder at their coming in that warlike order. Thus caſt he his eyes into every corner, ſeeking where this war ſhould be. For there was not ſo much as any token to be ſeen, either of ought removed out of the way, or brought in place, upon this preſent occaſion; but all in ſo ſetled quietneſs and peace, as if they had ſcarcely heard any inkling or rumor of hoſtility. Being therefore overcome with this patience and ſufferance of the enemies, he cauſed their Senat to aſſemble, unto whom he ſpake in this wiſe: "Ye alone to this day of all that I know, O Tuſculans, have found the only armor of Camillus to the Senat of Tuſculum.
"proof, and the forcible ſenſe indeed, to ſave your ſelves and all ye have from the Romans ire.
E "Go your ways to Rome unto the Senat there. The Lords of the Councel wil weigh and conſider, "whether ye deſerved more puniſhment before, then pardon now. I wil not foreſtal and pick my "ſelf a private thank for a publick benefit. At my hands ye ſhal have this favour and liberty, to
"ſpeak for your ſelves and plead your own cauſe: as the Senat ſhal think good, ſo ſhal you ſpeed
"of your ſuit. After that the Tuſculans were come to Rome, and their Senat (who but a while afore had been faithful Allies and kept their allegeance) ſeen to ſtand waiting with heavy cheer, and giving their attendance at the entry of the Court and Councel Chamber: the Lords of the Roman Senat, were preſently moved thereat, and cauſed them forthwith to be called in, and received by way of hoſpitality, more like then hoſtility. Then the Dictator of Tuſculum made this ſpeech and ſaid: "Right honorable Senators, we againſt whom ye have proclamed and made war, The Dictator of Tuſculum to the Senat of Rome.
F "came forth to encounter your Generals and Legions, armed and appointed as ye ſee us at this "preſent ſtanding in the porch of your Councel Houſe. This was our array, this was the habit of "our Commons, and always ſhal be, unleſs at any time we ſhal put on arms for you and in your "quarrel. Thanks we yeeld to your Captains and to your Armies, that they have beleeved rather "their eyes than their ears: and where they ſaw no hoſtility at all, there they offered none themſelves. That peace which we have ſhewed and obſerved, the ſame crave we humbly ſtill at the "hands of your clemency. Turn we beſeech you from us your forces thither, where war is to be "found. And if we muſt needs make trial (by ſuffering ought) of your puiſſance and power bent a-"gainſt us, we will try it ſurely without armor. This is our full reſolution, God grant it prove "as fortunate, as it is well meant and proceeding from a ſingle heart. As for the treſpaſſes, where-G "upon ye were moved to denounce war againſt us: although it be bootleſs and to no purpoſe to "diſprove that by words, which by deed is already proved: yet ſurely, were they never ſo true,
"we think verily, that without prejudice to our ſelves, we may ſafely confeſs the ſame, ſince that "we have ſo evidently repented thereof. And for you, ſo long as you be worthy to have ſo full "ſatisfaction made, it ſkilleth not what default or tranſgreſſion be committed againſt you. Thus much in effect ſpake the Tuſculans. At the very inſtant they obtained peace: and not long after, the right of free burgeoſie, to be made Citizens of Rome. So the Legions were withdrawn back again from Tuſculum. Thus Camillus having won great honor by his policy and valour both, in the Volſcian war: by his happy ſucceſs in the journey of Tuſculum: by his ſingular patience and carriage of himſelf, toward his companion in government, as well in the one place as the other, went out of his Magiſtracy: there being created Tribuns Military for the next year, L. Valerius the fifth time, and Pub. Valerius the third time, C. Servilius the third time, Licinius Menenius the ſecond time, P. Papirius, Serg. Cornelius Maluginenſis.

There was this year need of Cenſors alſo, by reaſon eſpecially of the doubtful rumors that ran concerning debts: whiles of the one ſide the Tribuns of the Commons did aggravate the greatneſs thereof, and made it ſeem an odious matter: and they again of the other ſide, did elevate and made litle of the ſame for whom it was good and beneficial, that the lent mony ſhould be thought abroad, in danger of being loſt: for that (ſay they) the debtors cautelouſly rather would not, than for ability could not, keep their credit and make paiment. So there were created Cenſors C. Sulpitius Camerinus, Sp. Poſthumius Regillenſis. And this matter now already commenced, was broken off by the death of Poſthumius, becauſe it would have bred a ſcruple to chuſe another Cenſor in the room of him deceaſed. When Sulpitius therefore had reſigned up his place, it fell out ſo that other new Cenſors upon ſome error committed in their creation, exerciſed not their office: and to chuſe a third time they made a ſcruple, ſo tender conſcienced were they, as if the gods were not well pleaſed with that office for that year. But the Tribuns would not endure this deluding of the Commons, but gave it forth that it was intollerable: ſaying, "That the Senat ſought to avoid "the exhibiting of publick records and books, which gave teſtimony of the valuation of every "mans ſubſtance to the worth: becauſe they would not have the ſums of debts to be ſeen and "known; which might bewray and plainly ſhew, that one part of the City was even eaten up and "devoured of the other: and in the mean time the poor Commons ſo deeply engaged, were pack-"ed away, and ſent forth againſt theſe enemies and thoſe: and now without all regard and diſ-"cretion, they ſought occaſions to quarrel and make war in every place. From Antium to Satri-"cum, from Satricum to Velitre, from thence to Tuſculum have your Legions been poſted. And "now, forſooth, there is war intended againſt the Latins, Hernicks and Preneſtins: for hatred "rather of the Citizens here at home, then of the enemies abroad: and all to wear out the "Commons with continual wars, and to afford them no breathing while within the City: that "in time of reſt, they might remember and think upon their freedom, keep their rooms in com-"mon aſſembly, where they might at the length hear their Tribuns voice pleading for the eaſe-"ment of uſury, and for a final end of all injuries. But and if the Commons had the heart, and "carried that mind with them, as to call to remembrance their anceſtors liberty, they would ſuf-"fer neither any Citizen of Rome to be awarded to bondage for debt, nor any muſters for to be ta-"ken, until a view were made and juſt accompt had, of every man his debts, and ſome courſe ta-"ken for abating the ſame: that each man might know, what he had of other mens goods, what "remained of his own: whether his body were left free, or at the mercy of his creditor, to lie in "cold iron and baleful priſon. This hire and ſalary of ſedition, this reward once propounded a-forehand, ſtirred up (you may be ſure) a mutiny ſoon after. For whereas there were many adjudged to be bound unto their Creditors, and the Senators had decreed new Legions to be believed, for the bruit and rumor that went of the Preneſtin wars: both matters began to be hindred for taking any effect, as well by the Tribuns help as the Commons accord. For neither would the Tribuns ſuffer thoſe that were condemned to be led to priſon: nor yet the younger ſort of the Commons, enter their names in the Muſter-maſter his book. And the Senators for the preſent, leſs minded the execution of judgement for the Creditors behoof, then the muſtering. For why? News came already, that the enemies had put themſelves in their journey from Preneſte, and were encamped in the Sabins country: And all this while, the very tidings hereof rather quickned and provoked the Tribuns of the Commons to the broil that was begun, than frighted them any jot from it. Neither would any thing ſerve to quench the ſedition in the City, until the war was come in manner to the very walls. For the Preneſtins had intelligence given them, that in Rome there was no army gathered, no General certainly known: the Senators and Commons at jar and together by the ears. Their Captains hereupon, taking this advantage and opportunity, with a running camp invaded, ſpoiled and waſted the fields all afore them as they went, and came with banners diſplayed before the gate Cullina. Great fear was in the City, every man cried Alarm, ran up to the walls to man them, and to the gates to ward them. And at the laſt they left their mutinies, turned to the wars, and created T. Quintius Cincinnatus Dictator. He appointed for his General of horſemen, A. Sempronius Atroninus. This was not ſo ſoon voiced abroad, (ſo great a terror went always with that magiſtrate) but the enemies withal diſlodged and departed from the walls: and the younger ſort of the Romans, without any trifling and drawing back, upon the proclamation, gathered together. Whiles forces were thus ariſing at Rome, the enemies pitched their camp not far from the River Allia: and as they forraged the Country all about, they bragged and vaunted among themſelves, that they had got that very plot of ground, which was ever fatal to the deſtruction of the City of Rome. "Here wil be (ſay they) the "like fight, from hence wil they fly, no doubt, as ſometimes they did before in the Gauls war. For "if the Romans feared that diſmal and unlucky day, noted with the infamous name of this place; "how much more wil they dread the river Allia it ſelf, in memorial of their ſo great overthrow, "than the only bare day Allienſis? Certainly, when they are come hither, they will think they ſee "again the grim looks, and hear the hideous voices of thoſe ſavage Gauls. Thus rolling & toſſing with

The Tribuns of the Commons againſt the Senat.

The Preneſtins invade the territory of Rome.

A with themselves these toyish conceits, rising of as vain and foolish presumptions, they rested wholly and reposed their full hope in the lucky perswasion only of the place. The Romans contrariwise knew full well, that their enemies the Latins, were (whersoever they were) the very same men still, and no other, whom for the space of one hundred years they held peaceably and quietly as their devoted vassals in subjection. And as for the place noted indeed, for the memorial of that late defeat and loss sustained, it might rather stir them up and set an edge upon them to abolish and cancel the remembrance of that shameful disgrace, then put them in fear, that any ground should be so unfortunat, as to be a bar unto their victory. Nay, if the very Gauls themselves came now in their way, they would so fight with them even in that ground, as they
B did at Rome, in the recovery of their country: as they did the morrow after at Gabii: when they bare themselves so valiantly, that no one enemy that entred within the walls of Rome, went ever home again to tell news how they sped, well or ill. Thus on both sides being resolute, and courageously bent, they met at Allia. The Roman Dictator discovering the enemies arranged in battel array, within sight. "See you not (quoth he) O A. Sempronius, how they have stayed at Allia, "presuming upon the luckiness of the place? No surer confidence, no greater help may they have,
"I pray God. But you, with trusty armor, keen weapons, and doughty courage set spurs to horse,
"gallop amongst the thickest of their main battel with your horsemen. I, with the legions on foot
"will advance mine Ensigns, and display them, in their faces, and charge them hotly when they "are disbanded once, and put in fear. Assist us now, and aid us, O ye gods (the witnesses of our C "league) and punish them duly for their deserts, both in dishonouring your divine Majesty, and "deceiving us in your name, whom they called solemnly to witness. Neither horsemen nor footmen could the Prenestins abide, but at the very first shout and shock were the ranks broken. And seeing their Battailions in no place whole and kept together, they fled: and amazed as they were in that confused fear, and carryed away beyond their own camp, they stayed not running for life until by good footmanship they were come within the sight of Prenaste. There, all such as had been scattered in the flight, met together, and chose a plot of ground, to fortifie in that haste as well as they could: lest peradventure, if they had put themselves within the town, forthwith their villages should have been fired, and after all consumed and spoiled, the town also might fortune to be besieged. But when the Roman Conqueror after the rifling of their camp at Allia was D once come toward them and discovered, they abandoned that Fort also, and gat within the town Preneste, thinking themselves scarce safe enough within the walls thereof. Eight towns besides there were under the seignory of the Prenestins, against which the Dictator warred round: and having won them all, one after another without much ado, he brought his army against Velitre, and got that town also by assault. Then came he to the principal head and very seat town of the war, Prenaste, which was not by force won, but by surrender yeelded up into his hands. And T. Quintius thus having obtained one victory in a pight field, won two camps and holds of the enemies, conquered by force nine towns, and regained Preneste surrendered unto him, returned home again to Rome. In his triumph he carried aloft the Image of Jupiter, surnamed Emperor, which he brought from Preneste, and set it up in the Capitol, where it was placed and dedicated be-E tween the shrines of Jupiter and Minerva: and in a table of brass fixed under it, was the monument of this noble exploit recorded and engraven in these or such like words: [T. Quintius Dictator, by the gracious help of Jupiter. and all the rest of the gods, won nine Towns.] So on the 20. day after his creation, he resigned up his Dictatorship.

Then was the assembly holden for electing of Tribuns Military with Coss. authority, who were equally chosen from out of the Nobility and the Com. Of Nobles were created, P. and C. Manlius, with L. Julius. The Commons yeelded C. Sextilius, M. Albinus, and L. Antistius. Upon the two Manlii, for that in blood and degree they were above the Commoners, and for favour more gracious then Julius, the province of the Volscians was bestowed extraordinarily, without casting lots or parting together by agreement of the Collegues amongst themselves. Which both they them-
F selves rued, and the Senators also (that would have it so) repented afterwards. For without any espials, sent out aforehand to scour the coasts, they had set forth certain cohorts or companies (of footmen) a forraging, and when upon a false alarm that those were beset & intrapped, they marched themselves apace after, to their rescue & convoy, & kept not with them stil, the reporter of these tidings (who being indeed a Latin and an enemy, but disguised in the habit of a Roman souldier, had deceived them) they fel headlong into a train and ambushment laid of purpose for them. And whiles they made resistance with main force only in a ground of great disadvantage (giving & taking the like measure) they were killed & slain on either side. But in the mean time their enemies from another quarter entred the camp of the Romans lying open in the plain. Thus in both places, things went but badly and untowardly, & all through the rashness and unskilfulness of the leaders.
G And what remained unfoiled for the fortune of the people of Rome, that was preserved by the hardy and resolute valor of the Roman souldiers only, without the help of general and commander. Upon which news reported at Rome, at the first it was thought good to chuse a Dictator: but afterwards, when tidings came, that all was whole & the Volscians quiet, and that it was well seen they knew not how to use victory when they had it, nor to take the opportunity of the time, whiles it offered it self: both the Generals & the army were sent for home from thence & so for the Volscians they were at rest afterwards. Only in the very end of the year, there arose some new stir & sudden tumult, by reason that the Prenestins having sollicited the people of the Latins, entred into rebellion again. In the ſame year the men of Setia made moan of themſelves for want of people, H and thither new Coloners were aſſigned to inhabit there.

Albeit the Romans ſped but badly in wars, yet the quietneſs at home was ſome comfort; which the Tribuns Military choſen from out of the Commons had procured, by reaſon that they were ſo gracious and reverenced among thoſe of their own coat and faction. All the beginning of the year following, was at the firſt on a light fire with hot diſcord and mutiny, when Sp. Furius, Quintius Servilius the ſecond time, Licinius Menenius the third time, P. Clœlius, M. Horatius and L. Geganius were Tribuns Military with Conſuls authority. The matter and cauſe of which ſeditious broils, were the debts above ſpecified. For the due inquiſition wherof, and to know to what ſums they amounted, Sp. Servilius Priſcus, and Clœlius Siculus were made Cenſors, but ſtopped I they were for doing any thing, by occaſion of wars. For firſt, fearful meſſengers in all haſte brought word, and after, the flight of the Country people confirmed it, that the legions of the Volſcians were entred into the confines, and fell to ſpoiling every where the territory about Rome. Notwithſtanding which fear and forraign terror, ſo little were the civil diſcords appeaſed, that contrariwiſe the Tribuns of the Commons extended their power with more violence to hinder the levy of ſouldiers, until they had indented and capitulated with the Senators, that ſo long as the wars laſted, no man ſhould either contribute and be charged with any impoſt, or be ſued in any action of debt. When the Com. took hold once of this eaſement and liberty, the muſters were delayed no longer. And after they had levied and enrolled two new legions, it was thought convenient that the legions ſhould be divided, and two armies ſent forth into the Volſcians Country. So Furius and M. Horatius, went on the right hand along the ſea coaſt to Antium. Q. Servilius and L. Geganius on the left hand, by the way of the mountains to Ecetra. But on neither ſide met they with the enemy. Whereupon they fell to forraging the Country, not here and there in ſcattering wiſe, as the Volſcians had done, after the manner of robbers, at ſtarts upon advantage taken of their enemies diſcord, and by ſtealth for fear of their valour: but being a full power and army of men and juſtly provoked to anger, the longer they continued there, the fouler work they made. For the Volſcians ſtanding in fear, leſt in the mean while they ſhould be encountred with a power from Rome, had made roads only into the utmoſt frontiers; But contrariwiſe, the Romans made ſtay in the enemies land, the rather to train them forth and draw them to a field-fight. Having therefore burned up, in a manner, all the uplandiſh houſes and granges, and ſome villages I alſo, and left behind them no fruitful tree ſtanding, nor the ſown corn for hope of grain, and driven away whole booties of men, women, and cattel, which they could light on without the walls; they reduced their armies of both ſides home again to Rome. In this mean while the debtors had ſome little reſpit to breath themſelves in. But ſo ſoon as all was quiet from enemies abroad, they began a freſh to be ſued and troubled by their creditors at home. And ſo ſmall hope they had to be releaſed of their old uſury, that they fell into a new, by reaſon of a contribution collected toward a wall, which the Cenſors had ſet out to be made of ſquare Aſhler ſtone. To yeeld unto this impoſition and burden, the Commons were driven, becauſe there was no muſter for the Tribuns of the Commons to hinder. Forced they were likewiſe through the might and power of the great men, to admit for Tribuns military, all of the Nobility, to wit, L. Æmylius, P. Valerius the M fourth time, C. Veturius, Servius Sulpitius, L. and C. Quintii Cincinnatii.

By the ſame ſtrong hand alſo they prevailed ſo much, that without impeachment of any man, all the younger ſort took the military oath, ſo that they levied three armies againſt the Latins and Volſcians: who joining their legions together, had encamped themſelves at Satricum. One army was gathered for the defence of the City: another to be ſet out againſt all ſudden wars, if haply elſewhere ſome tumult ſhould ariſe: & a third, of all other the ſtrongeſt, was under the conduct of P. Valerius, and L. Æmylius, led to Satricum. Where, finding the enemies embattelled in good array upon a plain & even ground, they charged upon them preſently. But ere that they had got the victory evidently in ſight, and were but only in ſome good hope of having a fair day of their enemies, the rain ſo poured down with huge ſtorms and tempeſts, that it parted both hoſts aſunder. N
The morrow after began a freſh conflict. And for a good while, the legions of the Latins eſpecially, which by long alliance with the Romans had learned their manner of warfare, ſtood to it as valiantly, and ſped as fortunatly as the Romans. At length, the Roman horſemen that road in amongſt them, brake their ranks; and when they were once diſarrayed, the footmen diſplayed their enſigns, and advanced upon them: and look how much the Romans battel ſet forward, ſo much the enemies gave backward. But when they began once to faint in their ſight, than the violence of the Romans was intollerable. Thus the enemies were diſcomfited and ſcattered: and flying not toward their camp, but to Satricum, which was two miles off, they were by the horſemen eſpecially beaten down, trod under foot and ſlain. Their tents were taken and rifled. From Satricum they diſlodged, the next night after the battel was fought and marched in great haſte (as if O they fled) to Antium. And albeit the Roman army followed them by the tracks hard at heeles, yet their footmanſhip ſerved them better in their fear, than it did the Romans, for all their anger. So the enemies put themſelves within the town walls, before the Romans could overtake them, and either cut off the tail of their rereward, or force them to ſtay. All be his, ſome days were ſpent in waſting the Country. For neither were the Romans ſufficiently pipvided with warlike engins of battery and artillery to aſſail their walls, nor they well appointed to abide battel in plain field. Then aroſe ſome diſcord within the town, between the Latins and the Antiats. The

Antiats,

A Antiats, of one side wearied with calamities that follow long wars, wherewith all their life time they had been exercised even to their old age, were of mind to yeeld. The Latins by reason of their late revolt and rebellion (whiles after so long peace, their courages continued yet fresh) were more forward and earnest to maintain wars still. But when they saw on both sides that they might do as they purposed, and follow their own designments, without being hindered one of another, their strife was soon ended. So the Latins leaving their fellowship & society of peace, so unhoneſt & dishonourable (as they thought it) departed from them, and stood out still to revenge their own quarrels. But the Antiats being well rid of these Councellors of their, so cross unto all wholsome courses, tending to their good and safety, yeelded up their town and country to the Romans. But B the anger and furious rage of the Latins, for that they could neither annoy the Romans by wars, nor keep the Volscians still in arms, brake out thus far, that they fired the City Satricum, which had been the first place of refuge, after their defeat and unhappy fight. Neither left they any house in that City standing, but set fire upon all indifferently, as well profane as holy edifices: onely the Church of Dame Matuta they spared. From which, it was neither any religion and conscience of their own, nor fear of the gods that kept them, but (as men report) a fearful voice heard out of the Temple with heavy threats, unless they held their hands, and kept them far enough from burning the sacred habitations so impiously. In this rage and mad fit of theirs, to Tusculum they go: for very spight that they forsaking the general counsel of the Latins, had not onely yeelded themselves to be in league with the Romans, but also became incorporate Citizens
C with them. And coming upon them on a sudden, while their gates were open, at the first shout the whole Town, all but the Castle, was surprized. The Townsmen with their Wives and Children were thither fled: and sent messengers to Rome with certificat to the Senat of this sudden and unlooked for accident. And with all speed (as appertained to the fidelity of the people of Rome) an army was led to Tusculum: whereof L. Quintius and Servius Sulpitius, had the conduct. At Tusculum they found the gates fast shut against them, and the Latins, as men both besieging and besieged. And whiles of the one side they intended the defence of the walls, on the other side assaulted the Castle, at one time they were afraid themselves, and put others in fear likewise. But the coming of the Romans wrought a great change and alteration in the hearts of both parties. For it caused the Tusculans of fearful men to become exceeding cheerful: and the D Latins who made full reckoning to win the fortress out of hand, as being masters already of the town, had but small hope now to help and save themselves. The Tusculans they set up a great shout from the Castle: and answered it was again with a greater from the Roman army. The Latins were put to it hard on both sides: For neither were they able to abide the violence of the Tusculans running down the hill upon them, nor to put by and keep off the Romans, coming hard under the walls, and assaying to break the bars of the gates. First, they scaled the walls and and gat upon them: after, they brake the port-cullis down. Thus the Latins environed with enemies both before and behind, that presled sore upon them, having neither strength enough left to fight, nor room of ground to make an escape, were slain in the midst between the enemies, every mothers son. So when Tusculum was recovered out of the enemies hands, the army was E brought back again to Rome.

But the more quietness there was that year without the City by reason of prosperous wars, the more encreased the violence and hard dealing of the Senators within: and the calamities of the Commons grew every day more than other. For they wanted means and were not able to pay for the interest that needs must be paid. When nothing therefore was to be had, to make paiment out of their goods, they were adjudged and awarded to satisfie their creditors in their body and name: and so their punishment served in stead of keeping their credit and discharging the consideration. Whereupon, not only the meanest of the Commons, but also the very chief, began now to let fall their hearts and stoop so low, that there was not a witty and nimble headed man and of experience amongst them, that would put himself forth to stand to be a Tribun Military, in F concurrence with the Nobles, (which they had so earnestly shot at and laboured for) no, nor so much as to bear and sue for any offices of the Commons. So as the Senators now, seemed to have recovered again for ever to themselves, the possession of that dignity, which the Commons of late, for some few years, had usurped and occupied over their heads. But that this order side might not joy too much hereat, a small occurrent hapned between which (as it falleth out most commonly) gave the occasion and first footing to an enterprize of much importance.

M. Fabius Ambustus a great and mighty man, as well amongst those of his own calling, as also with the Commons, (whom he was reputed never to despise, as other did of his condition and estate) had two daughters married forth: the elder unto Servius Sulpitius: the younger unto C. Licinius Stolo, a man verily of good worth and reckoning, but yet a Commoner. And Fabius dis-
G daining not this alliance and affinity, wan himself much love and favour among the Commons. Now it fell out so, that these sisters were upon a time together in the house of Servius Sulpitius, then Trib. Military: and as they passed the time away (as the manner is) in much good talk, discoursing one with another of many matters, it chanced that a Sergeant or Verger of Sulpitius, at what time as he was coming home from the Forum or cõmon hal, rapped as the order was, with his rod at the door. When the yonger Fabia not acquainted with those fashions was therat somewhat amazed, her sister making a wonder at her ignorance, laught her to scorn. But that laughter (as womens minds got wot, are soon kindled with a litle) set her a work & hammered in her head.

Beſides, the train of many that came about her, waiting and giving attendance, ready to know her H pleaſure and what ſhe would, mended the matter much. I ſuppoſe ſhe thought her ſiſter happily wedded, and repented her own marriage; upon an ill and ſiniſter judgment, whereby every man repineth that his neighbor and neereſt of kin eſpecially, ſhould go beyond him and do better then he. Upon this diſcontentment and freſh heart-burning of hers, her father haply ſeeing her diſmaid, asked her whether all was well at home? But when ſhe would have turned the cauſe of her grief another way, (for that it ſtood neither with her love and kindneſs towards her ſiſter, to envy her eſtate; nor yet with the reverent honor that ſhe was to yeeld unto her husband, to find fault with her own) he with mild queſtioning came about her ſo, that he drew from her the truth: ſo as ſhe confeſſed her grief to ariſe upon this, that ſhe was diſparaged; and namely, married not accor- I ding to her quality, but into an houſe uncapable both of worſhip and favour. Then Ambuſtus, comforting his daughter, willed her to be of good cheer, and ſaid, That ere it were long, ſhe ſhould ſee the ſame ſtate, the ſame advancement and dignity at home, which ſhe had ſeen already in her ſiſters houſe. Hereupon began he to plot with his ſon in law, joyning alſo unto them, L.
Sextius, a ſtout young man, and one that was like enough to come to preferment, but that he was not of noble race. Good occaſion and opportunity they ſeemed to have of compaſſing ſome alteration in the State, by reaſon of the exceſſive debts that men were grown into: for the redreſ-ſing and eaſing of which malady, the Com. had no other hope, but in advancing ſome of themſelves into the ſoveraign room of government. They thought it needful therefore, preſently to addreſs themſelves to the execution of theſe deſignments, conſidering that by endeavor and indu- K ſtry, the Commoners were climbed to that degree already, from whence if they would enforce and put themſelves forward, they had but one ſtep more unto the higheſt, and might be equal with the Nobles, as well in honour as in vertue and proweſſe. And for the preſent, it was thought good to make them, two Trib. of the Com. in which office they might open a way unto themſelves, for other dignities. So C. Licinius and L. Sex. propoſed laws, all tending to abate the pow-taking order for debts: That when ſo much was defaulked and deducted out of the principal, as had been paid for the uſe and intereſt, the reſidue ſhould be diſcharged by even portions in 3. years A ſecond, concerning a proportion and quantity of lands, That no man might hold in poſſeſſion above 500. acres. The third, That from thenceforth there ſhould be no election of Trib. Military, L but of Coſſ. provided always, that one of them be choſen out of the Com. Matters all of right great weight and conſequence, and ſuch as without exceeding ſtrife and contention, could not poſſibly be carried and obtained.* Thus when all thoſe things at once lay a bleeding, and were in hazzard to be loſt, which the whole world unmeaſurably coveteth and longeth after, to wit, land, money, and promotions: the Senators were put in a bodily fear, and began to ſtartle. And laying their heads together both in publick conſultation and privat conference, they could deviſe no other remedy, but that which in many commotions already they had tried, namely, the ſtepping between and negative voice of ſome of the Tribuns. And ſo, to croſs thoſe bills aforeſaid put up by theſe two Tribuns, they had wrought and made to their purpoſe certain of their own brotherhood. Who ſo ſoon as they ſaw the wards and tribes called forth by Licinius and Sextius, to give their ſuffra- M ges, being well backed and guarded with the aſſiſtance of the Senators, would ſuffer neither thoſe laws to be read, nor any other beſides (as yearly they uſed) to paſs by the voices of the Commons.

Thus the two Tribuns aforeſaid, having oftentimes (but ever in vain) aſſembled the people together, and ſeeing their laws ſtill nipped, as it were, in the head for ever going forward; "It is ve"ry well (quoth Sextius) and ſince ye like ſo well that theſe inhibitions may prevail ſo much:
"we will likewiſe defend the Commons with the ſame weapon and no other. Go to now my "Maſters of the Nobility, proclaime an election for the creation of Trib. Military: I will make
* I forbid. It was the negative voice of Tribuns. "I trow, that this word [* Veto] ſhall do your ſelves no good at all: howſoever now ye take ſo
"great pleaſure to hear our brethren keep that note ſtill, and evermore ſing that ſweet concent of "muſick. And ſurely, thoſe threats proved indeed to good earneſt and took effect. For there was N no election at all but of Ædiles and Tribuns, and thoſe both of the Commons. For Licinius and Sextius being choſen Tribuns again, ſuffered no Magiſtrates of the Chair, or of State, to be created. Which defect and deſolation of ſoveraign Magiſtracy continued in the City for the ſpace of five years: whiles the Commons for their part choſe the ſame two Tribuns ſtill, and they again ever laid a bar and put in a caveat againſt the election of Tribuns Military.

All other wars, as good hap was, were aſleep for the time. The Coloners only of Velitre, upon ſo long reſt and quietneſs began to be luſty and wax wanton: and for that there was no army of the Romans ſtirring abroad, they not only made inrodes ſundry times into the territory of Rome, but alſo aſſailed the town Tuſculum. And when the Tuſculans, the ancient Allies and new en-franchiſed Citizens of Rome craved help, the Senators and Commons both, were moved eſpeci- O ally for very ſhame to ſuccour them. And the Tribuns of the Commons yeelded at length, and permitted an aſſembly for election, to be holden by an Inter-regent: and Trib. Military there were created, L. Furius, A. Manlius, Ser. Sulpitius, Ser. Cornelius, A. and C. Valerii; Who found not the Commons ſo tractable in the muſtering, as they were pliable in giving their voices at the Election. Yet after much ado & great contention they levied an army, and ſet forward on their journey: drave the enemies not from Tuſculum only, but forced them within their own walls: beſieged Velitre more ſtraightly a great deal, and in more forcible manner, than Tuſculum had been by them.

Howbeit

A Howbeit, they that began the siege were not able to win the town. For before that time, were new Tribuns Military chosen, Q. Servilius, C. Veturius, A. and M. Cornelius, Q. Quintius, M. Fabius. Neither performed these Tribuns any notable exploit at Velitre. But the State at home stood in more dangerous terms than before. For besides that Sextius and Licinius, the publishers of those laws aforesaid, were now the eighth time made Trib. of the Commons again, Fabius also a Tribun Military, Stolo his wives father, was seen openly in the action, to set forward and perswade for the same laws, which in very deed himself had devised. And whereas at the first, eight of the Colledge or Company of the Tribuns of the Commons, had crossed the proceeding of them: now there were but five left that shewed themselves, and those (as commonly they use to do that dis-B band from their own faction) like men bereaved of their wits and amazed, being indeed the tongues and trunks that others spake by, pretended and made allegations in their prohibition, only as they were schooled and taught their lessons at home: (to wit) That a great sort of the Commons were in the army at Velitre and absent, and that the solemn Session or Assembly for enacting laws, ought to be adjourned until the return home of the souldiers: to the end that all the Commons generally, might give their voices concerning their own commodity and benefit. Sextius and Licinius with part of their brethren Tribuns, and M. Fabius one of the Tribuns Military, being their own craftsmasters, knew well enough by so many years experience, how to manage and handle the minds of the Commons: and plied the chief of the Senators (produced forth before the people) so hard with interrogatories of every particular that was proposed, that they weari-C ed and tired them out; Demanding, "how they could require to be allowed themselves to pos"sess more then 500. acres a man; whereas the Commons had but two a piece divided amongst "them? Whether that every one of them might in equity hold the lands, well neer, of 300.
"Citizens: and a Commoner to have hardly ground enough for to build him a necessary house "upon, and to serve for a place to bury his dead? Also, whether their will and pleasure was, that "the Commons oppressed with usury, should yeeld their bodies to bear irons and suffer torment, "unless they paid the interest before the principal? And that daily by whol companies they should "be had away from the bar, condemned to thraldom; and Noble mens houses to become goals,
"filled and pestered with prisoners? And whersoever a Patritian dwelt, there should be a privat "prison? These indignities and piteous matters to be heard, when they had with a loud voice D charged upon them, even before those that were afraid of the like measure themselves; with more indignation and disdain of all that heard them, than they themselves shewed in the uttering and delivery: "But these Senators say they (and that they redoubled) will never make an end either "of getting more land still into their hands, or spoiling and undoing the Commons with usury,
"until the Commons make once out of their body one Consul, for to be the maintainer and pro"tector of their liberty. As for the Tribuns of the Commons, they were now just nothing set by:
"as who by their priviledge of Inhibitions and negative voices, spoiled themselves and over-
"threw their own power. And never will there be any indifferent and equal course taken, so long "as the Nobles keep the soveraign place of command, and the sword to strike whiles the poor "Commons have only the buckler hand to ward all venues. For unless the government be parted E "between both alike, the Commons shall never have their due and equal portion in the Com"mon-weal. Neither is it reason that any man should stand contented with this only, that in the "Election of Consuls, the Commons are eligible and capable of the dignity: for in case, it be not "concluded absolutly, that one Consul at the least should be of necessity a Commoner, there wil "never be any at all. Have ye forgotten already (say they) that notwithstanding an Act made, That "there should be Tribuns Military created rather then Consuls, for this intent that Commoners
"might aspire and reach unto the chief place of honor; yet for all that in 44. years space, there "was not so much as one of the Commoners chosen Tribun Military? And will any man beleeve
"that they will of their own accord confer upon the Commons (when otherwise they may chuse)
"that dignity in the disposing only of two places, who were ever wont in the making of Tribun F "Military, to take up eight rooms all wholly to themselves? And will they allow them a way
"unto the Consulship, who thus long have held the (Consular) Tribunship so guarded as no man "might have access thither but themselves? Nay, it must be got by a positive law, which in their "Assemblies for Election, by favour and grace might not be obtained. One of the Consuls rooms "must be set aside, past all peradventure and question, and that for a Commoner, to enter into:
"For as much as if it stand still upon a choice, the mightier man will ever go away with the game
"clear. And whereas heretofore they have been wont to alledge and say, That the Commons af"forded not sufficient and able men to bear the offices of the chair and of state: that, now cannot "be truely objected. For was the Common-weal, I pray you more slackly and negligently govern"ed upon the (Consular) Tribunship of P. Licinius Calvus (who was the first Commoner that e-G "ver was made Tribun Military) than it was ruled for those years space in which there was not "a Tribun Military but of the Nobility? Nay, on the contrary side it will be justified that some of "the Nobles were condemned after they were out of their Tribunship, and not one of the Com"moners. And whereas not many years past, we began to make Questors or Treasurers out of the "Commons, like as we did Tribuns Military, the people of Rome repented never of the choice of "any one of them. It remaineth now, that the Commoners bear the office of Consuls too; That "were a fortress of their liberty, that were a strength and sure hold to trust unto. If they were "once come and stept to that degree, then may the people of Rome think assuredly and be per-

Sextius and Licinius against the Senators for the common people.

swaded

"swaded, that the KK. are baniſhed indeed out of the City, and their freedom fully eſtabliſh- H
"ed for ever to endure. For, from that day forward ſhall the Commons be partakers of all thoſe
"things, wherein the Nobles now ſurpaſs them: namely, ſoveraign rule and authority, martial
"renown, parentage and Nobility: great ornaments doubtleſs, unto themſelves to enjoy here in "this life: but far greater to leave behind them unto their Children and Poſterity. These and ſuch like Orations when they ſaw to be plauſible, and willingly accepted, they preferred a new Statute, That in ſtead of the two Duumvirs for holy Ceremonies and matters of the Church, there might be choſen ten Decemvirs: Provided always, that one part of them ſhould be created forth of the Commons, and another from among the Nobles. The Seſſion for enacting of all thoſe Laws, they deferred until the army was returned, which lay then at the ſiege before I Velitre.

But the year was come about and fully expired, before the legions were reduced home from thence: and by that means the whole buſineſs about theſe new Laws, hung ſtill in ſuſpence, and was put off unto the entrance of the new Tribuns Military. As for the Tribuns of the Commons, the Commonalty choſe the ſame again, even thoſe twain who had been the propoſers of thoſe Laws. And the Tribuns Military were theſe, T. Quintius, Ser. Cornelius, Ser. Sulpitius, Sp. Servilius, L. Papirius, L. Veturius. Preſently in the beginning of the year, they put unto the jump and final trial what ſhould become of thoſe Laws. And when as the Tribes were called, and none of the Tribuns Collegues ſtepped between to ſtop the proceeding of the Law-givers: the Nobles were afraid, and ran unto their two laſt helps, to wit, the higheſt and abſolute of- K fice, and the greateſt man among them. They thought it good therefore to create a Dictator. And M. Furius Camillus was nominated, who elected unto him L. Æmylius for General of the horſe. The Law-makers likewiſe for their part, againſt ſo great preparation of their adverſaries, armed at all parts the cauſe of the Commons, with ſtout ſtomack and couragious heart. And having aſſembled an Hall of the Commons, they called forth the wards to give their voices. At what time the Dictator accompanied with a great train of Nobles, full of wrath and menacing frowns, took his place and ſet him down. And after the matter was canvaſſed firſt, by the ordinary conflict of the Tribuns among themſelves, whiles ſome propounded, and others gainſaid the Law with their negatives voices; and that by how much in right the prohibition was the ſtronger, ſo much it was overweighed in favour and affection both of the Laws and Law- L givers: and when the firſt Tribes had given their voice (* Uti rogatis) affirmatively: then Camillus, For as much as (quoth he) O Quirites, ye are ruled now by the will and pleaſure, and not by the authority of the Tribuns, and as in times paſt ye obtained the priviledge of a negative voice and * Interceſſion by your departure and Seceſſion, ſo now ye make it void and nothing worth, even by the ſame force that ye got it by: I, choſen Dictator as well for your ſake as for the whole Common-wealth, will aſſiſt your priviledge of Interceſſion, and by mine abſolute authority maintain this your help and ſuccour, now reverſed and overthrown. If therefore C. Licinius and L. Sextius, give place unto the negative voice and interceding of their fellows in Office; I will not in a meeting and aſſembly of the Commons, once intermedle, nor bring in the authority, of a Magiſtrate of the Nobles: but if they ſhall go forward ſtill (notwithſtanding all prohibition) to M impoſe and give Laws unto the City, as if it were won by conqueſt of the enemy, I will not ſuffer the Tribuns power by their own ſelves to be defaced and come to nothing. But (all theſe big words notwithſtanding) when the Tribuns of the Commons made but a tuſh thereat, and went never the leſs forward with their enterprize, then Camillus throughly angred indeed, ſent his Lictors and Sergeants to command the Commons to avoid the place and depart: Threatning withal, that if they proceeded thus, he would take a Military oath of all the younger people, and lead an army preſently forth of the City. This put the Commons in a very great fright, but it ſet their Captains and Ring-leaders, rather in a greater heat of contention, than abated their courages one jot. And when he ſaw no relenting on either ſide, he gave up his office: Whether it were that there was ſome error in his creation (as ſome have written) or becauſe the Tribuns of the N Commons had put up a bill to the Commons, and they granted it: that if M. Furius (as Dictator) had proceeded to any action, he ſhould have a round fine ſet on his head of 500000 * Aſſes, I know not certainly. But I beleeve that he was terrified upon ſome unlucky ſigns of the birds, rather then with any ſuch ſtrange Act never heard of before, and without precedent. And hereunto am I induced, both in regard of the diſpoſition of the man ſo well given and of ſo good conſcience, and alſo for that P. Manlius was immediatly named Dictator in his ſtead. For to what end ſhould Manlius have been created Dictator for that broil and ſtir, wherein M. Furius had taken the foil before? Again, ſeeing the ſame M. Furius was Dictator the next year following, doubtleſs, he would never for ſhame have reſumed that office, wherein the year before he had received the foil and diſgrace, to be ſo overruled. Over and beſides, at the ſame time when as this bill was O ſuppoſed to have been preferred, concerning his fine, either he might have withſtood it too, (whereby he ſaw himſelf to be bridled) or elſe he had not been able to have hindred ſo much as thoſe, for which this alſo was propoſed. Finally, it was never ſeen to this day wherein we live, ſo long as the Tribuns and Conſuls with their factions and parts-taking have been at variance and debate with all their might and main, but evermore the authority of the Dictator controlled them all, and put them down.

A ted and begun, there was an assembly of the Commons summoned by the Tribuns, in time as it were of a vacancy or Interreign: wherein the overture was made and evidently it was seen, which of the laws proposed the Commons liked better, and which the Law-givers. For those that concerned usury and land, they granted to pass, but that other of a Commoner to be Consul, they denied and dashed quite. And surely both matters had been dispatched fully and established at once, but that the Tribuns said directly, that they required the Commons, to give their voices and speak to all three directly together. After this, P. Manlius the Dictator favoured somewhat, and helped the cause of the Commons, by nominating out of the Commons for his General of horsemen, C. Licinius, who had been a Tribun Military before time. The Senators B stormed hereat, as I find in records. And the Dictator was wont to excuse the matter unto them, alledging for himself the neer affinity and kindred that was between him and Licinius: saying also, that the dignity of the General of horsemen was no greater then of a Tribun Consular. Now when the election day was published for the Tribuns of the Commons, Licinius and Sextius so demeaned themselves, that by pretending that they would not any longer now continue in the office, they set the Commons on to be most earnest and hotly bent for that, which they under colour of refusal, desired and sought for. They seemed, forsooth, to alledge and say, "That for these nine years they had stood, as it were, in battel array, and affronted the States "and Nobles of the City, to the right great peril of themselves in privat, and to no good effect "at all in publick: and now together with them, both the laws proposed, and the whole strength C "of the Tribuns authority, were waxed old and decayed. At the first their Laws were crossed "by the interceding of their brethren Tribuns: afterwards by packing away the youth of the Ci- "ty to the Velitern war: and last of all, the Dictators lightning flashed in their faces, and their "thunderbolts shot against them. "Now (say they) neither their fellow Tribuns withstood "them, nor forraign wars hindered them, nor yet the Dictator himself, as who for his part hath "given a good fore-tokening and presage of a Consul Commoner, in electing his General of "horsemen out of the Commons. The very Commons and none else, are they that hurt them- "selves, and delay their own goods. Who might presently if they would, have their City, their "common Hall, and place of assemblies freed from these Creditors: yea, and their grounds re- "covered again from the unjust Land-lord; Which benefits and liberties, when are they like D "to weigh and esteem with thankful minds accordingly, if in the very time that they are to ac- "cept the Laws devised for their own wealth and good, they cut off all hope of promotion and "honour, from the publishers and proposers thereof? For it standeth not with the modesty of "the people of Rome, to require to be eased themselves of Usury, and to be set in possession again "of the land, wrongfully withheld from them by the mighty men: and then to leave those old "Trib. by whose means they have come by those good commodities, to shift for themselves, not "only without honor, but also without all hope of honor. Let them first therefore set down with "themselves, and resolve, what they are minded to do: and afterwards in the election of Trib. de- "clare the same openly. If they would be willing to speak affirmatively to those Laws, all jointly "as they were propounded, then there were some reason to chuse the same Trib. again: and then E "would they enact & establish finally that which they had published. But in case their wil was to "accept of that and no more than which served each privat mans turn then there was smal need "or none at all to have them stil in office, with the envy and grudging of so many. And to be short, "neither would they accept of the Tribunship any longer, neither should the Commons have "those Laws ratified, which were already granted. When as all the rest of the Senators were "struck into their dumps and blank, for the very indignity to see things thus go: At the last, one Appius Claudius Crassus (the nephew or sons son of that notorious Appius the Decemvir) upon a malicious mind and fell stomack, as it is reported, rather then for any hope he had to dissuade the matter, stood up, and to this effect answered that so stout and peremptory speech of the Tri- buns, in this manner. "It can be no strange matter to me, nor unlooked for, O Quirites, if that F "which hath been the only thing at all times objected by seditious Tribuns against our house, I "also should hear at this present: to wit, that the whole name and linage of Claudii, have ever "from the first beginning, regarded nothing more in the Common-weal, than the Majesty and "honor of the Senators and the Nobles, and always set and opposed themselves against the good "and well-fare of the Commons. Of which two challenges, the one I neither can, nor will deny "and disavow: namely, that we, since the first time that we were enfranchised Citizens, and ther- "with at once taken into the number of Senators, have endeavoured and strained our selves, that "it might be said and that truely, that the honor and dignity of that state and degree, into which "it was your good pleasure we should be incorporate, and graced with, was by us augmented, "rather then impaired. And as for the other challenge, this I dare be bold, in mine own behalf, G "and in the name of my ancestors and progenitors, to aver, O Quirites, that (unless a man would "think whatsoever is done for the Weal-publick generally, is directly against the Commons, as "if they were meer aliens of another City) we to our knowledge have practised nothing, witting "and willing, either whiles we lived privat, or during the time we bare office, prejudiciall to "commonalty: and that neither in deed nor word we can be justly charged to have wrought and "contrived any thing contrary to your good: although peradventure somewhat hath fallen out "cross against your will and mind. But were I not a Claudius, and of that family, nor descended "of noble blood, but some one of the Burgesses or Citizens: and knew my self to be but free

"your selves, ye would not chuse unworthy persons and unmeet, I wil bind you therefore of ne- N "cessity, to elect those whom otherwise ye would pass by. And what followeth hereupon but "this, that the Commoner who standeth with two Patritii, may plainly say, and that truly, he is "not by voices chosen, but by vertue of a law, and so acknowledg no benefit received of the peo"ple, nor be beholden at all to them, for their grace and favour? Thus seek they means to wring
"your dignities from you, and not the way to sue for them: and would so obtain the greatest, as
"that they might not be obliged & bound unto you for the least: and had rather get honours and "offices by advantage taking and cunning sleights, then by their own vertue, desert, and wor"thiness. But there is some one that scorneth to be pried and looked into, and to be considered
"as he deserveth: who thinks it meet, that he alone among the other Competitors, that contest
"and stand in suit, should be sure of offices and promotions, and will not submit himself to your O
"censure: who would have your suffrages, of voluntary, to be constrained: of free, to be thrall and "servil. I speak not of Licinius and Sextius: whose years of their continual government ye reckon
"upon, and mark up in the Capitol, as they used sometime, to count the years of the Kings "reign. But what is he this day in the City, of so base, so abject and low condition, that by the ad"vantage and benefit of this law, hath not easier access to a Consulship than we and our children "have? As for us truly, ye may sometime miss of chusing us, would you never so fain: but for them
"ye must needs, yea, though full against your mind. And thus much concerning the indignity

and

A "and unworthineſs of the thing; For, dignity and worthineſs, I take, to be matters properly to "men pertaining. What ſhall I ſpeak now of Religions, and of the ſolemnity of the Auſpices, "which imply a meer contempt and injury done to the immortal gods? Who knoweth not,
"that by the approbation of the gods teſtified by flight of birds, this City was firſt founded?
"that by the ſame Auſpices, all hath been ordered and directed, as well in war abroad, as in peace
"at home? And who be they that have to do with theſe tokens and preſages, by ancient cuſtom
"and tradition from our forefathers? Forſooth even the Nobles and none elſe. As for the Magi-"ſtrates of the Commons, none are choſen with regard of flight, ſight, and feeding of the birds.
"But to us, they do ſo properly belong, that not only thoſe Magiſtrates of the Nobles, which B "the people create, they do not otherwiſe elect but by obſervation of the birds; but we alſo our "ſelves, without the aſſent and voice of the people, do nominate an Interrex by means of the "birds: yea, and in the private actions of our life, we are guided by them at home, which theſe "Commons uſe not in their very offices. What then meaneth he elſe, but to take theſe Auſpicia
"out of the City, who by creating Commoners to be Conſuls, depriveth the Nobles thereof, who "only may have and uſe them? Now let them mock on and ſcoff at our religions. Let them deride "our Ceremonies. What makes matter (ſay they) if thoſe pullets peck or eat not? What if they "come ſomewhat late out of their coup or cage? What if a bird ſing auk or crow croſs and con"trary? How then? A great piece of matter ſurely. Small things, I confeſs they be: but as "ſmall as they are, our anceſtors by not contemning them, have brought this C. W. to a flou-C "riſhing ſtate. And we now adays, as if we ſtood not in need of the grace and favour of God, "poliute all holy rites and ceremonies. And therefore let our prelats and high Prieſts, our Au-
"gurs, and King at ſacrifices be created (it skilleth not how) even out of the common multitude:
"Let us ſet upon any mans head (it matters not whoſe, ſo he come in likeneſs of a man) the Mitre
"of Jupiter his Flamin. Let us commit the keeping of the Anciles or heavenly ſhields, and the "ſecret ſanctuaries; let us commit the gods themſelves and the charge of their holy ſervice to "thoſe, unto whom we may not lawfully nor without impiety. Let no lawes be publiſhed nor "Magiſtrates created ſolemnly, with regard of birds at all, and of the wil of the gods. Nor in the "Centuriate aſſemblies holden by degrees, and Curiat-meetings by the wards and pariſhes; let
"not the Senators be Preſidents and have their authority and royal aſſent. Let Sextius and Lici- D "nius, like Romulus and Tatius raign together, as fellow KK. in the City of Rome, becauſe they "give away ſo freely, the monies, lands and territories from others. So ſweet and ſavory it is to "prey upon other mens goods. Never conſider they, nor look ſo far into the matter, that by one "of theſe goodly laws, our fields wil be deſart and waſte, by ejecting and diſpoſſeſſing the right"ful land-lords: and by the other, all credit in borrowing and lending, in taking and putting "forth of money ſhal be aboliſhed. And then farewel all humane ſociety, commerce and inter"courſe whatſoever. In theſe reſpects therefore, thus I conclude, and would counſel you, in any
"wiſe to ſtop, fruſtrate and diſanul the overture and proceeding of theſe laws: and in ſo doing,
"I pray God bleſs and ſpeed you wel. This Oration of Appius thus far only prevailed, that the time of publication of theſe Acts, was cut off and deferred. But the ſame Tribuns Sextius and Li- E cinius, being choſen again the tenth time, propounded this law and had it enacted, That of the Decemvirs for divine ſervice and Church matters, ſome ſhould be created of the Commons: So, five of them were of the Nobles, and five of the Commoners: whereby they ſeemed to have gained already one good ſtep onward unto the Conſulſhip.

The Decemvirs created.

The Commons contenting themſelves with this victory, yeelded unto the Senators, that for the preſent without any mentioning of Conſuls, there ſhould be elected Tribuns Military. So there were created A. and M. Cornelii the ſecond time, M. Geganius, P. Manlius, L. Veturius and P. Valerius the ſixth time. At what time, when as (but for the ſiege of Velitre, which was like to be for ſervice a long piece of work, rather then for iſſue, doubtful in the end) the Romans were at reſt for any forraign troubles, the ſudden and unlooked-for news of the Gauls war, drave the Ci-F ty to chuſe M. Furius Dictator the fifth time: who took unto him for his General of the horſe-men, T. Quintius Pennus. Claudius writeth, that this year the Gauls were fought with, about the river Anio: and that there was that noble combat upon the bridge, in which, T. Manlius in the fight of both armies ſlew in ſingle fight a Gaul that had challenged him and given defiance, and deſpoiled him of his coller of gold. But there be more writers that induce me to beleeve, that this exploit was performed ten years after: and that in this year the Gauls had a battel given them by M. Furius Dictator, in the Albans land: where the Romans had neither doubtful nor dangerous victory, although the French made them afraid at firſt in remembrance of their former overthrow. Many thouſands of this barbarous nation were ſlain in field, many alſo fell upon the ſword in their camp after it was won. Some were ſcattered and fled, and thoſe moſt (who took the way to G Apulia) ſaved themſelves from the enemy, both by flying ſo far, and alſo for that upon fear they were ſo diſtracted and parted one from another. The Senators and Commons agreed and made a decree, that the Dictator ſhould triumph. Who ſcarcely had made an end of that war, but he was welcomed home with a more hotter and more dangerous Sedition within the City. For after many ſharp bickerings and contentions the Dictator and Senat both, were overmatched and o-vercome, yea, and forced to accept the Tribuns laws aforeſaid. And alſo in deſpite of the Nobili-ty and do what they could, there was an aſſembly held for election of Conſuls: in which L. Sex-tius was created Conſul, the firſt Commoner that ever ſat in Conſuls chair. But the broils ſtaid ſtaid not there. For, by reaſon that the Nobles denied to approve & give aſſent thereto, the matter was like to grow unto a Seceſſion and general departure of the Commons, yea, and to other fearful tearms and perilous threats of civil wars and inteſtin troubles. Howbeit, by means of the Dictator, the flames were quenched and the diſcords appeaſed, upon theſe capitulations. Imprimis, that the Nobility ſhould accord unto the Commons, to have one Conſul from among themſelves. Item, that the common people ſhould be content that the Nobles might out of the Patritii create a Pretor or Lord chief Juſtice for oyer and determiner in cauſes within the City. Thus when after long anger the two ſtates of the City were grown to unity and concord, the Senat thinking it a worthy matter (& good cauſe they had verily as ever any time before) willingly determined, for the honour of the immortal gods, to ſet out thoſe moſt ſtately [Roman] playes. And whereas before they had continued but three daies, to add one more, and to celebrate them full four. And when the Ædiles of the Commons refuſed that charge & excuſed themſelves, the younger Gentlemen of the Nobility cried all with one voice, That they would moſt gladly do that ſervice and honor to the immortal gods, ſo as they might be made Ædiles for that purpoſe. Thanked they were generally of all hands; and the Senat made a decree, That the Dictator ſhould propoſe unto the people, that two men of the Nobility might be Ædiles, and that in all the Aſſemblies and Elections for that year, whatſoever paſſed, ſhould be ratified by the ſoveraign aſſent of the Senators.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Seventh Book.

TWO new officers of State, to wit, the Pretorſhip and Ædileſhip of the Chair; were adjoined to the reſt. The City was ſore viſited with the peſtilence: which was more noted by reaſon of Furius Camillus who died therein. The remedy and end whereof, whiles they ſought to procure by bringing in new and ſtrange Religions, at length they deviſed ſtage-playes, which then firſt were ſet forth. M. Pomponius a Tribun of the Commons, arreſted L. Manlius for his exceeding rigour in taking muſter of ſouldiers: and for confining and hardly intreating his own ſon, T. Manlius, for no crime or hainous offence. And the young man himſelf, whoſe confining and miſuſage was laid unto his fathers charge, entred the bed-chamber of the ſaid Tribun, drew his Skean and forced him to ſwear unto him, that he would let fall his ſuit and proceed no further. Then all miſchiefs intended, were laid apart and had an end. Curtius armed at all pieces, mounted upon a Courſer, rode headlong into the wide gaping chink or gulf within the City of Rome, and ſo it preſently filled up again. The ſame young Manlius, who had freed his father from the troubles of the Tribun, entred into combat with a French-man, that challenged any one of the Roman Souldiers to ſingle fight, ſlew him, took from him his colar of Gold, which he ware about his neck afterwards himſelfe, and thereof was called Torquatus. Two Tribes more were added, Pontina and Publicia. Licinius Stolo was condemned by a law of his own making, becauſe he held in poſſeſſion more then five hundred Acres of ground. M. Valerius a Colonel of one thouſand foot, killed a Gaul, who challenged him to fight: and that, by the means and help of a Raven that ſetled upon his Morion, and with tallons and bill annoyed his enemy, and thereupon was he named Corvinus. For which vertue and valorous Act, he was the year next following created Conſul, being not full three and twenty years old. Amity was concluded with the Carthaginians. The Campaines being warred upon by the Samnites, craved aid of the Senat againſt them: and when they could not ſpeed, yeelded their City and Territory to the people of Rome. Whereupon it was thought good, ſeeing both they and theirs, were now become proprietary to the people of Rome, that they ſhould be defended by force of arms againſt the Samnites. When A. Cornelius the Conſul, had led his hoſt into a place of diſvantage and was in great peril, he was by the induſtrious ſervice of P. Decius a Colonel ſaved: who having gained the hill top, which commanded the ridge, whereon the Samnites lay encamped, gave the Conſul opportunity to eſcape and paſs into a plain ground: and himſelf, notwithſtanding he was environed by the enemy, brake through them, and gat away. The Roman ſouldiers left in garriſon at Capua, having conſpired to keep the City to their own behoof, were detected and their plot diſcloſed: and for fear of puniſhment, revolted from the people of Rome contrary to their allegeance: but by the policy and wiſdom of M. Corvinus, they were reclamed from their outrage, and reſtored again to their countrey. Moreover, this book containeth the fortunate wars againſt the Hernicks, Gauls, Tyburts, Privernats, Tarquinians, Samnites, and Volſcians.

The ſeventh Book of T. Livius.

HEre enſueth a year of eſpecial note and mark, for the Conſulſhip of a man newly riſen: alſo for two new offices, the Pretorſhip and Ædilethip of the Chair. Both which dignities, they of the Nobility purchaſed to themſelves in lieu of granting to the Commons one place of the two Conſuls. The Commons beſtowed the Conſulſhip upon L. Sextius for his good ſervice, in propounding the law, whereby that promotion was firſt ob-
B tained. The Nobles conferred the Pretorſhip upon Sp. Furius Camillus the ſon of Marcus: and the Ædileſhip upon Cn. Quintius Capitolinus, and P. Cornelius Scipio, perſonages of their own order and degree: So gratious were they with the people in Mars field. L. Sextius had companion with him in government, L. Æmilius Mamercus one of the Senators. In the beginning of the year, much debate there was and hard hold, both as well about the Gauls who at the firſt ranged abroad over all * Apulia, and were now (as the report went) gathered together: as alſo concern- * Puglia.
ing the Rebellion of the Hernicks. But all matters being put off on purpoſe, until a further time, becauſe nothing ſhould be done by this new Conſul a Commoner, all things were ſtill and quiet, as if it had been vacation or Non-term: this only excepted, that the Tribuns muttered and could not endure with patience, that for one Conſul of the Commons, the Nobility had got to them-
C ſelves three Magiſtrats, all of the Patritii, ſitting like Conſuls, with their purſled and purpled long Robes in Ivory chairs of eſtate, And as for the Pretor beſides, as L. chief Juſtice to hear and decide cauſes, he was fellow with the Conſuls, and with the ſame Auſpices and authority created. Hereupon the Senat was abaſhed to be inſtant and to enforce that Ædiles of the chair ſhould be choſen out of the Nobility. And firſt it was agreed amongſt them, that every ſecond year they ſhould be elected forth of the Commons: Afterwards, indifferently one with another in common, without that regard. Now when L. Genutius and Q. Servilius were Coſſ. and all at good reſt for any home-ſedition or forrain war: behold, leſt they ſhould at any time be void of care and danger, there began a great plague; In which died, as men ſay, one Cenſor, one Ædible Curule, three Tribuns of the Commons: beſides, many a dead corps from among the multitude, was ca-D ried forth, proportionable to the reſt. But above all, the bitter death of Camillus and much lamented (notwithſtanding the long and goodly time he had in this life) cauſed this peſtilence to be much ſpoken of and remembred. For he was (in truth) the only perſon in all fortune both of proſperity and adverſity, as well in peace as war: a rare and ſingular man before his baniſhment, and during the ſame more famous and renowned: either in regard that the City had a miſs of him, and being taken by the enemy in his abſence ſought unto him for his help; or in reſpect of his happineſs, in that together with his own reſtitution home he therewith reſtored his natural country. And after this, for 25 years ſpace (for ſo long he lived afterwards) he bare himſelf anſwerable to the title of ſo great glory: accounted worthy to be ſurnamed and reputed a ſecond founder after Romulus, of the City of Rome. All this year long and the next which followed, when T. Sulpitius
E Peticus, and C. Licinius Stolo were Conſuls, the ſickneſs continued. By reaſon whereof, nothing was done worth remembrance, but that for to obtain the mercy and grace of the Gods, there was a Lectiſtern ſolemnized, which was the third ſince the City was firſt founded. But when by no device of man, nor help of the Gods, the violence of the ſickneſs aſſwaged; their minds and conſciences were ſo poſſeſſed with ſuperſtition, that among other pacifications and appeaſings of the heavenly ire, the ſtage-playes (a ſtrange and new device for a warlike and martial people, who afore time uſed only to behold the ſolemn games and feats of ſtrength and activity, in the great Liſts or Race called Circus) were (as men ſay) firſt begun and ordained. But (as all beginnings Stage-players firſt at Rome inſtituted. lightly are) a ſmall thing (God wot) it was at firſt: without ſong and metre, without geſture and action ſutable unto ſong and verſe, and the ſame alſo meer outlandiſh. For the players, who were F ſent for out of Hetruria, as they danced the meaſures to the minſtrel and ſound of flute, geſtured not undecently withal, after the Tuſcan faſhion. But in proceſs of time the youth began to imitate and counterfeit them, jeſting pleaſantly beſides one with another, and ſinging in rude rimes and diſordered metre: and their geſture was ſorting with their jeſts and ditties. Thus was this thing firſt taken up, and thus with much uſe and often exerciſe, practiſed. And hereupon our own Country Actors and artificial profeſſors of this feat, were called Hiſtriones, of Hiſter a Tuſcan word, which ſignifieth a player or dancer. But theſe uttered not (as they uſed afore time) in their turns one after another, diſordred, confuſed, and rude verſes, like to the looſe and baudy Feſcenine rimes: but went through and rehearſed out, whole Satyrs, full of muſical meaſures, with a ſet concent of ſong alſo, to the inſtrument of the minſtrel, and with geſture agreeable there-G unto. Certain years after, Livius, who was the firſt that after the uſe of Satyrs, ventured to ſet [Andronicus] forth an Enterlude, of ſome one argument and uniform matter, is reported to have been himſelf (as they were all no doubt in thoſe dayes) the Author and Actor both, of his own verſes and ſongs: But being ſo often called on by the people to play, that he became hoarſe again, and loſt his voyce, he gat leave to ſet a boy to ſing before the minſtrels. And ſo being ſilent himſelf, he acted the ſong with more agility and nimblenes of motion a good deal: for, not employing his voyce, he had no hindrance of liberty in geſture. Then began the players to have others to ſing, and they themſelves uſed their voyces only in acting their parts in Comedies dialogue-wiſe. After that, by this order taken and Law of Playes, they came from laughter and pleaſant conceited Mirth, and that this paſtime and ſport turned by litle and litle to a methodical Art and profeſſion: Then the youth leaving to Comœdians, the acting of parts in Enterludes, began after the old manner to let flye, one at another, merry ſcoffs and jeſts, interlaced within their rime and meeter, which thereupon were afterwards called Exodia, and were inſerted commonly in the Atellan Comedies. Which kind of ſport the youth learned firſt of the Oſci: and having once taken it up, they held it ſtill, and would not ſuffer it to be diſtayned and diſhoneſted by common players. And hereof cometh it, that the Actors in the Atellane Interludes were neither diſplaced out of their own tribe, nor made Ærarii, but ſerved in the wars, and have the Cities pay, as if they were not baſe Comœdians, and Profeſſors of infamous players craft. Thus have I thought good, among the ſmall beginnings of other things, to ſet down the Original of Stage-players alſo: that it may appear, that the thing ariſing from a conſiderate entrance, is grown now to this foolery and exceſſive ſumptuouſneſs, as hardly can be defrayed by moſt rich and wealthy Kingdoms. And yet theſe players at firſt, employed about a religious buſineſs, neither rid mens minds of ſcruple and ſuperſtition, nor eaſed their bodies one jot of ſickneſs. But rather, when by occaſion of an overflow and inundation of the Tyber, the Circus or Theatre was drowned, and their playes in the very midſt hindred and interrupted, this occurrent mightily troubled and affrighted them, as if the Gods had turned away their face and countenance, and rejected all their endeavours in theſe appeaſings of their wrath and indignation. Therefore in the time that Cn. Genutius, and Æmylius Mamercus were Conſuls the ſecond time, when mens minds were buſied and troubled more in ſeeking means to pacify the wrath of the Gods, than their bodies vexed with diſeaſes; the elder ſort and grand ſigniors called to mind that in old time there was a plague aſſwaged and gave over, by the driving and faſtning of a ſpike or great nail by the Dictator. The Senat upon a religious devotion perſwaded herewith, cauſed a Dictator to be created, for to faſten the nail aforeſaid. And there being choſen L. Manlius Imperioſus, he nominated for his General of Horſemen, L. Pinarius. There is an old law written with ancient letters, and in antique words, *That the chief Prætor for the time being, ſhould in the * Ides of September drive a ſpike or nail.* Well, a nail was driven, and ſtuck faſt on the right ſide of the Temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, on that hand where as Minervas Chappel ſtandeth. That nail, becauſe in thoſe dayes there was but little writing ſhewed, as they ſay, the number of the years. And thereupon that Law was ſet up in Minervaes Church, for that Minerva was the inventreſs of numbring. And Cintius a diligent writer of ſuch monuments, and a ſtudious Antiquary, affirmeth, That at Volſinii there ſtuck ſuch ſpikes to be ſeen in the Temple of Nortia, a goddeſs among the Tuſcans, to quote and repreſent the number of the years. Now, as concerning the Temple of Jupiter Optimus Maximus, M. Horatius the Conſul (by an act in that behalf provided) dedicated it, the year next enſuing the expulſion of the Kings. Afterwards, the ſolemn manner and cuſtome of faſtning a nail, was transferred from the Conſuls to the Dictators, as to the greater and more abſolute Magiſtracy. And in proceſs of time, this cuſtome being diſcontinued, it was thought a thing in it ſelf worthy, for which a Dictator ſhould be created.

The ſuperſtitious driving of a nail.

*13 of Septem.

L. Manlius being elected [as is aboveſaid] for this cauſe, as if he had been called to that dignity for ſome war, and not to free the people from their ſcruple of conſcience: and intending himſelf war againſt the Hernicks, plagued the youth with a grievous muſter: until at length all the Tribuns of the Commons taking againſt him, oppoſed themſelves: and were it by force, or for very ſhame he relented, and reſigned up his room. Nevertheleſs, in the entrance of the year next following, when Q. Servilius Hala, and L. Genutius the ſecond time were Conſuls, M. Pomponius a Tribun of the Commons arreſted Manlius. His cruelty in taking of the muſters was odious, not only for the loſs and dammage that the citizens ſuſtained thereby, but alſo for tearing and mangling their bodies, partly by ſcourging them with rods, who anſwered not to their name, and partly clapping irons upon them in priſon. But above all, his own cruel diſpoſition by nature was hateful, and the ſurname (Imperioſus) offenſive, eſpecially to a free City. This name he got by plain ſhew of his cruelty, exerciſed no leſs upon his neereſt friends and kinsfolk, yea, and his very own bloud, than upon ſtrangers. For amongſt other matters, the Tribun laid ſore to his charge, that having a young man to his ſon, detected of no lewdneſs and diſhoneſt life, him he had baniſhed (as it were) out of the City, from his houſe and home, debarred from the common Hall and open ſight of men from the company of his mates and companions, ſet him to drudgery and ſervil work, and betaken him as it were, into a priſon and houſe of correction: where, a Dictator his ſon a young Gentleman highly deſcended by this daily miſery of his, was taught to know, that he had indeed a Lordly and imperious Sir, to his father. "And for what great offence, I "pray you? Becauſe he was not ſo fair ſpoken, nor all the readieſt with his tongue. Which in- "firmity and defect of nature, ought not a father to have born withal and cloaked (if there had "been any goodneſs, any common humanity in him) rather than to puniſh it, and by rough "handling, and ſharp uſage, to make it more known and notorious? Why? even the very brute "beaſts, if it chance that any of their breed or young ones prove but untowardly, feed and che- "riſh them ſtill nevertheleſs. But as for this L. Manlius, he augmenteth one inconvenience and "default in his ſon, with another: whom being but ſoft and ſlow of nature, he keepeth down the "more: and that litle life and ſmall metal that is in him, he goeth about to quench and dull at "once by this peaſants life and ruſtical uſage, and converſing amongſt the cattel and beaſts.

Theſe

A These bitter complaints and accusations moved the patience, and stirred the stomacks of every man else, sooner than the young man himself. Who contrary-wise was grieved in his mind, that he should be a cause of his fathers troubles, thus to incur the ill will and obloquy of the people. And that all the World, both Heaven and Earth might know, that he desired rather to succour and help his father, than to assist his adversaries and foes, he entreth into a course beseeming and bewraying (I must needs say) a rude and rustical mind. Which, although it savour nothing of Civility, yet for his kindness and dutiful piety to his father, deserveth commendation. One morning betimes he gets him up, and unknown to every one of the house, with a good skein close by his side, to the City he goes: and from the gate streight wayes directly to M. Pomponius the Tribun The kindness of T. Manlius to his father.
B his house. Heteileth the Porter, that he must needs speak with his Master out of hand, willing him to let him understand, that T. Manlius the son of Lucius, was there. And being immediately let in, (for the Tribun hoped, that the son was throughly angred with his father, and brought new complaints, and one matter or other against him, or some devise and overture how to proceed in the commenced Action) and salutations passed to and fro between the Tribun and him, he said, that he was to talk with him apart out of all mens hearing. So the room being voided, and all commanded to depart far enough out of the way, he draweth out his skein: and leaping aloft upon the bed, stood there, and held it full bent against him, and threatned presently to give him the stab, unless he would swear the oath he should render unto him, namely, never to call an Assembly or Hall of the Commons together about his fathers inditement, or impanel a Jury against him.
C The Tribun affrighted (seeing the naked weapon glittering before his face, himself all alone and unarmed, the other a tall and lusty young fellow, and, that which was as much to be feared as the rest, fool-hardy, and presuming upon his strength) took the oath in that form as he put it unto him. And afterwards he gave it out plainly and confessed (for his excuse) that by this means he was forced in spight of his heart, to surcease his suit, and give over his enterprise. But the Commons were not so much offended at the son, for giving such an adventure in his fathers quarrel: but they could have been more contented and better pleased, that it had lien in their power to have passed their voyces, for the condemnation of so cruel and proud a prisoner, as they had under their hands. And the more praise-worthy was this design of the son, because so great rigor of the father, wrought no alienation at all in his heart, from the affection at duty that he owed unto D him. So not only the father escaped his arraignment, but this action of the young man turned to his own honour and preferment. For whereas, this year it was first ordained, that the *Tribuns or Colonels should be chosen by voyces of the legionary souldiers (for aforetime, as at this day, the Generals themselves made them, whom they call Ruffult) in six places (for so many were elected) he obtained the second room: and that, in regard of no desert otherwise, either at home or abroad, which might win him this favour, as who had spent his youth in the country altogether, far from the civil society of men.

* A Tribun in a Legion, called Chiliarchus, i. a Colonel or leader of a 1000 [footmen]

The same year, by earth-quake or some other forcible violence, the common place called Forum, clave and opened wide, welneer in the mids, and sunk down to an exceeding depth: neither could that chink or pit be filled up by casting in of earth (notwithstanding every man laboured and E brought what he could) before that they began to enquire, according as they were admonished by the divine Oracles, what it might be, wherein the most puissance and greatness of the people of Rome consisted. (For the wisards prophesied, That if they would have the state of Rome to remain sure for ever, they should dedicate and offer it, whatsoever it was, unto that place.) And when they were in doubt what this should be, it is reported, that M. Curtius, a right hardy knight M. Curtius his valor and resolution. and martial young Gentleman, rebuked them therefore, because they doubted whether the Romans had any earthly thing better than armour and valor? Herewith, after silence made, he lift up his eyes, and beheld the Temples of the immortal Gods, scituat neer to the Forum, and the Capitol likewise; and stretching forth his hands, one while toward Heaven, another while to the gaping chinks and gulf in the earth, toward the infernal spirits beneath, he offered and devoted him-
F self to assured death. And mounting upon a brave courser, as richly trapped and set out, as possibly he could devise, armed as he was at all pieces, he leapt Horse and man and all into the hole. The people, both men and women, threw in after him sundry gifts and oblations, and fruits of the earth in great plenty. The place was after called Curtius Lacus, of his name, and not of that Curtius Lacus, Curtius Metius in the old time, who was a souldier under Titus Tatius. If I could by any means search out the truth, I would not spare for any pains in that behalf. But now seeing that by reason of antiquity the certainty is not fully known, we must go by the common voyce and report of men. And verily the name of the lake is more renowned and noble by occasion of this later and fresher tale, than the other.

After the expiation of so great and prodigious a wonder, much consultation there was in the G Senate that year, as concerning the Hernicks: for having sent their Heralds unto them for restoration of harms done, but to no effect, they determined with all convenient speed to propose unto the people, for to proclaim war against the Hernicks, and bid them defiance. The people generally with one voyce liked thereof, and approved it. The charge of that service and exploit fell to L. Genutius his lot, to undertake. Now for that he was the first Consul of the Commons that by his own auspices and conduct should manage war, the City was in great expectation of the sequel and issue: and according to the event that should fall out, good or bad in this journey, they were to judge, whether they had done well or amiss to communicat these dignities with the Commons.

But it fortuned ſo, that Genutius being with great preparation and power ſet forth againſt the enemies, was entrapped by an Ambuſcado, his legions upon a ſudden fear unlooked for defeated, himſelf (the Conſul) environed round about, and ſlain by them, that wiſt not whom they ſlew. Which tidings being brought to Rome, the Senators were not ſo penſive and ſorrowful for the common calamity, as they fumed and took on moſt inſolently, for this unhappy expedition and conduct of the Commoner Conſul: and muttered in all places theſe and ſuch like ſpeeches: "Now let them "go and create Conſuls again out of the commonalty, and tranſlate the Auſpicia whither they "ought not. What? Becauſe the Senators by an Act of the Commons, might be defeated and diſ-"poſſeſſed of their dignities, could ſo inauſpicate and irreligious a law prevail likewiſe againſt the "Gods immortal? Who now themſelves have taken the matter into their own hands, and main-"tained their power, their deity and Auſpices: which were not ſo ſoon medled withal, and pol-"luted by one that had no right thereto, nor lawful title, but both the whole army, and Captain "alſo, were vanquiſhed and overthrown; to teach them for ever hereafter, how they make their "ſolemn Elections of Magiſtrats confuſedly, without regard of the rights and royalties of noble "houſes. Theſe ſpeeches both Councel-Houſe and common place rung again withal. So the Conſul Servilius with conſent of the Nobles, named for Dictator Appius Claudius, who had afore-time in an Oration before the whole aſſembly of the Commons diſſwaded the proceeding of that law; and now with greater authority blamed the miſhap of that counſel, which was by him miſ-liked and reproved. A muſter was proclaimed, and a publick Vacation. But before that the Dicta-tor and theſe new enrolled legions were gone as far as the Hernicks confines, the other army under the leading of C. Sulpitius the Lieutenant, by occaſion of an occurrent that fell out there, got a good hand againſt their enemies. For when as upon the death of the Conſul, the Hernicks ad-vanced in ſcornful and contemptuous manner, cloſe under the camp of the Romans, with a full hope to be maſters of the ſame; behold, what with the exhortation of the Lieutenant, and what for anger and indignity, wherewith the ſouldiers ſtomacks were full, they made a ſally out againſt them. Whereupon the Hernicks came ſo far ſhort of their accompt, that they had no hope to aſſail, no, nor approach the rampier: and ſo in diſaray they diſmarched and departed. Afterwards by the coming in of the Dictator with a freſh power, the old army was reenforced double. The Dictator in a ſolemn audience, having praiſed the Lieutenant and his ſouldiers for defending their tents ſo manfully, both encouraged them that heard themſelves ſo highly commended according to their deſerts, and alſo whetted on the reſt to perform the like valorous ſervice. The enemies on the other ſide were nothing ſlack to prepare themſelves to fight again: who in remembrance of the honour they had already won, albeit they were not ignorant that the Romans forces were redoubled, encreaſed their own power alſo. For the whole Nation of the Hernicks, even as many as were able to draw ſword, were called forth to the wars. Eight cohorts by themſelves conſiſting of four hundred in a band were enrolled, even the moſt able and choice men of all others. This elect and eſpecial flour of their youth and manhood, they fed with hope and encouraged the more to this ſervice, becauſe they had taken order they ſhould have double pay. Freed they were beſides from all other labour and Military toil that being thus reſerved to intend the fight and no-thing elſe, they ſhould make reckoning and know, that they were to indeavour and ſtrain them-ſelves above the ordinary carriage of ſouldiers. Placed alſo they were in the battel, apart from the other ranks: to the end their valour and manhood might be more ſeen and marked. Between both camps of the Romans and Hernicks, there was a plain of two miles in length: and there in the mid way in a manner, was the battel fought. Firſt, the fight was doubtful on both ſides, whiles the Roman Horſemen charged and recharged again, but ever in vain, to ſee if they could break their battailons. Thus when the ſervice on Horſeback, proved leſs in effect than in attempt, they asked the adviſe and craved leave of the Dictator: which being granted, they abandoned their Horſes, and with a mighty ſhout, ran forth before the enſigns, and renewed the battel afreſh. Neither could they have been any longer endured, but that thoſe extraordinary bands oppoſed themſelves, and received them with equal might of body and valour of heart. Then was the fight maintained between the brave youth and principal flour of both nations. And look what ſlaughter there was by common hazard of war, as well of the one ſide as of the other, the loſs was greater for the quality of the perſons, than the proportion of the number. For the reſt of the common ſouldiers, as if they had ſhifted from themſelves the whole conflict, and betaken it to the van-guards only, repoſed their own event and hap in the manhood of others. Many a man on both parts was ſmitten down and dyed in the place, but more were hurt and wounded. "At laſt, thoſe "Horſemen that diſmounted, fell to call and rebuke one another, asking what hope remained elſe "beſides? If neither on horſeback they were able to drive the enemies back, nor on foot force "them to give ground and remove them, what third kind of ſervice looked they for? Why leapt "they out ſo luſtily and bravely into the forefront before the enſigns? and fought in the place of "others? With theſe words provoking one another, they pluckt up their hearts, and with a freſh ſhout ſet foot forward and gave a new charge. Firſt, they compelled the enemies to retreat and loſe their ſtanding: then to give more ground: and at length plainly to turn their back and run a-way. Hard it is to ſay, being ſo equally and indifferently matched as they were, what it was that turned the ballance and gave the victory: unleſs it were the perpetual fortune that ever followed both nations, able to advance the ſpirit and courage of the one, and to daunt and abate the hearts of the other. The Romans had the Hernicks in chaſe, all the way long, ſo far as to their camp: but

becauſe

A becauſe it was far in the evening, they ſtaid from aſſailing it. For by reaſon that it was long ere the Dictator could by ſacrifice gather any aſſured token of Gods favour, he ſounded not the battel before noon: whereby it continued until night. The morrow after, were the Hernicks fled and their camp abandoned: only ſome hurt and wounded ſouldiers were found left behind. But one troup of them that forſook their enſigns (when as neer unto their walls and forts their banners were diſcovered, ſlenderly accompanied, and with few about them) was ſcattered abroad over the fields, and in great fear ſtragled all about, and ſhamefully fled away. And yet this victory of the Romans coſt them well the ſetting on, and ſpent ſome bloud: for they loſt a fourth part of their men: and that which was no ſmall dammage unto them, ſome of the Roman Horſemen alſo were B ſlain.

The next year following, when C. Sulpitius and C. Licinius Calvus the Conſuls, were gone with a power againſt the Hernicks, and finding not the enemy abroad in the country, had by force won Forentinum a Town of theirs: in their return homeward, the Tyburts kept their gates ſhut againſt them. And after many complaints and unkindneſſes ripped up between them: this laſt quarrel was it, that moved the Romans by their Heralds (after reſtitution and amends demanded) to ſend defiance, and proclaim war againſt the people of Tybur. That Titus Quintius Penus was Dictator that year, and Serg. Cornelius Maluginenſis General of his Horſemen, it is agreed upon by all authors. Macer Licinius writeth that he was created for the holding of an aſſembly for Election of Magiſtrates, and that, by the Conſul Licinius: becauſe when his fellow Conſul made haſt C to have the Election before the war, thereby to continue his own Conſulſhip, it was thought good to withſtand and meet with his naughty deſire in that behalf. But Licinius [Macer] in uſurping to his name and family, that praiſe and commendation, maketh himſelf to be of leſs credit in writing of the reſt: eſpecially, ſeeing that in none of the old records, I find mention of any ſuch matter. Mine own mind giveth me rather, that the Dictator was created becauſe of the Gauls tumultuous war. For certainly that year they encamped themſelves three miles from Rome, beyond the bridge of * Anio, in the way Salaria. The Dictator having proclaimed a Vacation, * Teveron. becauſe of theſe troubles of the Gauls, received the Military oath of all the younger ſort; and with a puiſſant army departed the City, and upon the very banck on this ſide of Anio pitched his tents. In the mid way between them and the enemies there was a bridge: which they D would not break down on either part, leſt they ſhould be thought fearful cowards. But about the ſeizing and gaining of that bridge, firſt, there was many a skirmiſh: and judged it could not be, conſidering the equal forces of both ſides, who ſhould be maſters of it. Then advanced forward unto the bridge (void of all guards) a mighty tall and big Frenchman, and as loud as ever he could ſet out a throat, maketh this challenge; Now (quoth he) let the braveſt gallant that Rome hath, come forth and ſpare not, to combat if he dare, that the event of us twain may ſhew whether nation is more valiant and warlike. The brave Knights and youths of Rome, held their peace a good while, both abaſhed to refuſe the challenge, and alſo unwilling to run upon the preſent hazard of a ſingle fight. Then T. Manlius, the ſon of Lucius, even he who releaſed his father from the Tribuns troubles, goeth forth of his quarter unto the Dictator. "Without your leave and expreſs T. Manlius to E "commandment (quoth he) O Noble Soveraign, I would never preſume to fight out of my ranck the L. General. "and ſtanding, no, not if I ſhould ſee aſſured victory before mine eyes: but if it will pleaſe your "Excellency to give me licence, I will ſhew unto that beaſt yonder (that ſo proudly and luſtily is "come forth leaping before the enemies enſigns, and braving as you ſee) that I am deſcended of "that houſe and race, that gave the whole army of the Gauls the foil, and turned them down the "Cliff Tarpeia. Then ſaid the Dictator unto him, God bleſſe thee T. Manlius: On forth a Gods Name, in this thy dutiful mind and zeal that thou carrieſt both to father and Country: Go on I ſay, and with the help of the Gods, perform the Roman name to be invincible. Then his fellows and companions hoip to arme the young Gentleman. A light footmans ſhield he takes unto him, and a ſpaniſh blade by his ſide, more handſome to fight ſhort and cloſe. Being thus armed F and ſet out, they bring him forth againſt this vainglorious Gaul, ſet all upon joyful fooliſhly, and (as the ancient writers have thought it worth the noting and remembrance) ſcornfully lolling and blaring out his tongue. Then the reſt departed every man to his own quarter and ward: The combat and the two armed Champions were left in the midſt, more like a feſtival ſpectacle and pageant between T. to behold, than any fight in field, ſuiting to the manner, guiſe, and law of combat, conſidering Manlius and a they were not equally matched, if a man ſhould judge by the eye and outward view. The one of mighty big them of perſonage mighty and exceeding tall, his coat armour of ſundry colours and gay, his har- Gaul. neſs glittering and all damasked and engraven with gold. The other, a man of a middle * ſta- * Six foot high, ture of Souldiers, no great ſhew of armor, and that rather fit and handſome, than gaudy to be- or five foot hold: without any hooping, ſinging, and joyous vaunting of himſelf, without vain-flouriſhes and ten inches. G and ſhaking of his weapons in the air: but he had an heart full of reſolute courage, ſtomack, and cloſe anger within, reſerving all his fierceneſs and eagerneſs unto the very combat and tryal of fight. As they ſtood thus between the two armies, and ſo many men all about looking on, in doubtful ſuſpence between hope and fear, the Gaul like as he had been a huge mountain aloft over the other, ready to fall upon him, held forth his target with the left hand to bear off the ſword of his enemy coming againſt him, and let drive a down-right blow edgelong, that it reſounded again upon his ſhield, and did no harm at all. The Roman bearing his own ſword with the point upward, and with his ſhield having ſmitten the nether part of his enemies target, and turned it aside, got with his whole body close within him, and without the danger of being H hurt: and when he had wound himself between his enemies body and his swords point, he redoubled one or two foins, and thrust him up into the belly at the groin, and so overthrew him.

There lay the Gaul along, and took up a great ground in length. When he was down, without any further mangling and tormenting his carcass, he despoiled him only of his colar of gold, which embrued as it was with blood, he did about his own neck. The Gauls with fear and admiration of this fight were astonied. The Romans with great cheerfulness came forth of their wards and quarters to meet their champion, and with great praise and congratulation brought him before the Dictator. And as they merily cast forth (as the manner of souldiers is) certain pleasant ditties, ballad-wise, but without artificial skill of poetry, they were heard to surname him Torquatus*: I which afterwards was taken up and commonly used, and became an honorable name to his posterity, and the whole house besides. Besides all this, the Dictator bestowed upon him a coronet of gold for a reward, and openly before the whole audience of the army, highly and wonderfully commended that fight of his. And certainly, that combat was of such consequence, and made so much to the event of the whole war, that the night next following, the host of the Gauls, fearfully abandoning their tents, departed into the Tyburtin country: and being drawn into a society of war with the inhabitants of Tybur*, and liberally by them relieved with victuals, they passed within a while into Campania. Which was the cause that the next year, C. Petilius Balbus the Consul (when his fellow M. Fabius Ambustus was by lot, sent with commission against the Hernicks) led an army, by the appointment of the people, against the Tyburtins. To the aid of whom, when K the French were returned out of Campania; there was foul spoil and havock made in the Lavican, Tusculan, and Alban territories, by the leading and conduct, no doubt of the Tyburtins. And whereas the State stood well contented that the Consul should be the General commander, against these enemies the Tyburtins; this new trouble and tumult of the Gauls, caused a Dictator for to be created. And that was Q. Servilius Hala, who named for his General of Horsemen, *T.
Quintius*. And by the authority and assent of the Senators, he vowed to set out the great games, in case he sped well in this war. The Dictator having commanded the Consul with his army to tarry still, that by his own conduct of war he might keep in the Tyburtins, took the oath of all the younger people: and there was not one refused to go to the war. Not far from the gate Collina was this battel fought, in the sight of their Parents, Wives and Children. Great incouragements, L doubtless, to cheer up and animate men, absent and far off: but now before their eyes, partly, for shame, and partly, for pitty and compassion, they set the souldiers all on fire. After much blood-shed on both sides, at the last the army of the Gauls turn back: and being put to flight, they made hast to Tybur, the very strength and fort of the Gauls war. But as they fled straggling one from another, they were encountred by the Consul Petilius not far from Tybur. And when the Tyburtins issued forth to succour them, they with the rest were beaten into the Town. Likewise the other Consul Fabius, first in small skirmishes, and at last in one notable pight field, vanquished the Hernicks, at what time as his enemies charged upon him with all their forces and whole puissance. The Dictator having highly commended the Consuls, both in the Senat-house and also in a publick assembly of all the people, and attributed the whole honour of his own Acts unto M them, gave up the Dictatorship. Petilius, obtained a double triumph, over the Gauls and the Tiburts. For Fabius it was thought sufficient, that he should enter into the City Ovant, in a pety triumph. The Tyburtins scoffed and made good game at the triumph of Petilius. For, "where "was it (say they) that they encountred and joyned battel with us? There went forth indeed out "of the City gates a few of us to behold the flight and fright of the Gauls: but seeing our selves
"also to be set upon, and killed one with another as we came in the way, we retired back, and
"and got the City over our heads. And was that such a doughty deed, that the Romans should "think, it deserved a triumph? But that they may not deem it still, so noble and so wondrous an "Act, to make some stir, and raise a tumult in the enemies gates: they should themselves see short"ly greater fearfulness, even under their own walls. Hereupon, the year following, when M. Po- N pilius Lenas, and Cn. Manlius were Consuls, at the first watch of the night, they came from Tybur in warlike manner to the City of Rome. This sudden occurrent, hapning so fearfully in the night season, stroke a mighty terrour into them, that hastily awakened out of sleep. Besides, many there were that wist not, either what enemies they were, or from whence they came. Howbeit they cryed Alarm with all speed, on every side. The gates were fortified with warders, the walls manned with strong guards. When as early in the morning, they were descried to be but a mean number of enemies before the Town, and those none other but Tyburtins; the Consuls sallied out at two gates, and assailed both wayes their forces, as they were now come under the walls ready to scale. Then was it seen that they were thither come presuming rather on the vantage of the time, than trusting in valour and manhood: so little were they able to abide the first brunt and O charge given by the Romans. Furthermore, it was well known that this their comming turned to the Romans good: for, the discord that was now breeding between the Senators and the Com. for fear of this so neer danger was quite staied. But in the next war that ensued the enemies came after another sort, and were more terrible to the fields and country, than to the City. For the Tarquinians over-ran all the marches of the Roman pale, wasting and spoiling all those parts, especially that border upon Hetruria. And after restitution & amends demanded, but to no effect, the new Coss.
C. Fabius & C. Flaminius, by the ordinance of the people proclaimed war against them. The rumors

A alſo of the Gauls war began to be riſe. But amid theſe manifold and fearful troubles, this was their comfort, that the Latins had peace granted unto them, upon their own ſute: and from thence a great power was received, according to the ancient league, which for many years ſpace, they had let paſs and diſcontinued. The Roman forces by this aid well ſtrengthned, made a lighter matter of it, when they heard that the Gauls were arrived already at Preneſte, and were ſet down and encamped about Pedum. It was thought good, that C. Sulpitius ſhould be choſen Dictator, named by C. Plautius, ſent for to the ſame purpoſe. Unto whom M. Valerius was appointed for Commander of his Horſemen. Theſe marched againſt the Gauls with the choice ſouldiers of two Conſular armies. This was a lingring war and protracted longer a great deal, than both parties liked of. At the B firſt, the Gauls only were ſharp ſet and eager of battel: but afterwards the Roman ſouldiers, by ruſhing into fight and skirmiſh, exceeded far the fierceneſs and forwardneſs of the French. The Dictator was nothing pleaſed herewith, to put all upon the hazard of fortune, when there was no need at all, eſpecially having to deal with that enemy, whom tract of time and diſadvantage of the place, made daily worſe and worſe: being unprovided beſides of victuals and making long abroad without any fenced fort: moreover, of that ſtomack and conſtitution of body, as ſerved wholly for expedition and quick ſervice, and by ſmall delayes waxed feeble and faint. Upon theſe conſiderations the Dictator held off ſtill and drew the war on length, and had proclaimed a grievous puniſhment if any without his expreſs commandment ſhould fight with the enemy. The ſouldiers could not well brook this: but firſt within their wards and watches began among themſelves to carp at C the Dictator: and otherwhiles they let flie at the LL. of the Senate in general, blaming them for their direction in that the Conſuls had not the managing of this war. They have choſen indeed (ſay they) a ſingular General on ſet purpoſe, a Captain alone, who thinks whiles he ſitteth ſtill and doth nothing, the victory will fall from Heaven, or flie into his very lap. After this they began openly abroad, and in the day time, to caſt out the ſame, yea, and worſe ſpeeches too and more malepart: namely, that they would either fight, and ask the Dictator no leave, or go along in order of battel to Rome. The Centurions alſo joyned themſelves to the ſouldiers: and not only in conventicles and knots together, there was whiſpering and grumbling: but in the very * Principia, yea, and within the quarter of the L. General his pavilion, were heard confuſed ſpeeches together in one accord. So as the multitude began now to grow to a full aſſembly, and from all
D parts to call and cry aloud, to go preſently to the Dictator: and that Sex. Tullius ſhould in the name of the whole army ſpeak unto him, as beſeemed his vertue and courage. This Tullius now had been ſeven times already a primipilar or principal Centurion: neither was there in the whole army, of all thoſe that ſerved on foot, a man more renowned for feats of arms. He going before the army of footmen, ſteppeth to the Tribunal. And when as Sulpitius marvailed, not ſo much to ſee that company, as the leader of the company Tullius, who of all the ſouldiers had ever been in beſt order and moſt obedient. "This is the matter (quoth he) O Noble Dictator and nothing "elſe, The whole army in general, ſuppoſing themſelves by you condemned of cowardice, and in a "manner to their utter ſhame abandoned, and diſarmed, have intreated me to plead their cauſe "before your Majeſty. And I for my part, I aſſure you, in caſe we might be charged to have loſt
E "ground any where, in caſe we had turned our backs upon the enemy, in caſe we had loſt our en-"ſigns ſhamefully, would think it yet a reaſonable ſuit to be obtained at your hands, that you "would give us leave to amend that which is amiſs, to correct our former fault with hardineſs and "valour, and by ſome freſh and glorious exploit, to cancel the remembrance of ſo foul a foil and "ſhameful diſhonor. Even thoſe very Legions that were deſeated and put to flight at Allia, after-"wards in their return from Veii, recovered the ſame country of theirs by valour, which they had "once before loſt through cowardice. But we by the goodnes of God, through the felicity of your "ſelf and the people of Rome, have hitherto kept both the army unfoiled, & honor unſtained. And "yet I ſcarce dare ſay honour; if ſo be, that not only our enemies may with all reproachful tearms "ſcorn and flout us, as if we were women pent in & mewed up cloſe within our rampier: but alſo
F "you our General (the more is our grief) deem us your army to be heartleſs, handleſs & armour-"leſs: and before any tryal of us made, to deſpair of us, as if you took your ſelf to be a Commander "& Leader of a ſort of maimed & feeble perſons. For what elſe may we think of it, that you, an old "experienced Captain and a moſt valiant warrior, ſhould ſit, as they ſay, with one hand in another, "doing nothing? For howſoever the truth is indeed, more meet it is, that you ſhould be thought to "doubt of our valor, than we of yours. But if this be not a device of your own ſetting, but a publick "plot laid: and ſome matter agreed upon among the Senators at home, rather than any war of the "Gauls, keepeth us away from thence, confined as it were from the City & our own houſes: then "I beſeech you whatſoever I ſhall ſay, you would think it as ſpoken not by the ſouldiers to their "Lord General, but by the Commons to the rulers and Senators. Who may thus reply, that as ye G "have your policies and counſels, ſo will they have their deſigns & wayes of their own likewiſe. "For who would think I pray you, that we are your ſouldiers, and not your ſlaves: ſent to war, and "not into baniſhment? If any ſet out the banner of war unto us, lead us forth into the field, and "ſound the battel, ready we are to fight like men, and like Romans: but if there be no need of war, "we wil rather ſit ſtil at home than in the camp. And thus much ſuppoſe as ſpoken to the Lords "of the Senat. But we thy ſouldiers, O worthy General beſeech thee firſt to give us leave to fight, "then deſirous are we to conquer and under thy ſtandard and conduct to conquer: to preſent thee "with a glorious garland of lawrel, and in triumph to enter with thee into the City: and after thy of Tullius, the multitude ſeconded with their petitions, calling aloud unto the General on every XIV ſide, to ſound the alarm, and command them to arm. The Dictator, albeit he thought the matter in it ſelf good, but not handled in good manner; and for example ſake not to be allowed: yet promiſed to ſatisfy the ſouldiers deſire. "And calling Tullius ſecretly apart, queſtioned with him

"what this matter meant, what precedent or cuſtom they had for their warrant? Tullius earneſtly
"beſought the Dictator, not to think him to have forgotten either military Diſcipline, or his own "place, nor yet the Majeſty of his Soveraign. And whereas he had not withdrawn himſelf away "from the multitude being in a mutiny, nor refuſed to be their ſpeaker (who lightly reſemble "thoſe that are their ring-leaders) it was only for fear leſt ſome other ſhould have ſtept in place, I
"ſuch as the unruly people in mutinies are wont to ſet up for their Captains. As for himſelf, do "nothing he would, without the pleaſure of the General. Howbeit, he would adviſe him to look "well about him, and carefully to ſee to it, that he keep his army in order, government, and obe"dience. And high time it is now, and would not be deferred. For conſidering their hearts were
"kindled already, and their bloud up, they would be their own carvers, and chuſe themſelves "both time and place, if the General would not grant it them the ſooner. Whiles they were thus in ſad communication, there hapned two Roman ſouldiers to take perforce from a Gaul certain ſumpter Horſes, which feeding without the camp, he was driving away. At whom, the Gauls let flye ſtones good ſtore. And thereupon roſe an alarm from the Roman Corps de guard, and running out there was apace, on both ſides. So as now they had grown to a full skirmiſh and battel K indeed, had not the Centurions ſpeedily ſtickled them, and ended the fray. Upon which occur-rent, the credit of Tullius with the Dictator was confirmed: and ſeeing the caſe would abide no delayes, he proclaimed battel againſt the morrow. The Dictator notwithſtanding he had yeelded to fight a field, as preſuming more upon the courage of his men, than their forces: began to de-viſe with himſelf, and caſt about every way, how by ſome ſtratagem he might ſtrike a terrour among the enemies. And having a ſubtle wit and nimble head of his own, this new policy he thought upon: which afterwards many warriors, both of our own country, and of others alſo, The ſtratagem of C. Sulpitius the Dictator. yea, and ſome even in our time, have uſed and put in practiſe. He gave order, that the mules ſumpters ſhould be taken off their backs, leaving only two courſe twillies or coverings upon them, and ſetteth the muletors aloft thereon, furniſhed with the armour of certain captives, and ſick L and diſeaſed perſons. Of theſe he made wel-neer one thouſand, and joyned unto them one hundred good Horſemen. All theſe, he chargeth in the night time to get above the camp into the hills, and among the Furs and woods, to beſtow themſelves cloſe: and not to ſtir from thence, before that he gave them a ſignal. Himſelf, ſo ſoon as it was day light, began with great warineſs and conſiderate care to embattel and arrange his army in length along the very foot of the mountains: to the end, that the enemy might have the hills full againſt him. Thus having ſet out and directed theſe counterfeit cornets of Horſe, to ſcare the enemies with, who, as it fell out, did more good in a manner, than the other forces indeed; at the firſt the vanguard of the Gauls thought that the Romans would not come down on even ground: but afterwards, when they ſaw them upon a XV ſudden deſcended, they alſo, as deſirous of fight, ran on forward preſently to joyn battel, and be- M gan the fight before the Captains had ſounded. The Gauls charged the right wing more fiercely, ſo that hardly they might have been abidden, had not by good hap the Dictator been there in per-
ſon. "Who called upon Sextus Tullius by name, and rebuked him, demanding whether he had "given his word unto him, that the ſouldiers ſhould in that ſort fight? What is become (quoth
"he) of theſe, that with out-cries and open mouth called for battel? Where are thoſe threats
"now, that they would begin to fight a field without commandment of the General? Lo, your "General himſelf calleth upon you as loud as he can, to fall to your buſineſs, and goeth armed be"fore the enſigns in the vanguard: will any now follow after that erewhile would needs lead the "way afore? Fierce (I ſee well) in camp, fearful in the field. And no fable it was that they heard "him ſpeak. Whereupon for very ſhame they were ſo pricked forward, that without caſting any N perils, or minding preſent danger, they ran upon the darts and ſhot of their enemies. This violence of theirs, as if they had been welneer out of their right wits, at the very firſt troubled and diſordered the enemies. The Horſemen that were ſent out hard after them, forced them to turn back, when they were once in diſarray. The Dictator himſelf ſeeing the battel of one ſide to ſhrink, advanced forward with the enſigns againſt the left wing, unto which he ſaw the main multitude to reſort and gather together, and withal he gave the ſign to them that were within the hills, according as it was before agreed. And when from thence alſo a new ſhout aroſe, and that they were ſeen to march ſide-long overthwart the hill, toward the Gauls camp; then for fear leſt they ſhould be ſhut out from their hold, they gave over all fighting, and ran by heaps to their camp. Where M. Valerius the General of the Horſemen encountred and affronted them. For he ſeeing the right O wing diſcomfited had ſet a compaſs about, and ridden to the fortifications and munitions of the enemies. Whereupon they fled to the mountains and the woods. Moſt of them were received by the counterfeit ſhew of Horſemen, and by the muletors caught up, and came ſhort home: but as many of them as fear drave through into the woods, were (after the heat of the battel was paſt) cruelly ſlain and hewn in pieces. Neither was there any one, ſetting M. Furius aſide, that triumphed more worthily over the Gauls, than did C. Sulpitius. He conſecrated alſo in the Capitol a good weighty maſs of gold, got out of the Gauls ſpoil, and compaſſed it within an encloſure of ſquare ſtone.

A ſtone. The ſame year, the Conſuls likewiſe warred, but with diverſe fortune and ſucceſs. For by C. Plautius, the Hernicks were vanquiſhed and ſubdued. But his companion Fabius fought raſhly and unadviſedly againſt the Tarquinians. The loſs in the battel received, was not ſo much, but that the Tarquinians ſacrificed three hundred and ſeven Roman ſouldiers whom they took priſoners. This foul and ſhameful execution, cauſed the ignominy of the Roman defeat afore to be much more notable, and talked of abroad. Beſides this loſs, was the Roman territory much waſted (to help the matter withal) by the Privernats, and after them by the Veliterns, who made ſudden inrodes into the Country. The ſame year alſo were two more Tribes added, Pomptina and Publicia. The votive ſolemn playes or games likewiſe, which Marcus Furius the Dictator
B had vowed, were then ſet forth and performed.

Then and never before was the firſt law put up to the people by P. Petilius, a Tribun of the Commons, and that by the conſent and approbation of the Senators, againſt the exceſſive ſuit and ambitious ſtanding for dignities. By which law men ſuppoſed, that the ambition principally of certain perſons new riſen and of the firſt head, who were wont to haunt fairs and places of great reſort for that intent, was repreſſed and kept under. But the year enſuing when C. Martius and Cn. Manlius were Conſuls, M. Duellius and M. Menenius two Tribuns of the Commons, went through with a law and got it enacted, which was not ſo well liked of the Senators, to wit, concerning Uſury of one in the hundred. But the Commons were ſo much the more forward and better contented, to grant and accept it. Over and beſides thoſe new wars the year before intend-
C ed, the Faliſci were declared new enemies: and that, for two quarrels pretended againſt them; One, for that their youth had ſerved againſt the Romans under the Tarquinians: the other, becauſe they had not delivered again thoſe Romans which fled unto Falerii, after their defeat and unlucky fight, notwithſtanding the Heralds had made claim unto them and demanded them. This Province fell to Cn. Manlius. But Martius had the leading of an army into the Land of the Privernats, which by reaſon of long peace was unfoiled yet, and in very good ſtate, and thereby enriched his ſouldiers with good prizes. For, to the plenty and ſtore that there was found, he added his own bounty and liberality; in that he ſet out nothing for the common Treaſury, but favoured the ſouldiers, and gave them leave to better their own private eſtate. The Privernats lay ſtrongly encamped before their own City: and when he had aſſembled all his ſouldiers toge-
D ther; "Now (quoth he) I give unto you the enemies camp and their City for a booty, ſo you "will promiſe me to quit your ſelves like men, and to be as ready to fight as to ſpoil. Hereupon, with a great cry they call for the Signal of battel: and ſo advancing forward and exalting themſelves bravely and couragiouſly, with aſſured hope of victory, to battel they go. There, even before the enſigns in the vanguard, Sextus Tullius, of whom we ſpake before, cryed out aloud, Behold, Noble General (quoth he) how thine army performeth their word given unto thee: and therewith laying down his Javelin, with drawn ſword confronteth the enemy. Then follow after Tullius, all they that fought in the vanguard before the Standards, and at the firſt ſhock put the enemies to flight, followed the chaſe and drave them into the Town. And as they were ſcaling the Walls, the Town was rendred up into their hands. So he triumphed over the Pri-E vernats. By the other Conſul there was no worthy exploit done, but that as he lay encamped before Sutrium, he propoſed a law to paſs by the Tribes, (a courſe never taken before, and without example) concerning a twentith part or viceſime, to be levied of their goods that were made free. The Lords of the Senat (becauſe by that Act there accrewed no ſmall revenue to the Exchequer, that was now waſted) allowed thereof and gave their aſſent. But the Tribuns of the Com. moved not ſo much at the quality of the law in it ſelf, as at the dangerous precedent given, ordained under pain of death, That no man ever after ſhould in making of laws withdraw the people apart: For, if that were once by law permitted, there would be nothing, were it never ſo pernicious to the people, but it might be enacted by ſouldiers, that have ſworn to their Conſuls allegeance, and were at his devotion. The ſame year was C. Licinius Stolo at the ſuit of M. Popi-
F lius Lenas, condemned upon his own ſtatute in * 10000 Aſſes, for that he together with his ſon, was poſſeſſed of a thouſand acres of Land, and under colour of freeing his ſon, he had deluded the ſtatute in that caſe provided. * 26 lib. ſt. ſter.

After this, the two Conſuls M. Fabius Ambuſtus the ſecond time, and M. Popilius Lenas the ſecond time made two wars. That which Lenas fought with the Tyburtins was performed with eaſe and facility, For having driven the enemies into the Town, he forraged their fields. But in the other war, the Faliſci and the Tarquinians, diſcomfited in the firſt battel the other Conſul. Their greateſt fear aroſe upon this occaſion. For, their Prieſts carrying afore them light burning torches, and ſnakes beſides, went after a lunatick and frantick manner, and with ſo ſtrange and uncouth a ſhew troubled and diſordered the Roman ſouldiers. And therewithal, at that ve-G ry inſtant the ſouldiers, as if they had been diſtracted, beſides themſelves, and aſtonied, diſmarched fearfully and ſtumbled upon the munitions and fortifications of their camp: But after, when as the Conſul, Lieutenants and Colonels mocked and rated them, for being ſcared like children with theſe vain bugbears: for ſhame ſuddenly they took heart again, and like blind men ran upon thoſe very ſame things, that before they had fled from. And ſo after they had diſpatched this vain deviſe and preparation of their enemies, they fell upon the armed men indeed, diſcomfited their whole army and put them to flight: and being the ſame day maſters of their camp, with a rich booty returned victors, both recounting in their military merry ditties nd songs, the fooliſh preparation of the enemy, and alſo condemning their own fearfulneſs. After this, the whole nation of the Tuſcans aroſe, having for their leaders the Tarquinians and the Faliſci, and came as far as Salina. Againſt which fearful danger, was C. Martius Rutilius choſen, the firſt Dictator that ever was of the Commoners: who named for his General of the Horſemen a Commoner likewiſe C. Plantius. But the Senators thought this a ſhameful indignity, that the Dictatorſhip alſo ſhould now be choſen in common: and did all they could poſſibly to hinder, that there ſhould be nothing decreed toward the war, nor any preparation made for the Dictator. But ſo much the ſooner, and with more readineſs, all that the Dictator propoſed, the Commons granted. So he departed from the City, and marched on both ſides of the Tyber (tranſporting his army in boats and planks faſtned together) to what place ſoever he heard the enemies were gone: and ſurpriſed many forragers of them, as they wandred and ſtragled one from another, in the fields. He ſet upon their camp alſo, and wan it: and after that he had taken eight thouſand priſoners, and either ſlain or chaſed all the reſt out of the Roman pale; he triumphed, by the ſuffrages of the people only, without the approbation and aſſent of the Senators. And for aſmuch as they would not in any caſe have an aſſembly for Election of Conſuls, held either by the Dictator a Commoner, or by the Conſul: and becauſe the other Conſul Fabius was buſied abroad in the wars, and not returned; therefore, the matter fell again to an Interreign. So there were Interregents one after another, Q. Servilius Hala, M. Fabius, Cn. Manlius, C. Fabius, C. Sulpitius, L. Æmylius, Q. Servilius, and M. Fabius Ambuſtus. During the ſecond Interreign, there aroſe ſome variance, for that both Conſuls were Patritii, i. of the Nobles. And when the Tribuns interpoſed themſelves, and croſſed thoſe proceedings, Fabius the Interregent, alledged a Law out of the twelve tables in theſe terms, That whatſoever the people ordained or granted laſt, the ſame ſhould be good, and ſtand firm and ratified: and in ſuffrages and voyces of the people, were compriſed their grant and ordinance. But when the Tribuns, for all their gainſaying and ſtepping between, could prevail no more, but to prorogue the * Comices for the Election, there were at length two of the Nobles created Conſuls, C. Sulpitius Peticus the third time, and M. Valerius Publicola: who the ſame day they were choſen, entred into their office. Thus in the 400 year after the foundation of the City, and the 35 after it was recovered from the Gauls, the Commons loſt the Conſulſhip again, when they had enjoyed it nine years. And two Conſuls of the Patritii, upon the Interreign, began to govern, to wit, C. Sulpitius Peticus the third time, and M. Valerius Publicola. The ſame year was Empulum won from the Tyburtins, without any memorable warlike exploit: were it that, under the conduct of both Conſuls there jointly together, the war was managed, as ſome have written: or that about the ſame time the Tarquinians Country was by the Conſul Sulpitius over-run and waſted, whiles Valerius led forth a power againſt the Tyburts. But more ado had the Conſuls at home, with the Commons and Tribuns. The Conſuls thought now, it concerned them in truſt and credit, as well as in vertue and valour, that as they, being Patritii both of them, had received the Conſulſhip, ſo they ſhould make over the ſame again to twain of the Nobility: and either wholly to give up their intereſt and title for ever, if ſo be the Conſulſhip ſhould now become a Commoners dignity: or elſe to keep it wholly in their poſſeſſion, whereof they were firſt ſeized intirely, in right of their anceſtours. On the other ſide, the Commons fumed and ſtormed in theſe and ſuch like terms. "What ſhould we live any "longer? and why are we accounted citizens? In caſe, that which was firſt got by the vertue "and power of two only perſons, L. Sextius, and C. Licinius, we cannot now all of us together "hold and keep? Certainly, better we were to endure the KK. and Decemvirs again, or any o- "ther heavier and more fearful name of abſolute and Lordly Empire, than to ſee both Conſuls of "the Nobility: and that we, may not both rule and obey in turns, but that the one part ſetled in "the place of rule for ever, ſhould think us, the Commons, born for nothing elſe but to obey and "ſerve. The Tribuns themſelves were nothing behind to ſet forward theſe troubleſome mutinies. But when the people are up once altogether and in commotion, the principal leaders are hardly ſeen above the reſt in the action. And when as they were come down into Mars field ſundry times to aſſembly, but ever to no purpoſe and effect, and that many Comitial dayes of aſſembly were paſſed over, only in ſeditious troubles: at the laſt, the Commons being overmatched through the ſtiffneſs and obſtinacy of the Conſuls, took the matter ſo grievouſly to the heart, that when the Tribuns brake forth into theſe ſpeeches; "Now farewel freedom for ever: now are we driven, "not only to forbear coming into Mars field, but alſo to abandon and forſake the City, taken "captive and oppreſſed by the Lordly rule of the Nobles; and therewithal departed: the Commons "with ſorrowful cheer did the ſemblable, and followed after. The Conſuls being thus left deſtitute of one part of the people, yet nevertheleſs went through with the Election, as few as they were there remaining. And Conſuls there were elected of the Nobility both, M. Fabius Ambuſtus the third time, and T. Quintius. In ſome annals or yearly records, I find Coſſ. M. Popilius, inſtead of T. Quintius.

In that year, were two wars performed with proſperous ſucceſs. And the Tyburtins were fought withal until they yeelded. From them was the City Saſſula won by force: and other Towns had taſted of the ſame fortune, but that the whole Nation laid arms aſide, and ſubmitted themſelves to the Conſul his mercy. He triumphed over the Tyburtins: otherwiſe the conqueſt was mild and gentle enough, without extremity of execution. But the Tarquinians were cruelly dealt withal: and many a man of them ſlain in field. Of the priſoners that were taken, whereof

A whereof there was a mighty number, there were 358 of the Noblest and greatest Gentlemen chosen out, and sent to Rome. The rest of the common sort were put to the sword. Neither sped they better at the peoples hands that were sent to Rome. For in the mids of the Forum, were they all beaten with rods and beheaded. This execution made quittance with them, for sacrificing the Romans in the market place of the Tarquinians. This good success in war caused the Samnits also to seek for peace and amity. Their Embassadors were courteously answered by the Senat, and so upon covenants they were received into society. But the Commons sped not so well at home in the City, as abroad in warfare. For albeit the Usury was well eased by bringing it down from twelve to one, in the hundred: yet the poorer people were overcharged with the payment of the B very principal, and became bond and thrall to their creditors. Whereby the Com. in regard of their privat streights, that they were driven unto, never troubled their heads with the making of both Consuls of the Nobles, nor with the Assemblies and Elections, nor other publick affairs. Still the two Consulships remained among the Patritii. And created there were Consuls, C. Sulpitius Peticus the fourth time, and M. Valerius Publicola the second time.

Now when as the City was earnestly amused upon the Tuscan war, by reason that the news went, how that the people of Cære, for very pity and compassion, and in regard also of consanguinity, took part with the Tarquinians: behold the Embassadors of the Latins turned them clean against the Volscians. Which Embassadors brought word, that there was an army levied already from thence and in arms, even now upon the point to invade their borders; and would from them en- C ter the territory of Rome, and spoil as they go. The Senat therefore thought good to neglect neither business, and gave direction, that to both places certain legions should be appointed, and the Consuls to cast lots for their several Provinces and charges. But afterwards, the greater care was taken for the Tuscan war, upon intelligence given by Sulpitius the Consul his letters, whose commission was against Tarquinii, that the countrey was wasted and spoiled all about the Roman-Saline, [or Salt-pits] and part of the booties carried away into the confines of the Cærits: and that the youth of that people were doubtless employed in the driving of that booty. Whereupon Valerius the Consul, who was opposed against the Volscians, and encamped in the marches of Tusculum, was called back from thence, and commanded by the Senat to nominate a Dictator. Who named T. Manlius, the son of Lucius, and he taking to him A. Cornelius Cossus for his General of D the Horsemen, contenting himself with his Consular army, by the authority of the Senat, and the peoples suffrages, proclaimed war against the Cærits, and sent them defiance. Then were the Cerits afraid of war indeed, and not afore, as though there had been more force in their enemies bare words, to denounce and signify war, than in their own deeds, who by spoiling and plundering, had provoked the Romans to war. Then saw they plainly that they were overmatched and not able to make their parts good: then repented they that they had made such wast and spoil, cursing the Tarquinians for solliciting them to revolt, not one of them making any preparation of armour or war: but every man labouring what he could, that Embassadors should be sent, to crave pardon for their trespass and offence. When their Embassadors were come to the Senat, they were from thence put over to the people. And then they besought the Gods, whose E sacred Images they had received in the French war and devoutly kept and cherished, That the Romans now in their flourishing estate, would take that pity and compassion of them, which they in times past had of the Romans, in their calamity and hard distress. And turning to the chappels of Vesta, they called upon the Flamins and Vestal Virgins, sometime their guests, whom they so chastly and religiously had received and given intertainment unto, saying in this wise. "Would "any man believe we had deserved no better, but thus of a sudden, without cause given, to be re- "puted enemies? Or suppose we had done somewhat smelling of hostility, would any man impute "it rather to deliberat counsel, than to some fit of heat and folly? And that we would blemish and "mar our own good deserts, especially conferred and bestowed upon so thankful persons, with "new misdeeds and shrewd turns? and chuse to make the people of Rome their enemies now in F "their wealthy and flourishing State, and in their most happy felicity of war: whose friendship in "their adversity we had embraced? Beseeching them not to term that considerate advise, which "rather were to be called force and necessity. For the Tarquinians, say they, passing with a cruel and "puissant army through our country & requesting nothing but away, had drawn with them some "of our rustical Peasants, to assist them only in fetching of that booty, which now so heavily is "laid to our charge. Whom if you please to have them yeelded, we are ready to deliver them: if "to be punished they shall suffer accordingly: most humbly craving, that their City Cære, the very "sanctuary of the people of Rome, the harbour and habitation of their Priests, the place of receit "for the Roman sacred images and reliques, they would grant unto them safe from the calamity of "war, and exempt from the slander thereof: and the rather for the professed vestal Virgins sake, G "so kindly intertained, and for the love of the Gods, by them so devoutly honored. The people were moved, not so much with the justice and equity of the present cause, as for their old deserts and good turns to forget rather the harm sustained than the good received. Whereupon, the people of Cere were pardoned & agreed it was that a truce for one hundred years should be registred among the Acts of the Senat. Then were the forces diverted against the Falisci, who were tainted likewise with the same offence. But the enemies would no where be found. They wasted therfore al over their confines: & forbare to assail their Towns. So they withdrew their legions to Rome. The rest of the year was employed in repairing their wals & Towers: and the Temple of Apollo was dedicated.

The Embassadors of Cære, to the people of Rome.

dicated. In the very end of the year, the contention between the Senators and the Commons, H brake off the Election of the Consuls: whiles the Tribuns stifly denied to suffer any assembly therefore to be holden, unless it were according to the Law Licinia. And the Dictator again was as stoutly and stifly bent, to abolish wholly out of the City the Consulship, rather than it should be indifferent for the Nobility and common people. Thus by adjourning the Election, the Dictator left his office, and the matter grew to an Interreign. And the Interregents, finding ever the Commons maliciously set against the Senators, succeeded one after another unto the eleventh Interregent: and all the while continued the discord and variance. The Tribuns they called on hard for the maintenance of the Law Licinia. The Commons, they had an inward grief that stuck neerer to them, upon the excessive usury that still increased: and each mans privat care and grievance, brake I out in their publick contentions and debates. The LL. of the Senat weary of these troubles, commanded L. Cornelius Scipio the Interregent for the time being, for concord and unity sake, in the Election of Consuls to observe the Law Licinia. So P. Valerius Publicola, had joyned with him in fellowship of government, Caius Martius Rutilius, one of the Commons.

Now whiles mens minds were enclined once to concord, the new Consuls labouring to ease also this matter of usury, the only spill or bone (as it were) between, that seemed to hinder the uniting of their hearts, and impeach the general agreement; took order publickly for the payment of debts, by creating five officers or Quinquevirs, whom of the despensing and disposing of the publick monies, they called Mensarii. And surely, for their equity and careful diligence, they deserved in all monuments and records to be remembred and renowned. And these they K were, C. Duellius, P. Decius, M. Papirius, Q. Publius, and T. Æmylius; who underwent and managed this matter, so intricat and difficult to be dealt in: so grievous and combersome to both sides for the most part, but evermore to one at the least. Which they performed both with indifferent moderation otherwise, and also with some cost and defray of charge, rather than any loss and dammage to the State. For the long debts and more entangled, rather in regard of the debtors slackness and negligence, than their want of ability, either the City out of the common stock crossed out of the book, by setting up certain counters or tables with ready coin in the publick Hall (provided, that there were good security unto the City by sureties and cautions put in aforehand) or else the goods of men valued at indifferent and reasonable prices discharged. So as not only without any wrong done, but also without the complaint of both parties, a mighty deal of L debts was satisfied and paid.

Five bankers instituted, called Mensarii.

All debts cleared in Rome.

After all this, a vain fear of the Tuscan war, upon a false Alarm given, that their twelve Nations conspired and were confederate together, caused a Dictator to be chosen. So C. Julius was named in the camp: for thither to the Coss. was the patent of the Senats decree sent. And to him was joyned as General of the Horsemen, L. Æmylius. But all was quiet without the City; Within the City the Dictator gave the attempt, that both Consuls should be created of the Patritii: which brought the government for the time to an Interreign. And the two Interregents that were in that while (to wit) C. Sulpitius and M. Fabius, obtained that which the Dictator had reached at in vain; namely, that both Consuls might be created of the Nobility: for now the Commons were more pliable and tractable, by reason of the fresh benefit received, in the easement M and satisfying of their debts. So there were chosen C. Sulpitius Peticus, he, who was the former of the twain that gave over the Interreign, and T. Quintus Pœnus. Some there be that give to Quintius the addition of Cæso for his surname [and of Caius for his forename.] Both of them went forth to war; Quintus against the Falisci, and Sulpitius against the Tarquinians. Who, for that they could never meet with the enemy in open field, by burning and spoiling made war with the fields rather than with the men. By which lingring continuance, as it were of a languishing consumption, the stubbornnes of both Nations was so wel tamed, that they made petition first to the Consuls, and by their permission after to the Senat, for a truce, and obtained the same for the term of forty years. Thus the care was laid aside of the two wars, which seemed so neer at hand. And whiles there was some rest from Arms, it was thought good because the payment of debts above- N said, had changed the owners and masters of many things, that there should be held a general Sessing of the citizens. But, when there was an assembly summoned for the chusing of Censors, C. Martius Rutilius professing himself to stand for a Censorship, even he that had been the first Dictator of the Commons, troubled the peace and unity of the States of the City. This he went about (as it seemed) in a very undue and unseasonable time. For, both Consuls were then of the Nobility, as it fell out, who gave it forth that they would not admit him to be a Competitor, nor propound his name at the Election. Howbeit, both he by earnest perseverance in his resolution obtained that which he went about: and also the Tribuns with all their might endeavouring to recover their right, which was lost in the Election of the Consuls, set to their helping hand. And as the countenance and Majesty of the man himself, seemed worthy of the highest type of honor: O so the Commons were right willing, that by the same man who had opened the way unto the Dictatorship, the Censorship also should draw to that side, and be in part conferred upon them. Neither in the assembly was there any variance in the Suffrages, but that, together with Manlius Nævius, Martius should be created Censor. This year likewise had a Dictator, M. Fabius, not for any fear of war, but because the Law Licinia, for the choice of Consuls, should not be revived and observed. The General of the Horsemen unto the Dictator was Q. Servilius. And yet for all the Dictatorship, the agreement of the Senators together, was in the Election of the Consuls

A Consuls no more force then it was in the chusing of the Censors. For Popilius Lenas was Consul, of the Commons, and L. Cornelius Scipio of the Nobles. And the commoner Consull, by good fortune, proved more famous of the twain. For when upon tidings brought, that a mighty army of the Gauls were encamped in the Latine country, this Gauls war was laid extraordinary upon Popilius, because Scipio lay grievously sick. Who having soon levied an army, and commanded all the younger men, to meet him in their armour at Mars his Church, without the gate Capena, and that the Questors should bring thither the Standards and ensignes out of the Aerarium [City chamber] and after he had chosen out of them, fully four Legions, he delivered all the residue of souldiers unto P. Valerius Publicola, the Pretor: and moved the LL. of the Senat to enroll another army to be in readiness, against all uncertain occurrents of war, what need soever the City B should have. And now himself being at all points throughly furnished, setting forward to meet the the enemie. Whose power because he would know, before he had triall therof with the uttermost hazard, he began to cast a trench and raise a rampier upon the next hill unto the Gauls camp, that he could come unto. The Gauls, a fierce kind of people and by nature eager of fight, having discovered afar of the Roman ensignes, embattelled themselves forthwith, as ready to bid battel. But when they saw the Roman army not brought forth into the plain and even ground, but that they were strongly defended, not only by the height of the place, but also with a ditch and palisado, and supposing them to be smitten with fear, and the fitter therefore to be assailed, for that they were at that instance busily occupied about their other fortifications; with an hideous noise and horrible shout, gave the charge upon them. The Romans gave over their work never the C sooner (they were the Triarii of the rereward that made these fortifications) but the spearmen or javelottiers of the vanguard, and the Principes of the middle ward, who stood ready armed in guard for the defence of the pioners, made head and received them with fight. Besides their valour, the higher ground was their vantage: so as all their darts and spears light not in vain (as commonly they do that are flung and lanced on levell ground) but stuck all fast as being poised with their own weight: so that the Gauls being surcharged with darts either sticking through their bodies, or fast set in their shields, and so weighing them down; having also run themselves upon the hil; first, as doubtfull what to do, made stay, afterwards, when protracting of time had discouraged themselves, and encouraged their enemies, they were driven back and fell one upon another; and in that confusion made greater havock and worse, then the slaughter was by the enemy: and crush- D ed they were to death, more in that croud and thrust, then were slain by sword. Yet were not the Romans sure of victory: for when they were come down into the plain, there was a new piece of work to begin, and a fresh trouble behind. For the Gauls, by reason of their number, little feeling such a losse (as if a new army had started up in sight, out of the ground) stirred up their fresh souldiers and unfoiled, against the enemy in his victory. Whereupon the Romans made a stand and staied their eagernesse: both because they being already wearied, were to abide a new conflict; and all for that the Consul, whiles he laid about him with the formost, without regard of his own person, was wounded well neer the left shoulder with a pike, and thereupon for a while was departed out of the battell. By occasion of which lingring, the victory had like to have been lost again: but that the Consul when his wounds were dressed and bound up, came back again E with speed to the formost ensigns, and said: Why stand you still sirs? ye have not to deal now, with the Latins or Sabins your enemies, whom after ye have conquered by the sword, ye may make of enemies friends and confederats: but upon very savage beasts we have drawn sword. Either we must have their blood, or they ours. From the camp ye have driven them back: chased ye have them headlong down the hill side: over the bodies of enemies lying along, now ye stand: fill the plain "also with their dead carkases, as ye have done the hils already: and never look that they will "flie, so long as ye stand still. You must advance your ensigns, and charge the enemy afresh. With these exhortations they fell to it the second time, and forced the former rankes and files of the Gauls to lose ground: and then with pointed close battailons of footmen, they brake through into the heart of the main battell. Whereupon the barbarous people being distaraied, such as had F neither certain directions to follow, nor Captains to command, turned their force upon their fellows, were scattered here and there about the plains, fled in this pursuit beyond their tents, and made toward the fort of Alba; which among many hils that stood of even height, they espied mounting above the rest. The Cos. followed the chase no farther than their camp: both because his hurt made himself unwieldie, and also for that he was unwilling to put his tired army to a new labour, considering the enemy had gained the hils tops, and so rested from farther pursuit. And when he had given the whole pillage of the camp to his souldiers, he brought back to Rome his army with victory, and inriched with the spoils of the Gauls. The Consul his wound staid his triumph, which was a cause also that the Senat wished and longed for a Dictatour, to hold the assembly for for the Election of Consuls, whiles the other were sick.

G L. Furius Camillus being chosen Dictator, had joyned unto him P. Cornelius Scipio for his Generall of the horsmen. He restored again to the Senators their ancient possessing of the Consulship: and for this good turn, was himself with exceeding affection of them all, created Consull. And for his companion he chose unto him App. Claudius Crassus. But before the new Consuls entred unto their office, Popilius with great love and favour of the Commons triumphed over the Gauls: who mumbling and muttering among themselves, would often ask one another, whether there were any repented of a Commoner Consul: rating withall at the Dictator, who despising the law Licinia, had got for his reward a Conſulſhip; which was more ſhamefull and infamous, H in regard of his privat ſeeking for it, (for being Dictator he had made himſelf Conſul) then for any publick harm and injury. This year for many and ſundry troubles was very famous. The Gauls from the Alban woods (for that they were not able then to endure the cold of winter) ranged all over the Champian and ſea-coaſts, and waſted the country. The ſeas likewiſe were dangerous by reaſon of the Greeks navy. Alſo all the tract along Antium, and the river of Laurentum, even to the very mouth of Tyber. So as the rovers and men of war by ſea, and the land robbers of the French, met both together, and ſtruck once for all a dangerous battell: and then departed aſunder, the French unto their ſtanding camp, the Greeks back unto their ſhips: both doubtfull, whether they had won or loſt. Amid theſe troubles, the greateſt fear by far, aroſe from this, that the I Latine Nation held certain Diets and Councels at the grove of Ferentina; and when the Romans demanded ſouldiers from them, flat anſwer was made, That they muſt no more think to command

"them whoſe aid they ſtood need of. And as for the Latins, they were reſolved rather to bear "arms in defence of their own liberty, then fight for the maintenance of the dominions of ſtran"gers. The Senat being grieved and perplexed as well for theſe two forrain wars, as alſo for the revolt of their confederats, ſeeing no other way, but to keep them in by fear, whom loialty would not reſtrain, commanded their Conſuls in their muſtring, to extend and ſtrain to the ut-moſt the whole ſtrength of the State: for now that their Allies failed them, they were to truſt upon their City forces onely. From all parts therefore, the youth as well without in the country, as within the City were taken up, and ten legions (as men ſay) were enrolled of ſouldiers, amounting K to 4200. foot and 300. horſe in a legion. Which puiſſant army, if now at this day any forrain wars were toward, theſe mighty forces of the people of Rome, which the whole world is hardly able to contain, if they were united and brought into one together, would not eaſily make again:
ſo great are we grown in wealth only and ſuperfluous delights, to which we ſtrive and apply our minds.

Among other heavy occurrents of that year, Ap. Claudius one of the Conſuls, in the very preparation of the wars, departed this life. Whereupon the whole government was devolved upon Camillus. To which ſole Conſul, either for his quality and worthineſſe otherwiſe (not meet to be controlled by the abſolut command of a Dictator) or for the lucky preſage of his name ſo fortunate in all the tumultuous wars of the Gauls, the Lords of the Senat thought it not decent and L convenient that there ſhould be a Dictatour adjoyned. The Conſuls having ordeined and appointed two legions for defence of the City, and parted the other eight with the Pretor L. Pinarius, bearing in mind his fathers valour and manhood, undertook the Gauls war himſelf, without caſting lots therefore: commanding the Pretor to keep the ſea-coaſts, and to put the Greeks back from landing on the ſhore. He went himſelf down into the country of Pomptinum, and becauſe he was not willing to give battell in the champian, unforced thereunto; and thought the enemy might be wearied out well enough by keeping him ſhort, for forraging and fetching in booties, who of neceſſity was driven to live of prey, choſe a convenient place for a ſtanding camp. Where, XXVI as they paſſed the time quietly in their wards, as a ſetled Garriſon: there cometh forth a mighty Gaul in perſon tall and beg, for armour brave and glorious: who clattering his ſhield and M ſpear together, and thereby making ſilence, gave defiance and challenged by his interpreter The combat between a Gaul and Valerius ſurnamed thereupon Corvinus, the Romans to a combat, man to man. There was one M. Valerius a Colonell of footmen, and a very young man, who thinking himſelf nothing leſs worthy of that honour than T. Manlius, having firſt known the Conſul his pleaſure, advanced himſelf forth apart from the reſt, armed at all points.
But this conflict (as touching the proweſs of the men) was leſs notable than the other, by reaſon that the hand of God came between & took a part. For as the Roman was ready to joyn and cope, behold ſuddenly a raven ſetled upon the creſt his of morion, even ful in the face of his enemie. Which at the very firſt, the Colonell took joyfully as a token of good luck ſent from heaven. Afterwards he praied devoutly, that the God or goddeſſe whoſoever, that ſent unto him from above that augurall foul, to preſage and foreſignifie the future event, would be favourable and gratious N unto him. And lo, (a wonder to be ſpoken) the bird not only held the place ſtill, which it firſt light upon, but alſo, as often as the champions buckled and cloſed together, mounting up with the wings made at the eies and the face of the enemie, with beak and claws both, ſo long, until Valerius killeth him. For the Gaul being affrighted at this ſo ſtrange & wondrous a ſight, both his eies dazel-ed, and his mind was mightily troubled. Then the raven took his riſe, flew on high quite out of ſight towards the Eaſt. All the while the camp on both ſides was quiet hitherto. But after that the Colonel began to riſle and diſarme the Body of the ſlain enemy, neither could the French keep themſelves within their Stations, nor the Romans contein, but run with more ſpeed unto their Conquerour champion. And ſo about the bodie of the Gaul that lay along dead, began ſome skirmiſh, and thereof grew a ſharp and cruell battel: for now not only the companies of the next quarters, and corps de guard, but alſo the whole legions on both ſides, came a- O broad and fought. Camillus commanded the ſouldiers, joyous for the victory of the Colonell, joyous alſo for the gods, ſo favourable and ready to help, for to go to battell: and ſhewing very often unto them the Colonell, ſet out bravely and enriched with the ſpoiles of his enemie, "Follow this brave gentleman, good ſouldiers (quoth he) and about the dead champion of the "Gauls killed their whole troops, and lay them along. In this fight appeared the help of God and manevidently: and they fought it out with the Gauls, and had no doubtfull conflict: both

armies had so conceived and deeply imprinted before hand in their mind, the future event of these two souldiers that had fought together. Between the formost, whose concurse had raised others, there was a sharp conflict: but the rest of the multitude, turned back before they came to the volley of darts. And first they were scattered along the Volscian and Falern countries: but afterward they took their waies toward Apulia and the lower Adriatick sea.

The Consul having assembled the souldiers to an audience, solemnly before them all, commended the Colonell, and rewarded him with ten oxen and a coronet of gold. Himself, by direction from the Senat, to attend the war by sea, joyned camp with the Preter. And there, because through the cowardise of the Greeks that would not come into the field, the war was like to be long and lingring, he nominated, by the authority of the Senat, T. Manlius Torquatus for the Dictatour, to hold the Election of Consuls. The Dictatour having named for his Generall of horsmen, A. Cornelius Cossus, held the Election, and with exceeding favour of the people, declared for Consul one like himself, and tracing the steps of his own vertue and glory, M Valerius Corvinus (for that was his surname afterwards) in his absence: a young man, I say, three and twenty years old. To Corvinus was adjoyned companion in government a Commoner, M. Popilius Lenas the fourth time. Camillus performed no memorable exploit with the Greeks: for neither were the Greeks good souldiers on land, nor the Romans at sea. At the last being kept from landing; and failing, besides other necessaries, of fresh water, they left Italy. Of what people, or of what nation in Greece this fleet consisted, is not certainly known. I would think verly, that they were the Tyrants or potentats of Sicily, above all other. For all Greece beyond them, at that time wearied and toiled out with civill wars, much feared the greatnesse of the Macedonians. After the armies were discharged, and that both abroad there was peace, as also at home quietnesse, through the unity of the States: lest they should be glutted with too much joy, behold a pestilence arose in the City and constrained the Senat to command the Decemvirs, to overlook the books of Sibylla: and by direction thereof, was a Lectisterne celebrated. The same year there was a Colony drawn out of the Antiats, to people Satricum, and the town was repaired for them, which the Latins had destroied. Also there was at Rome a league concluded with the Carthaginian Embassadours, who came of purpose to sue for society and amity. The same rest continued still both at home and abroad, when T. Manlius Torquatus, and C. Plautius the second time were Consuls. The usury which was before after one in the hundred, became now but half so much. The paiment of debts was dispenced & ordered into three years by even portions, so as a fourth part should be paid out of hand. And albeit some of the Commons (for all that) were pinched therewith, yet the Senat had more regard to see credit kept with the chamber of the City, then of the difficulties of privat persons. The greatest matters were well eased, in that they forbare to collect the tribute and to muster souldiers. CCCXVII.

The third year after that Satricum was reedified by the Volscians, M. Valerius Corvinus the second time Consul with C. Petilius, upon news of Latium, that Embassadors from Antium went about to the nations of the Latins, soliciting them to rise up in arms, was commanded to make war upon the Volscians, before the enemies forces were greater: who put himself on his journey with a fierce army toward Satricum. Whither when as the Antiats and other Volscians were come to meet him, with a power provided aforehand, against any preparations from Rome, presently without any stay they joyned battel, as being through a deep setled and long hatred, malitiously bent one against the other. The Volscians, a nation more hasty to rebell, than hardy to fight, being defeated in a battel, fled amain and highed apace to put themselves within the wals of Satricum. But when the wals were not able to save them, for that the town being environed and invested round with souldiers, was ready to be taken by scaling, there were upon 4000. of them, besides the common sort not meet for service, that yeelded themselves. The town was rased down and burnt; only they spared the firing of Matutas church. And the whole laccage and spoil was bestowed upon the souldiers. But there were not comprised within this booty, the 4000 that yeelded. Those the Consul in his triumph caused to be led bound before his chariot: and after that sold them, & brought a round sum of money into the treasury. Some write, that this number of captives, were bondslaves. And that is more like to be true, than that they should be sold, who yeelded themselves. After this followed Consuls, M. Fabius Dorsuo, and Servius Sulpitius Camerinus. Then began the Auruncan war upon a sudden invasion that they made. And for fear lest the action of that one State and City, had been the resolution of the whole Latine nation and by their maintenance, there was created Dictator (as if it had been against all Latium already up in arms) L. Furius Camillus: who chose for his General of horsmen, Cn. Manlius Capitolinus. And (as the use had been in time of great troubles and sudden tumults) he mustered without any respect of Immunity and Exemption, and therewith proclamed a Cessation of all courts of law: and the legions with all speed possible were led against the Auruncans, where they found, that they carried the mind of plunderers rather then of warriors. So that in the first battel, that war was dispatched. Howebeit the Dictator, because they not only made the quarrel and warred first, but also offered fight without any drawing back, supposing there were some need of Gods help withall from heaven, had vowed a temple to Juno Moneta: and after he had obtained that he vowed for, and therby was charged to perform his vow, so soon as he was returned home to Rome with victory, gave up his Dictatorship. The Senat commanded two officers called Duumvirs to be created for the edifying of that temple, according to the magnificence of the people of Rome. The place was appointed and set out on the CCCXVIII. The temple of Juno Moneta.

M. Manlius Capitolinus. The Conſl. having imploied the Dictatour his army in the Volſcian war, ſurpriſed at unwares the town Sora out of the enemies hands. The Temple of Moneta was dedicated the year after it had been vowed, when C. Martius Rutilus the third time, and T. Manlius Torquatus the ſecond time, were Conſuls. Immediatly upon the dedication of that church, there enſued a ſtrange wonder, like unto that old marvel of the hil Albanus; For it rained ſtones, and in the day time it ſeemed to be dark night. And the books of Sibylla being peruſed (for that the City now was mightily given to ſuperſtition) the Senat ordeined, that there ſhould be a Dictator named for the ordeining of certain feaſts and holy daies. So P. Valerius Publicola was choſen, and with him, Q. Fabius Ambuſtus Generall of the horſmen. Order was given, that not only the Tribes ſhould I go in ſolemn proceſſion with their praiers and Letanies, but alſo the nations that bordered upon them: with a preciſe direction unto them, upon what daies every one ſhall make ſupplication. That year (as it is reported) there paſſed heavy judgments and the Sentences of the people againſt the Vſurers, with whom the Ædiles had commenced ſuit. And without any notable cauſe to be remembered, they grew to an Interreign. Upon which, that ſomething might be thought thereby done, both Conſuls were made of the Nobles, M. Valerius Corvinus the third time, and A. Cornelius Coſſus.

Now from hence-forth will we treat of greater wars, both for the puiſſance of the enemies, and alſo for their far diſtance: as well for their ſpacious countries they inhabited, as long tract of time that they continued. For this year began the Romans to bear arms againſt the Samnits, a nation powerful in wealth, and valiant in field. After which war, fought on both ſides with alter- K native fortune, there ſucceeded Pyrrhus their enemy, and after Pyrrhus the Carthaginians. To ſee (good Lord) the wonderfull ſtirs and troubles, and how often the Romans fell into extremities of perils, that their Dominion and Empire might ariſe unto this greatneſs and high ſtate, which hath much ado to hold its own, and ſtand maintained. But the cauſe of the Romans war with the *Samnits, being in ſociety and amity linked together, aroſe firſt from others, and not upon any quarrel between themſelves. At what time as the Samnits warred unjuſtly (as being more mighty) upon the * Sidicins: they as the weaker and forced to flie for ſuccour unto the richer, banded with the Campains. Who bringing with them a greater name, than power (in deed) to aid and aſſiſt their Allies, & flowing in riot and ſuperfluous delights, happed in the country of the Sidicins to be foiled & defeated by the other, who had been inured and hardened by continual uſe of arms: and ſo after- L wards drew upon their own heads, the whole violence and poiſe of the wars. For the Samnits letting the Sidicins alone, went to the head, and ſet upon the Campains, as it were the very fortreſſe and caſtle of defence for al the borderers. For wel they wiſt that there they might win victory as eaſily: but riches & honour at their hands they were to atchieve much more. And when they had gained and held with a ſtrong garriſon, the hils called * Tifata, that were adjoyning, and commanded the City Capua; From thence they deſcended with a fourſquare ranged battell into the plain that lyeth between Capua and Tifata: where a ſecond field was fought: In which the Campanies had the overthrow, and were beaten within their wals. Having therfore no hope neer hand, and ſeeing the ſtrength of their youth greatly decaied, they were conſtrained to ſeek for aid of the Romans. Whoſe Embaſſadors being admitted into the Senat, and having audience given M them, ſpake much what to this effect. "The people of Capua, moſt noble Senators, hath ſent us in "ambaſſy unto you, to crave at your hands friendſhip for ever, and ſuccour for the preſent. Which "amity if we had requeſted in our proſperity, well might it ſooner have begun, but knit had it been with a weaker bond and not ſo durable. For then, remembring our ſelves to have entred league and ſociety on even ground, and in equall eſtate with you; friends haply we ſhould have been as we now are, but bounden and devoted unto you, we had never been. But now, in caſe by your "commiſeration and pity we be gained and won; and in our diſtreſſe, by your aid, helped and re- "lieved; we muſt needs affectionatly embrace a benefit from you received, unleſſe we would be "thought unthankfull wretches, and unworthy of any help either of God or man. And albeit the "Samnits, have been before us intertained in friendſhip and confederacy, yet we think that no N
"ſufficient bar, but that we may alſo be received into the ſame. Only thus much it ought to make "for them, as to be preferred before us in antiquity of time, and degree of honour. For in that alliance between you and the Samnits, there is no expreſſe clauſe, no caveat or proviſo contained, "againſt the making of any new confederacie. And ſurely, alwaies heretofore ye have thought "it cauſe good enough of your friendſhip, if the party who ſought the ſame, were but willing "and deſirous to be your friend. We Campains (albeit our preſent condition ſuffereth us not "to ſpeak magnifically) giving place to no nation but your ſelves, either for the ſtately port of "our City, or goodneſſe, and fruitfulneſſe, of our ſoil, in entring into your acquaintance, ſhall "not a little, I ſuppoſe increaſe and better your good eſtate. And firſt for the Æquians and "Volſcians, thoſe eternall and perpetual enemies of this City, they ſhall not ſo ſoon at any time O
"ſtir and put out their heads, but we will be ſtreight upon their jacks. And look what ye firſt "ſhall find in your hearts to doe for our ſafty, the ſame will we alwaies do for your Empire "and honour. And when thoſe nations be once ſubdued that are between you and us (which your "vertue and fortunat felicity, promiſeth will be ſhortly) then ſhall your dominions reach all the "way in a continued train, as unto us. A pitifull and lamentable caſe it is, that our preſent for- "tune urgeth us to confeſſe; To this exigent and hard terms of extremity are we Campains dri- "ven (right honourable) that ſubject we muſt be, either to our friends or to our enemies. The beginning of the Samnit war.

A defend us, yours will we be; forsake us once, we must be the Samnits. Consult ye now therefore " deliberatly, whether ye had rather, that Capua and all the territorie of Capua, should be annexed
" unto your power and State, or added to the Samnits Seignory. your mercy your succour, O No" ble Romans, ought in equity to extend unto all men, but especially unto those, who by yeelding
" their relief and helping hand (even above their power) unto others, that inplored and humbly
" besought succour, are now themselves fallen all, into the same streights of necessity. And yet,
" to say the truth, we fought in shew and semblance of word for the Sidicins; but in very deed
" and effect for own selves. For considering a neighbour nation, bordering even upon us, to be " robbed and spoiled most wrongfully by the Samnits; we well foresaw, that when the Sidicins B " were once set a burning, the same fire would soon be driven and reach unto us. For now are not " the Samnits come to assail us, as discontented for any injury received: but, as well pleased that " they have cause of quarrell offered and presented unto them. For if it had been but a revenge
" only of anger upon some pretended wrong, and not a mean and occasion, to satisfie their greedy
" appetite: had it not been enough for them, that they had vanquished and put to the sword our " Legions once in the Sidicine country, and a second time in Campain it self our own territory?
" what a cankered and a mortall malice is this, which bloodshed and massacres in two battels can " not satiate or aswage? besides the wasting of our fields, the driving away of booties, as well of " people as cattell, the firing of villages, the ruin and havock they made; and in every place no" thing but fire and sword. Could not their anger and wrath have been satisfied with all this? But it C " is their greedy and unsatiable covetousnes and nothing else that must be filled. That is it which " carrieth them, that haleth and draggeth them to the assault of Capua. At it their teeth water, that " most goodly and beautifull City will they either destroy, or be LL. thereof themselves. But may
" it please you Romans, to gain it afore by your own benefit and good desert: rather then suffer
" them to seiz upon it, by wrong and mischief. I speak not this before a people that useth to make " it strange and goodly to undertake any rightful and just wars. If ye but shew a copy of your coun" tenance, as if ye would aid and succour us, I suppose ye shall have no need at all of further
" war. The Samnits overweening of themselves and contempt of others, reacheth to us only,
" further it proceedeth not. So that under the very shaddow of your assistance, O Romans, we " may be safely covered and protected. And whatsoever we shall hereafter gain thereby, what-D " soever we shall be of our selves (even as much as we are worth) ready are we to acknowledge it " all yours. For your sake shall the Campain ground be tilled: for your behoof shall the City Ca-
" pua be resorted unto and frequented: and accounted shall ye be of us, no less than founders, pa" rents, yea, and as the immortall gods. There shall be a borrough or Colony of yours, that " shall go beyond us in obsequious dutifulnes towards you. Do but afford unto us Campains, O
" Noble Senators, a token of your gracious countenance, yeeld us your invincible name as a " powerfull deity, and bid us hope assuredly, that Capua shall remaine still and continue in safe" ty. What a number think ye of all sorts and degrees of people, followed and accompanied " us, when we came from thence? How left we all places filled with their vows, their praiers
" and tears? In what expectation now, do the Senat and of people Capua, our wives and chil-E " dren, attend our return? Assured I am, that the whole multitude stand about the gates looking " toward the high port-way that leadeth from hence thither, waiting to know what news, ex" pecting what answer, my LL. your pleasure is that we should report back from you unto them, " so carefull, so heavy, so perplexed. One word presenteth unto them safety, victory, life and " liberty: the other, I dread to presage what it may import. Wherefore to conclude, determine of " us, either as of them that shall and will be, your confederates and faithfull Allies; or else such " as must be worse then nothing. After that the Embassadors were withdrawn aside, and the Se-nat fell to counsell: although a good part of them were of opinion, that the greatest and wealthiest City of all Italy, the most plenteous country and near to the sea, might be as it were the garner and storehouse, whatsoever variable changes of corn and victuals might happen: yet they set F more by keeping their faith and promise, then of that great commodity that might accrew unto them: and thus by direction of the Senat made the Consul answer. " The Senat judgeth you O Campains worthy of aid: but meet it is that we entertain your amity, so, as a more ancient society and friendship be not thereby violat and broken. The Samnits a train league, and confede-
" rat with us. We must needs therefore debar you from making that war against the Samnits, which should sooner dishonour the gods then hurt and wrong men. Howbeit, as equity and " reason doth require, we will to our Allies and friends send our Embassadours, to intreat them to " offer no violence unto you. To this answer the chief man of the Embassage (according as he had commission from home) replied and said. " For as much as ye are not willing to defend our right
" and cause, by just and lawfull power against violence and injury: your own yet, I am sure ye " will maintain. Therefore my LL. of the Senat, here we yeeld up in your hands, and to the G Seignory of the people of Rome, the whole nation of the Campains, the City Capua, our lands and possessions, the sacred temples of the gods, and all things else both holy and profane. And whatsoever from henceforth we shall suffer and abide, we will sustain as it your liegement and subjects, wholly devoted as vassals unto you. At which words they all held up their hands unto the Consuls, shed tears plenteously, and fell down upon their knees in the very entry of the Councell house. The Senat moved with consideration of the changeable course and turn of human fortune, in the world, to see so great and mighty a people of puissance, so pompous for superfluous abundance and magnificence (at whose hands but a while before, the nations bordering had craved and begged their aid) to carry with them now so base and broken hearts, as of their own accord, to submit themselves and all they had in the whole world, to the power and devotion of others: were perswaded now it was a matter of trust and faithfullnesse, not to abandon and see betraied, those that thus were reduced under their protection. Neither thought they, that the people of Samnium could in any equity or colour of Justice, invade that land, or assault that City, which was surrendred and annexed to the imperiall State of Rome. Whereupon presently they agreed to dispatch Embassadors unto the Samnits, who had incharge and commission to make declaration unto them; First, of the Campains petitions: secondly, of the answer of the Senat returned unto them, implying the remembrance of the Samnits amity: last of all, of the Campains surrender. Then to request and desire them in regard of their mutuall society and friendship, to spare and forbear those, that were their vassals, and not with any hostility to invade that territory, which was become subject to the people of Rome. If by this courteous dealing they could do no good, then, to command the Samnits in the name of the people and Senat of Rome, to abstain from the City Capua and the country of the Campains When these Embassadours debated these matters in the Councel House of the Samnits, they returned so stout and arrogant an answer again, not in these terms only, That they would go forward in the war begun; but (that which more was) the rulers coming forth of their Councell House, even whiles the Embassadors there stood, called to the captains of the cohorts, and with a loud voice commanded them forthwith to make a rode into the Campain country, for to spoil and fetch booties. This Embassage being returned home again to Rome, the Senators setting aside the care of all other matters, sent their heralds to demand restitution: and for default therof, after the solemn maner to proclaim open war. Whereupon they decreed with all speed possible to propound this matter to the people: and by the consent of the people, both Coss. with two armies departed the City, Valerius into Campania, Cornelius into Samnium: and pitched their tents, Valerius at the foot of the hil Gaurus, and the other at Satricula. The Samnit legions presented themselves first to Valerius (for that way they supposed all the forces would be bent) for indignation also, against the Campains, because they were so ready one while with their own succours, & another while in sending for the aid of others against them. And so soon as they discovered the Romans camp, in all hast (every one for his part) called lustily to their captains for to strike up and sound the battell: assuring themselves, and saying plainly, that the Romans should speed as well in succouring the Campains, as the Campains had done before them in aiding the Sidicins. Valerius, after he had amused the enemies not many daies together, with some light skirmishes, only to make triall of them what they could do, put forth the * signall of battell at the last, but first exhorted his souldiers in a short speech in this wise, "That neither this new war nor new enemy should terrifie them: for as much as the farther they warred from the City, the more cowardly Nations they were and lesse warlike still to "whom they went. That they should not esteem the valour of the Samnits by the late losses & defeats of the Sidicins or Campains: For whosoever they be that contend & fight together, one side "or other cannot chuse, but go to the wals. The Campains, doubtlesse, had the overthrow rather through their own effeminat tendernesse, as flowing too much in excesse and superfluity of "pleasures, than by their enemies hardinesse and valour. And what were two only fortunat battels of the Samnits, in so many ages, to be set against so many honourable victories of the people "of Rome? Who, from the first foundation of their City, may number more Triumphs well neer "than years: who have by war subdued all Nations about them, the Sabines, Hetruria, the Latins, Hernicks, Æquians, Volscians, and Auruncans. And as they ought to go into the field, every "man presuming & trusting upon his own manhood and glorious warfare: so should they have an "eye, and consider, under whose leading and regiment they were to enter into battell. Whether "he were a man that in the hearing of his souldiers, could only make goodly and magnificall Orations, fierce in brave words, void of Military works: or he who himself knew how to handle "his weapon, to advance before the standards, yea, and to be employed even in the midle of all "the battell. I would have you (quoth he) my souldiers, to follow my deeds and not my words, "and of me to learn, not only discipline, but also good example. I have not by bribing and factions, nor yet by courting and Orations (usuall matters among Noblemen) but by this right hand "of mine, attained unto three Consulships, and to the highest honour. The time had been indeed, "when a man might have said thus unto me: No marvell, For why? You were a gentleman of "noble blood, descended from those that were the deliverers of their country: & in the same year "that the City had first a Consul, this house of yours had the Consulship. But now the case is altered, the way unto a Consulship, is as open to you Commoners, as to us of the Nobility. Now is it "not the guerdon of birth and gentry, as aforetime: but the reward and recompence of vertue "and valour. And therefore my souldiers, shoot at the highest dignities, and aim at soveraign "honour. And although ye that are men, have by the grace and approbation of the gods, given "unto me this new addition of surname [Corvinus] yet have not I forgot the antient name of the "Publicolas, appropriat unto our family. I love and ever will (as alwaies I have done) the Commons of Rome, at all times alike, both abroad in wars, and also at home in peace, as well a privat "person, as in my offices, were they little, or were they much: whiles I was Tribune, whiles I was "Consul; and no changling have I bee throughout all my Consulships, one after another. Now for "this present enterprise which we are about, with the help of God, & in his name, have a cast with me

Defiance given by the Romans to the Samnits

A coat of arms of purple or scarlet colour hanging forth at the Generall his pavilion.

The exhortation of Valerius Corvinus to his souldiers.

A "me for a new and freſh Triumph over the Samnits. Never was there a Generall more familiar with his ſouldiers: as willing as the meaneſt of them, to lay his hand upon any baſe offices that that were to be done; yea, and in the very training and exerciſes of the ſouldiers, at what time as equals try maſteries of activity and ſtrength, one with another, gently would he otherwhiles take the foil, as well as the victory, and ever keep one countenance ſtill: not rejecting or refuſing any one whoſoever would offer to match him, or be his mate. For deed, benigne and bounteous to his power, and as occaſion required: in his words, no leſſe mindfull of the freedom of others, than reſpective of his own place and dignity: and (than which, there is nothing more popular) look by what vertuous demeanour & carriage of himſelf, he ſought to attain unto honours and B promotions, with the ſame he bare them, and went through with them. Therefore the whole army with incredible cheerfulneſſe accepting this exhortation of their captain, iſſued forth of the camp into the field. Never was there battell fought more indifferently on both ſides. Their hope was like, their forces equall, with full truſt and confidence in themſelves, and yet without contempt of their enemies. The Samnits, for to whet their courage, preſumed upon their freſh and late atchieved acts, and their double victory but few daies before. The Romans on the contrary ſide, ſtood upon their honour and reputation for the ſpace of four hundred years, and their conqueſts every ſince the foundation of their City. Yet they were troubled, both the one and the other, to deal with a new and unknown enemy. The manner of their fight ſhewed what ſtomacks they carried. For the conflict was ſuch, as for a good while they ſeemed on neither part to yeeld one foot.

XXVIII

The familiarity of Corvinus with his ſouldiers, and his other good parts,

C Then the Conſul, ſeeing they could not by mere force be cauſed to retreat, thought to ſet a ſudden fear among them: and therefore aſſaieth, by ſending in the horſmen upon the formoſt enſignes, to break their rancks, and put them in diſarray. But when he ſaw, that in ſo ſmall room of ground they toiled themſelves in vain, and could not well manage their troops and cornets, nor break in upon the enemies, he rode back again to the van and forefront of the Legions, and diſmounted from horſback, "We that are footmen (quoth he) when all is done, muſt do the deed I ſee well. Come on then, and as ye behold me (which way ſoever I go) by dint of ſword to make "way and entrance into the enemies battell: ſo every man for himſelf, down with him that "ſtandeth next in his way. Straightwaies ſhall ye ſee, that where as now their ſpears and pikes "ſtand glittering and bent upon us, there will be a wide lane made over their ſlain carcaſes. He

A cruell battell between the Romans and Samnits.

D had not ſo ſoon ſpoken theſe words, but the horſmen at the Conſuls commandment, ran upon both the wings and points, and made way for the footmen to enter the main battell. Firſt and formoſt the Conſul in perſon chargeth the enemy, and whomſoever he hapned to encounter, him he killeth in the place. This goodly fight ſet the reſt on fire: and then every man did his beſt, laid about him manfully, and carried it afore him right worthily. The Samnits ſtood to it ſtill and moved not, albeit they got more knocks and wounds then they gave. Thus when the fight had continued a good while, notwithſtanding much bloody ſlaughter about the Samnits enſignes: yet no flying was there on any ſide: ſo reſolut were they, by death only to be vanquiſhed. Whereupon the Romans feeling their own ſtrength for wearineſſe decaied and ſpent, and but little day left, inflamed with anger, gave a freſh charge all at once upon the enemies. Then (and not before) began they to ſhrink and give ground, and encline to flight: Then were the Samnits taken priſoners E and ſlain thick. Few or none had eſcaped alive, but that the night came ſo faſt upon them, that it interrupted the victory, rather then ended the battell. Both the Romans themſelves confeſſed, they never fought with a more ſtubborn and obſtinate enemy: and the Samnits alſo being demanded the primitive cauſe, which forced them (ſo ſtifly bent as they were) to run away at the laſt, ſaid, that the Romans ſeemed to have burning fire in their eies, and to carry in their faces and viſages the furious rage of mad and frantick perſons: and thereat firſt began they to be affrighted, more then at any thing elſe. Which fearfulneſſe of theirs, they bewraied not only by the preſent event of the battell, but alſo by their diſlodging and departure away in the night. The morrow after the Romans were maſters of their empty and naked camp: unto which all the whole F multitude of the Campaines came running in number to rejoice and congratulate their victory.

XXXIV

But this joy had like to have been fouly blemiſhed with an overthrow and defeat in Samnium. For Cornelius the Conſul being depared from Satricula, had engaged his army unadviſedly within a foreſt, through which went an hollow valley or lawn, forlaid on both ſides with an ambuſh: neither diſcovered he his enemies over his head, before ſuch time as he could not retire with his enſignes into a place of ſafe receit. But whiles the Samnits ſtaied only untill he had brought his army fully down into the bottom of the vale, P. Decius, a Colonell of footmen, eſpied in the foreſt one little high hill, which commanded the place where the enemies lay encamped: and as it was for an army heavily armed, and charged with carriage, hard to be got up unto: ſo for them that were lightly appointed and burdened, nothing difficult. He perceiving the Conſul troubled G in mind and affrighted: See you not (quoth he) O Aulus Cornelius yonder hill top above the enemie? That is the very fortreſſe of our hope and ſafety, if ſo be that we can gaine the ſame luſtily, as the Samnits have left it blindly. I require no more of you, but to let me have the Principes and ſpear men of one only Legion. And when with them I have once ſeized the top thereof, let forward you from hence and fear not, neither make doubt to ſave your ſelf and the army. For the enemie being under us, and lying open to all our ſhot, cannot ſtir without great loſſe and preſent miſchief. As for us, either the fortune of the people of Rome, or our own manhood ſhall work our evaſion. Being commended by the Conſul, and having received that troop and guard which H he demanded, he marcheth cloſe through the woody paſs, and was not deſcried by the enemie before he approached the place that he went to get. And whiles they all were amaſed thereat and wondred, and wholly turned their eies to himward, he both gained the Conſul ſome time to withdraw his army into a more convenient and open ground, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the hill top, and there reſted. The Samnits, whiles they turn their enſignes to and fro, (as men that loſt the vantage of both ſides) could neither make after the Conſul, but through the ſame valley, wherein a while before they had him under their ſhot, nor yet erect their ſquadrons, and march up that hill, which Decius over them had already gained, But being more angry with thoſe, that thus had diſap-pointed them of the fair means they had of a brave exploit, and conſidering withall the neerneſſe I of the place, and their ſmall number which were gotten thither, they were one while of mind to environ the hill round with armed men, and to keep Decius from the Conſul; another while, to make them way, that when they were come down into the valley, they might ſet upon them.

Thus whiles they were in doubt what to do, the night overtook them. Decius at the firſt, was in good hope to fight with them from the higher ground, as they mounted up againſt the hill: but afterwards he marvelled much, that they neither began to charge upon him, nor yet when they were diſappointed and put by that purpoſe, through diſadvantage of the ground, fortified them-

"how got theſe lozels the victory of the Sidicins and Campains? Ye ſee their enſigns waving hither K "length. As for munitions & fortifications, no man beginneth any: and by this time we might have "been entrenched round about. But if we ſtay here longer then for our vantage, we might be "counted lazy lubbers like them. Come on then, go with me, that whiles day light ſerveth, we may

"ſee in what places they quarter their guards, and what way we may get from hence and eſcape.
All this went he to eſpie and diſcover himſelf in perſon, clad in a common ſouldiers jacket, leading with him the other captains in the habit of their ſouldiers; to the end that the enemies might not take mark of the Generall himſelf, how he went about to view them. After this, when he had diſpoſed the ſentinels and corps de guard, to all the reſt he commanded a watchword to be given, that when the trumpet ſounded the ſecond watch, they ſhould come all unto him armed, and L what I would have done. The enemy hath not inveſted you here, as men either fled away for "people of Rome: and now by breaking out from hence, ſave your own ſelves. Worthy you are

"that being but a few, have ſuccoured many, ye ſhould not ſtand in need your ſelves of any M

"ſlipped their happy opportunity to defeat our whole army; who were ſo blind, that they ſaw
"not this hill of ſo great importance even over their heads, before it was by us gained: who being "ſo many thouſands, could neither debar us from climbing up, as few as we were, nor when we

"mies, whom ye have thus deluded & beguiled, whiles they were awake, and had their eie-ſight,
"ye are to deceive when they are faſt aſleep, nay, you muſt doe ſo indeed, there is no other reme"dy. For at that paſſe we are now, that I am rather to ſhew you, in what terms of extremity ye

"doubt for hunger and thirſt, if we dread the ſwords point more than befitteth hardy men, and "valorous Romans. One way there is therefore, and but one way of ſafety, even to make a brave
"ſally through and away. This muſt we do, either by day or by night. And that doubt is ſoon "cleared. If we look for the morrow day, what hope have we, but that the enemy will caſt a "ditch and bank even round about us: who already as ye ſee lying under this little riſing, have
"compaſſed it with their very bodies. Now, if ſo be that the night be a convenient and favourable
"time for irruptions and ſallies, as in truth it is: then, this hour of the night certainly, is of all o"ther the fitteſt. At the ſecond watches ſound ye are come hither, at which time all men are in "their moſt ſound and dead ſleep. Amid their bodies being faſt aſleep, ſhall ye go. Either by ſi- O
"lence deceive them unawares, or if they perceive you, affright them with a ſudden outcry. Do
"but follow me, as ye have done already, I will follow the ſame fortune that guided me hither.
"Now as many of you that think this good counſel, and a courſe like to ſpeed well, make no more the quarters void of watchmen and warders. Now were they eſcaped the mids of the camp, when a ſouldier, as he clambered over the watchmens bodies, lying heavy aſleep, chanced to ſtumble at a ſhield, which gave a ſound again. Wherat the watchman being awakened, raiſed his next fellow; and they being ſtart up, call up other, not knowing whether they were enemies or fellows, whether the gariſon of Decius on the hill was broken forth, or the Conſul had ſurpriſed the camp. Decius then, ſeeing his ſouldiers could not paſſe clear and undeſcried, commanded them to ſet up a ſhout. And therewith he amaſed them with a new fright, who were already drowned in drowſineſs; ſo as they could neither take weapons readily, nor make heed againſt them, nor yet purſue after them. Whiles the Samnits were thus amazed and in confuſion, the Roman gariſon had by this time ſlain the warders whom they met, & were marching towards the Conſul his camp; as yet was ſomewhat of the night to come: but now they ſeemed to be ſafe, and paſt all danger. Then (quoth Decius on forward in this courage of yours, O hardy Romans; This your paſſage and re-B turn to and fro, all ages ſhall extoll and praiſe. But for the full ſight and view of ſo great valour, we had need of broad day light: for ye deſerve better, than that the ſtil night ſhould hide you in ſo " glorious a return of yours into the camp. Let us here reſt, and wait for day. His words were obeied; and ſo ſoon as the day brake, he diſpatched a meſſenger afore unto the Conſul: and ſo with exceeding joy they made ſpeed to the camp. And when it was known in the camp by the privy watchmen, that they who had put their lives in moſt dangerous hazard for the ſafty of them all, were themſelves returned ſafe: then every one came forth to meet them as faſt as they could, with praiſes and commendations, calling them both all & ſome, their ſaviours: praiſing the immortall gods, and giving thanks, yea, and extolling Decius to the skie. This was the triumph of Decius in the camp, as he marcheth through the midſt thereof with his armed gariſon, whiles every man

C caſt his eies upon him, and made him a Coronell, equall to the Conſul in all kind of honour. When he was come to the Pretorium, the Conſul by ſound of trumpet, called all the army to an audience, and as he entred into a diſcourſe of the deſerved praiſes of Decius, Decius himſelf interrupteth him, and cutteth off his ſpeech. Whereupon the Conſul put off the Oration. Decius then perſwadeth the Conſul, to ſet aſide all other things, and whiles the occaſion and opportunity was offred, he urged him effectually, to give an alarm to the enemies, both while they were amazed with this ſcare by night, and alſo lay ſcattering about the hill, as it were in their ſeverall ſconces. Beſides, he thought verily that ſome were ſent out after him to make freſh ſuit, and wandred aſtray in the forreſt. So the Legions were commanded to arm, and being departed out of the camp, and by means of the eſpials better acquainted with the foreſt, they were conducted by D a wider and more open way toward the enemy, whom ſuddenly they ſurpriſed & charged, unawares and unprovided as he was. And for as much as the Samnit ſouldiers were ſtragling abroad, and moſt unarmed, and could neither rally themſelves and take arms, nor retire into their trench, they drave them at firſt with fear into their camp: after, whiles the guards about it were diſordered and troubled, they were maſters thereof alſo. The noiſe was heard all about the hill, and cauſed every man to flie out of his hold. So a great part of them took their heeles before the enemy could come. But ſo many as for fear were driven within the trench (& thoſe were ſome 30000) were all ſlain: and the camp rifled & ſpoiled. The Conſul having atchieved this exploit, called an aſſembly; and not only finiſhed the praiſes of Decius, as he before began, but alſo amplified them with freſh commendation of this new ſervice. And beſides other military gifts, he rewarded him with a E crown of gold, a hundred oxen, and one ſpeciall white one, fat and fair above the reſt with guilded horns. The ſouldiers who together with him held the hill aforſaid, had given unto them for ever after, a double proportion of corn, and for the preſent one oxe a piece, and two ſingle liveries. After the Conſul his reward was beſtowed, the Legionary ſouldiers themſelves put upon Decius his head a wreath of green graſſe, in token of a delivery from ſiege, and with notable thouts and loud cries approved this gift. Another chaplet or garland alſo, in token of like honour, did his own band and company ſet upon him. And thus being adorned with theſe ornaments of honour, he ſacrificed that choſen white oxe unto Mars; and beſtowed his hundred oxen among thoſe his ſouldiers, who had accompanyed him in that exploit and ſervice. To the ſame ſouldiers the legions gave a pound meaſure of wheat meal, and a * ſextar of wine, a piece. All theſe particulars were performed and done with great cheerfulneſs, and ſeconded with thouting and acclamation of F the ſouldiers, to ſignifie their good liking and generall aſſent.

A third battel was fought at Sueſſula: wherin by M. Valerius, was put to flight the hoſt of the Samnits. Whereupon, the whole manhood and flower of their youth that remained at home were ſent for and aſſembled, determining to fight it out and trie their fortune once for all. Fearfull news hereof came from Sueſſula to Capua: and from thence carriers and poſts were diſpatched to Valerius the Conſul, for aid. Forthwith he advanced the ſtandards, and leaving the cariages belonging to the camp, with a ſtrong guard, he marched forward in great haſt: and not far from the enemie, took a little plot of ground to encamp in; as having beſides their horſes of ſervice, no beaſts at all for cariage, nor a rabble of ſlaves and varlets that follow the camp. The Samnits (as if without further delay they were to fight) embattelled themſelves. But ſeeing none to encoun-
G ter them, they came with banner diſplaied to the very camp of the enemies. And there ſo ſoon as they beheld the ſouldiers upon the rampier, and underſtood by them that were ſent out of purpoſe to view the circuit of the camp, in how ſmal compaſſe they had fortified, gueſſing therby how few their enemies were; there ran a noiſe throughout the army, to make no more adoe but to fill up the ditches, to cut through the banks, and ſo preſently to break into the camp. And even in that raſhneſſe had the war been decided and diſpatched, but that the captaines held in the violence of the ſouldiers. But for as much as their own number ſo great, required good ſtore of victuals victuals, and was both by their lying before Suessula, and also by their long stay there without fight brought to scarcity well-neer of all things: it was thought good, that whiles the enemies kept within their hold as affrighted, the souldiers should be sent about the country a foraging. In which mean time they supposed that the Romans likewise, would have spent all, who were thither come lightly appointed, and had brought no more corn with them then they could carry on their shoulders, besides their armour. The Consul having espied the enemies straggling over the country, and their guards slenderly manned, after a brief exhortation to his souldiers, led them forth to give an assault upon their camp. Which when they had won at the first shout and onset, and killed more of the enemies within their tents, then either upon the gates or upon the rampier; he caused the ensignes that he had taken, to be brought together into one place: and leaving there two legions, for a guard and defence, with a straight charge, that untill he came again, they should forbear to rifle and make spoil, he went forward in order of battell. And when the horsmen which he made out afore, had like hunters driven the scattred Samnits, as it were, within net and toil, he fell upon them and committed an exceeding great slaughter. For frighted as they were, they knew neither at what signall they should rally themselves together, nor whether they should make speed to the camp, or flie further away. But so great was their fright and flight both, that there were brought to the Consul, 40000 shields, more indeed then there were men slain: besides 170 ensigns, together with those that were won in the camp. Then returned he unto the enemies tents, and bestowed the whole pillage there, upon the souldiers. And such was the happy successe of this war, that it both caused the Falisci being in truce, to sue unto the Senat, for a league: and also turned the Latins, who had prepared their forces already from warring with the Romans, to wage war upon the Peligni. Neither rested the fame of this so fortunate a victory within the marches of Italy: for even the Carthaginians also, sent their Embassadors to Rome, with gratulation, and a present of a golden crown weighing * twenty five pounds, to be set up in Jupiters Temple within the Capitoll. Both Consuls triumphed over the Samnits: and Decius followed after, all goodly to be seen, with his gifts and worthy praises: whiles the souldiers, as their manner was, with merry jests and rude ditties, magnified and renowned the name of the Colonell no less than the Consuls.

A notable defeat of the Samnit.

After this the Embassadours of the Campains and the Suessians had a day of audience: and upon their humble request it was granted, that thither should be sent a standing garrison to winter there, for to stop the excursions and invasions of the Samnits. But Capua, even then no good place for military discipline, wrought an alteration in the souldiers there: who having once got a taste, and taken a delight in a world of pleasures of all sorts, quite forgot their own naturall country. For they of the garrison, began to lay plots and devise how to get Capua from the Campains: even by the same wicked practise, by which themselves had won it first from the ancient possessors and inhabitants, saying, "It made no matter, and they were but rightly served, in case their own "precedent lewd example, should return upon their own heads. Again, why should the Campains, "not able to defend themselves, nor maintain their liberties and goods, be LL. of the most plentiful "country of Italy, and of a City answerable and correspondent thereunto, rather then the victorious army, which with their sweat and blood had repelled and expelled the Samnits from them? And "was it any reason, that they who had yeelded to be vassals unto them, should enjoy that fruitfull "and pleasant tract, while they themselves wearied with fighting, struggled still and wrestled in a "pestilent air, and dry barren soil, about the City of Rome, and within that City, indured the set-"led, inveterat and intestin mischief & plague of usury, that surcharged them daily more and more? Whiles these projected conspiracies were contrived in secret conventicles, and as yet not broached and divulged to all mens knowledge, the new Consul, C. Martius Rutilus came in place: whose lot it was to be L. Deputy of the province Campania, leaving his fellow Q. Servilius in the City, who having intelligence by the Captains and Colonels, of all the particularities of those designes: being a wise man, both for his old age and long experience (as who was now Consul the fourth time, and withal had been Censor and Dictator) thought it best to dissemble the matter, and to make void and frustrat the present heat and outrage of the souldiers, by deferring and prolonging their hope, as if they might put in execution their plots at their best leisure, whensoever they pleased. He raiseth therefore a rumour, that the garrisons should in the same towns winter again the year following. [For divided they were into sundry Cities of Campania: & the web begun at Capua, was spred from thence through all the forces.] By means of this good respit to bethink themselves and advise of these matters, the mutiny for the present was well quieted. The Consuls then led forth the souldiers into the summer places of abode and repose, and purpose while he had the Samnits in quietness to cleanse the army by the casheiring & discharging those busie bodies and troublesome spirits: pretending colourably, and saying, That some of them had served already so long as the law required, others were well now stept in years, or waxen feeble and their strength decaied. Some had their passports limited, and were sent home: at the first one by one singled out, afterwards, certain whole cohorts or bands, as having wintered far from their dwelling places, from their goods and substance. Under a pretence and colour also of military services and imploiments, whiles to me were dispatched one way, some another, a great part of them were rid clean away. All this multitude, the other Consul and the Pretor kept still at Rome; devising this cause, and that, of delaies and abiding behind. And verily at first, they being not aware of this delusion, were not unwilling to visit home. But after that they perceived, that

A neither they who were dismissed first, returned again unto their colours, nor any in a manner discharged else, but such as had lien in winter garrison at Capua: and those especially, who of them were the authors of the conspiracy; first they marvelled, and afterwards feared in very deed, that their complots were revealed and come to light, and that now presently, they should be put to examinations and tortures, abide arraignment and judgement, be executed secretly apart one by one, and suffer the insolent lordlinesse, and cruell tyranny of Consuls and Senatours over them. These and such like speeches sow they and whisper secretly, hat were in the camp, when they saw the principall authors of the mutiny, who were the sinews and strength thereof, by the wily policy of the Consul to be dismembered from them. One cohort of them, being not far from Anxur sat them down ot Lautulæ, in a narrow passe or wood between the sea and the mountains, to intercept and stay, whomsoever the Consul sent about this or that pretended businesse as is aforesaid. Soon were there gathered together a right strong power: and nothing wanted to make a shew of a full army, but only a head and Captain. And disordered as they were, they went robbing and spoiling, as far as the Alban country, and under the hill of long Alba they encamp themselves within a trench and rampier. Which work being finished, they spend the rest of the day in consultation about chusing a Commander, little trusting any one there present in place. And who possibly (say they) could be sent for as far as from Rome? What Senator or Commoner was there, that either wittingly would venture upon so great and dangerous an enterprise: or to whom the cause of an army, enraged upon an injury received, might safely be committed? The next C morrow, whiles they reasoned still about this point, and sadly debated the matter, some of the wandring and vagrant forragers of the Country thereabout, bring certain inteligence, that Titus Quintius imployed himself in husbandry, and held a farme in Tusculanum, minding neither the City, nor dignities of state and Common weal. This man was come of noble lineage, and having served with great credit and honour in the wars by a wound received, was lame of a leg, and gave over souldiery, determining to lead the rest of his life in the country, sequestred far from all courting and ambitious suing for civill offices. They had not so soon heard his name, but presently they took knowledge of the man, and (that which might turn to their good) agreed with one accord, he should be sent for. Small hope there was that he would willingly do any thing: they thought therefore to use force and to bring him to it by fear. So, in the dead time of the night, they D that were sent thereto, entred the farm house, and finding Quintius found and fast asleep, they awakened him: propounded unto him either rule and honour, or else pre ent death: and no mean between, in case he made stay and refused to go with them: and so they haled and brought him to their camp. Incontinently he was saluted L. Generall at his first coming. And when the man was affrighted at this sudden and wonderful occurrent, they endue him with the ornaments and ensigns to that honor belonging, and will him to lead them as their commander to the City of Rome. Thus having plucked up the standards, in this heady fit of their own, rather then upon any advise or counsell of their captain, they march in warlike maner with an army toward Rome, within eight miles of the City, upon the causey or street way, now called Appia Via: and had approached immediatly in that train to the very City, but that they heard there was a power coming against them, and a Dictatour created to withstand them, to wit M. Valerius Corvinus, toge- E ther with L. Æmylius Mamercus General of horsmen. So Soon as they were come in enterview one of another, and took knowledge of the armor and ensigns: the remembrance of their native country wrought with them straightwaies a mitigation of their mood. They were not yet so far gone, nor so hardy, as to shed civill blood: neither had they knowledge of any other wars but forrein: and the uttermost rage and maddest fit that ever they proceeded unto, was counted their Secession and departure away from their own countrymen. And therfore both captains and souldiers on either side sought means to meet together, and draw to imparle. Quintius for his part, who having had already his hands full of wars in defence of his country, could worse brook taking arms against the same: Corvinus likewise for himself, as one that with loving affection embraced all his fellow-citizens, but the souldiers especially, and above al others those of his own army that fought F under his banner, came forth to a parle. And forthwith as soon as he was once known, he had no lesse reverence done of unto him of the adverse part, than silence and audience given of his own men. The immortall gods (quoth he) O souldiers as well those which are common to you all, as mine own particular patrons, when I took my leave of the City, I adored and worshipped in this wise, craving humbly upon my knees at their hands, to vouchsafe me the honour, not of a victory over you, but of procuring concord and unity among you. Occasions there "have been, and will be enow else where, to win glory and warlike renown: From "hence, peace onely is to be sought. And even that which among my vowes that I made "I besought so devoutly of the immortall gods, it lieth in you to make me enjoy. A posed himself against their conspiracies and innovations, and took not part with them who fled from Lantulæ. But when this one point could not be obtained of the Senat, for the favour they bare to Salonius: then Salonius himself besought the Senators that they would not regard his honour more than the concord of the whole City: and so at length it also was granted and enacted. As unreasonable a demand was this also, That of horsemens pay, (and that was triple at that time) some Asses should be deducted, for that they also had withstood the conspiracy. Over and besides, I find in some writers, that L. Genutius, a Tribune of the Commons, published this Law unto the people, That Usury might be made altogether unlawfull. Likewise in other Acts of the Commons it was provided, That no man within ten years space should be capable of the same Office twice: nor in B one year bear two Offices: and that both Consuls might be of the Commons. Which if they all were granted to the Commons, it appeareth that this insurrection carried some sway and force with it. In other Chronicles it is recorded, that neither Valerius was chosen Dictator, but that all this business was by the Consuls managed: nor so great a multitude of Conspirators rose, before they came to Rome, but even in Rome took arms: nor yet that they came by night, in forcible manner into T. Quintius farm-house, but in the dwelling house of C. Manlius: and that he was taken up by the rebels to be their General and from thence went as far as four miles end, and there encamped in a fortified place: that the motion of Concord arose not from the Captains, but that of a sudden when both Armies stood aranged in order of battel they fell to greeting one another: and that the souldiers began to take one another by the hands and embrace with tears: and that the C Consuls seeing the souldiers so backwark from fight, were forced to move the Senat for an attonement. So as among ancient writers, there is no certainty set down but that a sedition there was, and the same appeased. But the rumor thereof and the cruel war which the Samnits begun withdrew certain nations from the Romans society and alliance. For besides the faithless and untrusty League (a long time) of the Latines: the Privernats also with sudden rodes, invaded and wasted Norba and Setia two Colonies of the Romans near bordering and adjoyning.

The Eighth Book of T. Livius.

NOw was C. Plautius Conſul the ſecond time, with L. Æmylius Mamercus, when as the Setines and Norbans brought tidings to Rome of the Privernats revolt, with complaints of harms ſuſtained at their hands. News came likewiſe, that an Army of Volſcians, under the conduct of the Antiats, were encamped at Satricum. Both theſe wars fell by lot to Plautius. Who taking his journey firſt to Privernum, forthwith bad them battel: and with no great conflict gave his enemies the overthrow. The Town was won and reſtored again to I the Privernats, with a ſtrong garriſon therein placed, but two parts of their Lands were taken from them. The Army thus having obtained victory, was conducted thence to Satricum againſt the Antiats. Where was a cruel battel fought with much bloudſhed on both ſides: and when as the tempeſtuous and ſtormy weather parted them aſunder, before that either ſide enclined to victory, the Romans no whit wearied with that conflict ſo doubtful, addreſſed themſelves to fight againſt the morrow. But the Volſcians having taken a view and account what men they had loſt in fight, were not of like mind to adventure the hazard again: and therefore as vanquiſhed men they diſlodged by night in diſorder, and fearfully took their way to Antium, leaving behind them their wounded, and part of their baggage. Great ſtore of armour was there found, both upon and among the ſlain bodies of the enemies, and alſo within the Camp: Which the Con- K
The goddeſs Lua. ſul promiſed to dedicate to dame Lua, and ſo he forraged and ſpoiled the confines of the enemies, even as far as the ſea coaſt. But againſt the other Conſul Æmylius, who was entred into the Sabellian land, neither were the Samnits encamped, nor their Legions oppoſed any where. Whiles therefore with fire and ſword he waſted their Countrey, the Samnits Embaſſadours came unto him, craving peace: but being by him poſted off to the Senate, after they had audience given, they let fall their ſtout ſtomacks, and requeſted peace for themſelves with the Romans, and liberty to make war againſt the Sidicins: which petition they enforced with more reaſon and equity. "Firſt, in that they had entred into amity with the people of Rome, during their proſpe- "rity, and not as the Campains in their adverſity: again, they were to take arms againſt the Si- "dicines, enemies alwaies to themſelves, and never freinds to the people of Rome: who alſo, L "neither in peace (as the Samnits) ſued for friendſhip and alliance, nor in time of war (as the "Campains) ſought for aid and ſuccour: and finally, were neither under the protection of the "people of Rome, nor yet their vaſſals and ſubjects. When as T. Æmylius the Prætor had conſulted with the Senate, about theſe points demanded by the Samnits, and that the LL. thought good that the league with them ſhould be renewed; the Prætor in the name of the reſt, made anſwer to the Samnits, "That neither the fault was in the people of Rome, that the confederacy between "them was not perpetual; neither gainſaied they, but foraſmuch as they were weary themſelves "firſt, and repented of the war commenced through their own default, the league might yet be "newly made again. Touching the Sidicins, they would be no hinderance, but that the Samnite "people, might uſe their liberty and do what they thought beſt, either for war or peace. The M League being thus concluded and confirmed, and they returned home, preſently the Roman Army was brought from thence upon receit of a years pay, and corn for three months, according to the capitulation covenanted with the Conſul, in conſideration of a truce granted, untill their Embaſſadors were returned.

The Samnits, with the ſame forces which they had employed to withſtand the Roman war, went forth againſt the Sidicins with undoubted hope, ſpeedily to win the City of their enemies. Then, had the Sidicines before made an offer to yield themſelves unto the Romans, but ſeeing the Nobles to reject them, as coming too late, and wreſted as it were perforce from them in their laſt extremity, they tendred the ſame to the Latines, who were already of their own accord riſen up and had taken arms. The Campains likewiſe (ſo ready and forward were they to bear in mind N an injury of the Samnits, rather than a good turn of the Romans) forbare not to joyn in this quarrel. Thus was there raiſed a mighty power of ſo many Nations banded together, under the conduct of the Latines, and invaded the borders of the Samnits, where more hurt was received by rodes than skirmiſhes. And albeit the Latines in fight had the better hand, yet were they well content for avoiding ſo many conflicts, to depart out of the enemies country. Which gave the Samnits leiſure to ſend Embaſſadors to Rome, who before the Senat complaining, that they endured the ſame meaſure ſtill, being now aſſociats, which they had abidden before when they were enemies: beſought moſt humbly, "that the Romans would be ſatisfied with that victory of the "Campains and Sidicins, their enemies, which they had got out of the Samnits hands, and not "ſuffer them to be trodden under foot by thoſe Nations, the moſt daſtards and cowards of all O "others: requeſting moreover, if ſo be the Latines and Campains were under the dominion of "the people of Rome, that they would command them by vertue of their authority to forbear the "Samnits country: and if they refuſed to obey, then to chaſtiſe and keep them in by force of war. To theſe demands they framed a doubtful anſwer, as being loath and abaſhed of the one ſide to confeſs, that the Latines were not at their devotion, and fearing again on the other ſide by reproving and provoking them to turn away their hearts, and loſe them for ever. And this was the anſwer. "As touching the Campains, their caſe was otherwiſe, who were not by covenants and conditions

A "ditions in forme of League, but by voluntary and ſimple ſubmiſſion under their protection: and "therefore they ſhould be quiet whether they would or no: but as for the Latines, by any capi"tulation compriſed in their accord, they were not prohibited to levy war with whom they liſt.
Which anſwer, as it ſent the Samnits away, in doubt what to think what the Romans would do; ſo it eſtranged and alienated the Campains for fear: and made the Latines more ſtout, as ſuppoſing the Romans now would give them the head & yield any thing unto them. And therefore under a colour of preparing war againſt the Samnits, they ſummoned and held many Councils one after another: and in all their meetings and conſultations, their Princes and chief men ſecretly amongſt themſelves did nothing but plot and practice war with the Romans. In which conſpiracy alſo the B Campains had their hand as deep as the reſt, even to bear arms againſt thoſe who had been their Protectors. But although they did what they could to keep all cloſe of purpoſe, and were deſirous before the Romans ſhould ſtir, to be ſecured from the Samnits, (an enemy preſſing hard upon their backs) yet nevertheleſs this complot was diſcovered, and intelligence thereof given at Rome, by means of certain perſons linked to the Romans in privat acquaintance and mutuall hoſpitality.
Hereupon were the Conſuls commanded to reſign their Magiſtracy before the ordinary time, that ſo much the ſooner there might be new created againſt ſo great a danger and preparation of war.
But here roſe a ſcruple of conſcience, that the aſſembly for Election ſhould be holden by them, whoſe government was thus ſhortned and abridged. Whereupon they proceeded to an Inter-reign. And two Interregents there were one after another, M. Valerius and M. Fabius: who crea-C ted Conſuls, T. Manlius Torquatus the third time, and P. Decius Mus.

In that year, it is recorded for certain, that Alexander King of Epirus, arrived in Italy with a Navy: who, no doubt if he had ſped well at his firſt entrance, would have proceeded farther and warred upon the Romans. In this age flouriſhed Alexander the Great in glorious conqueſts, who Alexander the Great.
being this man his ſiſters ſon, and a warrior invincible, whiles he atchieved feats of arms in another part of the world, hapned to die in his beſt time and prime of his youth. But to proceed forward. The Romans although there was no doubt but that their aſſociats, and namely, the Latines were revolted: yet, as though they were carefully buſied about the Samnits only, and nothing intended them; they ſent for to Rome ten of their chief Peers, pretending to give them in charge what their pleaſure was to have done. At that time the Latines had two Prætors or Provoſts, L.
D Annius of * Setia, and L. Numitius of Circeia, both Roman Colonies. By whoſe means, beſides Sig- * Sezza.
nia and Velitre, being alſo Colonies of Rome, the Volſcians were ſollicited likewiſe to take arms.
And thought good it was, that thoſe Latine Prætors by name, ſhould be cited with the reſt. No man was ignorant for what intent they were ſent for. The Prætors therefore, called a Council before they went, and there declared how they were convented by the Senat of Rome, demanding their advice what anſwer to make as touching thoſe matters, wherewith, as they ſuppoſed, they ſhould be charged. When ſome were of this opinion, ſome of that; then Annius ſpake and ſaid: The ſpeech of Annius in the Council of Latium.
"Although I my ſelf have moved you to reſolve upon an anſwer, yet I think, it concerneth us more "in our main eſtate, to determine what to do, than what to ſay. And when we are grown to a re-
"ſolution once of our affairs, and what courſe to take, an eaſie matter will it be to frame words fit E "for the purpoſe. For if even now already under a ſhadow and pretence of an indifferent league,
"we can abide and find in our hearts to endure bondage, what ſtandeth in the way, but that ha"ving abandoned and betraied the Sidicines, we be obedient not only to the Romans command-
"ment, but alſo to the Samnits? and anſwer the Romans in theſe plain terms, That at their beck "only, and if they do but nod their head, we will preſently lay down all arms? But if at length, the "deſire and longing after liberty do touch our hearts, and give an edge unto our ſpirits: if there "be a league between us: and if confederacy ought to be nothing elſe but a ſociety and equal frui"tion of liberty and priviledges: if, I ſay, we may now glory and vaunt, whereof ſometimes we "were aſhamed, that we are of kin to the Romans, and of their bloud: if they have an Army of aſ-"ſociats, by the addition whereof they redouble their forces, and which the Conſuls in leaving or F "levying their proper wars, will not part and ſever from their own: why is there not equality in "all things elſe? Why is not one of the Conſuls a Latine? Look where is part of power and for"ces, there alſo is part of rule and command. And certainly even this in it ſelf is not a matter of ſo
"great honour unto us, as who have granted and confeſſed Rome to be the head of Latium: yet by "long patience and continual ſufferance only, we have brought to paſs that it might ſeem honou"rable. But if ever ye wiſhed to ſee the day wherein ye might participate in government and re"cover your liberties again, lo, that time is now come preſented unto you by your own valour, and
"the gracious goodneſs of the immortal gods. Tried their patience ye have in denying ſouldiers:
"who doubted not but that they were in a great choler and angry at the heart, when we brake a "cuſtome of two hundred years preſcription and above: yet nevertheleſs this grief have they put G "up and given us not one foul word. We warred upon the Pelignians in our own name and quar"rel: and they, who aforetimes allowed not us the liberty ſo much as to defend our own mar"ches of our ſelves, nothing gainſaid and croſſed it. That the Sidicins were taken to our mercy and "protection, that the Campains revolted from them and ſided with us, that we levied an army a-"gainſt the Samnits their confederats, they heard and knew well enough: and yet they ſtirred not "once forth of their City. How come they to be ſo calm and quiet, but upon a privity and know"ledge, both of our puiſſance and of their own weakneſs? I am able to avouch by the report of "men of good credit, that when the Samnits complained themſelves of us, they had ſuch an an"swer again of the Senat of Rome, that it plainly appeared that they themselves pretended not to H "require that Latium should be under the Roman Empire. Do ye but take upon you, and lay "claim unto that which they secretly yield unto you themselves, and repossess it at your pleasure.

"Now if any man be affraid to be the speaker, Lo, here am I, who profess to be the man, and to "say thus much not only in the audience of the people and Senat of Rome, but also of Jupiter him"self, who is reliant in the Capitol, namely, That if they will have us to be of the League and con"federacy, they shall admit from among us one of the Consuls, yea, and a part of the Senat. As he with great spirit and boldness, not only advised this, but promised also thus to do; all that were present with a general applause and assent permitted him to do and say whatsoever he thought expedient for the common good of the Latine nation, according to that trust which they re- I posed in him. So soon as he was come to Rome (with other Embassadors) he was admitted into the Senat, and audience given him in the Capitol. Where when T. Manlius the Consul, by the authority and direction of the Senators, had dealt with him and the rest, not to make war upon the Samnits their confederats: Annius raging like a conqueror, as if he had won by force and arms the Capitol; and not as an Embassador, who was to deliver his mind and message safely, by the protection of the Law of Nations, began in this sort: "The time required (quoth he) now at "length, O T. Manlius and ye Senators of Rome, not to treat and deal with us in any affairs by "way of authority and commandment, namely, when you saw Latium by the favour of the gods
"to flourish exceedingly both in men and munition, as having subdued the Samnits, confederate
"with the Sidicins and Campains, and now also combined with the Volscians: and besides, even K
"your own Colonies and townships too, have made choice to submit themselves to the Latines "rather than the Romans. But forasmuch as you cannot find in your hearts of your selves, nor see "how to make an end of your proud and outragious Lordship and tyranny; We, albeit we are a"ble to restore Latium unto her ancient freedom by force of arms, yet for kindred sake wil be con"tent to offer indifferent articles and equal conditions of peace, forasmuch as it hath pleased
"the immortal gods, that we are equal unto you in power and puissance. Imprimis, there is no re"medy now, but your two Consuls must be one a Roman, and the other a Latine: Item, that the "number of Senators be elected as well out of the one nation as the other. Item, that we become "one people incorporate, and one Common-wealth. And to the end that there may be one im"perial seat, and one name of all, and therefore we or you must needs yield, we are content a Gods L
"name (and to the good of both nations may it prove) that this City and State of yours be coun-
"red the better and more noble: and let us be called all by the name of Romans. By good hap it so fell out, that the Romans also had for their Consul T. Manlius to match him; one as stout and hot as the other: who could not contain his anger no longer, but openly said, "That if the Sena"tors were so far overseen and besides themselves, as to take conditions of a Setine, he would "come with his sword by his side into the Senate house, and what Latine soever he saw there in "coun il, he would not fail but slay him with his own hand in the place. And therewith turning "to the Image of Jupiter: Hearken (quoth he) O good god Jupiter. Hear this wickedness and in"dignity: hear O Justice: and piety to Godward. Wilt thou abide to see, O Jupiter, in this thy ho"ly and sacred temple wilt thou endure, as taken captive and troden under foot to see Consuls of M "aliens & a Senat of forreiners? Are these the covenants, O ye Latines, which Tullus King of Rome
"made with the Albans your forefathers? or which L. Tarquinius after him, concluded with you?
"Remember ye not the battel at the lake Regillus? Have ye so forgotten indeed, both your "own calamities and overthrows of old, and also the good turns and benefits received at our "hands? When this speech of the Consul was seconded with the indignation also of the Senators, it is recorded, that when they called upon the gods, witnesses of those covenants, and reiterated their names oftentimes. Annius in mockery of those protestations, was over-heard to despise and scorn the power and godhead of the Roman Jupiter. But this is certain, that as he in heat of anger stepped hastily to the entry or porch of the temple, and went apace, he fell down the stairs, and so hurt his head that dashed against the bottom stair, that he swooned withall, and lay for dsad. But N because all writers agree not, that he yielded up his last breath thereupon, I also wil leave it doubtful, as I find it: as also this, that in the very charging of him with breach of covenants, there poured down a tempestuous storm, with many mighty thunderclaps. For, as these and such like things may be very true, so they may be prettily devised and invented on set purpose to represent & shew the wrath and vengeance of God. Torquatus being sent by the Senat to give the Embassadors their dispatch seeing Annius there to lie along, cried out aloud, in the hearing both of the Senat and the people, and said, "No force, it is well, and as it should be; thus begin and bless, O ye immortal
"gods, our just and rightful war. Surely there is a God above, there is a power divine and deity
"in heaven, thou art no feigned and imaginary god O mighty Jupiter & not in vain have we hal"lowed thee in this place, as the father both of gods and men. Why stay ye then, O Roman Qui- O
"rites, ye likewise my LL. of the Senat to take arms in the name of the gods, having them already "as you see to be your Leaders? I for my part shall soon so overthrow and lay the Legions of the "Latines along on the earth as ye now see their Embassador, lying here at the stairs foot. The words of the Consul, received with so great applause of the people, animated and enkindled them in such sort, that had not the careful diligence of the Magistrates been more (who by commandment of the Consul accompanied the Embassadors as they went) than the ordinary safe conduct of the Law of Nations, they had not escaped the rage and fury of the multitude.

The Oration of Annius in the Senat of Rome.

The Oration o T. Manlius.

The

A The Senat also gave their assent to this war, and the Consuls having levied two armies, and passed through the country of the Marsians and Pelignians, and joyned unto them the Samnits power, encamped themselves before Capua, whither the Latines with their associats, were already come together. There, as the report goeth, the Consuls both of them in their sleep had a vision: and there appeared unto them one and the same shape of a mans personage, much greater and more stately than the ordinary port of men, who should deliver these words unto them, "That "of the two armies embattelled and affronting one another, the one was appointed as a due tri-"bute to the infernal spirits, and to Mother Earth: and of the other, the chief General only. And "look of whether army the said soveraign General should devote and offer unto those infernal
B "spirits, and to mother Earth, the Legions of the enemies, and his own person withall, that part "and that Nation shall have the victory. When the Consuls had imparted one to the other these night-visions, it was thought good and agreed (for to divert and appease Gods anger) that certain sacrifices should be slain, and also if the same shewed in their inwards, as appeared in their sleep, then one or other of the Consuls should fulfil the destinies, and accomplish fatal appointment. When as the answers of the Soothsaiers agreed also to that secret religion which was now entred and setled already in their minds, then the Consuls calling together the Lieutenants and Colonels to a Council, and openly declaring before them all the pleasure of the gods, (to the end, that the wilful and voluntary death of one of the Consuls, might not fright his army in the field) they agree between themselves, that of whether side the Roman battallons began first to give back
C and retreat the Consul of that Army, should devote and betake himself to die for the people of Rome and the Quirites. It was debated also in that assembly, that if ever at any time before there had been war managed by severe rule and government, the military discipline should now be revived and reduced to the old manner and ancient rigour: their care in that behalf was the greater and more redoubled, for that they were to fight against the Latines, suting altogether to them in language, fashions, armour, and especially above all, in the orders and laws of warrare. For, many a time, in these two armies souldier with souldier, Centurion with Centurion, Colonel with Colonel, had sorted and conversed together, as collegues and compeers in the same garrisons, yea, and under the same colours and ensigns. By reason whereof, to the end, that by no errour the souldiers should be mistaken or deceived, the Consuls made proclamation through the Camp, That no
D man should fight with his enemy out of his own rank, and place appointed unto him. It fortuned now, that among other Captains and Cornets of horsemen, which were sent out every way as scouts and espials to discover the coasts, T. Manlius the Consul his son, together with the rest of his Cornet and Troup, was passed above the enemies Camp, so near, as he was within an arrow shot of their next Corps de guard. In which was quartered the cavalry of Tusculum, under the leading of Geminius Metius a Knight, both for birth, and also for his noble feats of arms highly esteemed in his country. He espying the Roman horse, and knowing the Consul, son, advancing before them, and of especiall mark above the rest (for all Noblemen and of quality were well enough known one to another.) What, will ye Romans (quoth he) with one Cornet of horse fight with the Latines and their confederats? What shall your Consuls, what shall two Consular armies do E the mean while? Marry (quoth Manlius) they will be here time enough for you, and with them Jupiter himself, a witness of league and covenants by you broken. Jupiter I say, who only can do more than all mens forces in the world. And we who at the pool Regillus, have given you fighting your bellies full, will here also quit our selves so, that never after ye shall have any great joy and pleasure to encounter and joyn battel with us again. With that, Geminius, riding forth as he was on horseback, a little from his company, Wilt thou then (quoth he) till that day come wherein ye mean with so great a do to set forward your armies to a general set field, break a staff with me in the mean time; that by the proof and event of us twain, it may henceforth appear, how far the Latine men of arms, surpass the Roman? The young man his bloud and courage was F soon up either upon anger and choler, or for very shame to refuse the combat, or because God would so have it, and it was his destiny that could not be avoided. Forgetting therefore his fathers commandment, and the express Edict of the Consuls, he returneth on head and rashly, to a single fight: wherein it skilled not much, whether he had the better or the worse, for any great odds thereby in the main trial of the quarrel. Thus when the rest of the horsemen of both parts were retired aside (as it were) to behold some spectacle or running at tilt: in the void place of the plain field that lay between, they ran their horses in full carreer one against the other, with sharp and deadly spear in rest. Manlius with his lance aloft glid over and raised the Morion of his enemy, and Metius with his spear lightly touched, and passed by the horse neck. Then having turned about their horses, Manlius came upon him first with a second charge, and so redoubled the push, that he thrust the others horse in between the ears. At the smart of which wound the G horse reared and mounted with his forefeet, and with great force shaking his head cast his rider. And as he bare his spear and shield, to raise himself from his grievous fal, Manlius ran him through at the throat, so that the spear-head came forth at his ribs, and nailed him fast to the ground. And having disarmed & despoiled him rode back to his own troop: and both together with exceeding joy hastned to the Camp, and so to the Generals Pavilion, even to his father; full little knowing his fatall destiny, and what was to befall unto him, whether he had deserved praise, or incurred danger of punishment. That all the world, quoth he, (O father) may be perswaded and report truly that I am descended indeed of your bloud, and your undoubted son. Lo here I am, who being defied and challenged to fight man to man, have killed mine enemy a man of arms: see here the H ſpoils of him ſlain and dead. Which ſo ſoon as the Coſ. heard, preſently he could not abide to look on his ſon, but turned away, and by ſound of trumpet, commanded the hoſt to a publike audience. Which being aſſembled in great number. " Foraſmuch (quoth he) as thou, T. Manlius, with" out regard of Coſſ. authority, or dread of thy fathers majeſty and power over thee, againſt our E" dict and expreſs commandment, haſt fought with the enemy, and that without thy rank and " place; and as much as lay in thee, haſt broken the diſcipline of war, whereby to this day the State

" of Rome hath ſtood maintained, and haſt brought me thy father to this hard point, that I muſt
" forget either the Common-weal, or elſe mine own ſelf and mine, we will abide rather the pu-
" niſhment and ſmart for our own miſdeeds, than the whole ſtate, to her ſo great prejudice and da- I Manlius executed by his own father. " mage, ſhould pay for our folly and tranſgreſſion. A fearful and dolorous example will we afford:
" but good & profitable to all youth for ever hereafter. As for me verily, both the inbred love and " affection of all fathers to their children, and alſo this ſhew and proof of thy valour and knight-
" hood (although ſeduced with deceitful apparance and vain reſemblance of honour) moveth
" me not a little: but ſince that, either by thy death the Coſſ. commands muſt be eſtabliſhed, or by " impunity of thy diſobedience for ever diſanulled, I would not wiſh thee to refuſe (if there be any
" of my bloud in thee) but by thy puniſhment to reſtore and ſet up again the military diſcipline " which this day by thy default is faln down and ruinate. Go ſerjeant, and bind him to a ſtake. At this ſo cruel a ſentence, they were all amazed and in an extaſie, that were preſent: and as if they had ſeen the edge bent againſt themſelves, for fear more than for any modeſty or reverence, they K were quiet. So when they were come again to themſelves, as if their ſpirits had been recovered after ſome deep impreſſion of a wonder which had aſtonied them, they ſtood ſtill with ſilence: but ſo ſoon as the poor wretch his head was chopt off, and his bloud ſeen to guſh and ſpin out, then began they all of a ſudden to ſpeak freely and complain with open mouth, ſo as they forbare neither lamentations nor curſes: they covered the youth his body with his own victorious ſpoils, they erected a funeral pile of wood over his corps without the trench and rampiers, ſet it on fire, and burnt him accordingly; and ſo with as great love and affection as ſouldiers could ſhew, performed their laſt duty unto him, and ſolemnized his obſequies. Thus the commandments of Manlius were not only dreadful for the preſent, but gave an heavy and fearful precedent for the future, to all ſoveraign Commanders of an Army. Howbeit, the rigour of this puniſhment made the L ſouldiers more dutiful to their Captains and Leaders: and beſides that, the rounds and ſentinels, and the ſet corps de guard, were every where more carefully looked unto and obſerved: even in the very hazard and extremity alſo of the battel afterward, that auſtere ſeverity did much good.
For their fight was much like unto a civill war. So little, or nothing at all in a manner, differed the Latines from the Romans Common-wealth, but only in heart and courage.

Aforetime they uſed Roman long large ſhields, covering their whole bodies; but in proceſs of time, after that they became Stipendaries and to take pay, they bare ſhorter targets. And whereas aforetime they had their battallons thick and cloſe together, like to the Macedonian Phalan-ges, afterwards they began to range their battel into bands more looſely and diſtinctly, and laſt of all, they were divided into thinner orders and ſquadrons: every ſuch order or ſquadron M contained threeſcore ſouldiers, two Centurions, and one Port enſign. The forefront of the vangard ware javelineers called Haſtati, in fifteen ſquadrons, diſtant ſome little way one from another: ſuch a ſquadron had twenty ſouldiers lightly armed, and all the reſt a ſort of Targeteers. And thoſe were called light-armed, who carried only a ſpear or javelin to fight with at hand, and other darts to lance from them aloof. This forefront contained the flower of youths, that grew up as apprentices to war-ſervice. Then followed after them of ſtronger and riper age, as many bands or ſquadrons, which were called Principes; whom there followed hard at heels, thirty ſquadrons, all targeteers or ſhield-bearers, with brave armour above all others. And this battallon of thirty companies, they called Antepilani [avant-darters] for that the other fifteen orders or bands were placed hard before the enſigns. And of theſe, every band conſiſted of three parts: and each of them N they called Primum pilum, and it was compoſed of three banners or pannonces: and every ſuch banner contained 186 men. The firſt Pannonce or banner conducted the Triarii, who were old ſouldiers of approved valour: the ſecond, thoſe that were called Rorarii, of leſs puiſſance both for age and proweſs: the third ſuch as were named Accenſi, who were of leaſt account and truſt, and therefore they were caſt behind unto the tail of the battallon. When the Army was thus ordered in battel array into theſe bands & ſquadrons, the javelineers formoſt of all began the fight:
if they were not able to diſcomfit the enemies, than they with ſteady footing and ſoft pace retired back into the void places between the ſquadrons of the Principes, who received them: then began the Principes to enter into the battel and to maintain fight, and were ſeconded by the Haſtati or Javelineers. The Triarii remained ſtanding all this whiles firmly, about their enſigns, ſetting O out their left legs afore them at length, with their Targets on their ſhoulders, and their pikes or javelins ſticking on the ground, with their heads ſomewhat bending forward, much like as if their battel were fortified with a Palliſado or rampier of pales and ſharp ſtakes. Now if thoſe Principes had not good ſucceſs in fight, they retired themſelves by little and little from the forefront to the Triarii. And hereupon grew the proverb, that when a thing was at a dead lift and in diſtreſs they would ſay, We are come to the Triarii. Then the Triarii ſtanding up right, ſo ſoon as they had received the Principes and Haſtati, into the void place between their files, preſently drew in their ranks

A ranks and files close together, and shut up as it were all waies of passage and entrance, and with one main joint and close battallon (as if now there were no more hope behind) advanced toward the enemy. And this most of all feared and terrified the enemies, when thinking to chase those that they seemed to have vanquished, they saw a new battel of fresh men starting up, and the same increased in number.

Now were there commonly four Legions enrolled, consisting of five thousand foot, and three hundred horse to every legion. As many more were added unto them, and those mustered out of the Latines, who at that time were enemies to the Romans, and had ordered their battallons after the same manner in all respects. And they knew well enough that not only ensign with ensign,
B all pikes and javelins with pikes and javelins, Principes with Principes, but one Centurion with another, if the arraies were not broken, were to encounter. Two Primipili or chief Centurions, there were amongst the Triarii in the one army and the other. The Roman, of body not so strong and well set, howbeit a good souldier otherwise, skilfull and of great experience: the Latine, exceeding mighty, and a notable fighter of all others. Well known they were one unto the other, because at all times they had the same conduct and equal place of charge. The Roman not greatly trusting to his own strength, was permitted even at Rome by the Cos. to chuse unto him an under-Centurion whom he would: who might protect and defend him safe from an enemy that should hap to deal with him hand to hand. And it fortuned that the yong man by him elected, fought in the throng and got the victory of the Latine Centurion. As for the battel, it was fought
C not far from the foot of the hill Vesuvius, in the very way that leadeth to Veseris. The Roman Consuls before they came into the field killed their beasts for sacrifice. And the bowel-prying Soothsaier (as it is reported) shewed to Decius the head of the Liver on the inner side wounded (as it were) and cut off: otherwise in all respects, his sacrifice was acceptable to the gods. As for Manlius he had as good signs of Gods favour in his, and all as well as might be. That is well yet (quoth Decius) if my collegue speed well, and have good success by his sacrifice. Their battels being so arranged, as I said before, they marched into the field. Manlius led the right wing, Decius the left. At the first they fought on both sides with equal forces and like courage and heat of stomack. But afterwards on the left wing, the Roman Hastati, not able to sustain the violent charge of the Latines, retired to the Principes. In which trouble and fearful disorder, Decius the Cos. called aloud
D to M. Valerius. "We have need of Gods help (quoth he) O Valerius. Where art thou, the publike "high Priest of the people of Rome? Come and say afore me that form of words, whereby I may "devote and betake my self for the Legions. The Priest commanded him to put on his long purple robe embroidered before, called Prætexta, to cover his head, and to put forth his hand under the said robe at his chin, and standing upon his javelin, with both his feet, to pronounce these words after him, as follow: [O Janus, Jupiter, father Mars, Quirinus, Bellona, O ye Lares and domesticall gods, the gods Novensiles and Indigetes; ye gods likewise, whose power extendeth over us and our enemies, and O Manes the infernal gods, you I invocat, you I worship and adore, your pardon I beseech and favour crave, that ye would prosper all power and victory unto the people of Rome and Quirites; and put to fear, fright, and death, the enemies of the people of Rome and Quirites. And just as I pronounce in set
E words, so for the weal publike of the Quirites, the Army, Legions and aids of the people of Rome, I betake with me unto Manes the infernal spirits, and dame Tellus, the Legions and aids of the enemies, and my self after them.] Having made this praier, he willed the Serjeants or Lictors to go to Manlius, and with all speed to tell him, that his collegue was devoted for the army. Himself girded after the Gabine fashion, and armed at all pieces, mounted on horseback and so rode into the midst of his enemies. Of both armies he was seen to carry with him much more stately and venerable port than a man, as sent from heaven to be a satisfaction of all gods wrath, and to turn away all plague and mischief from his own people upon the enemies. All terrour and fear he carried with him as he went, and first disordered the ensigns of the Latines in the edge and border of the battallons, and afterwards entred within into the whole army. This was noted and seen most evidently, that F which way so ere he rode the enemies were smitten with fear, as if they had been blasted and struck with some untoward aspect and influence of a planet. But so soon as he was faln and overcharged with shot of darts, presently from that place all about, the cohorts of the Latines (out of all question) as amazed men, fled away and avoided. And therewithal likewise the Romans, as if they had been discharged and freed from their religious fear and scruple of conscience, and as if they had but then and not before heard the sound of the trumpet to battel, began to charge and fight afresh. For both the Rorarii advanced forward and ran among the ranks of the Antepilani and thereby re-enforced the Hastati and Principes, and caused them to fight more stoutly: and the Triarii kneeling on their right knee, waited till the Cos. gave them some token to arise. Afterwards in process of fight when in other parts the Latines in their number prevailed, Manlius the Consul, ha-G ving heard of the final end of his companion and (and right as piety would) accompanied as well with plaints and tears as with due praises so worthy and memorable a death for a while doubted, whether it were yet time for the Triarii to arise. Afterwards thinking it better that they should be reserved in heart and fresh, unto the last push of extremity, he biddeth the Accensi from the hindmost tail of the rereward to come forth before the standards. Who so soon as they were come in place, forthwith the Latines, supposing the enemies had done the like, raised their Triarii. Who having for a good while fought fiercely and wearied themselves, and either broken their javelins or dulled their points, and yet by meer force repulsed their enemies; thinking now all had been done, and the victory atchieved, as being come as far as to the utmost skirts of the battallons; " Then, H

and

" quoth the Consul to the Triarii, rise now fresh and lusty as ye are, against the wearied, mindful
" of your country, parents, wives and children, mindful of the Consul, who for your victory hath " taken his death. The Triarii all hearty & unfoiled, were not so soon risen up, shewing themselves in their bright and glittering armour, but there began on a sudden & unlooked for, a new skirmish and conflict. For they receiving the Antepilani between their files, set up a shout and outcry troubled & disordered the Principia of the Latines, gored their faces with their javelins, slew the principal flower and strength of their best & formost men, and passed untouched in a manner through the other bands, as if they had been disarmed: yea, and brake through their pointed and close battallons, with so great a murder, that scarcely they left behind them a fourth part of their enemies I alive. The Samnits also under the foot of the hill, being seen a far off in battel array, smote a terror among the Latines. But among all either Citizens or Allies, the especial commendation of that service rested in the Consuls: of whom, the one turned all the threats and dangers from the gods both above and beneath, upon himself alone; the other in that battel shewed such valour and policy, that it is confessed both of Romans and Latines, who have written of that journey and commended it to posterity, that of whether army T. Manlius had the conduct, that way doubtless would the victory go. The Latines after their defeat and flight retired to Minturnæ: their camp presently upon the battel was won, and many a man there surprised alive and cut in pieces, but the Campains especially. That day could not the corps of Decius be seen, for that the night came upon them as they fought for it: the morrow after it was found amongst a mighty company of K slain enemies, overwhelmed with swords, darts and javelins: and with all honour and solemnity according to his death performed by his brother Consul were his funerals.

This also amongst the rest, seemeth worth the remembrance and to be inserted in this place, namely, That it was lawful for Consul, Dictator, and Prætor, whensoever they sacrificed and betook to the Devil the Legions of their enemies, for to vow and offer withall, not themselves in any case, but any Citizen whom they would: provided alwaies that he were one of the enrolled legion of the Romans. [And if the man who is thus addicted and destined to death, hap to die, all is well, and as it ought to be: But if he die not, then was the image of him seven foot high or above buried in the ground, and a purging or propitiatory sacrifice was slain in his stead: but whersoever it chanced that Image to be so interred, thither was it not lawfull for any Roman Magistrate to set foot and come. But if L a man would needs offer and vow himself to death, as Decius did, and die not, he shall not purely perform any sacred duty, or do sacrifice, either for himself or the City, that hath once thus betaken himself. If he will bequeath and offer his armour to Vulcan, or to some saint whomsoever he list, be it permitted and lawful for him so to do, either by way of sacrifice or other offering as he pleaseth. As for the weapon or spear over which the Consul standing on both his feet, made his prayers and invocations, it is not lawful the enemy to seize thereon: but if he fortune to win the same, a propitiatory sacrifice must be offered to appease Mars, to wit, a swine, a sheep, and a Bull.] And albeit the records both of all divine and humane customes and traditions, make no mention hereof, and are now grown out of use and remembrance, by reason that we prefer new and forrein ceremonies, before the old ancient rites of our own country and ancestors, yet I thought not amiss to make report hereof, even in those very M words and terms as they were used, delivered, and pronounced.

In some writers I find, that the Samnits having waited to see the event of this battel, came to aid the Romans when all was done and past. Also, that there was succour a coming from Lavinium unto the Latines, but not before they had the overthrow; by reason that they spent a great time in deliberation. And when as now the formost ensigns and some part of the army was gone forth of the gates, and news came of the defeat and slaughter of the Latines; as they turned their banners and returned into the City, it is said, That their Prætor or Provost, named Millonius, spake these words, " That so small a way as they had gone, must cost them dear, and full sweetly
" would the Romans be paid therefore. Such as were remaining of the Latines after the battel, and were scattered asunder in many and divers waies, when they were rallied together, shrowded N themselves for safety in the City Vescia. Where in their Councils and assemblies, Numisius their Generall, averred, and assured them, that Mars indeed was common, and the hazard indifferent to both parties, as having made an equal massacre in the one army and the other; and that the bare name only of victory went with the Romans: for otherwise, they carried away with them the fortune of men vanquished, and sped no better than they. For (saith he) The two royal pavilions of their Cos. are polluted and defiled; the one with the parricide of his own son, the other for the death of the Cos. who had vowed himself to die: all their forces in manner slain: their Javelineers and principals kil'ed: a bloudy slaughter committed both before and behind the Standards: and only the Triarii at the last upshot renewed the fight and set all upright. And albeit (quoth he) the power of the Latines also be shrewdly abated, yet for a fresh supply, either Lati-um or Volsci are nearer than Rome. And therefore if they so thought good, he would with all speed raise the lusty flower and chosen manhood both out of the Latines and the Volscians, and return again with a fresh army to Capua: and with his sudden coming unlooked for, surprise and defeat the Romans, expecting as then for nothing less, than a second battel. So by dispatching his cautelous and deceitful letters into all parts of Latium and the Volscian nation (by reason that they who had not been present at the battel were sooner induced to give rash credit) there was a tumultuary army in great hast levied, enrolled, and assembled together out of all quarters.

A This hoſt as it marched, Torquatus the Conſul met at Tifanum, a place between Sinueſſa and Minturnæ. And before they could chuſe out a plot of ground to encamp in, they beſtowed their carriages and baggage on heaps of either ſide: fell to a battel preſently, and made a final end and concluſion of all the war. For the enemies were brought ſo low that as the Conſul led his victorious Army to waſte their Country, all the Latines yielded themſelves to him: and this their rendring the Campains likewiſe followed. Thus Latium and Capua forfeited and loſt part of their Territories. The lands of the Latines with the Privernats laid thereto, and the Territory of Falerii, which belonged to the people of Capua, even as far as the river Vulturinus, was divided amongſt the Commons of Rome. Two acres in the Latine Country, with a ſupplement of three four parts out of B the Privernats land to make up the whole: and three acres in the Territory of Falerii, with addition of a fourth part to boot for amends, becauſe it was ſo far off, were aſſigned for a man. The Laurentins only, of all Latium, and the horſemen of the Campains eſcaped this puniſhment and were exempted from the reſt, becauſe they had not revolted. And a decree paſſed, that the League with the Laurents ſhould be renewed: and from that time uſually every year, is it renewed, after the tenth day of the Latine holidaies. Thoſe Campain horſmen were made free denizens of Rome: and for a monument and memorial thereof, they ſet up and faſtned a brazen table at Rome in the Temple of Caſtor. The people of Capua were enjoyned to pay yearly to every one of them, (and they were a thouſand and ſix hundred in all) 45. * Deniers.

* 45. Denarii amount to 28 ſh. 1 d. ob. ſter.

Thus after the war fully determined, and both rewards dealt, and puniſhment inflicted accor-
C ding to each mans deſert, T. Manlius returned home: whom the elders only [for certain] went forth to meet on the way: the youth, not only then, but ever after, during his life abhorred, and with curſes deteſted him. The Antiats made certain rodes into the Territories of Hoſtia, Ardea, and Solonæ. And for that Manlius the Conſul was not able himſelf in perſon to intend and manage that war, by reaſon of ſickneſs, he nominated for Dictator L. Papirius Craſſus, who as it happned was at that time Prætor: by whom was named for General of the horſemen L. Papirius Curſor. This Dictator, albeit he kept the field, and lay encamped certain months within the Confines, yet atchieved no worthy and memorable exploit. After this year thus renowned for the victory of ſo many and ſo puiſſant nations, and withall, for the noble and famous death of the one Conſul, and for the government of the other, albeit ſtern and rigorous, yet notable and renowned;
D there ſucceeded Conſuls, T. Æmylius Mamercus, and Q. Publilius Philo, who met not with the like ſubject and matter of great affairs: and they themſelves were more mindful either of their own private buſineſs, and ſtudious to maintain a ſide and faction in the Common-weal, than to advance the State of their Country. Howbeit, the Latines (who rebelled for anger that they loſt their lands) they diſcomfited in the plain of Fenecta, drave them both out of their Camp, and forced them to leave the field. Where, whiles Publilius (by whoſe governance and conduct that victory was atchieved) received ſurrender of the Latines, the flower of whoſe youth was there all ſlain and killed up Æmylius led his Army againſt Pedum. As for the Pedans they had maintenance from Tybur, Preneſte, and Velitern, who took their parts: there came alſo aid from Lanuvium and Antium. Where the Roman Conſul, albeit he had the better hand in skirmiſh, yet for E that there remained behind a new piece of ſervice about the City it ſelf Pedum, and the Camp of their Confederats which was adjoyned cloſe to the Town: all of a ſudden he gave over the war unfiniſhed, becauſe he heard that triumph was decreed unto his brother Conſul. He alſo himſelf returned to Rome, and called earneſtly for triumph before victory. At which untimely and covetous deſire of his, the Nobles being offended, denied flatly; that unleſs he either forced Pedum by aſſault, or won it by compoſition he ſhould not triumph. Hereupon Æmylius being diſcontented and alienated from the Senat, bare his Conſulſhip afterward like to the ſeditious Tribunes. For ſo long as he was Conſul he ceaſed not to charge and accuſe the Nobles before the people; and his Collegue no whit gainſaid him as being himſelf one of the Commoners. He took occaſion of theſe accuſations upon this, that the lands in the Latine and Falern Countries, were divided in F pinching and ſcant meaſure among the Commons. And after that the Senat deſirous to abridge the time of the Conſuls government, had decreed that a Dictator ſhould be declared againſt the Latine rebels; Æmylius (whoſe turn it was at that time to govern) nominated his own companion in office to be Dictator, by whom Junius Brutus was named General of the horſe. This Dictatorſhip was popular and altogether framed to the humour of the common people: both by reaſon of ſlandrous and accuſatory Invectives made againſt the Nobles; and for that it enacted three Statutes, moſt favourable and pleaſing to the Commons, and as croſs and adverſe to the Nobility: firſt, That the Acts deviſed and enacted by the Commons, ſhould bind all the Quirites or Citizens of Rome: ſecondly, That all laws which were propoſed and to paſs by the ſuffrages of the Centuries, before the Scrutiny began, and their voices gathered, the Nobles ſhould allow G and approve: thirdly, That foraſmuch as they were come thus far already, that both the Cenſors might be of the Commons, now one Cenſor at the leaſt ſhould be a Commoner of neceſſity. Inſomuch as the Nobles thought verily that there was more loſt at home this year by theſe Conſuls and Dictator, than gained to the Empire abroad, by their victories and warlike exploits.

In the year following when C. Furius Camillus and Q. Menius were Conſuls, to the end that Æmylius the Conſul of the former year, might be more notably reproached for the quitting and letting ſlip of a victory that ſhould have been atchieved in his year, the Senat began to mutter

in their ſpeeches, that Pedum by force of arms, by valour of men, & all poſſible means whatſoever, H ſhould be deſtroyed and raſed to the ground. Whereupon the new Conſuls being forced to lay aſide all other affairs, and to go in hand with that ſervice, firſt took their journey thither. Now was Latium grown to thoſe terms, as they could neither abide war nor endure peace. To maintain the wars they wanted means: and peace they could not away with nor abide to hear of, never ſince the loſs of their lands. So they thought beſt to hold a middle courſe; to ſtand upon their guard, and to keep themſelves within their towns: that the Romans being not provoked, ſhould make no quarrel of war: and if there were tidings brought of any town beleaguered, there might be aid ſent from all parts to the beſieged. And yet for all this, were the Pedans ſuccoured but of very few. The Tiburtins and Præneſtins, whoſe country lay neareſt came to Pedum. But for the Ari- I cins, Lanuvins, and Veliternes, who joined their forces with the Antiats and Volſcians, were ſuddenly aſſailed and ſet upon near the river Aſtura by Menius, and vanquiſhed. Camillus fought before Pedum with the Tiburtins, who came into the field with a right puiſſant army, and put him to much trouble and hazard: howbeit, he had as good ſucceſs in the end as Menius. The greateſt tumult and trouble was cauſed eſpecially by occaſion of a ſudden ſally of the townſmen in the very time of the conflict. Againſt whom, after that Camillus had oppoſed part of his forces to make head, he not only drave them within the wals, but the ſame day alſo, when he had diſcomfited both them and their ſuccours, he ſcaled the town and was Maſter thereof. Then it was thought good, with greater preparation of power and couragious reſolution, after the winning of that one City to go about with the victorious army from one to another, and ſo to ſubdue and tame for e- K ver the whole nation and name of Latium. Neither reſted they, untill partly by main force, and partly by taking one City after another by way of ſurrender, they had brought all Latium under their ſubjection. After this, having diſpoſed and placed garriſons in every town which they had got, they departed to Rome for triumph: which was to them by a general conſent of all men granted. Beſides their triumph, this honour was to them done, that two ſtatues of horſemen (a rare thing in thoſe daies) ſhould be erected for them in the Grand place called Forum.

But before that they gathered the ſuffrages of the people, in the aſſembly for Election of Coſſ. againſt the year following, Camillus in this wiſe made a ſpeech to the Senat, touching the Latine nations. "My LL. and Senators of Rome, That which by war and force of arms was to be done in "Latium, is now by God his goodneſs and the valour of our ſouldiers brought to good paſs. The L
"Armies of our enemies ſlain before Pedum and Aſtrua: The Latine towns all, and Antium a Ci"ty of the Volſcians either by force won, or rendred by compoſition, are now held and kept to "your behoof by your own garriſons. It remaineth now to conſult (foraſmuch as they trouble us "oft by rebellion) and to deviſe ſome means how to keep them quiet in continual peace. In this
"conſultation, the immortal gods have given you thus much power to reſolve upon, that it lieth
"wholly in your hands, to chuſe whether Latium ſhall continue ſtill a nation or no: and therfore
"may ye for ever procure your ſelves repoſe and ſecurity from thence either by rigour & puniſh-
"ment, or by clemency and pardon, chuſe you whether. Are ye minded to proceed by way of cru"elty againſt thoſe that have yielded themſelves, and are vanquiſhed? Ye may, indeed, deſtroy all
"Latium, and make all waſt and a deſart wilderneſs, from whence oftentimes in ſundry and dan- M
"gerous wars of yours, ye have had the help of an army of Allies, & found them faſt and valorous.
"But wil ye (as your anceſtors have done before you) enlarge the Roman Empire by receiving un"to your City thoſe whom ye have conquered? Then have ye matter & means to grow up ſtil and "wax mighty, to your great honour and glory. Surely, that government & dominion is of all other
"moſt ſtrong and ſure, wherein the ſubjects take joy in their obedience. But whatſoever you mean "to determine in this behalf, ye had need to make ſpeed and reſolve betimes. So many nations ye
"hold in ſuſpence of mind between fear and hope: and therefore behoofeful it is, that you both
"rid and deliver your ſelves (as ſoon as you can) of the care they put you to; and alſo whiles their "heads are buſied and minds unreſolved (ſtanding as they do amazed in doubtful expectation)
"either by puniſhment or by benefit, to foreſtal and prevent them before they take heart again. N
"For our part, it was hitherto our endeavour to effect and bring about, that ye might be able to "diſpoſe of all at your pleaſure, and as you would your ſelves: now your duty it is to determine "what is beſt for your ſelves and the Common-weal. The Lords and chief of the Senat praiſed this motion of the Coſſ. and deemed good in general. But foraſmuch as the condition of the parties was divers, and their cauſe not all one, they ſaid that they might reſolve and determine beſt, according to the deſert of each ſtate, if they were ſpecified by name, and the opinions asked in particular. So they fell to conſultation of them ſeverally as they were propounded: and ſet down this order and decree. Imprimis, that the Lanuvins be enfranchiſed Citizens of Rome, and enjoy again their own religion and ſacred ceremonies, with this proviſo, that the chappel and grove of Juno Soſpita ſhould be common to the Burgeſſes of Lanuvium and the people of Rome. Item, that the O Aricins, Nomentans, and Pedans, ſhall be made denizens of Rome, and endued with the liberties and priviledges of the Lanuvins. Item, that the Tuſculans retain ſtill that freedom of their City ſafe, which as then they enjoyed: and the crime and attainder of rebellion, to be charged upon a few of the chief to ſave the common ſtate from danger. Item, that there ſhould be grievous puniſhment inflicted upon the Veliterns, who being ancient Roman Citizens, had notwithſtanding ſo often taken arms and rebelled: that their wals ſhould be diſmantled and raſed: their Senators from thence tranſlated, and confined beyond Tyberis, there to dwell, upon pain, that whoſo-

The Oration of Camillus to the Senat of Rome.

A whosoever were found on this side the water, it might be lawfull for any man to take him as his prisoner, and to ransom him at a * 1000 Asses. Provided alwaies that he should not enlarge him, nor release him of his Irons, untill the money were fully satisfied and paid. Into the possessions and lands of those Senators, were tenants and Coloners sent to inhabit: who being once enrolled, Velitre seemed again as populous as beforetime. At Antium was there a new Colony planted, with this proviso, that the ancient inhabitants of the Antiats should be permitted (if they themselves would) to be enrolled there, and remain still. From thence were their long Gallies and war-ships had away, and the people of Antium wholly forbidden the sea: but the freedom of Roman Citizens to them was granted. The Tyburts and Prenestins forfeited their lands, not for their late tres-

B pass of rebellion, common with other Latines, but because they repining and envying the good estate of the Romans had in times past joyned arms with the Frenchmen, a savage and unsociable nation. From the other Latines Cities and States, they took away the priviledge of marriage, the commerce of traffick, and entercourse of mutual intelligences, and holding counsels themselves, for ever after. To the Campain Gentlemen that served with horse aforesaid, for that they would not give consent to revolt with the Latines: to the Fundans also and Formans, through whose country they had alwaies had free, safe, and quiet passage to and fro, this honour was done, as to be made Citizens of Rome; but without the liberty of giving voices. Item, it was decreed, that the Cumans and Suessulans, should be of the same condition and state that Capua was. The Ships of the Antiates were part of them transported to the Arsenal at Rome, and the rest set on fire and

C burned. With the stems, beakheads, and brazen pikes whereof it was thought good, that the pulpit of common pleas and Orations in the grand place of Rome, should be beautified and adorned: which publike Pulpit was thereupon called Rostra.

Whiles C. Sulpitius Longus, and P. Ælius Petus were Consuls, when as the Romans held peaceably under their dominion, all the countries, as well through the favour which they won by bountiful dealing, as by might and strong hand, there arose war between the Sidicins and Aurunci ans. The Aurunci, who had yielded afore to T. Manlius Consul, and were taken into protection afterwards rebelled not: whereby they had a more just cause to request and seek for aid at the Romans hand. But before that the Consuls had led forth their power out of the City (for the Senate had commanded, that the Aurunci should be defended) tidings came, that the Aurunci for

D fear had quit their town: and being fled with their wives and children, had fortified Sinuessa, which now at this day is called Aurunca: and that the ancient wals, with the town it self, were by the Sidicins destroyed. Hereat the Senate offended with the Consuls, by whose delay and lingring their allies had been betraied in time of their necessity, ordained a Dictator to be chosen. So there was elected C. Cloudius Regillensis, who appointed for General of horsemen C. Claudius Hortator. But hereupon rose a scruple of conscience about the creation of the Dictator. And when the Augurs had pronounced, that they thought him not rightly created, both Dictator and General of horsemen gave over their rooms. The same year Minutia, a Vestal Nun, was first suspected of incontinency, for going in her apparel more trim than was decent for one of her calling and profession: and after that, brought in question and accused by a bond-servant, that informed against her to the High Priests. First, by a decree of theirs she was awarded to abstain from

E divine service, to keep her house, and not to manumise and set free any of her bond-slaves, but to have them forth-coming, whensoever they were called for: and after farther examination and judgement passed, was buried quick under the ground, at the gate Collina, in the paved causey on the right hand, within the plain or field called Sceleratus, i.e. Execrable or polluted. I suppose, that place took the name of such * incest of filthy whoredom. The same year, Q. Publius Philo was elected Prætor, the first that ever was of the Commons, notwithstanding the mind of Sulpitius the Consul, who said, That he would not take his name to propound it for Election nor admit him among other compititors. But the Senat strived the less in impeaching this Prætorship, seeing they could not have their will in the highest rooms and dignities.

* Simple fornication or incontinency in a professed Votary was called Incest.

F The year next ensuing, under the Consulship of L. Papirius Crassus and Caso Duellius, was notable and famous for the war of the Ausonians, in regard rather of the novelty, than the greatness and danger thereof. They were a people that inhabited a town called Cales, and had joyned their power with the Sidicins their next neighbours. The whole power of which two nations being discomfited in one battel, and the same not so memorable, was for the nearness of their Cities more ready to flie, and in their flight more safe and secured. Yet the Nobles of Rome omitted not the care of that war: for that the Sidicins so often, either had themselves moved war, or aided those that began, or else were the cause of all troubles. Whereupon they endeavoured all that they could to make Consul the fourth time, the noblest warriour in those daies, M. Valerius Corvinus, who had for his brother in government M. Attilius Regulus. And lest haply some errour by chance

G should be committed, suit was made to the Consuls, that extraordinarily, and without casting lot, that province might fall to Corvinus: who having received the Army (after the victory at Cales) of the former Consuls, went forth. And when at the first shout and onset he had discomfited his enemies, who in remembrance of their former late overthrow were affrighted, he assailed to assault their very wals: and so eager and hotly bent (I assure you) were the souldiers, that even at the first they would have set ladders to, as making full account to scale up to the top, and enter the town. But Corvinus, because that was an hard adventure, was desirous to accomplish that enterprise by the long toil of his souldiers, rather than their present perill: he raised therefore

therefore a countermure and platforms, and rolling frames, mounted against the wals: but as good H hap was, by an opportunity that fell out, they had no uſe of theſe munitions and fabricks. For M. Fabius a Roman priſoner, taking vantage of the negligence of his keepers upon a feſtival holiday, and making means to break his bonds, let himſelf down by a long cord, faſtned at one end to a pinacle or battlement of the wall, and ſlid by the arms, among the munitions and fabricks of the Romans: who ſo perſwaded and prevailed with the General, that he cauſed him to give an aſſault upon the enemies, now being faſt aſleep, as having filled their bellies with wine and good meats. So that with as little ado were the Auſonians and their City ſurpriſed, as they were afore vanquiſhed in fight. A great booty of pillage was there got: and after a garriſon placed at Cales, the Legions were brought back to Rome. The Conſul by decree of the Senate triumphed: and that Atilius ſhould not be without his glory too, both Coſſ. were appointed to lead forth an Army againſt the Sidicins: but before they went, they appointed by a decree of the Senat, L. Æmylius Mamercus to be Dictator, to hold the election of Conſuls. Who named Q. Publius Philo for his General of horſemen. I

In this Election, holden by this Dictator, there were created Conſuls, T. Veturius, and Sp. Poſthumius. Who albeit there remained ſome part behind of the Sidicins war, yet to the intent they might gratifie the Commons by ſome good turn, and prevent their longing before they ſpake themſelves; propoſed an Act concerning the bringing of a Colony to Cales: and when as the Senate had ordained that two thouſand and five hundred men ſhould be enrolled and aſſigned thither; they created Triumvirs for to bring them thither, and to divide the lands, namely, Caſo Duellius, T. Quintius, and M. Fabius. After this, the new Conſuls having received the army of the old, entred into the enemies confines, waſting all before, untill they came to the very walls of their City. Now, for that the Sidicins had aſſembled a puiſſant army, and ſeemed themſelves fully reſolute and bent upon utter deſpair to put all unto the laſt adventure, and to fight it out to the laſt man. Moreover, becauſe it was noiſed, that all Samnium was riſen up in arms: by authority from the Senate, the Conſuls appointed P. Cornelius Ruffinus Dictator, and M. Antonius was nominated General of the horſe. But hereupon grew again another ſcruple, that there was ſome errour eſcaped in the creation: ſo they reſigned up their places, and becauſe there enſued alſo a plague hereupon (as if all their Auſpices for Elections of Magiſtrates had been touched and infected with that errour and default) the managing of all affairs fell to an Interreign. Which being now entred K upon by the fifth Interregent, M. Valerius Corvinus, then Conſuls were created, L. Cornelius the ſecond time, and Cn. Domitius. L

When all things elſe were at quiet, the rumour of the Gauls war was ſo riſe and hot, that it was taken for a very * Tumult. Whereupon it was thought good, that a Dictator ſhould be created. And M. Papirius Craſſus was nominated, who had P. Valerius Publicola for General of the horſemen. When they had muſtred the ſouldiers more ſtreightly and with greater regard than would have been for wars near hand, the eſpials who were ſent out, brought word that all was well and quiet among the Gauls. But ſuſpected it was that Samnium now the ſecond year was ready to drop out of their allegeance and ſeek a change. Whereupon the Roman army was not withdrawn out of the Sidicin country. Howbeit the war of Alexander King of Epirus, drew the Samnits into M the Lucans country, which two nations uniting their forces, gave the King a battel, as he made rodes from Peſtus. In which conflict, Alexander having got the upper hand, entred into a League and amity with the Romans: although it was much doubted, with what faithfulneſs he would obſerve the ſame, if all his affairs proſpered as well. The ſame year was a ſolemn Levy or Numbring of the people of Rome held, and the new Citizens were matriculated and enrolled. And therefore two Tribes were annexed, Melia and Captia: the Leviers that ordained them, were Publ. Philo, and Sp. Poſthumius. The Acerrans became Roman Citizens, by an act propoſed by L. Papirius the Prætor: by vertue whereof they were enfranchiſed Denizens, but without the priviledge of giving voices. Theſe were the acts for this year both at home and abroad.

* The rumour of the Gauls war, was ever taken for a Tumult (quaſi timor multus) and ſuppoſed more dangerous than another ordinary war.

The year next following (were it through the unkind diſtemperature of the air, or by ſome N wicked practice of man) was infamous, when M. Claudius Marcellus and T. Valerius were Conſuls. I find the ſurname of this Conſul to vary in divers Chronicles, in ſome Flaccus, in others Potitus. But it matters not much whether be true. This rather I could willingly have wiſhed (and yet all Authors do not record it) that it had been falſely recorded, That thoſe perſons by ſorcery and poiſon were made away, whoſe death hath defamed that year with the note of a peſtilence. But yet as the thing is left in writing, I purpoſe to deliver it, leſt that I ſhould ſeem to derogate ought from the credence of any writer. When as the chief perſonages of the City died upon like diſeaſes, and after one and the ſame manner of ſymptomes, a certain chamber-maid preſented her ſelf to Q. Fabius Maximus (being for the time an Ædile of State) and profeſſed to bewray the cauſe of that publike and contagious malady, if ſhe might be aſſured by faithfull promiſe from him, that by the O utterance thereof, ſhe ſhould not come to harm nor trouble. Forthwith Fabius delivered this matter to the Conſuls: and the Conſuls made relation thereof to the Senate: by the conſent of which State aſſurance was made accordingly unto the party aforeſaid, to reveal the matter. Then ſhe declared, that by the lewd and miſchievous wickedneſs of women the City was thus afflicted: and namely, That certain Dames of Rome, even their own wives, boiled and tempered rank poiſons, (to kill their husbands) and if they would follow it preſently they might be taken in the manner. So they went ſtraight waies with the wench, and found ſome women as they were

ſeething

A seething and preparing venomous drugs, yea and some poysoned confections already put up. Which were brought into the market place, and about 20. of those dames, with whom the poysons were found, were sent forby a Sergeant. Two of them Cornelias and Sergia, both noble women born, stoutly standing upon these tearms, and stiffy avouching, That they were soveraign medicines and wholsom for the body of man, were by the chamber-maid aforesaid confuted, and enjoined to drink thereof, that they might disprove her, and make her a liar, and to have devised of her own fingers ends this false slander. Who took a time to commune and confer together, that the people were avoided aside to make them way. Now when as in sight of all the World, these two Dames had propounded the matter to the rest there in place, they also refused not: and B so having drunk the poysoned potion, they all perished by their own mischievous practise. Then presently were their complices apprehended, who detected and discovered a great number of other Wives: of which 170. were condemned. Never afore that day was there any inquisition nor proces at Rome, about poysoning and sorcery. So as the thing was taken for a prodigious wonder, and imputed rather to their minds, besotted and bewitched, then to any feilonious intent of theirs. Whereupon the Magistrates of the City, calling to mind and searching the old Chronicles, found, that in times past, at what time as the Commons in a mad fit withdrew themselves and departed the City, there was a spike or great nail driven and fixed by the Dictator: and that the minds of the people, which by discord had been distracted and out of their right wits, were by that ceremonial satisfaction, brought again in good tune: and therefore it was thought good,
C that for the fastning or sticking up of such a nail, there should a Dictator be created. So Cn. Quintilius was nominated, who named L. Valerius General of horsemen, who so soon as the nail was fastned, gave over their places.

Consuls then were created, L. Papirius Crassus the second time, and L. Plautius Venox. In the beginning of which year, there came from the country of the Volscians as Embassadors to Rome, the Fabraterns and Lucans, making request that they would take them into their protection, promising that if by them they were defended from the forces of the Samnits, they would become loyal and obedient subjects to the people of Rome: Then were Embassadors sent from the Senat, to give commandment to the Samnits, to forbear doing any violence upon the borders of those nations. Which embassage sped well and took place; not so much for that the Samnits desired
D peace, as because they were not as yet ready prepared for war. The same year began the Privernats war. The confederates whereof, were the Fundans, and their Leader likewise a Fundan, one Vitruvius Vaccus, a man of great name and reputation, not only in his own country, but also at Rome. His dwelling house stood sometime in mount Palatine, even the very same, which after the building was pulled down, and the ground forfeit and confiscate, was called Vacci Prata. Against whom as he wasted and spoiled far and neer the Setin, Norban and Coran countries, L. Papirius went forth with a power, and rested not far from his very camp. But Vitruvius neither had the wit to keep himself within his trench against a mightier enemy, nor yet the heart to encounter far from his fort. But having put his souldiers in battel array, before they were all well out of the gate of the camp, whiles the souldiers had more mind to flie backward, then march forward E and encounter the enemy: without either advise or confident courage he fought: and with as little ado, and without any question of the matter he was vanquished: so by reason of the shortness of the way, and the easie retire into the camp so neer, he found no great trouble to save his souldiers from much slaughter. For in the very conflict, few or none in a manner were slain, and not many in the press of the rout and tail of the flight, at what time as they rushed into their camp. And in the beginning of the night, the army thus discomfited, made haste to Privernum, there to defend themselves within a wall rather then a trench. Plautius the other Coss. having from Privernum, overrun and forraged the territory, and driven booties away, conducted his army into the Fundan country. The Senat of the Fundans as he entred into their confines met him, saying: "They were not come as Orators to entreat either for Vitruvius, or for those F "that took his part; but for the people of the Fundans: who that they were innocent and not "culpable for this war, Vitruvius himself hath plainly proved and declared, in that he chose Pri- "vernum to be his place of retreat and refuge, and not the City Fundi, the very place of his nativi- "ty. And therefore at Privernum the enemies of the people of Rome were to be sought for and "pursued, who unmindful of both their own countries, had revolted as well from the Fundans "as the Romans. As for the Citizens of Fundi, they were at peace with Rome, nay, they were "Romans in heart, and carried thankful remembrance of a benefit received: they entreated there- "fore and besought the Consul to forbear hostility with a guiltless people: assuring him that their "Lands, their City, their own Bodies, their Wives and Children were and should be at the devo- "tion of the people of Rome. The Consul after that he had commended the Fundans, and sent G letters to Rome that they remained firm and fast in their allegiance, turned his way to Privernum. But before he diflodged (as Claudius writeth) the Consul executed those that were the heads of the conspiracy, and three hundred and fifty of those rebellious conspirators were sent prisoners to Rome. But the Senat accepted it not, and were not content with that submission, as judging the Fundan people, desirous to be excused and discharged with the punishment of the needy and base sort of people. Now when as Privernum was besieged and invested with two Consular Armies, the one of the Consuls was called home, to hold the Election of Magistrates. That year were erected in the great race called Circus, the Barriers from whence the horses and their charriots are let forth, when their prizes. But before they were well paſt the care of the Privernats war, there H arrived a terrible and fearful brute of the Gauls war, which never was regarded ſleightly of the Nobles of Rome. Incontinently therefore the new Conſuls, L. Æmylius Mamercus, and Cn. Plau-

* First of July. tius, on that very day, namely, on the * Calends of July, wherein they entred their offices, were commanded to determin and agree between themſelves upon their Provinces: and Mamercus, who had the charge of the Gauls war, levied and enrolled an army without allowing any immunity and exemption from warfare. Moreover and beſides, even the poor handicrafts men and artiſans, ſuch as keep their ſhops, and live by ſedentary occupations, a ſort far unmeet for martial ſervice, are ſaid to have been called forth, and preſt to the wars: and a mighty army was aſſem-bled and met together at Veii, that from thence they might march to encounter the Gauls: For it I was thought good that they ſhould now go farther forward, for fear leſt the enemy taking another way, might deceive them and march directly to the City of Rome. But a few days after, when it was known for certain that all the trouble and fear for that time was overblown, they diverted their forces from the Gauls, and bent all againſt Privernum. But the iſſue hereof is reported two manner of ways, ſome write that the City was forced by aſſault, and that Vitruvius came alive into their hands: others, that before the utmoſt extremity of aſſault was uſed, they of their own accords, carrying before them white wands in token of peace, yeelded themſelves unto the Conſul: and that Vitruvius by his own Country men was rendered and delivered unto him. The Senat being moved, and their opinion asked concerning Vitruvius and the Privernats; ſent for the Conſul Plautius to triumph, after that he had diſmantled the walls of Privernum, and K there placed a ſtrong garriſon: and they gave order in the mean time that Vitruvius ſhould be kept faſt in priſon until the Conſuls return, then to be whipped and put to death. They appointed alſo that his habitation in Palatium ſhould be pulled down, and his goods conſecrated to their Idol Semon Sangus. And look what money [of braſs] was raiſed thereof, it ſerved to make braſen round Plates, which were offered and ſet up in the Chappel of Sangus towards the temple of Qui- rinus. Touching the Senat of the Privernats, thus it was decreed, that every one of the Senators calling, who remained at Privernum after their revolting from the Romans, ſhould in the ſame condition and ſtate as the Veliterns, be confined beyond Tybris, and there dwell. Theſe Acts being thus ſet down, there was no more talk of the Privernats until the triumph of Plautius. After the triumph, the Conſul having executed Vitruvius and his complices, ſuppoſing now that hee L might ſafely propound the cauſe of the Privernats, to the LL. of the Senat, whiles they were newly ſatisfied with the execution of the guilty offenders. "Since that (quoth he) my LL. of the "Senat, the principal authors of this revolt and rebellion, have both at the hands of the immor"tal gods, and at yours, ſuffered now already condigne puniſhment; what is your further plea-
"ſure, and what ſhall be done with the innocent and harmleſs multitude? For my part verily,
"although I be rather to demand your opinions then deliver mine own: yet ſeeing the Priver-
"nats neer neighbors unto the Samnits, with whom we now at this time entertain a moſt uncer"tain and ſlippery peace, I would have as little grudge and rancor left as may be, between us and "them. As the queſtion in it ſelf was doubtful and ambiguous, whiles men gave advice ſome to proceed cruelly, others to deal gently, according to each man his nature and inclination: ſo there M was one of the Privernat Embaſſadors that made it more doubtful, and put all out of ſquare; a man mindful of that ſtate wherein he was born, more than of his preſent need and extremity. Who being demanded of one (that had ſpoken to the point, and delivered ſome ſharp cenſure and heavy ſentence againſt them) What puniſhment he judged the Privernats deſerved?
Marry (quoth he) that which they deſerve, who deem themſelves worthy of liberty and freedom.
At whoſe ſtout and arrogant anſwer, when the Conſul ſaw thoſe to be more eagerly and bitterly bent, who before impugned the cauſe of the Privernats: to the end that he himſelf by ſome mild and gentle demand might draw from the party more modeſt language: What (quoth he) if we ſhould remit and pardon your puniſhment; what kind of peace might we hope to have at your hands? If (quoth he) ye offer us good peace, ye ſhall find it on our part loyal and perpetual: but N if ye tender hard conditions of peace, ye ſhall have it laſt but a ſmall while. But then one gave out, that the Privernat began to threaten plainly: and ſaid moreover, that ſuch ſpeeches were enough to ſtir up any peaceable and quiet people to war, that never thought to have fought. But the better part of the Senat drew theſe his anſwers to a better ſenſe, and ſaid that it was the ſpeech of a man, and of a man free born. For, was it credible (quoth they) that any ſtate, nay, any particular perſon, would longer abide (than needs he muſt) that condition which he miſliketh and goeth againſt his ſtomach? There only is peace ſure and like to hold, where men are contented and willing to keep themſelves in peace: and never let men look or hope to find faithful loyalty, where they will impoſe thraldom and ſervitude. And to this purpoſe the Conſul himſelf eſpecially moved and enclined their hearts, reiterating theſe words to the Senators that were firſt to give O their opinions, and that ſo loud, as he might of many more be over-heard, That they above all other, and none but they indeed were worthy to be made Roman Citizens, who minded and e-ſteemed nothing in the world, but their freedom. Whereupon, both in the Senat they obtained their ſuit: and alſo by the authority of the LL. a Bill was exhibited to the people, That the Privernats might be enfranchiſed Romans.

The ſame year were three hundred ſent as a Colony, to inhabit Anxur: and had two Acres of ground a peece allowed them. The year following was memorable in no reſpect, either of home

A home affairs or forraign, in the time of P. Plautius Proculus, and P. Cornelius Scapula Coſſ. Only this fell out that year; that in Fregellæ (which ſometime was in the territory of the Sidicins, and after, of the Volſcians) there was a Colony planted: and unto the people there was given a doſe or diſtribution of raw fleſh amongſt them, by Marcus Flavius, at the funeral of his mother. Some there were that thought, how under a colour of honoring his mother, he defrayed and paid unto the people a deſerved hire & reward, in that when he was by the Ædiles arreſted & brought to his anſwer for adultery committed with a Dame or married Wife in the City, the people had by their voices acquit him. This dole given for a favour paſt at his trial, was the occaſion alſo of a dignity following: for in the next Election, notwithſtanding he were abſent, he was preferred to the Tri-B bunſhip of the Commons, even before thoſe Competitors that were preſent in place.

There ſtood ſometime the City Palæpolis, not far from thence where as now Naples ſtandeth. In thoſe two Cities, one and the ſame people inhabited, deſcended and deriving their beginning from Cumes, and the Cumans fetch their off-ſpring from Chalcis in Eubœa. With that fleet wherein they ſailed from their own country, they were able to do much at ſea, and were mighty upon thoſe coaſts where they dwelt. And firſt landing in the Iſlands Æxaria and Pithecuſæ, afterwards they adventured to ſeat themſelves in the main and continent. This City relying and truſting in their own power, as well as preſuming upon the faithleſs and diſloyal ſociety of the Samnits with the Romans, or bearing themſelves bold upon the rumor that ran of a peſtilence that raigned in in the City of Rome, wrought much miſchief and hoſtility againſt ſuch Romans as inhabited the C Campain and Falern Countries. Whereupon, when as (in the time of Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, and Quintus Publius Philo Conſuls, the ſecond time) there were Fœcials ſent to Palæpolis, for to demand reſtitution again, and a proud anſwer returned back from the Greeks, a Nation more ſtout and valiant in tongue then in deed and execution; by the authority of the Senat the people decreed, that there ſhould be war made upon the Palæpolitans. And when as the Conſuls had divided their provinces between themſelves, it fell to Publius his turn to war upon thoſe Greeks. Cornelius with another army was oppoſed againſt the Samnits if they ſhould hap to ſtir any way. For the report went, that they looking and expecting aſſuredly the revolt of the Campains, would encamp neerer and join with them. There, Cornelius thought it beſt to keep a ſtanding camp. The Senat was certified from both Conſuls, That they had ſmall hope of peace with the Sam-
D nits. Publius gave intelligence, that two thouſand Nolan ſouldiers, and four thouſand Samnits, were rather by the compulſion and importunity of the Nolans, than with the good will of the Greeks, received at Palæpolis. At Rome it was for certain known, that in Samnium there were new muſters taken by the Magiſtrates direction, and that the whole country, and the people adjoining, were raiſed, and out in arms. Moreover, That the Privernats, Fundans, and Formians were without all diſſimulation ſollicited and moved to rebel. Upon which cauſes, it was adviſed by the Senat, firſt to ſend Embaſſadors to the Samnits, before they made war: and from them they had an inſolent anſwer, And they themſelves made quarrel, and charged the Romans with wrongs offered firſt: and nevertheleſs they juſtified themſelves for any thing by them done, and anſwered all objections that were laid againſt them full ſtoutly. "Namely, that the Greeks E "were not aided by any publick counſel or order of theirs, nor yet were the Fundans and Formi-
"ans by them ſollicited, as who need not be aſhamed of their own power, but thought them-
"ſelves ſufficient enough to war if they liſted. Thus much moreover, they could not diſſem-
"ble, but ſpeak it out in plain tearms, That the Nation and Senat of the Samnits take it in ill "part, that the people of Rome had re-edified and repaired Fregellæ, a town by them conquered,
"and won from the Volſcians, and by them laid ruinate: and not only ſo, but they had placed
"a Colony alſo in the Samnits Country, which the inhabitants called Fregellæ. Which contu-"mely and reproachful injury, unleſs they that were the authors thereof would do their beſt to "aboliſh and cancel, they would with all their might and main repel it from them. And when as the Roman Embaſſador made a motion, and would have had them to put the matter for to be F decided unto the common Confederates and friends of both parties; What double and indirect dealing is this (quoth the Samnits?) What jugling is here to no purpoſe? As for the quarrels and differences between us (O ye Romans) neither the babling words of Embaſſador, nor yet any days-man or arbitrator, but the very Campain field, wherein we muſt encounter in earneſt, even dint of ſword, and the ſpears point, and the doubtful chance of battel ſhall determin. And therefore encamp we between Capua and Sueſſula, in the ſight one of another, and let us then try the iſſue, whether Samnit or Roman ſhall be Lord of Italy. The Embaſſadors of Rome made anſwer, that they were not to go whither the enemy called them, but whither their General and Captains led them. In this mean while Publius had already got a convenient piece of ground G between Palæpolis and Naples, and thereby empeached the enemies of the mutual entercourſe of ſuccors from the one to the other, which they had uſed reciprocally, as either place had need, and was diſtreſſed. Therefore, when as the time of Election of Magiſtrates at Rome drew on apace, and expedient it was not for the Common-weal that Publius (now approaching neer the enemies walls, and ready to aſſault) ſhould be called away from the hope which dayly he had of winning the City; the Tribuns were dealt withal, to propoſe an Act unto the people, That when the time of Pub. Philo his Conſulſhip ſhould be expired, he might in quality and name of Proconſul, remain in government, until the war with the Greeks were fully ended. And unto L. Cornelius were letters ſent, implying thus much, That whereas it was not thought good, that he now being entred into Samnium, ſhould be called away from the chief puſh of the war, he ſhould nominate a Dictator to be Preſident of the Election of Magiſtrates: Who named M. Claudius Marcellus, and by him was appointed for General of horſe Sp. Poſthumius. Yet for all this, was no aſſembly for the ſaid election, holden by the Dictator. For it came in queſtion, Whether he were rightly created or no. And the Augurs being hereabout conſulted with, pronounced, "That the Dictator ſeemed not created aright. But the Tribuns diſcredited and made ſuſpicious "and infamous, by their accuſatory ſpeeches, this their ſentence and declaration, ſaying, That nei- "ther it was eaſie to know the fault and error in the creation, ſeeing that the Conſul nominated "the Dictaior in the beginning of the ſtill night, neither had the Conſul written to any man pub- "lickly or privatly thereof, nor yet was there any perſon could come forth and ſay, that he either "ſaw or heard ought, that might mar and interrupt the Auſpices, nor yet could the Augurs ſit- "ting at Rome, gueſs and divine, what error had hapned to the Conſul in the camp ſo far off. And "who ſaw not (ſay they) that the Augurs found fault herewith, becauſe the Dictator Elect, "was a Commoner? Theſe and other ſuch allegations were (to no purpoſe) by the Tribuns given out. For the matter grew to an Interreign, and the foreſaid Election being ſtil put off and adjourned for one cauſe or other; at length the fourteenth Interregent, L. Æmylius created Conſuls, C. Petilius, and L. Papirius, ſurnamed Mugillanus or Curſor, as I find in other Chronicles.

In that year it was recorded, that the City Alexandria in Egypt was founded: and that Alexander the King of Epicurus was murdered by a certain Lucan, a baniſhed perſon, to verifie the Oracle of Jupiter Dodoneus, which had foretold his death. For when he was ſent for into Italy by the Tarentins, he had warning given him, [To take heed of the Acheruſian Water, and the City Pandoſia, for there it was his deſtiny to end his days:] and therefore, with more ſpeed he paſſed over into Italy, to be as far off as might be, from the City Pandoſia in Epirus, and the river Acheron; which iſſuing out of Moloſſis into the lower Meers and Lakes, diſchargeth it ſelf, and falleth into the Theſprotian Gulf. Howbeit (as commonly it is ſeen when men ſeek moſt to flie and avoid their fatal death, they run headlong and plunge themſelves into it) he, having oftentimes vanquiſhed and overthrown the legions of the Brutians and Lucans; won by force Heraclea a Colony of the Tarentines, and Conſentia in Lucania, and Sipontum, and alſo Acerina a Colony of the Brutians, and other Cities afterwards of the Meſſapians and Lucans: ſent into Epirus three hundred Noble houſes and families, whom he meant to keep as hoſtages: he encamped not far from Pandoſia, a City ſituate neer to the Confines of the Lucans and Brutians. And there he held three hils ſomewhat diſtant aſunder, from whence he might make excurſions and rodes into every part of his enemies country: and he had in ordinary about him almoſt 200. baniſhed men of the Lucans, for his ſure truſty guard: who notwithſtanding (as the natures are of ſuch for the moſt part) changed with every wind, and carried mutable minds according to the variety of fortune. Now it fell out ſo, that the continual rains which overflowed all the fields, had forecloſed and ſtopped the paſſages three ways between his armies, ſo as they could not help one another: whereby thoſe two garriſons where the King was not in perſon, were ſurprized by the unexpected coming of the enemies: who having put them all to the ſword, turned their whole forces to beſiege the King. From whence, there were by the Lucan exiles, meſſengers ſent to their own countrimen: who in the name of the reſt capitulated, that if they might be reſtored again, they would deliver the King either dead or alive into their hands. Howbeit he himſelf with an elect number of men, made a noble and hardy adventure, and brake through the midſt of the enemies: and encountring the chief Commander of the Lucans hand to hand, killed him outright: and having rallied his men near together, who were ſcattered aſunder in fight, he came at length to a river, which by the freſh ruins of a broken bridge, that the violence of that water had born down, ſhewed paſſage. Which as the army paſſed over at an unknown and blind foord, one ſouldier wearied with fear and travel, curſing and deteſting the unlucky and abominable name of the River, fortuned to ſay, Thou haſt not thy name * Acheros for naught: which word when it came once to the King his ear, he preſently began to think and muſe of his final end; and there ſtayed ſtill in a deep ſuſpence whether he ſhall paſs over or no. Then Sotimus, one of the Kings ſervitors and liegemen, asked him why he lingered and made delay, being in ſo great a peril and jeopardy as he was? and ſhewed him withal, how the Lucans intended to play falſe with him, and ſought opportunity to forelay and do him a miſchief. With that the King looked behind him, and eſpied them afar off in a troop coming againſt him: whereupon he drew his ſword, put his horſe to it, took the River, and rode through the midſt thereof, and when he was now ſo far paſſed that he was ready to take the land, one of thoſe baniſht Lucans lanced a dart aloof at him, and ſtruck him quite through. Whereupon he fell down dead with the dart ſticking in his body, and the ſtream carried it down as far as to the Corps de guard of the enemies. Where his breathleſs corps was ſhamefully miſuſed and mangled. For they having cut it croſs the middle, ſent the one half to * Conſentia, and kept the other with themſelves ſtill, to practiſe a thouſand villanies upon it. And as they ſhot and flung ſtones at it afar off, a certain woman being amongſt this outragious multitude (raging beyond all meaſure of anger and malice that mans heart can deviſe or beleeve) after ſhe had beſought them to forbear a while, with her eyes guſhing out tears ſaid unto them, That her husband and children were priſoners, and in the hands of the enemies: but ſhe hoped with the Kings body, howſoever it were abuſed and martyred, to redeem them again. A ſtayed them from farther mangling thereof: Thus all that was left of the Kings body, by the means of one only woman, was burnt at Conſentia: and his bones ſent back afterwards to the enemies unto * Metapontum, and from thence conveighed to Epirus, unto Cleopatra his wife, and his ſiſter Olympias, whereof the one was ſiſter, the other Mother to Alexander the Great. Thus much concerning the woful and unhappy end of Alexander the King of * Epirus. Whoſe fortune albeit was ſuch, that he came ſhort, and was cut off before he intermedled in the Roman war, yet becauſe he warred in Italy, let it ſuffice that briefly by the way I have touched his ſtory. * Torride Mari. * Albania.

The ſame year was there a Lectiſtern at Rome, (which was the firſt after the foundation and B building of that City) for the pacifying of the ſame gods as heretofore. Afterwards the new Conſuls by the ordinance and direction of the people, ſent defiance and proclamed war againſt the Samnits. And as they themſelves made greater preparation every way than againſt the Greeks ſo they had beſides new aids, whereof (as then) they leaſt thought of; The Lucans and the Apulians (nations which to that day had no dealing nor commerce at all with the Romans) became their liege and loyal Allies, offering men and munition toward that war. Whereupon they were by form of Covenant and league entertained and received into their amity. At the ſame time alſo the Romans had good ſucceſs in the Samnits quarters: for three towns there yeelded unto them, and they became Maſters thereof, to wit, Allife, Callife, Ruffrium: all the territory beſides at the firſt coming of the Conſul, was pilled and ſpoiled far and near. Theſe exploits thus proſperouſly C atchieved, the other enterprize alſo of beſieging the Greeks, was well followed and at the point of an end. For over and beſides, that by certain ſconces and bloccuzes between the enemies forts and forces, one part was cut from the other; they endured alſo within their own walls much more miſery and calamity, than the enemy menaced and threatned without: and as if they had been captives to their own garriſon ſouldiers, whom they had called to them for their defence, they ſuffered infinite villanies, and indignities in the perſons as well of their wives as of their children, and even the hardeſt extremities, that follow upon Cities forced by the enemy. And therefore when it was noiſed abroad, that there were new ſuccours coming from Tarentum and the Samnits: they ſuppoſed that for Samnits, there were already within their walls more of them than they would: marry, as for Tarentins they looked willingly for their help, as Greeks both the one & D the other, hoping by their means that they might as well withſtand the outrages of the Samnits and Nolans, as the Romans their open and profeſſed enemies. Laſt of all, of many inconveniencies that they were driven unto, the leaſt and eaſieſt was thought, to yeeld ſimply unto the Romans. Charilaus and Nymphius two great men and the chiefe perſonages of the City, having laid their heads and plotted one with the other, ſo parted the matter between themſelves, that the one ſhould flie unto the Roman General, and the other ſtay behind, to find ſome opportunity, and miniſter ready meanes to render the City according to their deſignment. Charilaus was the man who preſented himſelf unto Philo, and ſaid unto him, "To the good and happy fortune be it "ſaid and done of the Palæpolitans and the people of Rome, I am determined to deliver and ſur- "render the City into your hands: in which Action, whether I may be thought to have be- E "trayed or ſaved my country, it reſteth only in the truſt and fidelity of the Romans. As for my "ſelfe privatly, I am come neither to indent, nor yet to crave ought at all: but publickly in the "behalf of the City, I would rather by way of petition requeſt, than article and capitulate, thus "much, That if this enterpriſe intended, ſpeed well and take effect, the people of Rome would "think and conſider, in what affection, endevour and jeopardy, our City returneth again into "their amity, rather than upon what folly and raſhneſs, it brake their allegiance and revolted. Then, after he had been bidden welcom by the General, entertained with good and gracious words, and highly commended, he received 3000. ſouldiers, to keep, ſurprize, and to ſeize that quarter of the City, where the Samnits were lodged, and which they held: of this regiment and garriſon, L. Quintius a Colonel had the conduct. During this time, Nymphius alſo did his part, F and dealt ſo craftily under hand with the Pretor of the Samnits, that he induced and wrought him to this point, That for as much as all forces, were either about Palæpolis or in Samnium, he would permit him with the fleet to caſt about to the Roman coaſts, for that he intended to forrage and waſte, not only the maritine parts, but the territories alſo adjoyning to the City: and the better to deceive the enemy (quoth he) I had need to go by night, and therefore the Ships preſently muſt lanch forth, and be ſet afloat. And to effect this more ſpeedily, all the youth of the Samnits beſides the neceſſary garriſon of the City, was ſent to the ſhoar. Where whiles Nymphius in the dark, and amongſt the multitude that hindred one another purpoſely, ſpent time in ſetting confuſedly, ſome to this and others to that, Charilaus, according to the complot ſet before, was by his aſſociats received into the City: and having filled the higheſt places of the town G with Roman ſouldiers, commanded to ſet up a ſhout, whereat the Greeks upon a ſecret token given them by their Captains, kept themſelves ſtill and quiet. The Nolans then, at the backſide of the town, eſcaped and fled by the high way, that leadeth to Nola. And the Samnits being excluded out of the town, as they had a more readier mean to flie for the preſent, ſo they found it, after they were paſt danger, a more ſhameful diſgrace. For, they were diſarmed and naked men, they had left all the good they had amongſt the enemies, and returned home ſpoiled, poor and needy, and ſerved for a laughing ſtock and deriſion, not only to other nations, but alſo to their own neighbors and countrimen. Albeit I am not ignorant that there is another opinion, whereby it is given out that Palæpolis was by the Samnits betrayed: yet as I have credited and followed herein ſuch authors, as me thinks it were hard if they ſhould not deliver a truth; for ſo I am induced the rather to beleeve that the Neapolitans returned into amity with the Romans, becauſe of the league extant in their name (for unto them afterwards the State and chief ſeat of the Greeks was tranſlated.) Unto Publius was decreed a triumph, for that it appeared clearly and was believed conſtantly, that by his ſiege the enemies were tamed, and ſo conſtrained to come to a compoſition and ſurrender. Two ſpecial favours hapned to this man above all others before him, namely, the prorogation of his government, not granted to any man aforetime; and triumph after his Magiſtracy was expired. H

Upon the tail of this war, aroſe another with the Greeks of the other tract or coaſt. For the Tarentins having born the Palæpolitans in hand a good while, and fed them with a vain hope of help, when they heard once that the Romans were poſſeſſed of their City, complained themſelvs like men forſaken, and not as thoſe who had forſaken others, much blaming the Palæpolitans, and with anger and envy raging againſt the Romans. Diſquieted alſo they were, for that news came that the Lucans and Apulians (for both theſe nations that year began to contract alliances) were under the protection of the Romans. For now (ſay they) they are well near come unto us, and ſhortly we ſhall grow to this paſs, that we muſt acknowledge the Romans for our Lords, or have them our heavy friends. And verily the trial and hazzard of our eſtate, dependeth only upon the Samnits war, and the event thereof, which nation alone, and the ſame nothing mighty, remaineth now; ſince that the Lucans are gone and revolted to the Romans: who yet might be reclaimed and moved to ſhake off the ſociety with the Romans, if any feat were wrought and practiſed to ſow ſome diſcord and diſſention between them. Theſe devices and overtures took place and prevailed with ſuch, as were deſirous of change and novelty: in ſo much as certain of the Lucan youth (better known, than truſted and reputed honeſt, amongſt their countrimen and fellow Citizens, hired alſo for a ſum of money) whipped one another with rods, came naked into the aſſembly of the Citizens, and with open mouth cried out aloud and ſaid, that for preſuming only to come into the Roman camp, they were by the Conſſ. thus ſcourged, & eſcaped narrowly the loſing of their heads. The thing it ſelf piteous and unſeemly to behold, as bearing a ſhew rather of wrong done unto them, than of any malicious & ſubtil practice by them intended, ſtirred the people up, to force their Magiſtrates with their unceſſant outcries to aſſemble a Councel. Some ſtanding round about the Senat in councel, call hard for war againſt the Romans: others run up and down to raiſe the multitude of Peazants to take arms: and in this ſtir and uproar, which was able to diſquiet and amaze even thoſe that were well minded, a decree paſſed; that the league with Samnits ſhould be renued, and Embaſſadors diſpatched forthwith, to the ſame purpoſe. This was a ſudden change: and as it had no colour of cauſe, ſo it carried ſmal credit with it amongſt the Samnits, who forced the Lucanians to give hoſtages, and to take garriſons into their fortreſſes: and they, blinded with anger, and invegled with flattery, refuſed nothing. But ſhortly after began the fraud to appear and ſhew it ſelf namely, after that the authors and deviſers of theſe falſe ſurmiſes and ſlanders, were retired to Tarentum: but having put themſelvs out of all, and being not at liberty to diſpoſe of their own affairs, they had nothing elſe left them, but like fools to repent in vain. I K L M

That year hapned to the Commons of Rome another beginning of their liberty, in that they were no more either bound in chains, or held in thraldom by their creditors. Which priviledg againſt poor debtors, was altered, by occaſion of the filthy luſt and notorious cruelty of one Uſurer. And L. Papirius was the man unto whom C. Publius for his fathers debt, became bound, and conſigned himſelf his priſoner; whoſe tender age and lovely favor which might and ſhould have moved pity, inflamed the mind of this Uſurer to unkind luſt and ſhameful contumely: for making ful account, that the prime and flower of his youth ſhould ſatisfie and pay for the intereſt of the debt, he firſt began to allure and entice unto him the youth with wanton & unchaſt ſpeeches: afterwards ſeeing that his ears abhorred to hear ſuch filthines, he ſel to minatory words, & ever and anon put him in mind of his preſent condition wherin he ſtood: but laſt of all, perceiving by him, that he ſtood more upon his honor and freedom by birth, then reſpected his hard eſtate by fortune, he cauſed him to be ſtripped naked, and whipping chear to be preſented unto him. The poor ſtripling thus piteouſly rent and torn, ran forth into the open ſtreet, complained of the filthy luſt & cruelty of his creditor. Whereupon, a number of people, enkindled as well with pity and commiſeration of the ſtripling, and indignity of the injury, as alſo in regard of their own caſe, and of their children: came running into the Forum or common place, and ſo from thence in a long train to the court of the Councel. The Conſuls upon this ſudden uproar were forced to call a Senat, and as the Senators entred into the Councel chamber, they lay all proſtrat at their feet, as they paſſed by, one after another, & ſhewed unto them the young mans back and ſides in what taking they were. And that one day, by occaſion of the outragious enormity of one perſon, brake the neck of that mighty bond, whereby, to that day, the creditors had their debtors, in danger unto them. For the Conſſ. had in charge, to propoſe unto the people, that from thence forward, no perſon whatſoever, unleſs he had committed ſome heinous fact, and until he were to ſuffer therefore, ſhould be either kept in fetters and gives, or ſtretched upon the rack. Item, that for lent money, the goods of the debtor and not the body ſhould be obliged. So, they that were in bondage, became releaſed and enlarged: and order was taken for the time to come, that none ſhould be impriſoned by their creditors again. N O

The ſame year, whiles the Samnits war of it ſelf alone, beſides the ſudden revolt of the Lucans, together

A together with the Tarentins the hatchers thereof, held the Senators of Rome in care and perplexity enough: behold over and above all these, the Vestin people, as a surcrease to their troubles, joined and banded with the Samnits. Which new occurrent, as for that year it rather maintained this discourse amongst men in their ordinary talk every where, than ministred cause of serious debating in publick Councel: so the Consuls of the year following, L. Furius Camillus the second time, and Jun. Brutus Sceva, thought no one thing more important than it, and needful to be treated of in the Senat, with the first. And albeit the thing were but new, and a breeding, yet so greatly were the LL. hereabout troubled, that they feared no less to begin to take in hand, then to neglect it altogether, and not to see it: doubting, lest if they were let go unpunished, the B neighbor nations would grow too lusty and proud: and again, if they seemed to chastise them by war, the rest for fear of the like measure, might be provoked to anger, take arms, and enter into a general rebellion. And all, and every one of them, namely, the Marsians, the Pelignians and Marucins, were in feats of arms comparable and equal to the Samnits every way: which nations they might be sure to have their enemies, if they medled with the Vestins, and touched them once never so little. Howbeit, that part prevailed and took place, which for the present, seemed to carry more courage and valor, then sage advice and wisdom: but the issue and event shewed, that, Fortune favoured Fortitude. So the people by authority and direction of the Nobles decreed war against the Vestins: the charge whereof light by lot upon Brutus, and Samnium fell to Camillus. To both places were the armies conducted: and by the care and industry employed in the defence
C of the marches and frontiers, the enemies were impeached for joining their forces together. Howbeit the Consul Furius Camillus, who had the greater and weightier charge laid upon him, fortuned to fall grievously sick, and thereby could not follow the wars: who being commanded to nominate a Dictator, for to manage and conduct his affairs, declared the noblest warriour in those days, L. Papirius Cursor: by whom Q. Fabius Rutilianus was named General of horsemen, a couple surely of great name and highly renowned for their worthy acts, atchieved in this their government: but yet more famous and voiced abroad, by reason of variance and discord which fell between them; whereby they grew well near to the utmost tearms of contesting one another in all extremity. The other Consul warred with the Vestins many and sundry ways, but evermore with like fortune and happy success. For he forraged and wasted their country: and D by pilling, rifling, and burning their houses and corn, forced them against their wills into the field: and in one battel so enfeebled and abated the forces of the Vestins (but not without bloodshed of his own men) that his enemies not only fled into their camp; but also as not trusting now to their ramparts and trenches, they were constrained to steal away into their towns, minding for to save themselves, as well by the natural situation of the places, as the strength of their good walls. In the end, he made assault upon those walled Cities, purposing by force to win them. And first he gained Cutina by scaling, either through the exceeding courage of his souldiers, or their anger, being so chafed as they were at their hurts received: for that scarcely one escaped out of the throng and skirmish, clear & not wounded. Then he likewise took Cingilia: and gave the pillage of both Cities to his souldiers. Neither gates nor walls could stand in their way and keep E them out. But into Samnium the journey was undertaken by the Dictator with doubtful Auspices and uncertain knowledge of the will of the gods. The default and terror whereof took not effect in the main event and issue of the war, (for it was prosperous and fortunate) but turned to the rage and anger of the chief leaders, who fell out deadly one with another. For Papirius the Dictator, advised by the Pullarius [that had the custody and charge of the sacred Pullets] went back to Rome to take the Auspicium [or the presage by the bird-flight] again: and straighrly charged his General of horse to keep himself close within his hold, and in no wise to give the enemies battel during his absence. But Fabius after the Dictators departure, advertised by the espials that the enemies were even as careless, as loose and disordered, as if there had been no Roman in Samnium? whether it were, that being a stout and lusty young Gentleman, he took foul scorn and thought it F an indignity, that all should seem to rest in the Dictator only: or that he was induced with the good opportunity of doing some brave exploit (I wot not:) but he went forth with an army in order of battel, to Imbrinium, (that was the places name) & there fought a field with the Samnits. But such was the happy issue of this battel, that if the Dictator himself had been there in person, it could not have been better managed. For, neither Captain failed his souldiers, nor souldiers their Captain. The horsemen also under the leading of L. Cominius a Colonel by his place, (who sundry times charged and recharged again, and could not with force break the enemies arrays) unbridled their horses, and so ran them all on the spur; that no strength was able to abide them: such an havock, such a lane made they all about over armour and men. The footmen seconding this hot charge of the horse, advanced the ensigns against the enemies thus put in disarray: and G twenty thousand men (by report) were that day slain. In some authors I find, that twice in the Dictators absence he fought, and twice had the upper hand. But in the most ancient writers I read but of one battel. In some Chronicles the whole matter is passed over and left out clean. The General of the horse, having gained a mighty mass of spoil, as otherwise he could not chuse, upon so great a slaughter & massacre: gathered together into one heap all the enemies armor made a fire under, & burned them: were it that he had made some such vow to one of the gods: or (as I list rather to believe, it was a motive of Fabius himself, that the Dicta. should not reap the fruit of his glory, and entitle his name thereto; or in pomp carry those spoils before him at his triumph.

Moreover, the letters of this victory by him ſent to the Senat, and not a wotd thereof to the H Dictator, were ſome proof, that he was not willing to impart and communicate his praiſes with him. But certainly, the Dictator took the matter in ſo ill part, that when every man elſe was joyful for this noble victory atchieved, he only ſhewed anger and ſadneſs in his very countenance.
Whereupon ſuddenly he diſſolved the Senat, and departed in great haſt out of the court, giving out and often iterating theſe words; Then hath the maſter of horſemen in deed as well everted and overthrown, both Dictators Majeſty and military diſcipline, as defeated the Samnits legions, if he can ſo go clear away and eſcape unpuniſhed, with ſo manifeſt contempt of my expreſs commandment. Whereupon full of threats and indignation, he haſtned to the camp, and took long journeys: yet could he not prevent the bruit of his coming. For, there were Vantcnrriers that I poſted from the City before, to bring word that the Dictator was coming, full of revenge, and ſet upon puniſhment, and at every ſecond word almoſt, commending the late exemplary juſtice of T. Manlius. Then Fabius immediatly calling an audience, beſought the ſouldiers, that with what valour and vertue they had defended the Common-wealth from moſt deadly and mortal enemies, with the ſame they would protect him from the outragious cruelty of the Dictatour, himſelfe (I ſay) by whoſe conduct and fortune they had gotten ſo glorious a victory. "For now, The Oration of Q. Fabius to his fellow ſouldiers. "coming he is (quoth he) for envy out of his right wits, and beſide himſelf: for anger at an"other mans manhood and felicity, furious and horn-mad: and all is no more but this, that in his "abſence, forſooth, we have ſped well; who wiſheth rather in his heart, if he could change the "courſe of fortune, that the Samnits had won the victory than the Romans: and nothing is ſo K
"riſe in his mouth, as, That his commandment was contemned; as who would ſay, he forbad
"not battel with the ſame mind, wherein he now grieveth that we have fought. For as then his "will was good, even for very envy to hinder and ſuppreſs the proweſs of another, and went a"bout to take weapons away from moſt forward ſouldiers, deſirous of fight, that in his abſence
"they might not lay hand to their ſword: ſo now, ſee how he fretteth and fumeth in great cho-
"ler at this, that without L. Papirius the ſouldiers were not diſarmed, diſmembred as it were,
"and maimed: and for that Q. Fabius forgat not his place, but bare himſelf as General of the "Cavalry, and not as a Servant and follower of the Dictator, ſtanding at receit, and waiting "at an inch when ſome under Captainſhip would fall, that he might ſtep into the place. What "would this man (think ye) have done, how would he have fretted, if (as the fortune and L "doubtful chance of war oftentimes goeth) we had been put to the worſe and loſt the day; who
"now that the enemies be vanquiſhed, the field ſo well fought, the State ſo well ſerved, as by "the moſt ſingular Captain in the world, better it might not be, thus menaceth execution to me
"the General of the horſe, even in the honour of my conqueſt? Neither is he (my maſters) cru"elly bent and ſet upon miſchief againſt the General of the horſe more then againſt the Colonels,
"the Centiners and common Souldiers: nay, he would (be ye ſure) if he had been able, have ra"ged and fared as bitterly, yea and executed his ire and furious rage upon all. But becauſe he "cannot, now he diſchargeth his gall upon me alone. For even as envy, like a flaming fire, ſear-
"cheth and mounteth up to the higheſt, ſo runneth he upon the chief Captain, and aimeth at "the head of this worthy exploit. If he had once extinguiſhed him, together with the glory of M
"this brave ſervice, then like a Conqueror and Lord over a poor captive army, whatſoever he "might by law execute againſt a General of the Cavalry, he would attempt and extend, upon the "ſimple ſouldiers. Make reckoning therefore, that in ſtanding faſt to me and in defence of my "cauſe, ye uphold the liberty of all. For in caſe he ſhall perceive once, the ſame agreement of "the army in the maintenance of the victory, which was well ſeen in the battel, and that ye all "have a care and regard of the life and ſafety of one, his ſtomack will come down, his heart wil "relent and incline to clemency, and a milder ſentence. To conclude, I recommend my life, and whole eſtate to your vertue and faithful protection. Then from all parts of the audience they cried unto him aloud & bade him take a good heart: for ſo long as the Legions of the Romans were ſafe, there ſhou'd no perſon do him harm or injury. Soon after came the Dictator, and preſently N by ſound of trumpet ſummoned a general aſſembly. And the publick Crier after an Oiez made, called by name for Q Fabius General of the horſe. Who ſo ſoon as he was come from a lower

"whereunto the Conſuls endued with kingly puiſſance and government, do obey, yea, & Prætors "created with the ſame authority that Conſuls are; whether thou eſteem it meet and right, that a "General of horſe ſhould be obedient to his commandment or no? I demand likewiſe, whether I
"my ſelf, knowing that I took my journey and went from home, with doubtful and uncertain Au-

"religious obſervation in that behalf; and not rather, to go again to take new Auſpicia, that I O
"might adventure & attempt nothing ſo long as I ſtood in doubt of the grace & favor of the gods?
"And withal, this I demand, whether the General of the horſemen could be freed, exempt, & diſ-
"charged of that ſcruple of conſcience, which checked and ſtayed the Dictator from execution of "his charge? But what mean I to make theſe demands? ſeeing that if he had departed without "ſaying one word, yet thou ſhouldſt have framed thy opinion and applied thy mind according "to the interpretation of my wil and pleaſure? Why ſayeſt thou nothing? Anſwer me I ſay. Forbad
"I thee not expreſly, to do any thing in my abſence? Forbad I not thee to fight with the enemies?

How

"how durſt thou, I ſay, be ſo hardy as to encounter with the enemy? To theſe interrogatories

"the peril of thy life, not a word beſides. Now come Serjeant and do thine office the while.
To which ſeveral Articles, when Fabius could not readily anſwer point by point, one while complaining that he had him for his accuſer, who was the judge of his life and death: otherwhiles crying out aloud, that ſooner might his life be taken from him, than the glory and honor of his B acts: and as he juſtified and excuſed his own ſelf, ſo he began again to challenge and accuſe [the Dictator.] Then Papirius being in more heat of choler than before, commanded the General of the horſemen to be ſtripped out of his cloaths and uncaſed, and the rods and axes to be brought forth ready. With that, Fabius calling earneſtly for the help of the ſouldiers, whiles the officers were a tearing and renting his cloaths from his back, made means to retire himſelf into the ranks of the Triarii, who began already to make a mutiny and uproar in the aſſembly. From whence there aroſe an outcry over all the audience. Some were heard to intreat, others to threat.
They who fortuned to ſtand next to the Tribunal, becauſe that being within the view and eye of the Dictator they might be known and noted, beſought his Majeſty to ſpare and pardon the General of the horſe, and not with him to condemn the whole army. They that were fartheſt off C in the skirt of the aſſembly, and eſpecially that troop and company about Fabius, rated and cried out upon ſuch a rigorous and mercileſs Dictator. And a little thing more wou'd have made them mutiny: nay, within the very compaaſs of the Tribunal all was not clear and quier. The Lieutenants or Colonels of whole legions, ſtanding about his ſeat or chair of ſtate, intreated him to put off the matter until the morrow: to give his choler ſome time to cool, and allow ſpace and reſpit to conſider of it with advice and counſel: ſaying, "That if Fabius had plaid a youthful part,
"he had paid ſufficiently for it already, and his victory had received diſgrace and diſhonour e"nough. Beſeeching him not to proceed to theſe extremities of utmoſt execution, nor to ſet ſuch
"a brand and note of ignominy and ſhame upon the young Gentleman himſelf, ſo rare and gal-
"lent a Knight; or on his father, a moſt honourable and excellent perſonage, not yet upon the D "noble houſe and name of the Fabii. But when they ſaw how little they prevailed by their prayers, and as little by any reaſons they could alledge; then, they admoniſhed him to have a regard to the furious aſſembly of the ſouldiers: "and that it was not for a man of his years and wiſ-
"dom, thus to put more fire to the hot ſtomack of Souldiers enkindled already, nor to admini-
"ſter more matter of mutiny: and if ſuch a thing ſhould happen, no man would impute the blame "to Q. Fabius, who ſought and humbly craved pardon of puniſhment, but to the Dictator: if he "overcome with choler, ſhould blindly ſo far paſs himſelfe in wilful peeviſhneſs, as to provoke
"the outragious multitude againſt himſelf. Finally, that he ſhould not think, how they laboured
"thus for any affectionate favour they bare to Q. Fabius; but were ready to take an oath, that "they thought it not ſafe for the State and Common-weal that he ſhould proceed at ſuch a time, E "to execute the rigor of Juſtice upon Q. Fabius. By theſe and ſuch like remonſtrances, when as "the Lieutenants had ſtirred up the Dictator his blood againſt themſelves, rather then pacified his mood againſt Fabius, they were commanded to go down from the Tribunal. And when as the Crier had aſſaied to make ſilence all in vain, for that by reaſon of the noiſe and tumult, neither the Dictator his voice, nor any of his apparitors and halberds about him, could be heard, the night came upon them and ended the contention, as if it had been a battel in field. The General of the horſe was commanded to appear on the morrow. Now when as every man gave it out and avou-ched unto him, that Papirius wou'd proceed more vehemently, for that conteſting of the Lieutenants, and that the more he was dealt withal, the worſe he was: Fabius privily ſtole out of the camp and fled to Rome. And by the means of his father M. Fabius, a man who had been already F thrice Conſul and Dictator, the Senat was called together immediatly. And as he was in the midſt of his grievous complaints before the Lords, touching the violence and wrong of the Dictator, all of a ſudden, there was heard before the Councel Houſe door, a great noiſe and hurrying of the Lictors, whiles they made way and voided the preſs. And no marvel; for the Dictator himſelfe was come with a revenging mind. For ſo ſoon as he had heard how Fabius was departed out of the camp, he followed after with his light horſemen. Then began the broil to be renued afreſh, and Papirius cauſed Fabius to be attached. Whereupon the chief of the Nobility, and the whole body of the Senat began to enterpoſe themſelves by way of mediation: but all their intreaty not-withſtanding, he perſiſted ſtil in his implacable anger. Then ſtept forth M. Fabius the father. "For M. Fabius to the Dictator.
"as much as (qd. he) neither the authority of the Senat nor mine old age, whom you ſeek to make G "childleſs, nor yet the valor & noble courage of the General of horſe, by your own ſelf choſen and "nominated, can prevail; nor any humble prayers, which are able to appeaſe the fury of the ene"my oftentimes, yea, and to pacifie the wrath and indignation of the gods: I implore the lawful "help of the Tribuns and to the whole body of the people I appeal. And ſince that you challenge "and except againſt the judgement of your own army, and of the Senat, I offer and preſent unto
"you that judge, who only is of more force and puiſſance, I am ſure, than your Dictatorſhip.
"I will ſee, whether you will yeeld to this appeal, whereunto the Roman King Tull. Hoſtilius
"gave place. Then out of the Councel houſe they went ſtraight to the Common place of audience:

and

and when the Dictator, attended with some few, was ascended up, and the General of the Cavalry accompanied with all the whole troop of the chief of the City, Papirius commanded that he should come down or else be fetched from the Rostra, unto the lower ground. The father followed after him. "Well done (quoth he) in commanding us to be brought hither, from "whence we may be allowed to speak our minds, if we were no better then privat persons. At the first there passed no continued speeches so much, as wrangling and altercation. But afterwards the voice and indignation of old Fabius, surmounted and drowned the other noise: who greatly blamed and cried out upon the pride and cruelty of Papirius. "What man (quoth he) I have been "also a Dictator of Rome my self, and yet was there never so much as a poor Commoner, no Centurion, nor Souldier hardly entreated or misused by me. But Papirius seeketh victory and triumph over a Roman Grand-Captain and General, as over the Leaders and Commanders of his "enemies. See, see, what difference there is between the government in old time, and this new "pride & cruelty of late days. Quintius Cincinnatus a Dictator for the time, proceeded no farther in "punishment against Minutius, when he was fain to deliver him lying enclosed & besieged within "his own camp, but to leave him as a Lieutenant in stead of Consul, in the army whereof he "had charge. M. Furius Camillus, not only for the present tempered his choler toward L. Furius, who in contempt of his old age and authority, had fought most untowardly and with "dishonor in the end; and wrote nothing to the people or the Senat but well, of his Collegue: "but also being returned, made a special reckoning of him above all the Tribuns consular, whom "also of all his collegues, when as he had the choice granted him by the Senat, he elected to be "his coadjutor in the charge of his government. Neither the people verily, whose power is Soveraign over all, were ever more angry against those, that through rashness and want of skill "lost whole armies, than to fine them at a sum of money. For the loss and miscarriage of any "battel, that a General should be brought into question and answer for his life, was never heard "of to this day. And now, rods and axes, whipping and beheading, are prepared for the Commanders under the people of Rome, and those, who are conquerors and have deserved most justly triumphs; which by no law can be offered to those that have been vanquished. What else I "pray you) should my son have endured, if he had beastly suffered the field to be lost and his army withal? If he had been discomfited, put to flight, and driven clean out of the field, how "far forth further would the Dictator his ire and violence have proceeded, than to scourge "and kill? And see how fit and seemly a thing it is that the City for the victory of Q. Fabius, "should be in joy, in processions to the gods, and thanksgivings, with congratulation and feasting one another: and he himself by whose means the Temples stand open, the Altars smoak with "incense and sacrifice, and are heaped up again with vows, oblations, and offerings, to be stripped "naked, to be whipped and torn in the sight of the people of Rome, looking up to the Capitol and "the Castle lifting up his eys to the gods upon whom in two such noble battels he called and invocated, not in vain nor without good and happy success? With what heart will the army take "this, which under his leading and conduct, and under his fortune, atchieved victory? What lamentation wil there be in the Roman camp, and what rejoycing on the other side amongst the enemies? Thus fared ths good old father, thus pleaded he by way of expostulation and complaint, calling upon God and man for help, and withal embraced his son in his arms, and shed many a tear. "On the one side, there made with young Fabius, and took his part, the majesty and countenance of the Senat, the favour and love of the people, the assistance of the Tribuns, and the remembrance of the army absent. On the other side were alledged against him by Papirius, the invincible government and Empire of the people of Rome, the discipline of warfare, the Dictators "commandment (observed and reverenced at all times, no less then the Oracle & wil of the gods) "the severe edicts of Manlius whose fatherly love and affection to his dear son was set behind the "service and common good of the State. Also it was alledged, that the same exemplary justice, L. Brutus the first founder of the Roman liberty, executed in his two sons: and now mild and kind "fathers, indulgent and fond old men, in the case of contempt of other mens commandment, give "liberty to youth, and pardon as a smal matter, the overthrow of military disciplin. Howbeit, he "for his part would persist in his purpose still, nor remit one jot of condigne punishment to him, "who contrary to his commandment, and notwithstanding the trouble and confusion of religion, "and the doubtful Auspicia, had given battel, saying, That as it was not in his power to abridge "any jot the majesty of that State and Empire, for being everlasting: so, L. Papirius would diminish "naught of the authority therof, wishing, That neither the Tribuns puissance sacred and inviolable "in it self should by their opposition & interposing of their negative voice, violate the Empire of "Rome: nor that the people of Rome, should in him above all others abolish and extinguish both "Dictator and Dictatorship. Which if it did, the posterity hereafter should lay the weight and "blame (although in vain) not in L. Papirius, but in the Tribuns, and in the perverse judgment "of the people: when as the military discipline being once polluted and stained, neither souldier "would obey the Centurions commandment, nor the Centurion the Colonels, nor Colonel the "Lieutenant, nor Lieutenant the Consuls, nor yet General of horse, the Dictator: whiles no man "hath regard and reverence either of men or of gods; no Edicts of Dictator, no flight of Birds "observed; but that without pasport, the souldiers may wander and rove, either in their own "ground or the enemies land, and unmindful of their sacred military oath, may cashier and discharge themselvs from souldiery, through a licentious liberty of their own, whensoever they list;

leaving

A "leaving their enſigns and colours not attended, not meeting at ſummons, not repairing to the "Rendezvous, according to proclamation: without all diſcretion, making no difference whether "they skirmiſh by day or night, on even ground or uneven, with advantage or diſadvantage, with "direction, or without; obſerving no ſignals and watchword, no array. In ſum, the whole courſe
"of military ſervice henceforth, blind, raſh, and inconſiderate, after the guiſe of robbing, to ſtand
"and go currant for ſolemn and ſacred warfare. With theſe crimes and abſurd inconveniences
"(O ye Tribuns) charged you muſt be to the worlds end: lay down you muſt, and gage "your own lives for the audacious diſobedience of Q. Fabius, for whom ye are now an-"ſwerable. The Trib. were aſtonied hereat, and for themſelves now, rather careful and perplexed, B than for him who had recourſe unto them for refuge and ſuccor. But the general conſent of the people of Rome, turning to prayer and intreaty, eaſed them of this heavy load and burden: and with one voice humbly beſought the Dictator, to remit the puniſhment of the General of horſe, for their ſake. The Tribuns alſo, ſeeing that was the way, and all enclining and growing to Petition, followed after, and did the like; earneſtly beſeeching the Dictator to forgive this human fragility, and youthful folly of Q. Fabius, ſaying, That he had ſuffered chaſtiſement enough. Then the young man himſelf, then his father M. Fabius, forgetting all ſtrife, and laying aſide debate, fell down at the Dictator his feet, and beſought him to appeaſe his wrathful diſpleaſure. Hereup-on the Dictator after ſilence made, "Yea marry (quoth he) O Quirites, this I like well, and thus "it ſhould be; now hath military diſcipline got the victory, now hath the majeſty of your Em-C "pire prevailed indeed, which lay both a bleeding, and were in hazzard to have been aboliſhed
"and overthrown for ever, after this day. Q. Fabius is not acquit of his offence, in that he fought
"againſt his ſoveraigns commandment: but being thereof convicted and caſt, is forgiven nay, is "given rather to the people of Rome and the Tribuns power, whoſe aſſiſtance and help is granted
"for their inſtant prayers, and not of duty. Well, Riſe up Q. Fabius and live, a more happy man
"for this agreement of the City in thy defence, than for that victory, upon which erewhile thou "bareſt thy ſelfe ſo bravely. Live (I ſay) thou that haſt been ſo bold to commit that fact, which "thine own father here, if he had been in L. Papirius his place, would never have pardoned. And "as for me, into my grace and favour thou mayſt come again, at thine own will and pleaſure: But "to the people of Rome, to whom thou art beholden and obliged for thy life, thou ſhalt perform D "no greater duty and ſervice than that the example of this days work may be a teaching and war"ning to thee for ever, to obey, as well in war as in peace, all lawful commands of ſuperiour Ma-
"giſtrates. After that he had pronounced the pardon of the General of horſe, and diſcharged him of the Court, and was departed himſelf out of the common place of audience, the Senat joyful and highly contented, and the people much more, came all about them, and on the one ſide bidding joy to the General of the horſe aforeſaid, and on the other ſide giving thanks to the Dictator, followed after, and accompanied them both: and it was generally thought, that military government was no leſs confirmed and eſtabliſhed by this peril and danger only of young Q. Fabius, then by the late piteous execution of young Manlius.

By chance that year ſo fell out, that as often as the Dictator abſented himſelf from the Army, E ſo often the enemies roſe and raiſed troubles in Samnium. Howbeit, the freſh example of Q. Fabius was ever in the eye of M. Valerius, Lieutenant General and Governor of the camp, who feared as well the dread wrath of the Dictator, as any violent attempts of his enemies whatſoever.
Inſomuch, as when purveiours for corn being entrapped by an ambuſh were ſlain, in a place of diſadvantage; commonly it was thought and beleeved, that they might have been by the Lieutenant reſcued and ſaved, but for fear of theſe rigorous and terrible edicts. For anger hereof, the Dictator loſt the hearts of the ſouldiers, who were already malecontent, for that he was ſo inexorable in the cauſe of Q. Fabius, and had denied them that, at their inſtant intreaty, which afterwards he yeelded unto and pardoned, at the ſuit and requeſt of the people of Rome. The Dictator, after that he had left for the government of the City L. Papirius Craſſus the General of horſe, diſcharged F Q. Fabius, and forbidden him to adminiſter any thing by vertue of that office, returned into the camp. Whoſe coming was neither very welcome and joyful to his own countrimen the ſouldi-ers, nor yet ſtruck any terror in his enemies the Samnits. For, the next morrow, were it, that they knew not that the Dictator was come, or little cared and weighed whether he were preſent or abſent, they approached the camp in order of battel. Howbeit, that one man, L. Papirius the Dictator, was of ſuch valor and importance, that if the love of the ſouldiers had ſeconded the policy and ſage conduct of their Commander, the war with Samnits had that day been quite diſpatched and ended, paſt all peradventure, ſo skilfully ſet he the battel in array, ſo warily choſe he his ground of advantage, ſo ſtrengthned he the ſame with ſupplies out of the reregard, in all warlike skil and ſingular policy. But the ſouldiers failed for their parts, and went coldly to G their buſineſs, even of purpoſe, that the valiant and commendable parts of the Captain might be diſcredited and depraved; and ſo the victory was much hindred and impeached. Howbeit, many of the Samnits were ſlain; and in exchange as many of the Romans hurt. But he like a wiſe and expert Captain, ſoon perceived, what was the cauſe that ſtayed the victory. He ſaw well enough, that he was to temper his own nature and to allay that ſeverity of his, within mildneſs and cour-teſie. And therefore, taking with him the Lieutenants himſelf in perſon went about to viſit the wounded ſoldiers, putting his head into their tents & cabbins asking each one how they did; charged the Lieutenants, Colonels, Provoſt-Marſhals, and other officers of the camp, to tend and look

unto the ſick ſouldiers, recommending their care unto them particularly by name. This being a thing in it ſelf popular, he handled and ordered with ſuch dexterity; that by curing their bodies, their minds alſo and hearts were much ſooner gained and reconciled to their General. And nothing made more for the ſpeedy recovery of their health, than their thankful acceptation of that care and diligence of his. When he had thus refreſhed and repaired his army, he encountred once again the enemy with aſſured hope of himſelf and his ſouldiers, to obtain a final victory; and ſo diſcomfited and put them to flight, that the Samnits after that day, durſt never fight again with the Dictator. Then the victorious army marched, as any hope of booty and pillage guided and directed them: and as they overran their enemies country, they found no force nor reſiſtance, either in open ſhew, or covert ambuſh. This alſo encouraged them the more, and cheered their hearts, for that the Dictator had by proclamation given away the whole ſpoil among the ſouldiers: ſo that their privat gain whet them on againſt their enemie, no leſs then the common anger and publick quarrel. The Samnits tamed and ſubdued by theſe loſſes and overthrows, ſued to the Dictator for peace: with whom they capitulated, and made offer to allow unto every ſouldier one livery, and the full wages of one year. But being commanded to go to the Senat, they made anſwer, That they would accompany the Dictator, recommending and putting their cauſe and whole eſtate to his faithful protection, to his vertue and goodneſs only. Thus the Army was withdrawn from the Samnits, the Dictator with triumph entred the City: and when he would have reſigned up the Dictatorſhip, the Senat ordained, That before he gave over, he ſhould create Conſuls. So, C. Sulpitius Longus the ſecond time, and Q. Æmylius Caretanus were elected.

The Samnits not having concluded peace, (for that they varied about the conditions, and were to treat farther thereupon) yet brought with them from the City of Rome, truce for a year. Which they obſerved not faithfully: ſo ſoon were their ſtomacks up again to make war, after they had intelligence, that Papirius was out of government. Whiles C. Sulpitius, and Q. Æmylius (or Aulius as ſome Chronicles have) were Conſuls, beſides the revolting of the Samnits, there aroſe a new war alſo from the Apulians. Both ways was there a power ſent. Sulpitius his lot was to go againſt the Samnits, and Æmylius againſt the Apulians. Some write, that upon the Apulians themſelves no war was made, but contrariwiſe, that the confederate States of that Nation were defended from the violence and wrongs of the Samnits. Howbeit, the low eſtate of the Samnits, at that time, hardly able to maintain and defend themſelves, maketh it more likely and credible, that the Apulians, were not warred upon by them, but that the Romans made war with both Nations at once. But no memorable act or exploit was there performed: only the Apulian countrey, and Samnium was waſted: and the enemies no where at all to be found, but at Rome there hapned a ſcare by night, which raiſed every man ſo ſuddenly out of their firſt ſleep, and ſo affrighted the City, that preſently at one inſtant the Capitol and the Caſtle, the Walls and Gates were full of armed men. And when as from all places there was running, and crying alarm, the morrow morning at the break of day, there appeared neither author, nor cauſe of this fear.

The ſame year the Tuſculans were judicially convented before the people of Rome by proceſs, and that, by a law that Flavius preferred. This M. Flavius, Tribun of the Commons, exhibited a bill of Endictment to the people that ſome puniſhment might be inflicted upon the Tuſculans: For that through their aſſiſtance and Counſel, the Veliterns and Privernats had taken arms againſt the people of Rome. The Tuſculans with their wives and children reſorted to Rome. Which multitude having changed their apparrel, and clad in poor array and habit, as priſoners at the bar, went about from Tribe to Tribe, falling down upon their knees to every man. Whereupon, pity prevailed more to obtain pardon of puniſhment, then the goodneſs of their cauſe to the purging of their guilt. So all the Tribes except Pollia, diſanulled and made void the Endictment aforeſaid. But the ſentence of the Tribe Pollia was, That as many as were of age and undergrown, to wit, fourteen year old and upward, ſhould be ſcourged and put to death. Item, that their wives and children, by martial law, ſhould be ſold in open port-ſale. And for certain it is reported, that the Tuſculans took ſo deep an anger againſt the authors of ſo hard a cenſure and cruel doom, that they have carried it in mind even to our fathers days. For in deſpite thereof no Candidate, or Competitor for an office of the Tribe Pollia, was ever wont to get the voices of the Tribe Papyria. The year following, whiles Q. Fabius and L. Fulvius were Conſuls, A. Cornelius Arvina Dictator, and M. Fabius Ambuſtus General of horſe, having taken a ſtraighter levy of ſouldiers then ordinary, for fear of a greater war in Samnium (for it was reported that the whole manhood and flower of the youth were taken up and waged out of the countries adjoining) lead forth a goodly and puiſſant army againſt the Samnits. But they pitched their camp ſo careleſly in the enemies ground, as if the enemy had been far off: and the Samnit legions came on a ſudden ſo proudly, that they ſet forward the trench and rampart, and encamped cloſe to the Corps de gard of the Romans. Howbeit the night approached ſo faſt, that they were hindered for aſſayling the Camp: but they gave it out plainly, they would do it the morrow after by day light. The Dictator ſeeing that he muſt fight neerer than he expected or hoped; for fear leſt the ſtraightneſs and diſadvantage of the ground, might prejudice and hinder the valour of his ſouldiers, leaving fires thick burning in the camp, for to diſappoint the ſight of the enemies, in the ſtill night with ſilence leadeth for h his legions: but yet could he not for the neerneſs of their camp eſcape, but be eſpied of them. The horſemen forthwith followed upon them in the tail.

A and preſſed hard upon the army in their march, yet in ſuch ſort, that before it was day, they would not fight, nay, the very footmen were not all iſſued out of the camp before day light. At length when it was broad day, the Horſemen adventured to charge upon the Romans, and partly by playing upon the tail of the hindmoſt, and partly by skirmiſhing in places that were hard to be paſſed over, they hindred their march and kept them behind. In the mean while their Infantery alſo overtook the Cavalry, ſo as now the Samnits with all their forces came upon them. The Dictator ſeeing he could not go farther without his great loſſe and diſadvantage, commanded his men to fortify even in that very place where he ſtood: but for aſmuch as the light Horſemen of his enemies were overſpred all about, they could not poſſibly go to provide ſtakes to make a parapet or rampier, nor begin to caſt a trench. When he perceived therefore that he neither could go
B forward, nor ſtay and fortifie, he removed all his baggage out of the ranges, and ſet his men in battel array. The enemies do the like, and were not behind either in courage or in forces. But this moſt of all heartned and encouraged them, for that they being ignorant that the occaſion of the enemies retreat was the diſadvantage and ſtraightneſs of the place, preſumed that they did it upon fear; and therefore they in terrible manner followed after them, as if the Romans had fled and been affrighted. And even that for a good while held the fight in doubtful ballance, albeit the Samnits now a long time had not been uſed to abide ſomuch as the firſt ſhout of the Roman army when they give the charge. But verily that day, from the third hour unto the eight, it is ſaid that the battail ſtood ſo equal and indifferent, that neither the ſhout and cry was redoubled, nor heard the ſecond time, after it was once ſet up at the firſt buckling: nor the enſigns were ſet
C forward, or withdrawn backward, but remained where they firſt were: nor yet of any part were they ſeen to retire or go back, but every man in his degree and place, bending forward and preſſing with his ſhield, without breathing or looking back, ſtill fought a-front: the ſame noiſe, one reſolution to die or fight it out, and not to give over before utter wearines or dark night. Now began the ſtrength of men to fail, now the ſpear point and edge of the ſword, began to turn and loſe their force, and now the Captains themſelves were to ſeek for counſel and what to do: By what time all at once the Samnits Horſemen, hearing that the cariages of the Romans with one only Cornet were gone a good way off from the armed ſouldiers, without any other guard and fortification; for greedineſs of ſpoil ſet upon them. Which when a meſſenger in great haſt and fear reported to the Dictator; Let them alone (quoth he) let them encumber themſelves with D the ſpoil, and ſpare not. Then came others one after another, windleſs with running, crying out and ſaying, that all was gone: and that every where the ſouldiers goods were rifled, ranſacked and carried clean away. Whereupon he ſent for the General of Horſemen, See ye not (quoth he) O M. Fabius, the battel abandoned of our enemies Cavalry? They ſtand ſtill and are encumbred and peſtred with our cariages. Now therefore charge upon them, disbanded as they are, (which uſually hapneth to any multitude, buſy in pillage) find them you ſhall (no doubt) few on Horſeback, and as few with weapon in hand: and whiles they are loding their Horſes with ſpoil, kill them unarmed, and make it a bloody booty to them, and let them buy it full dearly: as for me, let me alone with the charge of the legions and footmen; have you the honour of the Horſemens ſervice. Then the Cavalry ranged into a Squadron, as exquiſitly and skilfully as poſſibly
E might be, ran forcibly upon the enemies diſarraied and clogged with cariage, beating them down, and making a miſerable maſſacre of them in every place. For being (as they were) among packs and fardels which they caſt from them ſuddenly, and now lay againſt their feet to ſtumble on as they fled, and in the Horſes way, that were amazed and affraid, they were not able well, either to flie or to fight, and ſo were ſlain. When as the enemies Cavalry were thus defeated and welneer all come to naught, then M. Fabius wheeling about his wings of Horſemen, for to fetch a compaſs, ſet upon the Infantry at their backs: Whereupon aroſe a new fearful cry, which cauſed the hearts of the Samnits to tremble and quake. The Dictator withal, ſeeing the formoſt of the enemies fighting in the front, looking back ever and anon, their enſigns out of order, and all their battailons waving and floting to and fro; called hard upon his ſouldiers, and exhorted F them to fight luſtily: cried unto the Colonels, the Sergeants of Bands and Corporals ſeverally by name, to re-encharge and renew the battel again with him. Thus with a freſh and new ſhout, they advance the Standards, and ſet forward the enſigns: and the farther they march on, the more perceived they the enemies to be troubled, and in diſaray. And now by this time, the Horſemen alſo were within the ſight of the formoſt in the vanguard: and Cornelius looking back to the bands and companies of his footmen, making ſign with hand and with voyce as well as he could, ſhewed and made demonſtration unto them, that they ſaw the colours and targets of their own fellow Horſemen. Which when they once heard, and ſaw withal; preſently as if they had forgot the battel which they endured almoſt a whole day, and felt no ſmart of their wounds, they beſtirred themſelves againſt the enemy as luſtily, as if they had newly come out of their tents, freſh G and in heart, and ſeen but now the ſignal, and heard the ſound of trumpet, to a battel. Now were the Samnits no longer able to ſuſtain the terror of the Horſemen behind, and the violence of the footmen before: but were either ſlain in the mids between, or ſcattered abroad in flight. Such as ſtayed and were environed about, the footmen ſlew: thoſe who fled, were trodden under the Horſe feet and killed: among whom the General himſelf left his body on the earth. This battel above all other, ſo quelled and daunted the hearts of the Samnits and cruſhed their forces, that in all their Diets and Councels they mutterered and gave out, That it was no marvel that they ſped ſo ill, in all their affairs of arms, the quarrel was ſo bad and ungodly, and the war be- H gun ſo contrary to a covenant of truce, and having the very Gods, and that juſtly, more againſt them and greater enemies than men: and that ſuch a war muſt needs coſt ſome great overthrow, and might not be expiat without ſome notable ſatisfaction. Here only was the difficulty and difference, whether vengeance and puniſhment ſhould be taken of the guilty bloud of ſome few, or the guiltleſs bloud of all. And even then, ſome there were, that durſt nominate the very authors of this war. And one ſpecially, to wit, Brutulus Papius, whoſe name was by the common voyce and conſent heard above all the reſt. A noble and mighty man he was, and without queſtion, the principal breaker of this laſt truce. The Pretors being enforced therefore, to determine as touching him what was to be done; at length decreed, That Brutulus Papius ſhould be delivered to the I Romans, and that together with him, all the Roman pillage and their priſoners ſhould be ſent to Rome: and that of all the goods, unto which according to the covenant and compoſition, the Fecials laid claim, there ſhould, according to right and equity, reſtitution be made. Then were the Heralds, by vertue of the decree, ſent to Rome, together with the deads corps of Brutulus: for he to avoid ſhame and puniſhment, wilfully killed himſelf. It was thought good, that with his body all his goods alſo, ſhould be delivered. Howbeit none of all theſe things but only the captives, and whatſoever could juſtly be owned out of the booty, was received: all the reſt were offered, but in vain, for nothing was accepted. The Dictator by vertue of an act of the Senat, triumphed. Some write that this war was fought by the Conſuls, and that they triumphed over the Samnits: and that Fabius alſo went forward into Apulia, and from thence brought away K great and rich prizes. But without all controverſie A. Cornel. was Dictator that year: this only was the doubt, whether he were created for the conduct of this war, or at the Roman games [Circenſes,] (becauſe L. Cantius hapned to be grievouſly ſick) to give the ſignal when the chariots and ſteeds ſhould be let out of the Barriers to run the race for their prize: and that having done that function of a charge (I wis not worth the remembrance) he ſhould leave his Dictators place. It is not an eaſy thing to prefer either one matter, or one author before another. I ſuppoſe rather for my part, that the record and memorial of theſe matters hath been depraved and corrupted, by theſe funeral Orations of praiſes, and by theſe counterfeit and falſe titles of images: whiles every houſe and family draweth to it, the honour and renown of noble exploits, martial feats, and dignities, by any untruth and lie, ſo it be colourable. And hereupon, ſurely it is, that both the I deeds of particular perſons, and the publick records and monuments of Acts, are confounded: neither is there extant any one writer, who lived in thoſe dayes, upon whom, as a true and certain author, we might ground, and reſt our ſelves.

B AFter this year, immediately followed the peace made at Caudium, so memorable for the Romans soil and misfortune, which hapned in the Consulship of T. Veturius Calvinus, and Sp. Postumius. During which, the Samnits had for their General Conducter, C. Pontius, the son of Herennius, a most prudent and politick father, and was himself a worthy warrior, and a most excellent Captain. This Pontius, after the Embassadors aforesaid (who had been sent to yeeld and deliver the goods) were returned home without peace concluded, spake thus in a frequent assembly of the Samnits, and said: "Masters and friends, think never, "but good there hath been done in this voyage, and our Embassage hath taken some effect. For "look what wrath the Gods in Heaven conceived against us, by our breach of covenant and "truce, is thereby wholly satisfied, and fully done away. This I know assuredly, that the Gods a- "bove (whose pleasure it was, that we should be driven to this neer point and hard exigent, as "to render the goods claimed of us, by vertue of an accord and covenant) were nothing conten- C "ted and pleased, that this our satisfaction and recompence for the breach thereof was so proud- "ly and disdainfully despised and rejected of the Romans. For what could possibly have been "done more, either to pacify the Gods, or to appease men, than that which we offered and per- "formed? Whatsoever we won by way of hostility and spoil, from our enemies, and which by "right of war seemed to be ours, we sent back again: the counsellors and perswaders of taking "arms, because we could not send alive, we delivered dead as they were: and their very goods "also (because nothing might remain with us, to bring us within the compass of their guiltiness) "we brought to Rome. What ow I more to thee O Roman? what am I bound to perform be- "sides, in regard either of covenant, or of the Gods, the judges of the covenant? Whom shall I "chuse and take for an indifferent arbitrator between thine anger and my punishment? No State D "and body of people in general, no private person in particular do I refuse: and if no equity and "reason for the poor and needy, be reserved amongst men against the greater and more mighty, "yet flie will I, and have recourse to the Gods, the Revengers of such intolerable pride: and I "will pray them to turn their anger upon those, whom neither restitution of their own goods, "nor the tendring of other mens withal to boot, will serve and content: whose fell cruelty, nei- "ther the death of the guilty persons, nor the delivery of dead bodies, neither the owners them- "selves yeelded, nor all they had in the World rendred with them, can satisfie: briefly, who may "not possibly be appeased, without we should part with our heart bloud unto them, for to drink, "and give our bowels and entrails to be torn in pieces. The war (O Samnits) is just and right "on their behalf, who have no way and means to avoid it: and ever lawfully take they arms, who E "have no other hope, but in force of arms. Since then, in all the affairs of this World, nothing "is of more importance than this, That men weigh and consider, whether the Gods be gratious "or adverse unto their enterprises: be sure of this, that as we made our former war not so much "against men as the Gods; so, we shall fight that which is now in hand, in the name of the "Gods, and under their conduct and guidance. Having spoken by way of Prophesie these words, (which as they were right pleasant and plausible in the hearing, so they proved as true and were verified in the success ensuing) he lead forth an army into the field and about Caudium he encamped himself, as covertly as he could. From thence he sendeth to * Calatia (where he heard that the Roman Consuls and their forces lay in camp) ten souldiers disguised in the habit of Herdmen, and commanded them to keep their cattel grasing apart, some in one place and some in another, F but never far from the Romans forts and guards: with this instruction, That when they hapned upon any of the Roman foragers and vantcurriers, they should agree all in one tale, and say, That the Samnit legions were in Apulia, besieging Luceria with all their forces, and were at the point of winning it by assault. This rumour also was on purpose by others before, set abroad and spread yea, and came to the Romans ears: but these captives made it sound more credible and like to be true, for this especially, that all their words agreed one with another. No man doubted but that the Romans would aid the Lucerins, their good and faithful Allies, and the rather for fear lest all Apulia would upon this present trouble and fearful example revolt, and band with the Samnits: and the only thing they stood upon was this, Which way to go unto them. For twain there were leading to Luceria: the one, broad and open, along the coast of the Adria- G tick Sea: but as it was the safer, so it was the farther about. Another shorter cut there was through the streights or gullet of * Caudium called Furculæ Caudinæ. But the natural situation of the place is thus: There are two deep, narrow, and woddy pases, or dales, one in the tail of the other, with continual crests and ridges of hills round about them: between them lieth enclosed in the midst, a good large plain or meadow, green of gras and full of waters, through the midst whereof, there lieth a direct passage. But before ye come to that green, ye must enter into that first streight aforesaid, and return again either the same way that ye went in, or if ye proceed to go forward, ye must pas through another such pas or streight, but narrower and more cumberſome than the other. Into that plain aforeſaid the Romans marched down with H their army another way, through and hollow rock, but when they went on forth to the other ſtreight valley, they found it ſtopped and made up with the fall of trees, one croſs over another, and likewiſe with an huge heap of mighty ſtones, laid full againſt them in the way. And they had not ſo ſoon diſcovered this guilful practiſe of their enemies, but they might deſcry withal, a power of them alſo on the top of the Hill. Then with all ſpeed they ſeek to go back again the ſame way they came; but it they found alſo dammed up in like ſort, and beſet with armed men. Whereupon they made a ſtand, without any mans commandment: and as their minds were all amazed and aſtonied, ſo their bodies alſo were poſſeſſed as it were with a ſtrange and extraordinary nummedneſs in their limmets: and whiles they looked one upon another, each man thinking his fel- I low to be more witty, and have better underſtanding than himſelf; for a good while they ſtood ſtill, and ſaid not a word. But afterwards, when as they ſaw the two Conſuls pavillions a ſetting up, and ſome making ready things neceſſary to fortification; although they ſaw well enough, that in this deſperate caſe, paſt all hope of recovery, for all the defences they could deviſe, they ſhould but loſe their time and travel and prove fools in the end: yet nevertheleſs, becauſe they would not ſeem to encreaſe their diſtreſſed fortune, and double it with their own default and negligence, every man what he could, to his power, without the direction of any leader, ſetled himſelf to work, and to fortify along the water ſide their camp, with a trench and rampier. And beſides the inſolent and proud ſcoffing and deriſion of their enemies, every man with pittiful confeſſion ſcorned and checked his own work and travel, as vain, and to no purpoſe. As the Conſuls K then were penſive and diſcomforted, and called none about them to counſel, (for that indeed they ſuppoſed they were paſt all adviſe and help) the Lieutenants and Colonels came unto them of their ſelves unſent for, and the ſouldiers turning to the Prærorium or Conſuls Quarter, cryed to their Captains for help and ſuccour, which hardly the very immortal Gods could afford and give them. But they, rather made their moans and complaints one to another of their misfortune, than ſat in ſage counſel to give or take adviſe, until the night came upon them: whiles each man according to his natural humour and fancy, muttered diverſly. "One ſaid, let us break through "the ſtoppages oppoſed againſt us in the way: another, let us paſs over the mountains and "woods before us, what way ſoever we may be able to cary armour; for ſo we get to the ene- "my once, whom we have almoſt for theſe thirty years vanquiſhed and chaſed before us; all will L

"be plain, even and eaſy unto us Romans fighting againſt theſe faithleſs, perjured, and diſloyal "Samnits. Tuſh, ſaith another, whither ſhould we go, or which way? What? Are we about to "remove mountains out of their places? So long as theſe tops of Hills are over our heads, how "will you poſſibly come to the enemy? Armed or unarmed, courageous or cowards, all is one, en- "trapped we are and undone every one. Our enemy will not ſo much as offer us the ſword, "whereon we may dye like men with honor: he will ſit ſtill and end this war. Thus paſſed words to and fro and thus paſſed the night away: unmindful were they of taking repaſt, never thought they of taking repoſe and ſleep. The Samnits on the other ſide, in this ſo fortunat and happy opportunity preſented unto them, were as much to ſeek what to do, and what courſe to chuſe and follow. Whereupon, they all in general were to diſpatch letters to Herennius Pontius, the fa- M ther of their General, and to know his opinion. Now this man beforetime, by reaſon of his great age, had given over not only Military affairs, but alſo all civil buſineſſes: howbeit in that old craſy and ſpent body of his, he bare the freſh vigour of mind and a pregnant wit to give counſel. When he underſtood that the Romans army was ſhut up faſt within the two forreſts, at the Caudine Gullets, and that his adviſe was asked by his ſons meſſenger: he gave preſently this counſel, That with all ſpeed they ſhould be let go from thence every one, without any harm at all done unto them. Which opinion of his being rejected [of his ſon and the army] his mind was demanded a ſecond time, by the ſame currier ſent again unto him of purpoſe. And then he gave adviſe, that they ſhould be all killed, and not one left alive. Upon which anſwers ſo far diſagreeing, and thus delivered, as it were out of a doubtful Oracle: albeit his ſon himſelf N imagined, of all others moſt, that his fathers wit was in the wane, and aged as well as his feeble waſted body: yet by a general conſent of all he was overcome, to ſend for him in perſon for to declare his meaning by word of mouth. Neither thought the old man much thereof, but was brought (by report) to the camp in a chariot: and beeing called to counſel, he was in the ſame tale ſtill, ſo as he nothing changed of his former adviſe, but alleaged only cauſes and reaſons thereof. "Namely, that in his former reſolution (which he took to be ſimply the beſt) "his meaning was, by a ſingular benefit and good turn, to confirm peace and amity for ever, "with a moſt mighty and puiſſant people: in the ſecond his purpoſe was, by the utter loſſe of "two armies, whereby the State of Rome would not eaſily recover their ſtrength again, to defer "the wars for many a year. And as for a third counſel, he had none at all. When his ſon and O other chief Captains, by queſtioning inquired of him, what if a middle courſe between both were taken; namely to diſmiſs them ſafe, and according to the Law of arms and conqueſt to impoſe upon them, hard Laws and Conditions? "Mary (quoth he) this is the way indeed, that "neither winneth you friends, nor yet riddeth you of your foes: ſave them whom ye have pro- "voked with ſhame and diſgrace; and ſee what ye get thereby. The Romans are of this nature, "that they cannot be ſtill and quiet ſo long as they have the worſe; it will never dye in their "hearts, but wil be alwayes freſh whatſoever ſhame this preſent extremity ſhal brand them with:

"and

A "and never will it give them any reſt, before they have been by manifold and ſundry wayes reven-
"ged of you. So his adviſe was not accepted, neither the one nor the other, and old Herennius was carried home again from the camp. The Romans likewiſe in the camp, after many attempts (but all in vain) for to break forth and eſcape away, being now in great penury and ſcarcity of all things, for very neceſſity were driven to ſend Embaſſadors unto the enemies: who firſt ſhould crave an equal and indifferent peace: and if they might not obtain it, then to bid defiance and challenge them to a battel. Pontius made anſwer, that there was no talking of battel; for that the field was won already: and becauſe they being vanquiſhed, and as good as taken captive, knew not how to come down and confeſs their poor eſtate; he gave them to underſtand, That he would put them under the gallows, deſpoiled of their armour, and ſtript into their ſhirts: and as B for other conditions of peace, they ſhould be ſuch, as were meet to paſs between men conquered, and conquerours: namely, if they would depart out of the Samnits country, withdraw their colonies, and ſo both Samnit and Roman in equal alliance live under their own laws and cuſtomes:
upon theſe Articles and Capitulations, he was content to come to ſome point of accord with the Conſuls. If any of theſe covenants diſliked them, then he forbad the Embaſſadors to repair again to him any more, but at their peril. When relation of this anſwer was made in the camp, there aroſe ſuddenly ſuch a ſighing and groning amongſt them all, and ſo great penſiveneſs and anguiſh of heart ſeized upon them, that it ſeemed they could not have taken it more heavily, and to the heart, if word had been brought that they muſt all have died in the place. After long ſilence, when as the Conſuls wiſt not how to open their mouth, either for the accord and compoſition C ſo ſhameful, or againſt it ſo neceſſary: then L. Lentulus, who as well in regard of his vertue, as of his dignities, was chief of all the Lieutenants, ſaid: "I have heard my father (quoth he) O ye
"Conſuls, oftentimes make report, that he was the only man in the Capitol, who perſwaded the "Senat, not to ranſome and redeem with gold, the City from the hands of the Gauls; at what "time as they were not incloſed either with trench or rampier by their enemies, (a Nation to
"ſay a truth, of all others moſt idle in ſuch works, and fortifications) but might have broken "through them, if not without great danger, yet without evident ruin, and aſſured deſtruction.
"Were the caſe ſo now that as they then, being armed might have run down out of the Capitol
"upon their enemies under them (in which ſort oftentimes the beſieged have ſallied out upon "them that lay in ſiege) ſo we might but fight with our enemies in any place (it skilleth not) D "good or bad even or uneven: I would not in giving counſel be any jot behind my father in cou"rage and valor. For I confeſs verily that to die for our country is a brave death: and for my own "part, ready am I even to offer my body as a ſacrifice to preſent death, yea, and it were, to engage
"my ſelf among the thickeſt of my enemies, thereby to ſave the people of Rome and the legions:
"But alas, here I ſee my country, here I ſee all the Roman Regiments and Legions that are, who "unleſs for their own ſelves they will run upon their death, what have they elſe to ſave by their "death? Why, will ſome man ſay, the houſes and buildings of the City, the walls, and that mul"titude that inhabit the City. Nay rather, if this army fortune here to miſcarry, they are all clean "betrayed into the enemies hand and not ſaved. For who ſhall defend them? Peradventure, the "weak and unarmed multitude: even as well ſurely as they defended it againſt the violence of the E "Gauls: Or, will they ſend for an army from Veii, and beſeech the help again of Captain Camillus?
"Even the one as well as the other. But here in this place is our whole hope, here is all our power "and puiſſance: in ſaving it, we preſerve our country; in offering it to die, we abandon and betray
"our country. To yeeld and render our ſelves, is a foul and ſhameful thing; true, but ſuch is
"the love of our Country, that we ought to preſerve it, as well with our utter ſhame, if need re"quire, as by our death. Let us undergo then, and abide this ſhameful indignity whatſoever,
"and obey that fatal neceſſity, which the very Gods themſelves cannot overcome. Go to then,
"Conſuls, a Gods name, redeem the City with your armor and weapons, which your fore-fa"thers ranſomed with their gold. Then went the Conſuls to Pontius for to parle. And when as he began like a conqueror to debate about the capitulations of Covenants, they denied plainly F that any league could be made, without the privity, will and authority of the whole people: nor without the Fecials, and other ſolemn and uſual Ceremonies. So that this Caudine accord was not (as commonly it is believed, and as Claudius alſo writeth) concluded by form of abſolute covenant, but by way of ſtipulation and promiſe. For what needed either ſureties in a perfect agreement and league, or hoſtages to be given when the matter is paſſed by this form of prayer,
By whoſe default it hapned that the conditions agreed were not obſerved, that people Jupiter would ſo ſmite, as the ſwine there was by the fecial ſmitten? The Coſſ. Lieutenants, Treaſurers, and Colonels, who undertook as ſureties, ſubſcribed and ſigned; and the names yet are extant of them all: where, if the matter had paſſed by way of an abſolute league, there ſhould have been ſubſcri-bed no more but the names of two Fecials only. Moreover, by reaſon that the concluſion of G this accord was of neceſſity deferred, there were required alſo 600 Horſemen hoſtages, who ſhould loſe their heads, in caſe the covenants of the agreement were not obſerved. And thereupon was the time appointed and ſet down of delivering the ſaid hoſtages, and yeelding the army without their armor. Now the coming of the Conſuls renewed again the ſorrow in the camp, that hardly they could hold their hands from thoſe, through whoſe raſh conduct they were come to that place of diſadvantage: and through whoſe cowardiſe they were to depart from thence more ſhamefully than they came: complaining that they had not ſo much as a guide to direct them, nor an espial to discover the coasts: but like beasts were driven blinded into a trap or H pitfal: and one looked upon another; beholding the armor that within a while they were to deliver up, viewing their right hands, which anon should be unarmed, their naked bodies exposed to the mercy and devotion of the enemy. They set before their eyes, the gallows prepared by the enemy for them to pass under, the scornes and reproachful taunts of the Victor, his proud and disdainful looks, and how they (disarmed) should pass in a long train and go through the armed enemies: then afterwards, the piteous spectacle of the way which they must go, and the shameful dismarch of their disgraced army: briefly, their foul and dishonourable return through the Cities of their allies unto their country and parents, whither they themselves and their ancestors oftentimes had gone in triumph. They were the only men, which without wound, without dint of I weapon, without battel fought, were discomfited and vanquished: who might not so much as draw their sword, and never came to joyn or encounter with their enemy; having armour, having strength of lim, having hearts given them in vain. As they brayed out with great discontentment and anguish, these words, the fatal hour of their reproach and shame was come; which by proof and sensible experience, was to make all matters more heavy and woful, than they conceived and imagined in their minds aforehand. First and foremost were they commanded all, to go forth without the trench disarmed, and in their single garments: then were the hostages presently delivered, and had to ward: after this, were the Serjeants and Officers willed to depart from the Consuls: whose rich coats of arms, when they were plucked from their shoulders, moved such pity and compassion even in them, who a while before with all cursing and banning, judged them worthy K to be delivered bound hand and foot into their enemies hands, for to be mangled despiteously and cut in pieces; that every man forgetting his own estate, wherein he stood, turned away his eyes, as it were from an abhominable spectacle, and could not indure to behold that disgracing and disfiguring of so great state and Majesty. The first that were put under the gallows, were the Coss. welneer half naked: and according to their degree and place, so was every one in order put to the shame: and afterward, the legions one after another. The enemies in their armor stood al the while about them, scorning, mocking, and making a game of them: many had swords and daggers set against their hearts, in menacing wise, some were hurt and stabbed to death; namely, such as with stern countenance and grim looks above the rest, for the indignity of these things, offended the conqueror. Thus were they sent with shame enough under the gallows, and (that which was L more grievous than the thing) even in the sight and view of their enemies, they were not so soon got out of the forrest, but although they seemed but then as plucked out of dark hel to see the day, yet the very light it self was worse than al kind of deaths, when they beheld so ill favoured an army and unseemly. And therefore, albeit they might have reached to Capua before night, yet being doubtful of the faithfulnes and protection of their allies, or else dismaied for very shame, they cast their poor and silly bodies upon the ground, about the high wayes not far from Capua. Whereof, when news came to Capua, the just and due pitty which they took of their allies, overcame the inbred arrogancy and pride of that people by kind. Immediatly they sent unto the Coss. the ensigns and ornaments belonging to their place of authority, the Lictors and Serjeants with their rods, they sent armor and Horses, apparel and victual also for the souldiers bountifully: and as they came neer M to Capua, the whole Senat and people went out to meet them, and performed all duties of kindnes and hospitality both privat and publick, that could be devised, and as meet was and requisite. And yet neither the courteous usage, nor the pleasant countenances and lightsome speeches of their allies, could draw from them any words, no, nor so much as make them to hold up their heads and eyes, and to look again upon their friends, when they yeelded them al these comforts they could. So as, besides their grief and sorrow of heart, a certain bashfulnes and shame forced them to shun all communication and conversing with men. The morrow after, when as certain young Gentlemen of the Nobility were returned, who had been sent in convoy from Capua, to accompany them and bring them on their way, as far as their liberties and confins; they were sent for into the Senat-house, and being demanded by the ancients and elders, what news: they reported, that they N seemed unto them much more heavy and cast down than before, so silent and in manner dumb, they marched along: that noble mind and courage of the Romans was now mute and mum, their hearts clean done and gone together with their armor, not able to greet again, no, nor to give a word to those that saluted them, not one of them for fear able to open his mouth, as if still they bare that yoke and gallows upon their necks, under which they went. That the Samnits had indeed not only a brave victory, but also a perpetual over them, and the hand of them for ever; and had now won not Rome, as the Gauls aforetime, but also (which was a more hardy and warlike exploit) had conquered the Romans courage, stoutnes, and valour. As these news were reported, and audience given thereto, with such assent, that every man lamented now the Roman name, as desperat; and concluded generally it was in the counsel of these their faithful confederats, that O they were past recovery; one Offilius Calavius, the son of Ovius, a man right nobly born, renowned for his valiant Acts, and besides, very grave and reverend for his age, spake by report in this manner and said, That he took the matter far otherwise than they all did: for that stubborn and resolut silence, (qd. he) those eyes fastened so wistly on the earth, those deaf ears to admit al solace and comfort, that shame of theirs to look up and behold the light, were expres and certain tokens of them that tossed and rolled from the very root and bottom of their heart, a huge heap and mass of anger & despite. Either (qd. he) I know not the nature of the Romans, or else that stilnes & silence will

A will ſhortly coſt the Samnits, woful cryes and doleful groans: and the remembrance of this Caudium accord, wil be more heavy and dolorous a good deal to the Samnits than to the Romans: for, as for them, they wil every man find their hearts and courages again, whereſoever they ſhal hap to encounter: but the Samnits ſhal not meet every where with the Caudium ſtreights for their purpoſe.

And now by this time was this ſhameful overthrow and diſgrace known at Rome. Intelligence they had before, how they were beſet and encloſed about: but afterwards arrived a meſſenger with news more heavy and ſorrowful for that ignominious peace, than for any peril and danger otherwiſe. At the firſt noiſe and bruit that they were beſieged, they began to muſter; but after they heard, that they had ſo ſhamefully yeelded themſelves, all that preparation of aid and ſuccor B was diſcharged and ſent away: and preſently without any order from publick authority, they gave themſelves every one to all manner of mourning and lamentation. The ſhops all about the market place were ſhut up. A general vacation began of it ſelf, and pleading in all courts ceaſed, before Proclamation made: the purple and ſcarlet robes were left off, the golden rings laid away, and the whole City in a manner more ſorrowful and heavy, than the very army. Neither were they angry and offended with the Captains only, with the authors of the peace, with the cautions and ſureties for the ſame; but hated alſo the guiltleſs ſouldiers, denying flatly, that they were worthy to be received into City or houſe. Which heat of ſtomack and wrathful indignation, the firſt arrival of the army, utterly allayd; which even to angry perſons was pitiful and lamentable. For they returned not as men that eſcaped ſafe, alive, and unlooked for into their country, C but like captives in habit and countenance; they entred late into the Town, and hid their heads, every man within own houſe: ſo as the morrow after, and for certain dayes following, none of them would come into the market place, nor put his head out at dores to look into the ſtreets. The Conſuls likewiſe for their part, kept in, as privat men, and would exerciſe no function pertaining to their charge, but only that which thy were forced unto by an act of the Senat; namely, to nominate a Dictator for to be Preſident at the Election of Conſuls. So, they elected Q. Fabius Ambuſtus for Dictator, and P. Ælius Paetus, General of Horſe. Who being wrong created, and without the approbation of the Auſpices, there were choſen in their room, M. Æmylius Pappus for Dictator. and L. Valerius Flaccus General of the Horſemen, and yet by them was not the aſſembly holden for the Election aboveſaid. And for aſmuch as the people were even weary D again of all that years Magiſtrats, as unlucky and unfortunate, it grew at length to an Interreign. So Interregents there were, Q. Fabius Maximus, and M. Valerius Corvinus, who created Conſuls, Q. Publius Philo, and L. Papirius Curſor the ſecond time; with the whole conſent, no doubt, of the City, for that in thoſe dayes there were not two more noble and renowned Captains to be found.

Theſe ſame day they were created, they entred their Magiſtracy (for ſo the LL. of the Councel had decreed:) and after certain ſolemn and ordinary acts of the Senat paſſed, they went in hand to conſult about the treaty of the Caudine peace. And Publius, whoſe courſe it was then to have the ſoveraignty of rule; "Speak (quoth he) Sp. Poſthumius, to the matter propounded, "and let us hear your opinion, and what you can ſay. Who after he was riſen and ſtood up, E "with the very ſame countenance and cheer that he went under the gallows; I am not, (quoth he) "O ye Conſuls, ignorant, that I am firſt called forth, not for honour, but to my diſgrace; and "commanded to ſpeak, not as a Senator and Counceller, but as a man culpable and accuſed, both "for an unfortunate war adminiſtred, and a ſhameful peace concluded. Howbeit, ſeeing that "ye have not propounded and touched ought, concerning either our treſpaſs or our puniſhment, "(ſetting apart all kind of excuſe and defence, which would be no very hard matter to maintain, "before men that are not ignorant of humane fortune, and of neceſſities, whereto men may be "driven) I will in brief deliver my mind concerning that, which you have moved and propoun- "ded. Which ſentence of mine may ſufficiently witneſs and teſtify, whether I meant to ſpare mine "own life, or ſave your legions, when as I became bound to that diſhoneſt or neceſſary ſtipula- F "tion and promiſe, call it whether ye will. And yet, ſeeing it was made without the peoples pri- "vity and grant, the State of Rome is not obliged thereto, and thereby nothing due to the Sam- "nits, but only our bare bodies. Let us therefore be rendered by the hands of the Feciales and "Heralds, in our ſhirts, and faſt bound: let us deliver and rid the people of all ſcruple and trouble "of conſcience, if we have entangled them with any; that there be no let in Law of God or man, "but that both juſtly and lawfully ye may begin the war anew. In the mean while my mind and "advice is, that the Conſuls levy, enrol, arme, and lead forth an army: but not to enter within "the enemies marches, before all things duly belonging to the delivery of us into their hands, "be fully accompliſhed. Now, I pray and beſeech ye, O immortal Gods, that ſeeing it was not "your good will and pleaſure, that Sp. Poſthumius and T. Veturius Conſuls, ſhould with fortunate G "conduct fight againſt the Samnits, yet ye would be ſatisfied herewith, That ye beheld us put un- "der the gallows: that ye ſaw us obliged in an infamous and ſhameful bond of covenant: that "ye now view us naked and delivered bound into the enemies hands, ready to receive upon our "heads even with the loſs of our lives al their anger, malice, and deſpight: and that it would pleaſe "you, that the new Conſuls and Legions of the Romans, may in that ſort war with the Samnits, "as evermore the wars before us Conſuls have been conducted, managed and performed. When he had ſpoken theſe words, all men both ſo wondred at this man and pitied him too, that one while they would not believe he was the ſame Sp. Poſthumius, who had moved and perſwaded ſo foul foul and diſhoneſt a treaty of peace: otherwhiles they lamented that ſo brave and noble a perſonage, ſhould ſuffer any eſpecial torment above other, at the enemies hands, for anger and deſpite of reverſing and breach of that accord. When as now they all after ſingular praiſes of the man, condeſcended to his opinion; the Tribuns of the Com. L. Livius and Q. Melius, attempted for a while to oppoſe themſelves againſt this proceeding: ſaying, "That neither the people could be "acquit and aſſoiled in conſcience, by their delivery, unleſs every thing were again reſtored to "the Samnits, in the ſame eſtate wherein they ſtood at Caudium: nor they themſelves (in that they "ſubſcribed and became bound for the accord of peace, to ſave the hoſt of the people of Rome) "had deſerved any puniſhment: nor yet, laſt of all, ought they being ſacred Migiſtrats and in- "violable, to be yeelded to the enemies, and expoſed to any outrage and violence. Then (quoth "Poſthumius) in the mean while deliver us up that are but lay and profane men, whom with ſafe "conſcience and without offence ye may. And as for theſe, ſo ſacro-ſainct as they now be, ye "ſhall hereafter render them likewiſe, ſo ſoon as they are out of their charge. But if ye will be ru- "led by me, let them before they be thus yeelded, here in this common Hal be whipped and ſcour- "ged for the uſury and intereſt of their puniſhment, which they would ſeem to defer and put off "ſo long. For whereas they alledge and ſay, That by the delivery and yeelding of us, the peoples "conſciences cannot be cleered and aſſoiled; who is ſo ignorant in the Feciales and Heralds law, "that knoweth not that theſe men ſpake this, for this end rather, that they themſelves might not "be rendred, than for that the truth requireth ſo. Neither do I deny my Lords, that bare pro- "miſes and ſtipulations are unviolable, and to be kept as well as covenants and obligations with "thoſe men, among whom both Religion to Godward, and faithfulneſs to men is in regard and "eſtimation: but I deny again, that without the peoples aſſent and grant, any thing can be eſta- "bliſhed good and effectual, to bind the people thereunto. What! if the Samnits, in the ſame "pride and inſolency, wherein they obtruded and forced upon us this ſtipulation, yea, and wrung "it from us, would alſo have urged us to utter and ſpeak, the ſolemn form of words, which they "uſe to do that ſurrender up Cities; would ye (my Maſters that are Tribuns) infer and ſay, that "by vertue thereof the people of Rome is ſurrendred into their hands? and that this City, with the "Temples, Chappels, Limits and Waters, by ſtrength thereof, are the Samnits poſſeſſion? Well, I "let paſs to ſpeak of dedition, becauſe the matter in queſtion is touching only a ſtipulation. "What, I pray you if we had promiſed and undertook, that the people of Rome ſhould forſake "and abandon this City? or ſet fire on it? or not have Magiſtrats, Senat, or laws any longer? or "to be governed again by Kings? God forbid and deny that, ſay you. Well, it is not the indignity "of things, that eaſeth the bond of Stipulation. If there be any one caſe, wherein the people may "be obliged, then in truth may they be in all as well: neither skilleth it any whit, (whereat hap- "ly ſome will make a ſtay, and think it is material) whether Conſul, Dictator, or Pretor, enter "into bond and become ſurety. And even this it was, that the Samnits themſelves judged ſo to "be, and ſtood upon: thinking it not ſufficient, that the Conſuls became bound, but they put the "Lieutenants the Treaſurers, and the Colonels there, to the ſame. And now, let no man demand "of me, why I entred ſo into ſtipulation, being a thing not incident to the Conſul his charge and "right, neither was I to undertake unto them peace, which was not in my power to effect: nor "in your name to promiſe it, from whom I had no commiſſion and warrant. Certainly my Lords "and Senators, there was nothing at Caudium done at all by mans policy and counſel. The im- "mortal Gods bereft both your Generals and the enemies too, of all their ſenſe and underſtan- "ding: for neither we, in the conduct and ordering of our ſervice, ſtood warily enough upon our "good guard: and they again, as they gat the victory full badly, ſo they loſt it as lewdly: whiles "they hardly truſted the ſtrength of thoſe places, by means of which they had gained the vantage "and better hand of us: and while they made ſuch haſt, upon what agreement they cared not, to "diſarm men that are born martial, and naturally made for wars. For, if they had been in their "right wits, what an hard matter was it for them in the time that they ſent for old aged men from "their home, to come to Councel, for to have diſpatched their Embaſſadors to Rome? and ſo to "have dealt and treated with the Senat and people, about a perfect peace and final league indeed? "It had been but three dayes journey for men not encumbred, but lightly appointed. All that "mean while there might have been truce, until the Embaſſadors from Rome, had brought them "either certain victory or aſſured peace. For that had been a covenant and ſtipulation good in "law, the which we ſhould have agreed unto, by warrant of the peoples will and approbation. "But ye would never have granted and allowed it: no more ſhould we have entred into any ſuch "ſtipulation. Neither was it Gods will and providence, that there ſhould be any other iſſue and "end of things than this: that both they ſhould vainly be deluded and feed themſelves as it were, "with the fancy of a more joyful dream than their minds could wel conceive and apprehend: and "alſo that the ſame fortune which had entangled, ſnared and brought into danger our army, "ſhould relieve the ſame, and rid it again out of peril: that as their victory was frivolous and vain, "ſo a vainer and more frivolous peace, ſhould make it fruſtrat and worth nothing: and that ſuch a "ſtipulation and promiſe ſhould be interpoſed and come between, which might oblige and bind "no perſon, but the very makers themſelves. For what dealing hath there been with you my Lords "of the Senat? or with the people of Rome? Who can challenge you? Who can call you into que- "ſtion? Who can come forth and complain that he is by you deceived? Enemy, or Citizen? To "enemy ye have paſſed no promiſe: Citizen to undertake for you and in your name, ye com-

A "commanded none. Therefore ye have nothing to do to meddle with us, to whom ye gave "nought in charge: and with the Samnits as little, with whom ye had no treaty at all. To the "Samnits, we are ſufficient pledges enough, and anſwerable to perform that which is our own:
"for that, I ſay, which we are able to make good and yeeld; even our bodies and lives: upon
"theſe let them exerciſe their rage, upon theſe let them whet their ſwords and their ſpightful "malice. And as for the Tribuns of Commons, conſult ye together, whether they may be ren-
"dred preſently, or ought to be reſerved and put off to an other day: let us in the mean time (O "Veturius, and ye that are the reſt) offer theſe wretched heads and lives of ours, like caytives to "diſcharge our bond, and by our puniſhment and execution, deliver and ſet free the Roman B "army.

Both the cauſe it ſelf, and the Advocat alſo, moved the Lords of the Senat: and wrought ſo much not only with the reſt, but alſo with the Tribuns themſelves [of Commons] that they promiſed to be at the Conſuls ordering and appointment. Whereupon immediatly they gave up their offices, and were delivered into the Fecials hands with the other, to be led all, to Caudium. There was not ſo ſoon an act of the Senat paſſed hereof, but it ſeemed that the very light and rayes of the Sun ſhone upon the City again. Poſthumius was in every man his mouth, him they praiſed and extolled to the heavens: comparing him with the voluntary offering of P. Decius the Conſul, for the ſafety of the army, and other worthy and noble acts of others: Saying, that by his overture, by his means and travel, the City was delivered from a ſervil, diſhonourable and un-C honeſt peace: He (ſay they) hath offered himſelf to al the torments, anger, and vengeance of the enemies, and made full ſatisfaction thereby for the people of Rome. Nothing now but war, war: Alarm, now cryed every man: and, oh, that ever they might ſee the day to encounter once again with the Samnits, in their armour and with weapon in hand. So, whiles the City was thus inflamed and boiled with hateful ire and indignation, there was an army levied, well near all of Voluntaries. New legions were muſtred and enrolled again out of the ſame ſouldiers, and a puiſſant army ſet forth to Caudium. The Fecials marched before, and when they were come to the gate of the City, commanded the Sureties, ſuch as had ſubſcribed and ſigned the accord aforeſaid, to be deſpoiled and ſtript out of their cloths, and their hands to be pinnioned behind him. And when the Lictor or Serjeant, for very reverence of Majeſty in Poſthumius his perſon, bound him
D at large and at eaſe, Why doeſt not thou (quoth he) draw and pull the cord ſtreighter, that the rendring and delivery of us may be according to law and as it ought to be, and no fault to be found withal? Afterwards, when they were come into the aſſembly of the Samnits, and before the Tribunal judgment ſeat of Pontius; A. Cornelius Arvina one of the Fecials or Heralds thus ſpake: For aſmuch as theſe perſons, without commandment and commiſſion from the Quirites and people of Rome, have undertaken by ſtipulation, That there ſhall a league and peace be made with you; and in ſo doing have offended and treſpaſſed againſt the State, therefore, to the end, that the people of Rome might be freed and aſſoiled from a deteſtable and heinous offence, Here I deliver and yeeld unto you, the ſelf ſame men. No ſooner had he uttered theſe words, but Poſthumius with his knee ſmote the Fecial his high, with all the might he could: and with a loud
E voyce ſaid, That he being now a Samnit citizen, and the other an Embaſſador and an Herald of the people of Rome; had againſt the Law of Nations injured him and offered him the abuſe: whereby the Romans might more juſtly make war. Then quoth Pontius. "This delivery nei"ther will I accept of and admit, neither ſhall the Samnits hold it good and lawful. But why "doſt not thou Sp. Poſthumius, if thou believe there be any Gods, either undo and cancel all, or "ſtand to thy bargain and covenant? For by right either are they all due unto the Samnits, whom "they once had in their power; or elſe peace, in lieu of them. But why ſpeak I thus, and chal"lenge thee, who doeſt yeeld thy ſelf again priſoner to the conqueror as faithfully and loially as "thou canſt? The people of Rome I challenge, who, if they repent of the promiſe and bargain "made at the ſtreights of Caudium, let them bring again the Legions into that gullet, wherein F "they were environed, encloſed, and compaſſed. Let no man deceive and delude other. Let all "be undone again, and every thing as it was: let them take again their armour, which by cove"nant they yeelded up: let them return into their own camp, and have whatſoever they had the "day before the Parle. Then let them pleaſe themſelves with war, with valiant and magnanimous
"deeds: refuſe they then, and ſpare not all covenant: reject they then all treaty of peace. Let us "have the ſame fortune, the ſame opportunity and vantage of the places, which we had before
"the mention of peace: and ſo make war, and trie the iſſue. So ſhall neither the people of "Rome, blame the Conſuls ſtipulation, nor we find any lack and default in the faithfulneſs of the "people of Rome. And will ye never have done, but alwayes find ſhifts and excuſes, and not
"ſtand to your covenants, when ye are overcome, and have the worſe of your enemies? Ye gave G "ſometimes hoſtages to King Porſena; and when ye had done, afterwards ſtole them away. For "a ſum of gold you bought again your City of the Gauls; and as they were receiving the ſame
"gold, murdered they were by you and hewn in pieces. Peace ye have covenanted with us upon "condition that we ſhould reſtore again your legions unto you; that peace you cancel and make "void, and evermore ye ſet ſome colour of right upon your cautelous and fraudulent dealing: Well,
"alloweth not the people of Rome of the ſaving of their Legions, by a diſhonorable and ſhameful
"peace? Say it is ſo. Let peace go whether it will: but give you again to the Victor your Legions "captivat. Is this your faithful dealing? are theſe your covenants, & ceremonies of Fecials & He"ralds?

"ralds? that thou, according to the agreement and accord, ſhouldſt have that deſire of thine, H
"even ſo many citizens lives ſaved? and I not have the peace (which by letting mine hold go un"to thee an enemy) I bargained for? What Juſtice is this, that thou, O Cornelius, and ye that are "heralds, preſcribe to Nations abroad? Nay verily, I neither will accept of thoſe perſons whom "ye make a ſhew to deliver, neither can I believe, that they are yeelded in verity and good earneſt.
"Nay, I paſs not at all, whether they return again into that City, which is obliged by a covenant
"made, attended upon with the wrath and diſpleaſure of all the Gods, whole heavenly power
"and deity is thus deluded. Now go and make war, ſeeing that Sp. Poſthumius erewhile thruſt
"and puſhed an Embaſſador herald with his knee; and ſo the Gods will believe no doubt, that "Poſthumius is a Samnit citizen, and no Roman; and that by a Samnit, a Roman Embaſſador hath I
"been abuſed: and thereupon you may take a juſt occaſion and good quarrel to make war upon "upon us. Are you not aſhamed, and baſh you not to broach and ſet abroad, in the view and "face of the world, ſuch mockeries of Religion? What? old and ancient grave perſonages, and "ſuch as have been Conſuls, to ſeek ſuch ſubtle devices (not fit for very children and babes to "play with) and all to ſhift off and falſify their promiſe made by covenant. Go Lictor, looſe the
"Romans of their bands: and no man ſo hardy as to ſtay them, but that they may depart when "they will at their own pleaſure. So they, having thus perhaps diſcharged the publick fidelity,
"or at leaſt wiſe quit themſelves undoubtedly of their own, returned from Caudium, unhurt, to "the Roman camp.

The Samnits ſeeing that in lieu of a proud and unreaſonable peace, there was a moſt cruel war K new ſprung up again, not only forecaſt and apprehended in their minds, but well neer ſaw evidently with their eyes, all that ever enſued after. Then, all too late and in vain, God wot, they praiſed the two-fold counſel of old Pontius: and how they taking the middle way between, were deceived & had exchanged the certain poſſeſſion of victory, for an uncertain and doubtful peace:
and having loſt the opportunity both of gratifying the Romans, or doing them harm any more, were now to fight & wage war with them, whom they might either have diſabled for being hurtful enemies, or made their faſt and aſſured friends for ever. And ſo without any weakning of their power and forces of either ſide by battel, their hearts after this Caudine peace were ſo changed, that Poſthumius by his voluntary yeelding was more honored among the Romans, than Pontius his bloodleſs victory among the Samnits: and the Romans made this reckoning, that L the poſſibility of making war was to them aſmuch as undoubted victory: and the Sam-nits believed verily, that the Romans had at once made war again and got the upper-hand.

Whiles theſe things thus paſſed, the Satricans revolted to the Samnits: and the Colony at Fre- gellæ, by the ſudden and unlooked for arrival of the Samnits (with whom it is certain the Satricans were banded) in the night was ſurpriſed and taken. But the mutual fear one of the other, kept them in on both ſides that they ſtirred not out until the morning. Then began the fight, which for a certain time was equal and indifferent: yet, for that the Fregellones within fought for their Church and chimney (as they ſay) and by reaſon that the multitude, unmeet for arms, ſtood them in good ſtead in annoying their enemies from off their houſes; they held out and M found them play a long time. But afterwards, a wily and deceitful policy turned all backwards and was their undoing: for they ſuffred the voyce of the cryer to be heard through the Town, who proclaimed, That whoſoever laid down weapon, ſhould depart alive and ſafe with bag and baggage. The hope whereof, cauſed them to ſlack ſomewhat of their fight, and therewith they began to caſt away their armor in every place. But the reſolut ſort armed ſtill, brake away through a poſtern gate, whoſe venturouſneſs proved to them more ſafe, than the inconſiderat fear of the other which made them credulous and too light of belief. For the Samnits compaſſed them about with fire, and for all they called upon the Gods for their help, and to their enemies for performance of their promiſe, yet they burned them moſt piteouſly.

The Conſuls parted between themſelves, their Provinces. Papyrius took his way to Luceria in N Apulia, where the Roman Horſemen given for hoſtages at Caudium were kept in ward: but Publi- us ſtayed in Samnium to make head againſt the Caudine legions. Which thing much troubled and diſtracted the minds of the Samnits: for neither their hearts would ſerve them to go to Luceria, leſt the enemy ſhould come on their backs; not yet to ſtay behind, for fear leſt in the while, Luce- ria ſhould be loſt. They thought it beſt therefore, to put all in hazard of a battel, and to try it out with Publius. Whereupon, they bring forth their power into the field: with whom when Publi- us was minded to joyn in fight, he thought it not amiſs, firſt to make ſome ſpeech unto his men, and ſo commanded them to aſſemble unto an audience. But, as they came running to the Prætorium, with exceeding great cheerfulnes, ſo by reaſon of their noiſe that called hard for battel, no exhortation of the General could be heard: each man his own heart mindful of the former diſ- O grace, ſerved well enough to encourage and animat them. So they march out to battel, putting forward the ſtandard-bearers and port-enſigns. And becauſe they would loſe no time, they firſt charge with lancing their javelins and ſhooting darts, and after that, in drawing their ſwords, they threw away their javelins, as if they had had a ſignal given them ſo to do, and with naked drawn ſword, they ran upon their enemies. No cunning was there to be ſhewed of warlike Captain, no skill to be ſhewed either in ſetting in array the files and ranks, or placing of the rereward for ſupplies: the ſouldiers furious anger, with raging violence, marſhalled and managed all.

So,

A So, the enemies were not only discomfited and put to the rout, but also because they durst not hinder their flight by retiring to their own camp, they made all the haft they could, disbanded as they were, toward Apulia. Howbeit they were rallied together in one company, and so came to Luceria. The Romans, in the same boiling heat of blood that they pierced through the mids of the enemies battel; entred also into their camp: where was more bloudshed and execution than in the battel, and the greater part of the pillage was in their choler marred and clean lost.

The other army commanded by Papirius the Coss. marched along the Sea coast to Arpi: and all the Country they passed thorow, shewed them friendship and courtesie, more for the outrages and losses sustained by the Samnits, and the hatred they bare them, than for any love to the people
B of Rome, or good received at their hands. And now the Samnits at that time dwelling upon the Hills in Villages, being mountainers and wild people, and as it is commonly seen, of like disposition to the places which they do inhabit, wasted the plain Champian and Sea coasts, despising indeed their more civil life and conversation. Which Country, if it had been true to the Samnits, either the Roman army had not been able to come to Arpi, or else the penury and scarcity of all things between Rome and Arpi, would have consumed them, being cut off from all provision of victuals. For even then, being gone from them, and lying encamped before Luceria, as wel they without in the leaguer & those that were within the City besieged, were nipped and bitten with hunger. The Romans were served all from Arpi, but so slenderly and scantly, that whiles the footmen were occupied in their guards warding, watching, and working unceſſantly; the Horsemen, were C fain to bring corn from Arpi, in little leather baggs: and otherwhiles, if they met the enemy, were forced to cast the corn from off their Horsebacks, to fight more nimbly. They that were within besieged, before the other Consul came with his army, had both from the mountains of the Samnits, victuals brought unto them, and succors also, of men let in to them. But the coming of Publius made all provisions more streight: for, leaving the charge of the siege to his brother Consul, he rode lightly appointed without carriage, all over the Country, and so beat all the quarters, that they were too hot for the enemies to forage and purvey victuals. Then the Samnits, seeing that they within the City besieged, were past all hope to abide the famine any longer, encamped about Luceria, and were forced to gather all their forces together from all parts, and to give Papirius battel. At which very instant, when they were on both sides preparing to fight, the Taren-
D tin Embassadors came between, discharging and forbidding, both Samnits and Romans to fight: professing withal, that whosoever they were that refused to give over war, against them they would fight in defence and favor of the others. Papirius having heard that embassage, making semblance, as if he had greatly regarded their speeches, answered that he would confer with his brother Consul; and having sent for him, and bestowed all the mean time in preparation to fight, when he had talked with him as touching the execution of matters already resolved, he presently gave the signal, and set out the bloudy banner of battel. Now as the Consuls were busy in sacrificing and performing duties belonging to God and man (as their manner is when they purpose to go to a battel) the Tarentin Embassadors aforesaid, encountred them and expected an answer. To whom Papirius, The Chick-master (qd. he) O ye Tarentins, sendeth me word, that the birds feed E right, and all is well; and besides that, the Gods in our sacrifice seem passing well pleased. And in the name of the Gods, and under their conduct (as ye see) we are going to battel. Then commanded he to set forward the standards, and led forth his power, mocking the fooliſh nation for their great vanity, who, not able to manage their own affairs by reason of home seditions and civill discords, thought it meet to be moderators between others, and to prescribe them war or peace. The Samnits on the other side, having slaked all their care and desire of war, for that they desired peace in good earnest, or else thought it expedient for them to make a semblance thereof, for to win unto them the Tarentins; seeing the Romans all of a sudden arranged in battel array and ready to fight, cryed forth aloud, that they rested still in the authority of the Tarentins, and were at their direction: neither would they come forth into the field, nor put themselves in F arms out of their fort: choosing rather being thus disappointed, to abide the chance of fortune whatsoever, than to seem to have despised the Tarentins, who had interposed themselves as Mediators for peace. Marry (quoth the Coss.) we take that for a good sign and presage of lucky success: and we would wish no more at Gods hands, but to put into their enemies heads that resolution, not to defend their trench and rampire. So the Coss. when they had parted between them their forces, approached the very camp of their enemies, and set upon them with an hot assault on every side. Thus while some filled and dammed up the trenches, others plucked up the stakes of the rampier, and threw the bank and all down the ditches under their feet: whiles not only their own inbred valour by nature, but also anger and choler provoked and pricked to the quick, their hearts already fretted and cankred at the very root, for the last disgrace received, they G entred the camp. Every man for his part gave out and said, Here are not the straight gullets of Caudium, here are not the impassable nor inaccessible passes, and forests, where as proud fraud had gone beyond their silly errour and want of forecast: but Roman vertue and proweſs, which no rampier never so strong, no trench how deep soever, is able to put by and withstand. So they killed all afore them indifferently, as well them that made resistance and stood to it, as those that retired and gave way: armed and disarmed, bond and free born, old and young, as well under age as undergrown, man and beast, one with another: neither had there escaped any living creature drawing breath, but that the Consuls sounded the retreat, and with minatory

words commanded the ſouldiers, ſo greedy of murder and bloudthirſty, to go forth of the camp H Whereupon when they were highly diſcontented and in great indignation, for that they were ſtaid and interrupted in this ſweetneſs of eaſing their anger, and ſatiating their revenge to the full; it was time to deliver this ſpeech unto them, wherein the ſouldiers were given to underſtand, how the Conſuls neither were behind any of them in malice and hatred to their enemies, nor would be hereafter: but as they were their chief conductors to the war, ſo they would be their leaders and ſhew them the way, to unſatiable appetite of revenge and execution, had not the care and regard of thoſe 600 Horſemen, which were kept as hoſtages in Luceria, cooled their thirſt and ſtaid their ſtomacks; leſt haply the enemies in deſpair to find pardon and mercy, ſhould run upon them in a blind fit of fury and rage, and put them all to the ſword; chuſing rather to torment and kill them firſt, before they died themſelves. The ſouldiers greatly commended this I courſe, and rejoyced that thus their choler was allaid, and their fury bridled, confeſſing, That they were indeed to abide all whatſoever, rather than the life of ſo many of the forwardeſt and principal young Gentlemen of Rome, ſhould be betraid, or in danger. This audience being diſmiſſed, they drew together to a Councel, whether with all their forces they ſhould aſſail and preſs hard upon Luceria, or with one of the armies and chief Leaders, give the attempt to ſound the Apulians, a cloſe and ſecret kind of people thereabout, who ever to that day had ſtood in doubtful terms with them.

Publius the Conſul, who had taken this journey to over-run all Apulia, in that one voyage and expedition, either by force ſubdued and brought under his obeiſance certain Srates, or upon conditions entred league and ſociety with them. Papyrius alſo, who ſtaid at the ſiege of Luceria, with- K in a ſhort time ſped according to his expectation. For having forelaid and beſet all the wayes, by which victual was conveyed thither out of Samnium, the Samnits who lay in gariſon at Luceria, pinched and tamed with famine, ſent Embaſſadors to the Roman Conſul, making offer to releaſe and deliver up into his hands thoſe Horſemen, (the only cauſe of the preſent war) in caſe he would raiſe and levy the ſiege. To whom Papyrius made this anſwer, that they ſhould have gone firſt to Pontius, the ſon of Herennius, by whoſe counſel they had put the Romans under the yoke and the gallows, to learn and know of him, what in his opinion they were to abide, who were vanquiſhed and overcome. Howbeit, for aſmuch as they had rather, and choſe rather to be cenſured indifferently, and to receive equal conditions of their enemies, than of their own ſelves, he willed the Embaſſadors to give them to underſtand in Luceria, that they ſhould leave their ar- L mor, their bag and baggage, their beaſts of carriage, and impotent multitude not fit for the wars, within in the wals. And as for the fighting ſouldiers, he would put them to paſs under the gallows in their ſingle ſhirts, for to revenge the ſhame firſt offered them, and not to inflict any new ignominy upon them. Nothing was denied and refuſed: ſeven thouſand men of war were put under the gallows, a rich and huge pillage raiſed within Luceria, all their own enſigns and armor regained, which they had loſt at Caudium: and that which ſurmounted all other joyes, they recovered again thoſe Gentlemen of arms, whom, lying for pledges and ſecurity of the peace aforeſaid, the Samnits had ſent to Luceria to be kept in ſafe cuſtody. There is not lightly to be found a victory more noble, and of greater conſequence to the people of Rome than this, in regard of the ſudden change of fortune, in caſe (as ſome records bear witneſs) Pontius alſo himſelf the ſon of He- M rennius, and General of the Samnits, to make ſatisfaction and quittance for the Conſuls diſgrace and ſhame, was put under the yoke, as well as all the reſt. But I leſs marvel, that it is not clear, but leſt uncertain, that the enemies General was rendred, and went under the gallows: this rather I wonder at, that doubted it is, whether Lucius Cornelius Dictator, with L. Papirius Curſor, General of the Horſemen, managed theſe acts firſt at Caudium, and then afterwards at Luceria: and being the only revenger of that diſgrace of the Romans, triumphed moſt worthily (I dare be bold to ſay) of any man before that time, next to Furius Camillus: or whether the chief honour hereof pertain by right to Papirius as Conſul. Upon this error followeth another in the neck of it, whether Papirius, ſurnamed Curſor, for his good ſervice at Luceria, in the next Election, con- N tinued in Magiſtracy, and were made the third time Conſul with Q. Æmylius Cæretanus, the ſecond time: or whether it were L. Papyrius Mugillanus, and the error grew upon the ſurname. But it is agreed upon by all writers, that from this time forward all the reliques of the wars, were performed and finiſhed by Conſuls. Æmylius in one proſperous battel made a final conqueſt of the Ferentans, and upon compoſition had the City delivered up unto him, whither they had retired their forces for ſuccor after their defeat in the field, and hoſtages were impoſed upon them. With like good ſucceſs fought the other Conſul with the Satricans, who being Roman citizens, had revolted to the Samnits, after the loſs at Caudium, and had received into their City a garriſon of theirs. For when as the Roman army approached under the walls of Satricum, and that the citizens within (after Embaſſadors ſent to treat by way of humble petition for peace) had received this hard and heavy anſwer from the Conſul, That unleſs they would kill the garriſon of the Sam- O nits, or deliver them into his hands, they ſhould come no more again to him: the Coloners and inhabitants were more frighted and terrified with that ſpeech, than at all the forcible attempts of their army. Whereupon the Embaſſadors followed their ſuit hard and continued ſtill, demanding very often of the Conſul how he could believe, that they being but few, feeble, and diſarmed, ſhould be able to force a garriſon ſo ſtrong and wel appointed againſt their wills? being willed to ask counſel of them, by whoſe means they had received the ſaid garriſon into the Town, they de-

A parted their wives: and having hardly obtained leave & licence at his hands, to consult with their Senate and to bring answer, they return home again. Their Senate was divided into two factions, which distracted and held them in suspence, that they could not soon resolve. The one, consisting of the chief personages and head men, who had sollicited them to revolt from the people of Rome; the other of true hearted and loyal Citizens. Howbeit, both sides strove in the end and endeavored to labour the Consul for reconciliation of peace. The one part thought it sufficient (because the Samnits garrison having not provision enough aforehand to hold out the siege, was to depart the night following) to give notice to the Consul, what hour of the night, through what gate the enemies would go forth, and which way they would take: the other, namely, against whose will B they were revolted to the Samnits, the very same night, opened another gate besides to the Consul, and privily let their enemies armed into the City. So by a twofold complot of treason, they were surprised unawares and all their throats cut not only the garrison of the Samnits (by reason that the woods all about the high way were laid for them and beset) but also at one instant there was a shout and allarm raised by the enemies within the City, which was full of them: and thus in the space of one hour both the Samnits were slain, the Satricans taken, and all they had in the world seised into the hands of the Consul: who after diligent inquisition by torture, Who were the principal authors of this revolt? whomsoever he found guilty, those he scourged and beheaded: and setting there a strong garrison, he took from the Satricans all their armour. From thence Papyrius Cursor departed to Rome for to triumph (as they write, that say, by his leading Luceria
C was recovered, and the Samnits put under the yoke.) And without question, a man he was worthy of all commendations of a warriour, surpassing not only in fortitude and courage of spirit, but also in force and natural strength of body, and namely, for his good footmanship: whereupon he got his surname * Cursor. For in running (they say) he had not his peer, but went away with prick and prize before all other in those daies: and were it by reason of his bodily vigour and strong constitution, or his much exercise, a stout and mighty eater he was, he drank as liberally to his meat, and could carry it as well. Never had foot or horse under any Captain more rough and harder service, for that himself was of so tough metall and steel to the very back (as they say) that he could abide any pains and travell whatsoever. His horsemen upon a time were so bold, as to request him in lieu of their good service in some exploit, to ease them a little of their ordinary D toil and labour: yes marry will I (quoth he) and that ye shall not complain that ye have no easement at all, I will ease you of this pains, That when ye alight from your horses, ye shall not need any more to stroke their shoulders, back and buttocks. He was a man besides for severity straight, and of right great command, as well over his allies and confederates as his own Citizens. The Prætor of Preneste, for very fear chanced once to be somewhat behind, and slack in bringing forward the rereward, into the vangard and front of the battel: as he walked before his pavilion he commanded him to be called unto him: when he was come, he willed the serjeant to bring forth his axe immediately: at which word when the Prenestin stood amazed and well near dead, Dispatch Lictor (quoth he) stock me up and grub this root that hindreth them that walk this way: and when he saw him astonied and his heart in his heels for fear of death, he set a good round fine
E upon his head, and so let him go. Doubtless in all that age (than which there was never any more fertile and fruitfull for vertue and valour) there was no one man, upon whom the state of Rome rested and relied more: Insomuch as men had destined, and in their minds appointed him to have matched and made head with Alexander the great, if after the conquest of Asia, he should have bent his power hither, and warred in Europe.

Albeit it may well appear that I have nothing less sought, ever since I began this work, than to digress and decline more than was needful, from the order and course of mine history, and by extravagant garnishing and mingling my writings with variety of matters, both to seek for the readers pleasant starts and diverticles to repose themselves, and for my self some ease and recreation of my spirits: yet the mention of so mighty a King and renowned Captain, maketh me to F think upon, and to utter abroad the secret conceits and discourses, which often I have cast and tossed in my mind: and which induce me now to search and examin willingly, what event would have hapned and befaln to the Romans, in case they had waged war with Alexander. First and formost, the things that seem to bear sway and prevail in war, be these (to wit) number of souldiers, valour, and courage withall, wit, sufficiency and dexterity of their chief leaders, and lastly, fortune, which as in all other humane and worldly affairs beareth a great stroke, so in war most of all. Which points, if a man consider either severally by themselves, or jointly altogether, do prove that the Roman Empire and government had stood as well against him as other princes and nations invincible. And first, to begin with comparing of the Captains themselves; I do not deny, but that Alexander was a noble and singular warrior: and this maketh more for his fame and re-G nown, that he was a sole commander of himself that he was a young man and died in the growth of his prosperous affairs, before he had felt and tasted of adverse fortune. For to let pass other otherglorious Princes and brave captains, (the great mirrours and examples of humane changes and varieties of this world) what was it that exposed Cyrus, whom the Greeks commend and magnifie above all other, as also of late time, Pompey the great, to disfavor & the turning wheel of fortune, but only this, that they lived long? Let me but rehearse and reckon up the Roman captains; and those not all, nor in every age, wherein they flourished; but even them only, with whom being either Consuls or Dictator, Alexander should have warred, if had he come: namely, M. Valerius

A digression to a discourse of comparrison between Alexander the Great and the Romans.

Corvinus, C. Martius Rutilius, C. Sulpitius, T. Manlius Torquatus, Q. Publius Philo, L. Papirius Cursor, Q. Fabius Maximus: the two Decii, L. Volumnius, M. Curius: Beſides other brave men and valiant perſonages that followed after, in caſe he had fought the Carthaginian were firſt (for if he had lived he meant to have warred there) and then paſſed over into Italy, when he had been well ſtept in years. In every one of theſe there were the ſame good parts, the like towardneſs of nature, as much forwardneſs of courage and ſpirit, as in Alexander, yea, and as good Military diſcipline, which even from the foundation of the City, paſſing from hand to hand, grew at length to the form and perfection of an Art, framed & compiled of continual rules and precepts, and confirmed by experiments. For ſo, after one courſe the Kings conducted their wars: even ſo, next unto them the baniſhers of the Kings, (to wit, the Junii and Valerii) ſo, conſequently the Fabii, the Quintii, and Cornelii: ſo did Furius Camillus, whom thoſe two Romans in their youth (Manlius Torquatus and Valerius Corvinus) with whom Alexander ſhould have encountred, ſaw an aged man in the latter end of his daies. And whereas Alexander ventured his own proper perſon in battel, and performed all Military duties with other ſouldiers, (which was not the leaſt part of his praiſe & glory) would Manlius Torquatus have given him one inch of ground, think ye, if he had met with him in skirmiſh equally matched? or Valerius Corvinus either, both of them brave & ſtout ſouldiers before they were leaders and captains? Or would the Decii have given him place, who with devoted bodies to death, came among the thickeſt of their enemies into preſent danger? Would Papirius Curſor have given him way, a man of that incomparable ſtrength of body, & invincible courage of heart? And (not to name every one particularly) would that Senat & Council have been overwrought with the ſtratagems & policies of that one young man? which, whoſoever he was that ſaid, it conſiſted and was compoſed altogether of Kings, was the only man that conceived & comprehended the true image and Idea of the Roman Senat. Mary, here was all the doubt (forſooth) leſt that he knew how to chuſe out a convenient plot of ground, to pitch a Camp in, more wiſely & cunningly than any one of thoſe before named; to make proviſion for victual, to foreſee & beware of ambuſhes, to pick out & take a meet time for to fight a battel, to ſet his battaillons in array, and to ſtrengthen the ſame with ſufficient ſuccours & ſupplies from the reregard, Snrely, he would have ſaid himſelf, that he had not now to deal with Darius, which Monarch carrying with time a train of dainty women, and tender Eunuchs, weakned and made effeminate with wearing purple and gold, with all his rich furniture, for ſhew and oſtentation of his wealthy and ſuperfluous fortune, Alexander without any bloudſhed, with doing nought elſe, but knowing well how to contemn ſuch toies and vanities conquered as a prey and booty rather than an enemy and warrior. He would have thought verily that the ſcituation and nature of Italy far differed from that of India, through which he marched at his eaſe with his drunken Army, feaſting and banquetting all the way; but ſpecially, when he ſhould have beheld the woody forreſts and unpaſſable ſtraights of Apulia, the high hils and mountains of Lucania, and the freſh marks and tokens of the loſs that hapned in his own name and houſe, namely, where not long before his Uncle Alexander late King of Epirus miſerably periſhed. Our talk all this while is of Alexander, not drowned yet with the overflow of proſperity; wherein no man had ever leſs rule of himſelf than he. Whom if we conſider, as he was arraied in the habit and attire of his new fortune, and (if I may ſo ſay) of a new nature, whereinto after his conqueſts and victories he was transfigured; ſurely he would have come into Italy more like a Darius than an Alexander, and brought a baſtard army with him, nothing at all reſembling but quite forgetting their native country of Macedonie, degenerated already, and growing out of kind, into the manners and faſhions of the Perſians. It grieveth me, and I am aſhamed, in ſo great a Monarch as he was, to report the proud changing and variety every while of his apparel, his exceſſive vain-glory and deſire of being courted and crouched unto (as he was) in flattering manner by men lying upon the earth groveling and proſtrat at his feet. Such abject baſeneſs ſhould have been hardly endured of Macedonians conquered and ſubdued; much leſs than being conquerours as they were. Abaſhed I am to recount the foul and horrible torments & executions, the murders of his well deſerving friends, even in the midſt of his cups and dainty viands: laſt of all, his vanity, his over-weening, and forging to himſelf a divine race and pedigree from the gods. But what if his drunkenneſs and unmeaſurable love of wine, were every day more than other? what if his fell anger and exceeding heat of choler increaſed daily? (for I report nothing but that which all writers agree upon) reckon we not theſe infirmities for great blemiſhes and wondrous hindrances to the vertues and perfections of a warrior & general commander? But here is all the danger and fear (which ſome are wont to give out & alledge, even the vaineſt perſons of all other Greeks, who favour & magnifie the glory of the very Parthians in compariſon of the Roman name) that the people of Rome had never been able to abide the very majeſty and name of Alexander the great. (And I think verily, that even themſelves that talk ſo much of him never heard the truth, ſo much as by the brute and fame) and that againſt whom in Athens, a City mightily decayed by war with the Macedonians, and even then, when as they might ſee before their face the ruins of Thebes in manner ſmoking full in their eyes, the Orators durſt freely make publike invectives (which appeareth by the very records of their Orations now extant) againſt him: I ſay, not one of ſo many States and noble perſonages of Rome durſt have opened his mouth and given one word again frankly and boldly. How much ſoever the grandeur and greatneſs of this man may be conceived and imagined in the mind, all that ſhall be but one only man, riſing, growing, and come to his height with the felicity of little more than ten years.

Whhic

A Which happineſs of his, they that extol in this reſpect, that the people of Rome, although in no war they were ſubdued, yet in many battels had the foile and loſt the day; whereas Alexander never fought field but he won the victory; little underſtand they, that compare the exploits of one perſon, and him a young man, with the the deeds and acts of a State, which had now warred eight hundred years. And can we marvell, it when on the one part there may be reckoned more ages than years on the other, that in ſo long a time, fortune ſhould vary more, than in the ſpace of thirteen years? But why compare you not man with man, Captain with Captain, and lay their fortunes together? How many Roman Captains and Generals, in this caſe am I able to name, who never loſt field? Ye may turn every leaf and page of the yearly annals of Magiſtrates, of B day-books and journals of thoſe Conſuls and Dictators, whoſe valour and felicity the people of Rome had never cauſe to repent of and be diſcontented for, ſo much as one day. And that which maketh them more wonderful, and to be admired above Alexander or any other King in the world, ſome of them bare the Dictatorſhip but ten or twenty daies; and none the Conſulſhip longer than a year. Their levies and muſters now and then were letted and impeached by the Tribunes of the Commons. The due and beſt time for war otherwhiles overſlipped them, and yet they went forth. Before their term expired, they were often called home for to be preſidents of the Magiſtrates Election. In the very midſt and buſieſt time of their affairs, the year very often turned about. The inconſiderate raſhneſs one while, and the peeviſh crookedneſs another while of a Collegue and companion in government was hindrance and harm both. They ſucceeded ſundry
C times after the loſs and overthrow of their predeceſſors, and received the army either of raw untrained ſouldiers or ſuch as were in ill diſcipline trained up: whereas Kings and Monarchs contrariwiſe, not only freed and exempt from all ſuch obſtacles and inconveniences, but alſo Lords and Maſters, and of abſolute command, over their enterpriſes, over times and ſeaſons fit for execution, give direction to others, draw all after them to their advice and counſel, and are themſelves directed and over-ruled by none. Say now, that Alexander were invincible, and dealt with theſe Captains as invincible as himſelf, he ſhould likewiſe have hazarded as great pawns and favours of fortune as any of them; nay rather, he ſhould have adventured and incurred more jeopardy; in that the Macedonians had but Alexander alone, a man not only ſubject but alſo expoſing himſelf to many perillous chances: but many Romans there had been equal to Alexander, either for glory
D or greatneſs of their worthy deeds: who every one ſhould have lived and died according to the fatal courſe of his own ſeveral deſtiny, without the hazard of the whole and main chance. It remaineth now that forces be compared with forces, and armies to armies, either in number, or in quality of ſouldiers, or multitude of Allies, from whom they had their aids. There were eſteemed by computation in the Taxing years, and Surveies taken by the Cenſors of that age, two hundred and fifty thouſand polls Citizens of Rome. And therefore in all the revolts and rebellions of their allies the Latines, they were able to levy and enroll ten legions compleat of Roman Citizens well near and none elſe. And for many years oftentimes there were four and five armies employed at once, which maintained wars in Tuſcan, in Hetruria, in Umbria, take alſo the Gauls with you their enemies, likewiſe Lucania in Samnium. Beſides all theſe, Alexander ſhould have found all Latium
E with the Sabins, Volſcians, and Æquians; all Campania, part of Umbria and Hetruria, with the Picentes, the Marſians, Pelignians, Veſtins, and Apulians, and all the coaſt adjoyning thereto of the Greeks, along the nether Tyrrhen ſea, from the Thurians to Naples and Cumes, and from thence, the Samnits, as far as to Antium and Hoſtia. All theſe he ſhould have met with, either mighty and puiſſant allies and friends to the Romans, or if they were enemies, vanquiſhed and ſubdued by their arms. He ſhould have paſſed the ſeas himſelf, having of old Macedonian bands, not above thirty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, and thoſe, moſt of them Theſſalians; for this was all his power. And in caſe he had joyned thereto the Perſians, Indians, and other ſuch nations, he ſhould have drawn along after him, more let and encumbrance, that help and ſuccour by them. Take this over and beſides, The Romans had freſh ſupplies alwaies ready and near at hand, at F home in the City: whereas Alexander his army (as afterwards it hapned to Annibal warring in a ſtrange country) would have waxed old and decayed. They had for their armour and weapons, a ſhield or buckler, and a ſpear in manner of a pike. The Romans had a target of larger capacity to cover the whole body, and a javelin, being a weapon much better and more forcible than the pike, either to ſtrike and puſh withall near hand, or to be lanced a far off. The ſouldiers, I confeſs, both of the one ſide and the other, ſtood their ground ſurely, kept their place and array ſtill within their ſeverall ranks. The Macedonian huge Phalanx moved not, was ſtedfaſt and alwaies after one ſort: but the Romans battallon more diſtinct, and conſiſting of many parts eaſie both to divide and diſplay, or to joyn and reunite upon any occaſion. To ſpeak now of painfull work and travell, what ſouldier is comparable to the Roman? Who better able G to endure all ſorts of labour? Alexander by the loſs but of one battell had been clean done, and hir war at an end for ever. But the Romans, whoſe hearts, neither the ſhamefull diſgrace at Caudium, nor the woſull defeat at Cannæ, could amate and dant; what power would have diſcouraged? What battell in the world would have broken their backs? Certainly, Alexander although he had proſperity and good ſucceſs in his firſt beginnings and enterpriſes, would oftentimes here have miſſed his Perſians and Indians, and deſire with all his heart to have had dealing with them again, and other cowardly and daſtard Nations of Aſia: nay, he would have ſaid, that he had warred before but with women, as Alexander, King of Epirus (by report) gave out, when he was wounded to death, conferring the eaſie occurrents of war which this young Prince H his nephew, met withall in Aſia, with the difficulties of his own, that he found here in Italy. And verily, when I call to mind and remember the conflicts and fights at ſea, in the firſt Punick war, for the ſpace of twenty four years, with the Carthaginians, I ſuppoſe the whole age of Alexander would hardly have brought about and finiſhed that one war, and againſt one of thoſe two States. And peradventure, when both Carthaginians and Romans had been combined, either according to the ancient leagues, or for equall fear of a common enemy, and thoſe two Cities moſt puiſſant both for men and munition, had taken arms at once againſt him, he would have been overwhelmed with the Punick and Roman war together. Moreover, the Romans have made good proof of the Macedonians as enemies, if not when they had Alexander to be their Captain, nor I whiles the Empire of Macedonie was at the beſt, and ſtood upright unfoiled: yet tried them they have, and made head againſt them under the conduct of Antiochus, Philip, and Perſes: and it never coſt them the loſs and overthrow of their own part, no, nor ſo much as any appearance of danger at all. I would not be thought to ſpeak a proud word, but be it ſaid without arrogancy, and ſetting all our civill wars aſide; never were we diſtreſſed, either by horſe or foot, never in open field and battel ranged, never on even and plain ground, never in unequal places of diſadvantage, were we endangered. The ſouldier in heavy and compleat harneſs, I confeſs, may fear the Cavalry in the plains: may fear ſhot of arrows, cumberſome forreſts and woods, ſtraight gullets, and unpaſſable wilds, without waies forward or backward: but let there be a thouſand armies greater and ſtronger than the Macedonians or Alexanders, ſo long as we hold together, and con- K tinue ſtill in this love of peace and care of civill concord, wherein we live at this preſent, we are able, and ever ſhall be, to diſcomfit and put them all to flight.

After this, were M. Follius Flaccina, and L. Plautius Venox Conſuls. The ſame year there came from ſundry Nations of the Samnits Embaſſadors, to treat for the renewing of the league, and moved the Senat, moſt humbly kneeling proſtrate upon the ground: but being put off and referred to the people, their prayers availed not to ſuch effect: for as touching a league, they had a flat nay. And after they had for certain daies together importuned them one by one apart, with cap and congee: at length after much ſuit, they obtained truce for two years. And out of Apulia the Theanenſes and Canuſins wearied with rodes and ſpoil made in their Territories, after they had put in hoſtages to Lucius Plautius the Conſul, yielded themſelves to his protection. The ſame L year firſt began Ptovoſts to be created at Capua, to govern under certain laws given unto them by L. Furius the Pretor: after that themſelves had made ſuit for the one and the other, as a remedy for their ſtate, greatly decaied through civill diſcord. And at Rome were two more Tribes added to the reſt, Uſentina, and Falerina. When Apulia began once to ſhrink and go backward, the Theatins, being alſo Apulians, preſented themſelves unto the new Conſuls, C. Junius Bubulcus, and Q. Æmylius Barbula, and ſued to enter into a league with the Romans. And ſince they were the men that led the way firſt, and by their example and perſwaſion induced all Apulia to be in peace with the Romans, and had confidently undertaken, as ſureties and pledges to bring it to paſs, they obtained their requeſt. Yet was not the league indifferent and formal, with equal conditions, but ſo, as they ſhould be in ſubjection to the people of Rome. After that Apulia was M conquered (for Junius had won alſo Tarentum, a ſtrong town and a rich) they marched forward againſt the Lucans. Then upon the ſudden coming of Æmylius the other Conſul, Nerulum was by force taken. And after that it was noiſed abroad amongſt the allies of the people of Rome, that the ſtate and weal publike of Capua were eſtabliſhed by Roman diſcipline and government; the Antiats alſo, who made moan and complained, that they lived without poſitive ſet laws and Magiſtrates, obtained of the Senate certain Advocats and Commiſſioners, to ordain Statutes likewiſe for that Colony. So, that not only the Roman arms, but alſo their law and juriſdiction extended far and near, and was of great requeſt. C. Junius Bubulcus, and Q. Æmylius Barbula Conſuls, in the end of the year, delivered their Legions not to the Coſſ. by them created, Sp. Nautius, and M. Popilius, but conſigned them to L. Æmylius the Dictator. Who with his General of N horſe, L. Fulvius, began to lay ſiege to Satricula, whereby he gave the Samnits occaſion to rebell. Which brought upon the Romans a double fear two waies. For of the one ſide the Sam-nits having aſſembled a mighty army, to deliver their allies from the ſiege, pitched their Camp not far from the Romans leaguer: on the other ſide, the Satricans ſet open their gates ſudden-ly, and with a great tumult brake into the wards and corps de guard of their enemies. And ſo both parts, relying rather upon hope of ſuccour and help elſewhere, than truſting upon their own ſtrength, within a while began to charge the Romans in full battell, with banner diſplai-ed, and diſtreſſed them. And although the Dictator was aſſailed both waies, yet was he ſure and ſafe on either ſide, becauſe he had got a plot of ground, not eaſie to be compaſſed, and made head both againſt the one and the other, advancing his enſigns accordingly. Howbeit, O he charged more hotly upon them that ſallied forth, and without much ado beat them again within the wals. Then turned he the whole battell upon the Samnits. Where there was hard hold, and more to do. The victory, though long firſt, was neither doubtful nor variable.
The Samnits being chaſed and driven into their Camp, having in the night put out all their fires, diſlodged and departed privily away: and being paſt all hope of defending Satricula, they beſieged Pliſtia, a town confederate to the Romans, to requite their enemy with the like diſpleaſure. The revolution of the year being gone about, the war continued under the conduct of

A Q. Fabius Dictator: and the new Conſuls, like as the former remained ſtill at Rome. And Fabius came before Satricula to receive the Army of Æmylius, bringing with him a new ſupply to make up the broken bands: for the Samnits made no ſtay at Pliſtia, but having levied and ſent for freſh ſouldiers from home, preſuming upon their great numbers, encamped in the very place where they lay afore: where by braving the Romans, and challenging them with many skirmiſhes, they would have forced them to raiſe the ſiege. But the Dictator ſo much more earneſtly bent his forces againſt the wals of the enemies, thinking it the beſt piece of ſervice to aſſail the Town, as being of ſuch importance to the reſt of the war, which depended thereon: and was more careleſs therefore of the Samnits, and only oppoſed againſt them certain guards both day and night, along B the trench and rampire, to keep them from making any aſſault upon the Camp. But the Samnits on the other ſide, ſo much the more fiercely skirmiſhed on horſeback about the fortifications, and never gave them reſt. Inſomuch, as when the enemy now was at the point to enter the gates of the Camp, the General of the Horſe. Q. Æmylius Cæretanus, without advice and direction of the Dictator, riding forth in a great noiſe with all his Corners of Horſe, repelled the enemy. But even in that light manner of skirmiſh, and no ſet battel of any long continuance, Fortune ſo plaid her part, and ſhewed what ſhe could do, that on either ſide there befell a notable loſs, with the glorious death of both the Captains. For the General of the Samnits firſt taking it to heart, to ſee Æmylius ſo fiercely ride and give the charge, and himſelf to be diſarraied and driven out of his place, with much intreating and exhorting his horſemen, renewed the fight. Againſt whom, as he
C advanced himſelf, bravely to be ſeen amongſt his men and fought moſt valiantly, the Roman General of the horſe, with ſpear in reſt, ſo galloped his horſe, that with one puſh he unhorſed him and left him for dead: and yet for all this was not the whole troop beſides (as commonly it is ſeen) at the fall of their Captain ſo much amazed, as provoked rather to fight. For they that were about him charged Æmylius hard as he raſhly rode without heed, and engaged himſelf too far within the thickeſt of the ſquadrons of his enemies, and lanced their javelins at him: but they gave the ſpecial honour to the brother of the Samnits Captain to be revenged for his death. He, full of anger and ſorrow, plucked Æmylius from his horſe, and ſlew him in the place, even in the midſt of his victory: and for that he fell among the troops of his enemies, he had like to have left his dead corps among the Samnits. But preſently the Romans alighD ted on foot, and the Samnits were forced to do the ſame: and thus being arranged ſuddenly in great haſte into battallons, there began a cruell fight on foot about the bodies of the Captains. Wherein the Romans went clear away with the better, and having recovered the corps of Æmylius, in great joy, intermingled with ſorrow, they returned winners into their Camp. The Samnits thus having loſt their Captain, and tried their ſtrength what they could do in fight on horſe-back, left Satricula, which they ſuppoſed could not poſſibly be defended, and ſo returned again to the ſiege of Pliſtia. After few daies, Satricula was ſurrendred by compoſition to the Romans, and the Samnits by aſſault won Pliſtia. Then changed they the ſeat town of the war. For out of Samnium and Apulia, the Legions were removed to Sora. This Sora was revolted to the Samnits, and had ſlain all the inhabitants therein that were Romans.
E Againſt which place, when the Romans were come firſt by great journies to revenge the loſs of their Countrymen, and to recover the Colony, their eſpials and ſcouts whom they had ſent out diſperſed along the high waies, brought word, that the Legions of the Samnits followed, yea, and one after another gave advertiſement, that they were not far off. Hereupon they went forth to meet with the enemy, and near to a place called Lautulæ, there was fought a doubtfull and dangerous battel: for no ſlaughter it was, nor flight of either part, but the very night that parted them, and they knew not whether they had the better or the worſe. In ſome Chronicles I find, that the Romans loſt the day, and that there died in this battell Q. Æmylius Generall of the horſe. C. Fabius choſen in the room of Æmylius, came with a new and freſh army from Rome, and having diſpatched meſſengers before to the Dictator to know his advice, where F he ſhould ſtay and reſt, and what time, and which on ſide he ſhould ſet upon the enemy: after he was well informed and inſtructed in all points what to do, he put himſelf cloſe in ambuſh. The Dictator himſelf, who had for certain daies after the laſt skirmiſh, kept his ſouldiers within trench, more like one beſieged, than beſieging; all on a ſudden, put forth the ſignal and token of battell: and thinking nothing more effectual to animate and kindle the courages of hardy men, than to know of no other help or hope, nor to truſt upon any man but in themſelves, he concealed from his ſouldiers the coming of the General of Horſe and his freſh forces; and as if there had been no other way but one, even to break forth and ſally with violence: "We being The Oration of D. Fabius Dictator to his Souldiers.
"(quoth he) my ſouldiers, pent here and taken tardy in theſe ſtraights have no other iſſue but "that which by victory we ſhall make open. Our hold wherein we lie is fortified ſure enough but G "the ſame for ſcarcity of all things noiſome, irkſome, and hurtfull to us: for all parts hereabout
"are revolted from whence we ſhould have convoy of victuals: and were it that the people were
"diſpoſed to help us, yet the advenues & paſſages are hard, and the place of our abode incommo-"dious. Therefore will not I deceive and abuſe you any longer, by leaving here your tents into "which ye may after (ye have miſſed the entire victory) betake your ſelves for ſafety, as ye did the "other day: for our fortifications and holds, ought to be defended by force of arms: and not
"our arms by fenced forts. Let them have their Camp well fortified, to iſſue forth and to retire "thither again at their pleaſure, who have a purpoſe to make a long war of it. But let "us cut off all regard of other matters, but only of a preſent and final victory. Advance then H

"your enſigns directly againſt the enemy: and ſo ſoon as our Army is once without the trench
"and rampiers, let them ſet the tents a fire, that have the charge ſo to do: your ſhall make up your "your loſſes again, my ſouldiers, with the ſpoil of all the nations hereabouts, that have revolted.
At this ſpeech of the Dictator, which ſhewed no other ſemblance but of extream neceſſity, the ſouldiers took heart and were hot ſet to march ſtraight to the enemy. And the very ſight of their tents burning behind them (albeit thoſe only which ſtood next were ſet on fire, for ſo the Dictator had given commandment) was no ſmall provocation and prick unto them. And therefore they gave a charge like mad men, and at the firſt puſh and brunt they brake the array of the enemies: and withall, in good time, the General of the horſe, when he ſaw a far off the tents on fire I (for that was the ſignal agreed between them) came haſtily upon the back of the enemies and aſſailed them. So the Samnits being environed round about, made every man what ſhift he could to get forth and eſcape, and ſo fled. But the main multitude that were ſhuffled together all on a round heap, for fear, being an hinderance one to another in the preſs, was ſlain in the midſt and cut in pieces, the enemies camp won, and ranſacked: with the pillage whereof the ſouldiers were laden, and the Dictator brought them back unto their own Camp: who were not ſo joyous for the victory, as for that they found (beſides a little part thereof disfigured by fire) all the reſt ſafe and ſound beyond their expectation.

From thence they returned to Sora, where the new Conſuls M. Petilius and Caius Sulpitius took the Army at the hands of Fabius the Dictator: who diſcharged many of the old ſouldiers, K and brought certain new cohorts for ſupply in their ſtead. But when by reaſon of the difficult and unacceſſible ſight of the Town, they knew not well which way, and by what means to make aſſault, and ſeeing that the winning of it would either ask long time, or be expoſed to manifold and preſent dangers: a certain runaway-Traitor of Sora who was cloſely ſtoln out of the Town, got to the Roman Sentinels, and required forthwith to be brought to the Conſuls: who being preſented before them, promiſed to betray the Town: and being queſtioned withall, how and by what means he would perform that which he undertook, ſeemed unto them to alledge ſome reaſons to good purpoſe, and prevailed ſo far with them, that he cauſed the Roman Camp, which lay in a manner cloſe under the wals, to be removed ſix miles off the Town, ſaying, that thereby, the wards by day, and the watch by night would be neglected, and leſs careful and dili- L gent to keep the City. Himſelf the night following, after he had willed certain cohorts of footmen to lye in ambuſh within the woods near the Town, took with him ten elect and choſen ſouldiers; and through ſteep places, and ſuch as were not well paſſable, conducted them into the Caſtle, having brought thither more ſhot and darts to throw than to ſerve ſo ſmall a number of men: beſides, there was good ſtore of ſtones at hand, which lay there, either ſcattering by chance (as commonly in ſuch craggy and rocky ground) or elſe heaped together by the townſmen of purpoſe, for the better defence of the place. Where, after he had beſtowed the Romans, and ſhewed them a narrow and ſteep path-way out of the town into the Caſtle, From getting up here (quoth he) there needs no more but three men only well armed to keep back the greateſt multitude that is: ye are in number ten, and more than that, Romans; and of Romans the M moſt hardy and valiant: the place will ſtead you, I know, the darkneſs of the night will be for your purpoſe, the night, I ſay, which by reaſon of uncertainties, maketh all things ſeem much more than they are to men affrighted and amazed already. I will for my part ſet all in a hurly burly, look you in the mean time that you duly keep the fortreſs. This ſaid, he runs down with as great a noiſe and ſhouting as he could, crying, Alarm, help, help Citizens, the Caſtle is taken by the enemy, come away to defence. Theſe words he reſounded ever as he rapped at the gates of the principal Citizens and Noblemen: theſe words he redoubled aloud to all that he met, and to as many as ran forth affrighted into the ſtreets. This fearful alarm received from one man, was ſet abroad by many more all over the City. The Magiſtrates quaking for fear, ſent certain to the Caſtle in eſpial to diſcover the truth: and advertiſed by them that the Caſtle N was ſurprized indeed by armed men, and full of armor (for they made the number, and every thing elſe, more than it was) were clean put out of all hope to recover their Fortreſs. So every where they fell to running away: the gates were broken open by them that were not well awake, and thoſe moſt part unarmed. At one of the gates, thoſe companies of the Romans aforeſaid, who lay in ambuſh, and were raiſed with the noiſe and clamour, brake in, and killed all that in this fright ran headlong in their way. Thus was Sora won againſt the Conſuls ſhould come in the morning betimes by break of day: and look whoſe fortune it was to ſcape out of the maſſacre made in the night, and to flie away thoſe they took to mercy upon ſubmiſſion: whereof two hundred twenty five, even thoſe who by the general voice of all were pointed at, and reputed above the reſt the principal actors in that horrid maſſacre aboveſaid, of the Roman Coloners, inhabi- O tants, and the authors of the revolt they had away with them to Rome, bound hand and foot. The other multitude they left at Sora ſafe and unhurt, and planted there a garriſon. All they that were brought to Rome were in the market-place ſcourged with rods, and beheaded with the exceeding joy and contentment of all the Commons, whom it concerned moſt, that the multitude which ſhould be ſent into ſundry Colonies might in every place live in ſafety and ſecurity of their lives.

Sora ſurpriſed by treaſon.

The Conſuls being departed from Sora, marched forward to make war upon the Lands and Territo-

A Territories of the Auſonians; for the coming of the Samnits after the battel of Lautula, they were all out, full of inſurrections and commotions, and many conſpiracies there were in all places, about Campania: neither was Capua it ſelf without blame and faultleſs. Nay, this matter paſſed as far as to Rome, where information was made againſt ſome of the Nobles, and warning given to enquire into them. But the whole nation of the Auſonians, by reaſon that the Cities were betrayed, like as Sora, was reduced under obedience to the people of Rome. Auſona, Minturna, and Veſtina were the Cities, out of which twelve of the chief young Gentlemen having conſpired and ſworn together to betray their own Cities, preſented themſelves unto the Conſuls, giving them to underſtand, "That their countrymen wiſhed long ago for the coming of the Samnits, and ſo B "ſoon as they heard of the battel before Lautula, made account that the Romans were utterly "vanquiſhed, and helped the Samnits both with men and munition. But now, ſay they, that the "Samnits were chaſed from thence, they lived unreſolute in doubtfull terms of peace, and ſhut "not their gates in dread upon the Romans, for fear of bringing war upon themſelves, yet obſti- c "nately bent to ſhut them, if their Army approached toward them. In this wavering and doubt- "ful floating of their minds, they might at unawares be ſuddenly ſurpriſed. By this perſwaſion of theirs they encamped nearer, and at one and the ſelf-ſame time were ſouldiers ſent about thoſe three towns before named, ſome in armor cloſely to lie in ambuſh in convenient places near the wals: others in ſide gowns with ſwords under them, who a little before day, ſo ſoon as the gates were ſet open, ſhould enter into thoſe Cities. By whom the matter was ſo handled, that at one C inſtant they began to kill the warders at the gates, and gave a ſignal to thoſe armed ſouldiers who lay in ambuſh, for to riſe at once and come to ſuccour. Thus were the gates ſeized and poſſeſſed, and three towns in one hour by the ſame ſtratagem ſurprized. But becauſe this exploit was performed in the abſence of the Captains, there was no ſtay in execution and ſlaughter, but beyond all meaſure, and without all mercy, no ſex nor age was ſpared: and ſo the whole nation of the Auſones, before they were detected for certain of revolt, was deſtroyed and eſtinguiſhed, as if they had warred mortally, and been at deadly feud.

A conſpiracy of the Auſonians.

The ſame year Luceria came into the hands of the Samnits, by reaſon that the City had betrayed and delivered the Roman garriſon to them; but the traitors went not long unpuniſhed for it. The Roman Army chanced to be not far from thence, and at the firſt aſſault, the City ſtanding as D it did on a plain, was won. The Lucerins and Samnits both were put to the ſword every one: and ſo far forth proceeded their furious rage, that when the Senat ſate in council at Rome, about ſending men to inhabit Luceria, many were of mind, that the City it ſelf ſhould be raſed to the ground and deſtroyed: for beſides the curſed and execrable hatred they bare againſt them being twice conquered and revolted: the diſtance alſo of the place ſo remote, cauſed them to miſlike greatly, and abhor the confining, as it were, of their Citizens, ſo far from home, to live amongſt ſuch a kind of people ſo cruel and dangerous. Howbeit, their opinion took place and prevailed; who gave advice, that Coloners and inhabitants ſhould thither be ſent, and to the number of 2500 were there planted.

The ſame year when as the Romans found all unloyal unto them, and nothing but falſhood E on all ſides; at Capua alſo certain ſecret conſpiracies of the Nobles and beſt of the City were detected and revealed. Touching which, the Senats advice was asked, and the matter not neglected by them, but Commiſſions were appointed: and thought good it was that a Dictator ſhould be nominated for to ſit upon the ſame commiſſions and inquiſitions. And C. Manius was created, who named M. Fellius General of the Horſe. Great was the terror of that Magiſtrate, and thereupon either for fear, or guiltineſs of conſcience, the two Calavii, Ovius and Novius, who were the chief of that complot, before information was given againſt them by name to the Dictator, died: & queſtionleſs by their own hands ſhortned their daies, and ſo avoided the triall of juſtice and puniſhment accordingly. After that, when the Inquiſition wanted ſubject matter once about the Capuans, the Inquiſitors (by interpretation of words in the Commiſſion) proceeded to Rome, ſaying, F that the Senat had good warrant to make enquiry and ſtraight ſearch, not by name and preciſely, who at Capua only; but generally, who in any place whatſoever had uſed conventicles, and conſpired againſt the Common-wealth: and all ſecret meetings, ſay they, and packings together, for to get Dignities and Offices, were directly againſt the State and Common-wealth: ſo that the Commiſſion extended larger both for perſon and real action. Yea, and the Dictator himſelf nothing gainſaid, but that the vertue of his Commiſſion was directed without limitation. Hereupon were certain Gentlemen of the Nobility brought into queſtion: and notwithſtanding they called upon the Tribunes for to aſſiſt them, with interpoſing their negative, yet there was not one of them would ſuccour and relieve them, the preſentment was taken againſt them, and they indited. Then the Nobility, I mean not them alone who were in trouble, but generally the whole G Gentry of the City, at once, pleaded, That they were not the natural and true Noblemen indeed, who were to be touched and charged with this crime: who if it were not for ſiniſter and indirect courſes, had eaſie and open ſucceſs unto all honourable places and promotions; but certain new upſtarts and Gentlemen of the firſt head: ſaying, That it was the very caſe of the Dictator himſelf, and his General of Horſe, who were rather parties guilty, and offenders themſelves, than ſufficient Inquiſitors, and competent Judges: and that ſhould they well know and underſtand, when they were once out of their place and office. This made Manius to beſtir himſelf, who mindful rather of his good name and reputation, than reſpective of his high place and abſolute absolute government, went up into the common place of audience before all the people, and spake H to this effect: "My Masters and friends all, Citizens of Rome, well assured I am, that privy ye are

"to the whole carriage and course of my former life; and besides that, even this very honour
"and dignity which you have bestowed upon me, is able to testifie and approve mine innocencie.
"For to sit upon these inquisitions, there was not to be chosen now for Dictator (as oftentimes "heretofore, according to the dangerous occasions and necessity of the time) a man reputed
"the best and most noblest warrior of all other; but such a one, as throughout his whole life "hath most of all misliked and condemned ambitious conventicles. Howbeit, forasmuch as certain persons of noble linage, (for what cause, it is more meet for you to deem and judge, than for me being a Magistrate, to speak without book, as they say, and upon no sure ground) first have en- I deavoured with all their might and main to overthrow the process of the inquisition it self; and afterwards, seeing they were not able themselves to bring that about (notwithstanding they were Patritii) have fled to the holds of their very adversaries, even the protection of the Tribunes and their negative, rather than to justifie themselves and stand to the triall of their cause: and at last having there also a repulse (thinking all means safer than to approve their innocencie) have fain upon us, and bashed not (privat men as they are) to accuse and touch the person of him that is Dictator: to the end therefore, that both God and man, and all the world may know, that as they have assaied to compass that which they are not able to bring to pass, namely, to avoid the rendring an account of their life and demeanor; so, I am ready (to set forward their accusations) to offer my self unto mine adversaries; and giving them means to call me to mine answer, here K I resign up my Dictatorship. And I beseech you, O Consuls, if so be this charge be laid on you by the Senat, to proceed in examination against me first, and this Gentleman the General of Horse M. Fellius: that it may appear, how we, through our own innocency alone, and not by the countenance and priviledge of our dignity and high calling, are protected and safe from these slanders and intended crimes. Herewith he gave over his place of Dictator: and after him incontinently, M. Fellius yielded up his room likewise of General over the Horse. These persons were the first, who being charged and put to their trial judicially before the Consuls, (for to them by order from the Senat, was the commission directed) notwithstanding all the depositions and testimonies of the Patritii, were in every point found unguilty, and acquit. P. Philo also, albeit he had so many times attained to the supream dignities of state, after he had atchieved so many wor- L thy deeds, as well in peace as war, yet a man maliced or envied rather of the Nobility, was put to plead for himself, and finally absolved. But this inquiry into such men of name and quality, lasted no longer in force, (as it is usually seen) than whiles it was fresh, and in the first heat therof.
From them it began to fall to persons of less reckoning and baser account, untill such time, as by the same conventicles and factions, against which it was devised, it fell to the ground, and was tro-den underfoot.

The bruit of these things, and more than that, the hope of the Campains revolt, whereto certain had conspired and sworn (as ye have heard) recalled the Samnits back again to Caudium, who were turned and bent wholly into Apulia: that from thence, being so near at hand unto Capua, they might (if haply any insurrection and trouble presented the overture and opportunity) seize M upon it and take it perforce from the Romans. Thither came the Consuls with a strong and mighty army: and at the first they staied and lingred about the passes and straights, having on the one side and the other an ill way of passage unto the enemies. Afterwards the Samnits fetching a short compass about, came down with their army through the open places into the plains, I mean, the champain country and fields about Capua. And that was the first time that the enemies had a sight one of the others Camp. Whereupon by light skirmishes, on horseback or not than on foot, they tried masteries on either side: neither were the Romans one jot discontented with the issue and event thereof, nor repented of the delay whereby they drew the war a-length. Contrariwise, the Samnit Captains perceived their forces to wear daily by small losses, and their courage to cool and decay evidently by that lingring war. Whereupon, they came abroad N into the field and divided their Cavalry into wings: with a special charge, to have a more careful eye backward toward their camp (for fear of any impression and assault that way) than to the main battel: which would be guarded safe enough by the Infantry. The Cons. marshalled themselves in this manner Sulpitius led the right point of the battel and Petilius the left: the right side (whereas the Samnits also were arranged in thinner ranks and files, of purpose to compass and environ the enemies, or not to be compassed and enclosed themselves) shewed it self more abroad and open. They on the left hand, besides that they stood thicker and more close, were by occasion of a sudden policy of Petilius the Cos. farther strengthned. For those cohorts and bands which were reserved apart in the rereward for help at any need and kept fresh against all occurrents and hazards of long fight, he advanced presently to the forefront in the vangard, and with all his forces at O once charged the enemy at the first encounter & forced him to retreat. When the foormen of the Samnits were thereby troubled and disarraied, the horsemen followed close and entred into the skirmish. But as they rode cros and overthwart between the two hosts, the Roman horsemen pricked and galloped their horses to flank them; and disordred and troubled the ensigns, cornets, squadrons and troops of foot and horse, pell-mell together, untill he had caused the whole battel of that side to turn their backs. In this left point not Petilius alone, but Sulpitius also joyned with him, and was present in person to exhort and encourage the souldiers: for he had transported and distracted

A distracted himself from his own men, who as yet were not come to joyn battel at the cry & shout that arose from the left side: and seeing on that part undoubted victory, he went towards his own charge accompanied with 1200 men: Where he found a change of fortune, namely, the Romans to have retreated and lost ground, and the enemy as victor, advancing forward his ensigns upon them sore dismaid and daunted. Howbeit, the Consul his coming made a present alteration: for both at the sight of their Captain were the souldiers hearts refreshed and comforted; and for to aid them, there came a greater supply indeed, than in shew of number, of tall and lusty men. So when they heard first, and saw soon after, the victory got of the other part, they renewed the fight. After this on all sides the Romans had the better hand, and the Samnits giving over fight, B were either slain or taken prisoners: saving only those, who fled to Maleventum a town now named Beneventum. It is left in record, that there were upon 30000 Samnits, either left killed in the place, or brought away captive.

The Consuls having obtained this notable victory, forthwith from thence lead their Legions to lay siege unto Bovianum: and there wintred before the Town, untill such time as C. Petilius (chosen Dictator together with M. Fellius his General of the Horse, by the new Consuls L. Papyrius Cursor the fifth time, and C. Jun. Bubulcus the second time) received the Army at their hands. Who hearing, that the Castle of Fregella was by the Samnits taken, left Bovianum, and went forward to Fregella; which he recovered again without drawing his sword; for that the enemies had quit the place, and were fled by night: and when he had placed a strong garrison there, he return-
C ned from thence into Campania, of special purpose to regain Nola by force of arms. Thither were retired within the wals, a little before the Dictator his coming, both all the whole multitude of the Samnits, and the rustical peasants about Nola. The Dictator having viewed the scituation of the Town, to the end he might have the more open access to the wals, set all the houses on fire that were in the subburbs along the counterscarpe (and there they stood thick and were well inhabited.) And not long after, whether it were by Petilius Dictator (I know not) or C. Junius Consul (for it is reported as well of the one as the other) Nola was forced and won. They that would draw unto the Consul the honour of winning Nola, add moreover and say, That he won also Atina and Calatia: and that Petilius upon a pestilence that began, was made Dictator, for the setting or fastning of a spike or great nail. Two Colonies that year were conducted to Su-
D essa and Pontia. Suessa belonged to the Aurunci. The Volscians inhabited the Island Pontiæ, situat over against their own shore within a kenning. And a decree passed from the Senat, that to Cassinum also, a third Colony there should be sent inhabitants. M. Valerius and P. Decius, the Consuls that next succeeded, ordained three Triumvirs, for that purpose, and sent four thousand to people those places.

The war with the Samnits was in a manner now dispatched and brought to an end: but before that the Nobles and Senators of Rome had left the care thereof, a brute was blown of the Tuscans war. And there was in those daies another nation (setting the Gauls tumults aside) whose forces and hostility they more feared; for that their country was so near a neighbour and so populous withall. Therefore, whiles one of the Consuls was occupied in dispatching the reliques of the E war in Samnium, P. Decius who staid at Rome grievously sick, by authority of the Senat, named Dictator C. Junius Bubulcus. He according as the important affairs required, caused all the younger sort to take the military oath, and prest them for souldiers. Armor, and whatsoever requisite besides, with great diligence he prepared. And albeit he were thus furnished and well apointed, yet was he nothing bold and forward to begin war, willing (no doubt) to be quiet and stand upon his guard, unless the Tuscans shewed themselves first in arms. The same purpose had the Tuscans also, both in preparing for war, and in making stay to begin war. So, of neither side they departed out of their own limits.

In that year was there a famous Censorship of App. * Claudius, and C. Plautius. But the name
F of Appius became more memorable of the twain, and of happier renown unto posterity, for that he paved with stone the causey or * Port-way (bearing his name) and conveyed a channel of * water into the City of Rome. Which works he finished alone, for that his Collegue for shame of an infamous and odious choice of certain Senators which he made, gave over the office. But Appius having the stout stomack, engraffed in his name and house from the beginning, bare the Censorship alone. By the motion and means of the same Appius, the Potitii, to whose family properly belonged the Priestly service, at the altar of Hercules called Maxima, had taught certain publike servants (for that the function might be committed over to them as delegats) the solemn rites and ceremonies of that sacred ministry. Hereupon is reported a wonder to be spoken, and that which might strike a scruple of conscience, and make men afraid ever after, to alter any thing in religion from the former state and first institution. For whereas at the same time there were twelve hou-
G ses of the Potitii, and in them about thirty that were above fourteen years of age; within one year it is said, that they died all, with their whole issue and off-spring. Moreover, that not only the name of the Potitii became thus extinct, but that Appius also the Censor, within certain years (such was the ire of the gods mindfull of revenge) fell stark blind. Therefore the Consuls that followed in the next year, C. Junius Bubulcus the third time, and Q. Æmylius Barbula the second time, in the very entrance of their office framed a complaint unto the people: That by the leud and corrupt Election of some new Senators, that honourable state and order was deformed, and namely, how some were over-slipt, who were of more worth than those that were taken in: And saying plainly,

That

* Surnamed Cæcus, that is, Blind.
* Appia via.
* Out of the river Anio, and was called, Aqua Claudia.

That they would not obſerve and have in any regard ſuch a choice, which without reſpect of good and bad was made for favour and affection to ſome, and at the pleaſure of the Cenſors: and immediatly they cited the Senat by name in that order and form, as had been uſed before the Cenſors, App. Claudius and C. Plautius.

And in that year were two places of charge and command, firſt given by the people, both pertaining to warfare: the one, that ſixteen Colonels for four * Legions, ſhould from that time forward by the people be created, which before were in a manner the gifts and favours conferred by the Dictators and Conſuls; and few or none of the people had any hand or voice therein. This Act and Ordinance was propounded by L. Petilius and C. Martius, Tribunes of the Commons. The other was, That the ſame people ſhould have the appointment and ordaining of two Duumvirs at ſea, for the rigging, repairing, and trimming of the Navy. The maker of this Act was M. Decius, another Tribune of the Commons.

I would let paſs one thing that hapned this year, as of ſmall weight and importance, and not worth the ſpeaking, but that it ſeemed a matter pertinent to religion. The minſtrels that plaied upon the flute and hautboies, for that they were prohibited and debarred by the laſt Cenſors, to have their good chear any more in the Temple of Jupiter, according to an old cuſtome and tradition, took ſnuff thereat, and in a pelting chafe all in one company went their waies to Tybur: ſo as there was not one of them in the City left to ſing and pipe before the pomp of ſacrifices, and on their feaſtival daies. The Senat made ſome conſcience hereof, and were troubled in their mind. Whereupon they diſpatched certain meſſengers to Tybur, to travel with the townſmen, and endeavour all they could that theſe good fellows might be reſtored and ſent home again to the Romans. The Tyburtins undertook the matter, and promiſed right courteouſly to do their beſt: and firſt they ſent for theſe muſicians into their Town-Hall, and perſwaded with them to return again to Rome: but when they could not be brought to that, for any thing they could do, then they wrought another policy and feat with them, that ſorted and fitted well the humour of ſuch kind of people and of their coat. Upon a feſtival holyday, under a colour of making merry with minſtrelſie and muſick about them, ſome invited one, and ſome another, to give them a fit of mirth accordingly. But they plied them ſo with wine (which all the ſort of this profeſſion love but too well) that they drank until they winked, and winked ſo long, till they fell faſt aſleep. And being found aſleep, the Tyburtins brought them gently to their beds in certain waggons, and thus beſtowed, conveyed them to Rome. Neither perceived they ought, ſenſeleſs drunken ſorts they, before that their wagons were left in the market place of Rome. Nay, before they had ſlept out and concocted their wine that ſteamed up into their heads, and clouded there, the day-light came upon them, and then they awoke. The people came running together from all parts to them, and after they had either got at their hands, or charged them to ſtay, and make no more ſuch frolicks, it was granted unto them, that three daies every year, being diſguiſed and dreſſed in a mask for the purpoſe, they might range and walk about the City, with ſinging, and ſounding their inſtruments, after this licentious manner and jollity, which now adaies is yearly uſed, and their priviledge of eating in the temple was reſtored to them again, namely, to ſuch as ſung and plaied in time of their divine ſervice and ſacrifices: and all was well. This ridiculous pageant hapned amidſt the care and preparation of two great and dangerous wars.

The Conſuls parted their Provinces between them: To Junius fell by lot the Samnits, to Æmylius the new war in Hetruria. In Samnium, Cluvia, a fortreſs and hold of the Romans being impregnable by an aſſault, was a long time beſieged; and forced by extream famine, was delivered up to the Samnits. After they were once Maſters of the fort, they took the garriſon ſouldiers, and notwithſtanding they yeelded themſelves, yet they whipped and tare their fleſh moſt beaſtly, and in the end, without all mercy killed them. Junius exceeding wroth at this cruelty, thinking nothing more needful to be done firſt, than the winning again of Cluvia; laid all other matters aſide, and the ſame day that he aſſailed the wals, took it by force, and ſlew all he could find above fourteen years of age. In this train of victory the Army was brought againſt Bovianum. This was the chief place of the Pentrians in Samnium, the wealthieſt City, the beſt provided, and moſt furniſhed of all other with men and munition. The ſouldiers very eager and ſharp ſet for hope of a rich pillage won the Town. But for that they were nothing ſo angry and hot of revenge as before, they dealt not ſo cruelly with the enemies: but they got together and carried away more ſpoil and ſaccage from thence than they ever had well near out of all Samnium; and as liberally was it beſtowed every whit upon the ſouldiers. And foraſmuch as no pitched battel in plain field, no Camp ſo well fortified, no Cities and Forts, howſoever fenced, were able to withſtand the puiſſant Romans in force of open arms: all the Princes in Samnium ſtudied and applied their wits to find means of ſleight and ſubtill policy; if haply, as they waſted and forraged the Territories after a looſe and licentious manner, the Army disbanded once, might be entrapped and encloſed within ſome ambuſh. It fell out ſo, that certain fugitive peaſants of the Country, and Captives, ſome by chance, and other of purpoſe, coming in their way, made relation of tidings to the Conſuls, well agreeing all in one tale, and the ſame ſounding of a truth indeed; namely, that a great ſort of ſheep and other cattel were driven together into a by-forreſt out of the way: and ſo induced them to lead thither the Legions lightly armed, and to fit their hands with a fat booty. Now the Samnits had privily forelaid all the high waies with a mighty army, and after that they ſaw the Romans to have entred & engaged themſelves within the chaſe or forreſt aforeſaid, all of a ſudden

* A Legion conſiſted now of 4000 foot-ment; howſoever at other times, of 3000, 5000, yea, and 6000, and the Colonels fewer or more in a legion, according to the quantity thereof. There belonged beſides to every legion ordinarily 300 horſe. With whom the Tribunes or Colonels aforeſaid had nothing to do, being Captains of 1000 foot a peece.

A ſudden they roſe up and with a great cry and ſhout ran upon them to charge them when they leaſt thought of any ſuch thing. At the firſt this ſo ſtrange and unexpected occurrence made them afraid, while they took them to their weapons, and laid their fardels and baggage together on a heap in the midſt. But after that every man was eaſed of his load, and had put on his armor, they rallied on all ſides to their enſigns; and without the commandment or direction of any man, they of themſelves put the battel in array, each one knowing his ranke and place according to the accuſtomed order of the ancient Military diſcipline. The Conſul perceiving that he was brought to a moſt doubtful and dangerous battel, alight from his horſe; and proteſted before Jupiter and Mars, and the other gods whom he called all to witneſs: "That he came not into that place to Junius the Conſul to his ſouldiers.
B "get glory to himſelf by any enterpriſe, but only a booty for his ſouldiers: and that no fault elſe
"could be imputed unto him, but an overmuch deſire and affection of his, to enrich his ſouldiers
"by the ſpoil of the enemy. From which blame and ſhame both, nothing could free and acquit
"him elſe, but the manhood and proweſs of his ſouldiers: exhorting them with one accord but "to ſtay themſelves and endeavour all together to ſet upon their enemy, defeated and vanquiſhed
"in battel, driven out of Camp and field, bereaved of his Towns and ſtrong holds, and come now
"to attempt his laſt and utmoſt hope, of privy and theeviſh trains of forlaying, truſting upon the "vantage of the ground, and not pure force of arms. But what place is there now unacceſſible or "unpregnable to the valiant Romans? Herewithall he named the Caſtle of Fregellæ and Sora, and "what place of diſvantage and hard acceſs ſoever, they had won by force. With theſe words the C ſouldiers encouraged and enflamed, forgetting all difficulties and dangers, marched apace and advanced forward up to the army of the enemies that now approached them, and were over their heads. Where the Romans found ſome difficulty all the while they climed up the cliff or ridge of the hill againſt them. But after that the formoſt enſigns were mounted up and had gained the plain in the top, and perceived they were embattelled upon an even and equall ground, preſently the terror turned upon thoſe that lay in wait for them, & being disbanded, ſcattered, and driven to fling away their weapons, they fled and trudged as faſt as they could to recover again thoſe ſtarting and lurking holes, wherein before they had hid themſelves. But even thoſe difficult places which they had ſought of purpoſe for their enemy, and their own deceit and guile, encumbred themſelves. For very few of them could find the way out, and eſcape by flight. Inſomuch as to the num-D ber of 20000 were ſlain. And then the Romans after this victory ran up and down at their pleaſure to that booty of ſheep and cattel, which was firſt preſented unto them by the enemy, as a bait to catch them with.

Whiles theſe things thus went in Samnium, all the people of Hetruria by this time, but only the Aretins, were up in arms, and entred into a right great war; beginning firſt with the ſiege and aſſault of Sutrium: which City being allied to the Romans, was (as a man would ſay) the very Barriers of all Hetruria. Thither came the other Conſul Æmylius with an army, to reſcue and deliver their allies, and to raiſe the ſiege. Againſt the Romans coming, the Sutrins curteouſly brought victuals for the Camp, lying before the City. The Tuſcans ſpent the firſt day in conſulting whether they ſhould make a ſhort war of it, by hot aſſaults, or temporiſe and protract the time by E lingring ſiege. The morrow after, when as the Captains liked rather of expedition and haſty courſes, than of more ſage and ſafe proceedings, at the ſun riſing they ſet out a flag of defiance and the ſignal of battel, and armed they go forth of their Camp into the open field to fight. Which after it was told the Conſul, preſently he commanded a watch-word to be given, that the ſouldiers ſhould take their breakfaſt: and after they had refreſhed and ſtrengthned their bodies with food, go ſtraight to arm themſelves: which was obeyed accordingly. The Conſul ſeeing them well appointed in readineſs, commanded the enſigns to advance forward out of the rampier, and not far from the enemy marſhalled his battels. For a good while they ſtood on both ſides, wiſtly looking, and waiting that the ſhout and charge ſhould begin from the adverſe part. But it was paſt F noon before there was one dart flung or javelin lanced either from the one ſide or the other. But then, becauſe they ſhould not go away without doing ſomewhat, the Tuſcans began to ſet up a cry, the trumpets ſound the charge, and the ſtandards came forward. Neither were the Romans any jot behind to begin battell: Thus they ran to it, and encountred with exceeding animoſity and fury; the enemies more in number, the Romans better in hardineſs and vertue. The fight was doubtful and dangerous, and coſt the life of many a man on both ſides, and namely, thoſe that were moſt forward and valiant: neither began they to ſhrink on any part, before that the ſecond battaillon of the Romans, freſh and luſty, advanced to the forefront of the vangard, into the place of their wearied fellows. The Tuſcans, for that their vangard was not ſupplied and reenforced by any new ſuccours, both before and all about their enſigns were beaten down and ſlain every man. Never in any one battel had there been leſs running away, or more bloudſhed, if the night had G not protected the Tuſcans: ſo reſolute were they all to die in the place: inſomuch as the winners gave over play before the loſers. After the ſun ſet, the retreat was ſounded: and by night both parts returned into the Camp. After this, no exploit was performed before Sutrium that year, worth remembrance: both for that, the foreward of the enemies army, was wholly in that one battell defeated and deſtroyed; and they had none left but the Subſidiary ſouldiers of the rereward, and thoſe hardly able and ſufficient to guard and defend the Camp: and alſo, the Romans were ſo hurt and ſore wounded, that there were more of them died after the battell of their hurts than were ſlain in the very skirmiſh outright. Q. Fabius, Conſul for the year following, ſucceeded ed and entred upon this war at Sutrium. And for his collegue he had C. Martius Rutilius: and like as Fabius brought a new ſupply from Rome to furniſh out the broken bands, ſo there came freſh forces alſo unto the Tuſcans, levied at home.

For many years there had been no jars and debates between the Magiſtrates of the Nobility and the Tribunes of the Commons: but now there began a variance and contention out of that family and houſe, which even then was fatall, (as it were) and born to do miſchief to the Tribunes and Commons both. Appius Claudius the Cenſor, after eighteen months expired (which by the law Æmylia was the full term of bearing that Magiſtracy) notwithſtanding that C. Plautius his Collegue had given up his office; could by no means poſſible be forced himſelf to go out and give over the place. Then roſe up one P. Sempronius, a Tribune of the Commons, who took in hand this matter, as touching the demiſſion of the Cenſorſhip, within the time prefixed by the law: an action doubtleſs, not more popular than juſt and rightfull, nor leſs acceptable to the better ſort, than pleaſing to the very Commons and baſe people. He having frequently rehearſed and reiterated the law Æmylia, extolled with praiſes up to the sky, the author and maker thereof, Mamercus Æmylius a Dictator; who had reduced the Cenſorſhip, an office aforetime of five years continuance (a puiſſance and authority, which by the length thereof ſavoured of Lordſhip) within the compaſs of a year and ſix months. "Come on, quoth he, Appius Claudius, anſwer and ſay, "what you would have done in caſe you had been Cenſor, when C. Furius, and M. Giganius were "Cenſors? Appius anſwered and ſaid, that this demand and queſtion of the Tribune did not greatly touch or concern his cauſe. For put the caſe, that the law Æmylia had obliged thoſe Cenſors, during whoſe Magiſtracy the Act was made, (for that after thoſe Cenſors created, the people had granted that law, and look what they laſt allowed and ordained, the ſame was good, lawfull, and ratified) yet neither he nor any of them, who after that law enacted were created Cenſors, could be bound by vertue of that law. Whiles Appius thus cavilled, and no man there preſent ſoothed him up, or gave applauſe and aſſent unto him: "Behold Quirites, quoth Sempronius, "again, the progeny and race of that Appius, who being created Decemvir for one year, elected "himſelf the ſecond year: and in the third, being choſen neither by himſelf, nor by any other, in "quality of a private perſon, held the ſoveraign dignity and government, with all the regall marks "and enſigns thereof: and thus continuing ſtill in rule and dominion, would never give over, "before that his uſurped governments of his ill-gotten, badly born, and naughtily kept and retained, were his finall fall and utter overthrow. This is the ſame family and houſe, (my Maſters "and friends, Citizens of Rome) by whoſe violence, by whoſe wrongs and oppreſſion, ye were "driven like poor baniſhed perſons to forgo your own deer native country, and to ſeize and "hold the Mount Sacer; the very ſame, againſt which ye procured and purchaſed to your ſelves "the ſupport and help of Tribunes; the ſame, for which with two armies ye were fain to poſſeſs "your ſelves of the Aventine hill; the ſame that alwaies withſtood the Statutes deviſed againſt "Uſury; the ſame, that ever impugned the laws for diviſion of waſt lands among the people; the "ſame brake for the time, and interrupted the marriages between the Nobles and Commons; "the ſame kept out the Commons ſo long from bearing any dignities of the Chair, and of State: "finally, this name is much more ſpightfully and mortally bent againſt your freedom, than that "of the Tarquins. And is it ſo indeed, O App. Claudius? Would you have us beleeve, that being now an hundred years ſince Mamercus Æmylius was Dictator, there have been ſo many "Cenſors moſt noble and valiant perſonages, that none of them all ever read the twelve Tables? "and none of them knew that to be law which the people laſt granted and allowed? Yes Iwis, "they all wiſt that well enough: and thereupon yielded they, and obeyed rather the law Æmylia "than the old and ancient Statute, (whereby the firſt Cenſors were created in the Common-wealth) even becauſe the people approved it laſt: and by reaſon that there are two ordinances "repugnant and contrary one to the other, there the new alwaies repealeth and abrogateth the "old. And is this your ſaying, O Appius? That the people are not bound to the law Æmylia or rather that they are tied unto it, but your good ſelf alone is free and exempt therefrom? Was the "law Æmylia able to bridle and curb thoſe violent Cenſors C. Furius, & M. Giganius, who ſhewed ſufficiently what harm and miſchief this Magiſtracy could do in a Common-wealth, when "for anger & deſpite that their term was abridged and cut ſhort, they diſtranchiſed, and deprived "of the right of voice and Suffrage, yea, and brought within the range of Tributaries, M. Æmylius "the worthieſt and moſt excellent perſonage of his time, both at home in peace, and abroad in "war? This law took hold of all the Cenſors, one after another in order, for the ſpace of an hundred years after; and bindeth now C. Plautius your Collegue, created with the ſame Auſpices, "and in equall authority with you. Tell me (I pray you) did not the people elect and make him "with as good right and authority as any Cenſor might be? Are you the only and ſpecial man amongſt all others to have this prerogative, this priviledge and ſingular preeminence by your ſelf? O "Suppoſe a man ſhould create the King Sacrificer, ſhould he, having once got the name and title "of a King, give out and avouch, that he was King indeed, of as great a prerogative as any King "of Rome? Who, think you, will be content with a Dictatorſhip of ſix months, or with an Interregne for five daies and no more? Whom may a man boldly and confidently create Dictator "either to faſten a ſpike or great nail? Or for the ſtately plaies and games, or horſe-running, and "ſuch like? How fooliſh, think ye my Maſters, how baſe-minded and ſimple were they in this "man his conceit, who within twenty daies, after notable exploits done and atchieved, gave over their

A "their Dictatorship? or they that being created with some errour and default, went out of their "place? But what need I to rehearse examples of old date? Of late, even within these ten years,
"C. Manius Dictator, for enforcing a commission more severely than stood with the safety of "some great & wealthy persons, was charged by them with the guiltiness of the same crime, wher-
"upon he sate and made inquisition; who, to the end, that being a privat person, he might answer
"the accusation of his adversaries, and justifie himself, resigned up his Dictatorship. But I would "not that you in any hand were so modest: no, no, degenerate not a jot from that most imperious
"stock and proud race: go not you forth of your office, howsoever you do, a day no, nor an hour
"sooner than you needs must: but see then withall, that you exceed not the ordinary time limited B "and set down. At leastwise, it might content you to draw out your Censorship a day longer, or "to stretch it farther by a month. A month? what tell you me of a month? I will exercise my Cen"sorship (quoth he) three years and six months, more than may be by the law Æmylia: yea, and by "my self alone will I exercise it. Yea mary sir, this is somewhat like indeed, and spoken like a King.
"What, will you substitute unto you a Collegue in the room of the other? will you so? Whom "lawfull it is not to be subrogated and chosen no not in the dead his place? For you think it not "enough, belike, that you (religious holy Censor that you be) have translated and transmitted,
"that most ancient solemnity, and only instituted by that good [Hercules] in whose honour it is "celebrated, from the function of most noble Sacrificers and Chaplains, of that divine and sa"cred service, unto the ministry of base servants, and abject slaves: and that a kindred and linage C "of greater antiquity, than the very first foundation of this City, so sanctified by entertainment "and lodging of the immortal gods, by your means, and by occasion of your Censorship, with-
"in one year is rooted out and perished every mothers son: unless also by the same means, you "hazard the whole Common-wealth, and bring all into the same enormity and guilt of wicked"ness, which even to prelage and conjecture, my heart doth tremble and quake again. In that "Lustram [or five years space] was the City of Rome taken by the Gauls, wherein L. Papyrius
"Cursor, because he might not go out of his Censorship, took a Collegue unto him, M. Cornelius "Maluginensis, in the place of C. Julius the Censor late deceased. And yet see how much more "sober and moderate was his ambitious humour in that behalf, than this of yours, O Appius.
"For L. Papirius neither alone, nor yet beyond the just set time by law, administred his Censorship: D "yet found he never any one person after him, that would imitate and follow his example. All "Censors from that time forward, upon the death of their fellow Censor gave up the office. But "as for you, notwithstanding that the date of your Censorship be fully out, and your compani"on in government departed out of the place; neither law nor shame, is able to rule and re"strain. You suppose that vertue consisteth in pride, in audacious boldness, in contempt both of "God and man. For mine own part truly, O Ap. Claudius, for the reverence and majesty of this "honourable place, which you have born, I would not willingly enter into any such hard cour"ses, as to touch your person by violence of hand; no, nor so much as to offend your name with "any foul or unkind language. But as these words that have already passed, your own peevish and "perverse frowardness, your opinionative contumacy, and insolent pride, having wrung and for-E "ced from me: so unless you will obey the law Æmylia, by your leave, I will be so bold as com"mand you to ward and prison. And since our forefathers and ancestors have so provided and or"dained, that in the Election of Censors, if either of the twain come short of sufficient voices re"quisite for to choose him, the other cannot be admitted and declared Censor; and so they must "proceed again to a new election, and the former Scrutinies are of no effect: shall I suffer you to "exercise the Censorship alone, who may not lawfully be created alone? These and such like remonstrances after he had alledged, he commanded the Censor to be attached and committed. In these proceedings of his, six of his fellow Tribunes adhered unto him, and three only assisted Appius; who called instantly upon them for their protection and lawfull succour: and so with exceeding ill will, and highest discontentment of all states and degrees, he went clear away, and bare F the Censorship alone.

These matters thus passed at Rome, and Sutrium was besieged still by the Tuscans: and as the Cons. Fabius was leading about at the foot of the hils, certain forces to succour his allies, & to assail the fortifications of the enemies what way he could, they with an army in battel-ar. ay met with him. Whose great multitude when he might discover upon the plains underneath, because he would help out the small number of his men by some advantage of the ground, he wheeled a little about, up toward the hill tops (which were rough and craggy places spred all over with stones) and from thence he turned his banners full upon the face of the enemies. The Tuscans fogetting all things, and thinking upon nothing but their multitude, whereof only they presumed; gave battell so hastily and in such greedines, that casting away their shots and darts from them, to G the end they might the sooner come to hand-strokes, they drew their swords, as they marched against the enemy. The Romans on the contrary side laid load with shot, and applied them one while with darts, another while with stones which the place plenteously afforded them.
Which, as they thumped and clattered, and stuck upon their shields and morions, although they hurt them not much, yet troubled them not a little: neither could the enemies easily come within them to fight neer and close, nor any darts or javelins had they to fling and launce afar off and thereby to annoy their enemy. And whiles they stood still exposed as Buts, to receive all that came, and had nothing now to cover and protect them ſufficiently; whiles ſome of them al- H ſo gave ground and retreated, and the whole battel was wavering and unſteady, the Roman Haſtati and Principes, came forward with a new ſhout, and charged them afreſh. This violent aſſault could not the Tuſcans bear, but turning their enſigns, fled amain in diſarray toward their camp. But when as the Roman horſemen who were rid over through the plains and had gotten before, met them afront in the rout, they left their way unto the Camp, & turned toward the mountains: from whence with their whole company in a manner diſarmed and ſore wounded, they recovered the forreſt Ciminia. The Romans having ſlain many thouſands of the Tuſcans, gained thirty eight enſigns of the field, and won alſo their tents with rich pillage; began to conſult about purſuing the enemy. The wood Ciminia was at that time more unpaſſable and to be feared, than were I of late daies the German forreſts: for never to that day had it been travelled and frequented ſo much as by merchants. And ſcarcely any one but the Captain himſelf durſt venture to enter into it: for, all the reſt had not forgot as yet the unhappy luck they had at Candium. Then the Conſul his brother, one that was there, (M. Fabius, as ſome ſay, as others, Cæſo, and as other ſome C. Claudius, his brother only by the mothers ſide) promiſed that he would go as a ſcout in ſpiall, to deſcry the wood, and within a while bring certain news. He had in his tender years been brought up at Cære, among the ancient friends of his houſe and family, where afterwards he was taught the Tuſcan learning and knowledge, and thereby was perfect in their tongue and language. And I find ſome authors of credit that writ, how in thoſe daies the Romans young children went to ſchool for to learn to parl Tuſcan, as now they do to ſpeak Greek. But it ſtandeth more like a truth, that K there was ſome ſpecial matter in this man, who with ſo bold ſemblance and diſſimulation, durſt intrude and inſinuate himſelf amongſt the enemies. It is ſaid, that one only ſervitor accompanied him, one who had been brought up and nurſed together with him, and thereupon not ignorant of the ſame language. And all the way as they went they did nothing elſe, but ſuperficially and after a generall ſort, learn the nature and ſite of the quarters which they were to enter into, and the names withall, of the chief rulers and principal perſonages of that country and nation: to the end that in their ſpeech and talk, they might not falter and trip, and be taken tardy in any apparent thing, which might bewray and diſcover them. They went clad in paſtoral weeds like herdmen, armed like country Kernes or Peaſants, each of them with a faulchion and two javelins. But neither the familiar uſe and commerce of the tongue, nor the faſhion of apparel which they L were, or weapons that they carried ſaved them ſo much as this one thing, That no man would ever beleeve, that any forreiner and ſtranger durſt enter upon thoſe thick Ciminian forreſts. Well, forward they went (by report) as far as to the Camertins in Umbria. There the Roman ventured to bewray who they were: and when he was brought in to their Senat, he treated with them in the Conſuls name, about a league and amity. Whereupon, after he had been courteouſly entertained and friendly intreated, he had his diſpatch, and was willed to relate unto the Romans, That there ſhould be ready for their army, ſufficient victuals for one whole month, if they would come into thoſe parts: Alſo, that the youth of the Camertins in Umbria ſhould be at their command, preſt in arms at all times. Theſe tidings being reported to the Conſul, after that he had ſent before his carriages at the firſt watch of the night, and commanded the legions to go after, himſelf ſtaid M ſtill with the horſemen: and the morrow morning by day-light he began to ſkirmiſh with the corps de guard of his enemies, which were quartered without the forreſt, and when he had long enough kept them play, and amuſed them at his pleaſure, he retired into his Camp; from whence he went forth at another gate, and before night overtaketh the main army. The morrow after, at the point of day-break, he was got up to the creſt of the hill Ciminius: from whence, after he had beheld and vewed the goodly proſpect of the rich grounds and fields of Hetruria, he ſendeth out his ſouldiers abroad to forrage and fetch in prizes, and by that time they had got, and were driving a fat booty, certain tumultuary bands of the ruſtical Peaſants of Hetruria, gathered together in great haſt, and of a ſudden, by the States of that country met with the Romans; but ſo out of order were they, that being come to reſcue a prey, they had like to have been a prey themſelves. A N number of them were ſlain or put to flight, and the Romans, having waſted and made ſpoil all over the country, enriched with ſtore of all things, returned victorious into their Camp. Thither were arrived (as it fell out) five meſſengers or purſevants with the Tribune of the Commons to warn and command Fabius in the name of the Senat, not to paſs through the forreſt Ciminius. But theſe meſſengers being glad that they came too late for to hinder and interrupt their enterpriſes, returned home again to Rome with news of the victory.

By this expedition and journey made by the Coſ. the war rather encreaſed and ſpread farther, than was diſpatched & brought to an end. For all that tract lying along the bottom & foot of the mountain Ciminius, felt the ſmart of this rode: and provoked to anger & deſire of revenge, not only the State of Hetruria, but alſo the borders and marches of Umbria. Whereupon there came to O Sutrium, a greater power than ever afore: for not only they removed their Camp forward out of the woods, but alſo for the eager deſire of fight withal ſpeed, they came abroad into the plain field. Afterwards, they ſtood firſt embattelled in a plot, by them fitly choſen, leaving over againſt them a ſpace of ground for the enemies to ſet themſelves in order of battel: but perceiving the enemies to fall off, & loath to fight, they approached the very trench and rampiers; but finding there, that the guards were retired within their hold all at once they began to cry with one voice to their captains for to give order, that the reſt of their allowance of victuals for that day ſhould be brought

A them thither out of the camp; for they would ſtay in their armor and harneſs, as they were, and either in the night, or elſe in the morning betimes by day-light, give the aſſault upon their enemies camp. The Roman army was no more quiet then they, yet at their Generals commandment kept in. Now it was welneer the * tenth hour of the day; When as the Conſul willed his ſouldiers to take their refection, and warned them to be ready in armes at what hour ſoever by day or by night he ſhould give them the ſignal of battell. And in the mean time maketh a ſhort ſpeech unto them, praiſing highly, and ſetting out of the Samnits wars, debaſing the Tuſcans, ſaying, that there was no compariſon between either enemy to enemy, or number for number: over and beſides, he ſaid that he had another feat and ſecret deviſe in ſtore for them, which they ſhould know when time ſerved; in the mean while they muſt keep ſilence of neceſſity, and hold their peace. By theſe dark ſpeeches and bidden myſteries, he made ſemblance, as though he had ſome privy intelligence, B that one part of the enemies would betray the reſt when time came: this did he, to the end, that the heart of his ſouldiers (which haply were diſmaied and diſcouraged at their great multitudes) might be comforted and refreſhed: and for that the enemies lay abroad in field without any hold and fort, it was more likely and probable, which he pretended. The ſouldiers having taken their repaſt, they laid their bodies to repoſe and ſleep, and ſomewhat before the reliefe of the * fourth watch, they were raiſed without noiſe, and armed themſelves. The ſouldiers boies and lackies, and ſuch as followed the camp, had mattocks and ſpades divided amongſt them, to caſt down the rampire, and to fill up the ditches with the bank, whiles that within the compaſſe and circuit of the camp, they were marſhalled in battell array. The choſen * cohorts or bands were placed at the gates and paſſages forth. Then at the ſound of trumpet, a little before day (which in ſummer nights C is the time of the deepeſt and ſoundeſt ſleep) the whole army, when the rampire was laid along and levell, iſſued forth at once, and charged the enemies on all ſides, lying here and there ſcattered on the ground. Some before they were ſtirring, others half aſleep and half awake in their couches: but the greateſt part, making haſt in that ſudden fright to take arms, were ſlain and cut in peeces. Few had time to put themſelves in armour, and they having no enſigns, no colours to follow, and no captains to direct them, were by the Romans ſoon diſcomfited, put to flight, and purſued in chaſe. Some made halt to the camp, other to the woods, ſundry waies one from another. But the woods were the ſafeſt place of refuge. For their camp pitched in a plain, was the ſame day taken, and won. All the gold and ſilver there found, was by expreſſe commandment brought unto the Conſul his pavilion; the reſt of the pillage, was the ſouldiers ſhare. Slain and taken priſoners that D day, there were of the enemies to the number of 60000. This ſo noble a battel (ſome Writers ſay) was fought on the other ſide of the wood Ciminia, before Perufia: who alſo report, that the City of Rome was in great fear, leſt that the army being incloſed within ſo dangerous a wood, ſhould have been ſurpriſed and defeated by the Tuſcans and Umbrians, who were riſen up in arms together from all parts. But whereſoever it was fought, the Romans had the day. Whereupon there came Embaſſadors from Perufia, * Cortona, and * Aretium, where were in maner the chief and princi- pall Cities at that time of all Tuſcane, treating and ſuing to the Romans for peace, and a league: but they obtained truce only for thirty years.

During theſe affairs in Hetruria, the other Conſul, C. Martius Rutilus, wan from the Samnits the town * Allifas. Many other villages and caſtles were either utterly demoliſhed and deſtroied E by way of extream hoſtility, or yeelded ſafe and whole unto their ſubjection. At the ſame time the Roman navy alſo, under the Conduct of P. Cornelius, whom the Senat ordained Admiral of the ſea-coaſt, ſet ſail for Campain, and being arived at * Pompeii, the mariners and ſea-ſervitors went a land to waſt and forage the teritories about * Nuceria: and after they had made ſpoil, and pilled by ſnatches the parts lying neereſt unto the ſea, from whence they might ſafely again return to their ſhips; they adventured farther for ſweetneſſe of gain and booty (as uſually it falleth out) and ſo gave the alarm to the enemies for to riſe. As they ſtragled all over the fields, no man made head againſt them, at what time, as they might have been ſoon ſlain every one; but as they were returning with a diſordered march, and ſtood not upon their guards, a troop of the peaſants of the country overtook them, not far from the Ships, and eaſed them of their ſpoil and pillage, F and ſlew ſome of them: the reſt of the multitude, as many as eſcaped the ſword, were chaſed to their fleet.

The journey of Q. Fabius beyond the forreſt Ciminia, as it cauſed great fear in Rome, ſo it gave occaſion of as joyful news in Samnium. For the rumor ran, that the Romans army was ſhut up and beſieged. And hereupon they called to remembrance, and alledged the like example of a loſſe and ſhameful diſgrace at Gaudium; reporting and giving forth, that theſe Romans being a nation greedy alwaies of incroaching farther, and winning more ground, were through the ſame raſhneſſe now run headlong into the blind forreſts impaſſable, and inviroued not ſo much with the power and force of enemies, as the dangerous difficulties of thoſe paſſages. In ſuch ſort as amid this joy of theirs, they envied alſo that fortune had turned the glorious honour of the conqueſt over the G Romans, from the Samnits, to the Tuſcans. And therefore being well appointed with men and armour, they ran out from all parts, to tread down and confound C. Martius the Conſul forever: minding from thence, in caſe Martius would not abide a battell, to go into Hetruria through the Marſi and Sabins. But the Conſul met with them by the way; where was fought a ſharp and cruell battell with doubtful event, and much effuſion of bloud on both ſides. And as uncertain as it was, whether part loſt more bloud, yet the rumour went, that the Romans had the worſe, by reaſon of the loſſe of certain knights and gentlemen of Rome, and Colonels, and one H Lieutenant; and that which made moſt, for that the Conſul himſelf was hurt. Hereupon the brute (as commonly is ſeen) got more feathers ſtill as it flew, and made every thing greater: ſo as the LL. of the Senat in Rome, were in great fear and perplexity, and agreed to create a Dictator. Neither was there any doubt at all, but that Papirius Curſor ſhould be the man, who in thoſe daies was reputed the only warrior above all others. But neither could they be aſſured of ſending a meſſenger ſafe into Samnium (conſidering all the country was up in arms) nor that the Conſul was for certain alive. And as for the other Conſul Fabius, upon an old ſecret and privat grudge, he mali-ced Papirius: which quarell, leſt it might hinder the ſervice of the Commonweal, the Senat thought good to ſend unto him certain Embaſſadors (as it were) even ſuch as had been Conſuls; who of their own authority, as well as by vertue of publick commiſſion from the State, ſhould ad- I moniſh and counſel him to remit and forget all old diſpleaſures and rancours, for his countries ſake.

When theſe perſonages were come to Fabius the Coſ. and had delivered unto him the decree of the Senat, and uſed withall ſuch ſpeech and reaſons of their own, as ſuted well to the errand they had in charge: the Coſ. caſting his eies down toward the ground, departed from the Embaſſadors without giving ever a word, and left them doubtfull what he would do. But the night following, in the dead time (as the maner is) he nominated L. Papirius for Dictator. And when theſe meſſengers or Embaſſadors gave him great thanks for maſtering and ruling his affections ſo exceeding well, he held his reſolution ſtill of ſilence, and without any anſwer given, or mention made of himſelf, diſmiſſed them; that it might appear, how upon an high mind and haughty ſtomack, he bridled and kept in that grief of heart and ſpiteful anger of his, Papirius named C. Junius Bu- K bulcus commander of the horſe. And whiles he propoſed an act concerning the regiment and command of his army, before the people aſſembled by the Curiæ or wards, there hapned a matter of ominous preſage, which cauſed that buſineſſe to be put off untill the next day: for that the ward Faucia, which by lot had the prerogative now to give the firſt voices, was noted already for infamous and unhappy, in regard that two calamities which happened in both years, wherein the ſame Curiæ likewiſe began the ſuffrages firſt; namely, the taking of the City of Rome, and the Caudine peace. Macer Licinius making that ward ominous and unlucky, for a third loſſe and calamity received at Cremera. But the next morrow, the Dictator, after he had taken new Auſpices, went through with the act, and obteined his commiſſion, and ſet forward with the legions lately muſtered and enrolled upon the fearfull alarm given, that the Roman army was paſſed L the wood Cyminia, untill he arrived at Longula: where, after he had received of the Con-ſul Martius, the old bands of ſouldiers, he brought his forces into the field to give battell. The enemies for their part ſeemed not to refuſe fight: howbeit, as they ſtood armed and aranged, and neither the one ſide nor the other would begin to charge, the night came upon them, and forced them to retire. Then they abode encamped neer together in reſt and quiet for certain dayes, neither diſtruſting their own puiſſance, nor yet diſdaining and deſpiſing their enemies. In this mean time there was doings and war in Etruria: for both there was a battell fought with the army of the Umbrians: howbeit, the enemies were rather diſcomfited and put to flight than ſlain, for that they were not able to hold out and maintain fight long with ſuch courage and animoſity as they began: and alſo neer the lake and Mear Vadimon*, the Tuſcans had levied a new army, Lego di vetter-bo.* according to a ſacred law, wherby one man had choſen another (who as ſworn brethren were to M to live and die together) where they fought a field, not only with greater number, but alſo with more courage than ever at any time before: and with ſuch heat of anger and malice one againſt the other they encountred, that of neither ſide they thought of diſcharging ſhot and lancing darts, but began at the very firſt with their ſwords to go to handſtrokes: and the conflict being right fiercely begun, increaſed ſtill, and waxed hotter in the very skirmiſh, and continued for a good while ſo doubtfull, that the Romans thought they dealt not with Tuſcans ſo often by them defeated and vanquiſhed, but with ſome new nation more warlike than they. No ſhew of flight on neither ſide; down go the formoſt, and lay dead before their Standards: and leſt that the enſigns ſhould be left naked and bare, and without the defendants, the ſecond range and ward of the bat- N taillon came in place to ſupply the firſt: and ſo ſtill new ſuccours and freſh were fet even as far as from the rereward behind, deſtined for the laſt help and utmoſt refuge. And to that extremity of travel and perill they proceeded, that the Roman horſmen abandoning their horſes alighted on foot, and were fain to go to the footmen in the forefront of the vanguard, over armor, and over dead bodies, lying all ſpread upon the ground; which new troop and battaillon riſen and ſprung (as it were) a freſh, to reenforce and ſtrengthen their diſtreſſed fellowes, diſordred the ſquadrons and enſigns of the Tuſcans. The other legionary ſouldiers, wearied (as they were) followed hard and ſeconded their violence and forceable charge, and at length brake through the ranks of their enemies. Then the Tuſcans as ſtiffe as they ſtood afore, began to have the worſe, and certain bands gave way and retreated: and when they once turned back, they fell plainly to O take their heels and run away. This was the firſt day, that overthrew and laid along the puiſſance of the Tuſcans, who abounded ſo long in wealth and fortunate proſperity. Their whole flour and ſtrength which they had, was in this battell ſlain, and at the ſame time their camp won and ranſacked.

With like hazard and glorious ſucceſſe of the end, was the war managed with the Samnits ſoon after; who beſides all other preparations and ordinary furniture of war, gave order that their

A their army ſhould glitter and ſhine againe with a new kind of garniſhing their harneſſe and armors. For having divided their forces in two armies, the one had laid their ſhields with gold, the other with ſilver. The form and faſhion whereof was this, that upper part wherewith the breſt and ſhoulders are covered, was broader, and the head of it of even height: but the nether end growing downward to the bottom was more pointed wedgewiſe, for to weld it more nimbly; Their breaſt and ſtomack was fenced with ſpunges, the left leg armed with a good greeve, their morions with high creſts made a ſhew of tall ſtature. The ſouldiers aforeſaid with guilded ſhields wore coats of ſundry colours; the other with ſilvered, white linnen: and theſe had the leading of the right wing, or point of the battell; but they of the left. The Romans had notice and knowledge already what preparation there was of brave and goodly armor: and their Captains had B taught them afore, that a ſouldier ought to be dreadful and terrible, not dight and decked in his damasked gold and ſilver, but truſting in the ſharp edge of iron and ſteel, and a good heart and courage withall: and as for that other furniture, it was rather a good booty than armor of proof; fair and reſplendent, before men come to the ſharp, but foul and unſeemly amongſt bloody wounds. The true ornament and beauty of a ſouldier, is valour and hardineſſe; as for all thoſe braveries, they went commonly with victory: and to conclude, that a rich enemy would ſerve well for a good prize to the conqueror, were he never ſo poor and needy. With theſe ſpeeches after that Curſor had animated his ſouldiers, he leadeth them into the field: himſelf he put in the right wing; the left he committeth to the conduct of the Generall of horſe. So ſoon as they charged one another and buckled together, a great conflict and hardy had they with the enemy, and no leſſe emula-
C tion there was between the Dictator and him; ſtriving much whether of them twain ſhould begin the victory. But as hap was, firſt Junius diſordered the enemy, and from the left point which he commanded, he charged right luſtily the right wing of the enemies: ſaying ever and anon, That he offered and ſacrificed unto the Devill and infernall ſpirits, thoſe ſouldiers of theirs, conſecrated already unto them after the maner of the Samnits, and decked accordingly in white livery, and bright ſilvered armour ſuting in colour thereunto: and withall advanced forward his ſtandards, brake their araies, and made the battell to ſhrink evidently and give ground. Which when the Dictator perceived, How now, quoth he, ſhall the victory begin at the left wing, and ſhall the right, wherein the Dictator fighteth in perſon, come behind and follow the battel of another, and not carry away with it the greateſt part of the victory? Herewith he ſetteth on his
D ſouldiers, yet gave the horſemen no place in manhood to the footmen, or the ſervice of the Lieutenants was inferiour to the Captains themſelves and chief commanders: M. Valerius on the right point, P. Decius on the left, both Conſular men, put themſelves forward, and rode out to the horſmen aranged in the wings, exhorted them to take part with them in honor, and charged acroſſe upon the ſides and flanks of the enemies. Whiles this new terror upon the former, had on every ſide entred the battel of the enemies; and the Roman legions, to terrifie them the more, had redoubled a freſh ſhout, & charged them with great fury, then began the Samnits to flie amain. Now were the fields overſpread with the bodies of ſlain men, and ſtrewed thick with armor, erewhile ſo brave and glorious: and at the firſt, the Samnits in great affright recovered their tents; but being there, were not able ſo much as to keep them, for they were won and rifled before night, and fire
E ſet upon them. The Dictator by a decree of the Senat triumphed: and the ſaid armor which was taken from the enemy; made the goodlieſt pageant of all other, in the pomp of triumph: which carried ſo ſtately a ſhew and magnificent, that the guilded ſhields were divided amongſt the warders of the company of Bankers and Goldſmiths, to the beautifying of their Hal and Market place. And hereof began firſt the cuſtome of the Ædiles, to adorn and ſet out the common place of the City in their ſolemn proceſſions, when the ſacred images of the gods and holy reliques were carried about for pomp in ſilver chariots. And the Romans verily for their part put this goodly trim armor of their enemies to this uſe, namely, to honor their gods withall. But the Campains upon a pride and inveterate hatred that they bare againſt the Samnits, uſed to arm their ſword players and fencers at the ſharp (which was a ſolemn ſight and paſtime they had at their great feaſts)
F with this ſame attire, and termed them in mockery, by the name of Samnits.

The ſame year Fabius the Conſul fought with the reſt of the Tuſcans at * Perufia (which City * Perugia. alſo had broken the covenant of truce) where neither doubtfully nor hardly he obtained victory. And the very town it ſelf he had forced & won (for in the ſame train of his conqueſt he approached the wals) but that their Embaſſadours came forth and yeelded the City. When he had placed a good garriſon at Perufia, and ſent before him to Rome unto the Senat, the Embaſſadours of Hetruria, who treated for peace; he being but Conſul, made his triumphant entry into the City for a more magnificent victory, then the Dictatour. And that for a good part of the honor of ſubduing the Sammits, was aſcribed to the Lieutenants P. Decius, and M. Valerius, therefore at the next Election, the people with general aſſent declared the one Conſul, and the other Pretour. Fa- G bius for taming Hetruria ſo bravely and valiantly, continued Conſull ſtill, and had for his Colleague P. Decius. Valerius was created Pretor the fourth time. The Conſuls parted between them the provinces, Hetruria fell to Decius, Samnium to Fabius. Who taking his voiage to Nuceria, laid ſiege to the City of the Allifats, and won it by aſſault; and notwithſtanding they made ſuit for peace, he rejected and deſpiſed them; for that when it was offered, they would not accept it. With the Samnits he fought a battell; but without any great conflict, the enemies were vanquished. Neither had the remembrance of that field been left in record, but that the Marsians H first took arms and warred with the Romans. After the Marsians were revolted, the * Peligmans did the semblable, and sped alike. Decius also the other Consul had good successe in his wars. He drave the Tarquinians for fear, to find the army corn, and to sue for a truce of forty years. Certain castles and holds of the Volscinians, he forceably wan: some of them he utterly rased, for that they should not be any receptacle or harbour for the enemies. And with warring round about every where, he became so terrible, that the whole Tuscane nation made sute to the Consul for peace and confederacy. It they could not obtain: but truce for a year was granted. In regard wherof, for that year they satisfied the whole pay for the army, and a double livery for every souldier was exacted and taken of them. This was the pension and fine that their truce cost them. I

But now when all was quiet among the Tuscans, the sudden revolting of the Umbrians, a nation free, and saved hitherto from the calamities of war, but only, that the Roman army passing through their territories troubled all anew: for they having raised the strength and flower of their youth and sollicited also a great part of the Tuscans to rebell, levied so great a power that making no accompt of Decius, whom they left behind them in Hetruria, they gave out proud words of themselves, and spake basely of the Romans, vaunting and boasting that they would march right forth to assault Rome. Which designe of theirs, so soon as it was reported to Decius the Cos. he made speed, and by long journies departed out of Hetruria toward the City, and in the Country of the Papinians, encamped himself; listning ever after the enemies, what they meant to do. Neither at Rome was the Umbrians war neglected and set light by: for their very threats and menaces K scared them, as who already had seen by experience, by the foil they had at the Gauls hands, how unsure a City they inhabited and not unpregnable. Therupon messengers were dispatched to the Cos. Fabius, That if he had any breathing time, and rest from the Samnits war, he should with al speed lead his army into Umbria. The Cos. obeyed, and by great journies went forward to * Me- vania, where at that time the forces of the Umbrians lay. This sudden and unexpected coming of the Cos. whom they thought verily occupied in Samnium far enough off from Umbria, so terrified the Umbrians, that some gave advise to retire back to their walled towns, others to relinquish the war altogether. One Canton or tract of their country (which they themselves call Materna not only kept the rest in arms, but also set them on to fight immediatly, so as they charged upon Fa- bius, as he was trenching and fortifying. Whom when the Cos. saw rushing upon his rampiers in L such heaps, he called his men from their work, and as the ground & time would give leave, he marshalled them in order of battel: and after he had encouraged his souldiers with a true report & discourse of many glorious and honourable journies atchieved as well in Thuscia as also in Samnium he willed them to dispatch this smal residue of the Tuscan war, that hung by and remained behind, and to be revenged of that accursed and impious speech, whereby they threatned to assail the City of Rome. These words of his were heard by the souldiers with such alacrity and cheerfulness of heart, that before their General had made an end of his speech, they set up a shout of themselves and interrupted him: and thus before commandment and signall given by sound of trumpets and cornets, they ran amain upon the enemies, and charged them as if they had not been men, and those also armed. For (a wonderful thing to be spoken) at the very first they began to pluck the M banners and streamers out of the bearers hands, after that, the ensign-bearers themselves were led to the Consuls, and the souldiers armed as they were, transported out of one battailon into another, and where there was any scuffling, they fought not so much with sword, as buck-ler: and what with their bosses and iron pikes, and what with justling, shouldering, and striking the enemies about the arme-pits, they were overthrown and felled. In which skirmish, more men were taken then slain: and no other cry was heard throughout the field, but down with weapon, down with weapon. So that in the very conflict, the principal authors of the war rendred themselves: and the morrow after, and other daies following, the rest of the people of Umbria likewise yeelded. The Otriculans by stipulation only and pledges given, were received in amity. And Fabi- us having thus got the victory in that war, which fell to another mans lot and charge, led back his N army again into his own province. And in regard of his prosperous and happy exploits, like as the people the year past continued his Consulship: so the Senat against the year following, when Ap.
Claudius, and L. Volumnius were Cos. prorogued his martial rule still, maugre the heart of Appius, who was greatly against it. In some Chronicles I find, that Appius, whiles he was Censor sued to be Consul, and that his Election was crosted and staied by L. Furius, a Tribune of Com until he had resigned up the Censorship. Being created Cos. and the war with the Salentins (declared new enemies) allotted unto his Collegue, he remained at Rome; that by civil policy, and managing home-affairs, he might augment his own state and authority, since that the honour of war-service rested in the hands and conduct of another. Volumnius had no cause to repent of his charge and province: for many fortunat battels he fought, and some towns of the enemies by force he won. O
He was a bountiful giver of the spoil away unto his souldiers: and this bounty in it self alone acceptable, he helped much with great courtesie and gentleness, by which vertues and artificiall means, he made the souldiers both venturous in perils and hardy in travell.

Q. Fabius on the other part, in quality of pro-Consul, gave battell to the Samnits neer the City Allifa, where the day was nothing doubtful. The enemies were discomfited and beaten into their camp: neither had they been able to have kept the field, but that there was but a little

A tle day left behind: and yet before night, they were beſet round about in their hold, yea, and watched with good guards all night long, that none ſhould make eſcape. The morrow morning ere it was well day light, they began to yeeld themſelves, and to capitulate, that as many Samnits as there were among them, ſhould be ſent forth in their ſingle garments, and they all went under the gallows. As for their confederats and allies, there was no ſuch proviſo nor compoſition made, but they all, to the number of ſeven thouſand, were ſold as ſlaves, and wore a garland. As many as advowed themſelves to be Hernicks, were kept apart by themſelves to be forth coming. All thoſe Fabius ſent to Rome to the Senat, and untill ſuch time as enquiry was made, whether in a publick muſter they were preſſed ſouldiers or voluntarily ſerved under the Samnits againſt the Romans, they were committed to be kept in ward among ſundry nations of the Latins: during B which time, the new Conſuls, Publius Cornelius Arvina, and Quintius Martius Tremulus (for thoſe were now created) had in charge to propoſe that matter anew unto the Senat. The Hernicks took that ill. Whereupon the Anagnins held a Diet or General Councel in the round Cirque, which they call Maritimus, of all the Cities of that Nation, except the Alatrinats, Ferentinats, and the Verulans. Where the whole State of Hernicks proclamed war againſt the people of Rome. In Samnium alſo, for that Fabius was departed thence, there aroſe new troubles and rebellions. Calatia and Sora were forced, and the Roman garriſons that there lay, were put to the ſword, and upon the bodies of as many as they took alive, they exerciſed much torture and cruelty. Whereupon Publius Cornelius the Conſul was thither ſent. And to Martius were the new enemies appointed (for by this time decreed it was, That war ſhould be made upon the C Anagnins and the other Hernicks.) At the firſt the enemies had ſo ſeiſed all the convenient paſſes and waies between both the Conſuls camps, that there could not readily paſſe a lackey or currier between, in ſo much, as for certain daies both Conſuls abode doubtfull how the world went, and uncertain one of the others ſtate. The fear whereof, ſpred to Rome, ſo as all the younger ſort [from ſeventeen years of age to ſeven and forty] ware to ſerve: and againſt all ſudden occaſions, and occurrents whatſoever, two full and compleat armies were levied and enrolled. But the Hernick war was nothing correſpondent either to the preſent menaces, or to the ancient glory and reputation of that nation: for having done no worthy adventures, and within few daies loſt their camp thrice, they covenanted for to have thirty daies truce; during which time, they might ſend Embaſſadours to the Senat of Rome: and in conſideration hereof, they D promiſed to lay down two months pay, and to find corn for the army, and allow every ſouldier one coat. But from the Senat they were put off and referred to Martius: unto whom by order from the Senat, a large commiſſion was granted, to diſpoſe of the Hernicks as he he thought good: and ſo he took the whole nation as yeelded to his devotion. The other Conſul in Samnium being in forces more puiſſant then the enemy, was not withſtanding encumbred much with the difficulty of the ground. All the paſſages had the enemie ſtopped, and poſſeſſed himſelf of the forreſts and woods which were thorow faires, that no way victuals might be conveied unto him. Neither could the Conſul, for all that daily he diſplaied banner in field, train them forth to fight: ſo as it was well ſeen, that neither the Samnits could abide preſent battell, nor the Romans long delay of war. But the arrival of Martius who upon the ſubduing of the Hernicks, made haſt to aid his E Colleague, cauſed the enemy to defer no longer the triall of the field. For, they, who thought themſelves not good enough to match ſo much as the one army, knew full well that if they ſuffered two Conſuls armies to join together, there had been no hope left. They therefore ſet upon Martius as he marched without order of battel. Hereupon in al haſt their truſſes and fardels were brought together and laid in the middle; and as the time would permit, he ſet his ſouldiers in array. At the firſt encounter, the ſhout was hard into the camp of the other Conſul. Afterwards the duſt deſcried afar off, gave an alarm, and made a trouble and tumult there. Then the Conſull preſently commanded to arm: and haſtily bringing his ſouldiers forth into the field, entred upon the battell of the enemies in the flank, whiles they were buſied in another skirmiſh. He cried aloud to his men, that it were exceeding great ſhame, to ſuffer the other army to carry away dou-
F ble victory, and not themſelves win the honour of that war, which was their proper charge. Thus, whereſoever he charged, he brake in and made entrance, and having pierced and made a great lane through the midſt of the enemies battel, he paſſed on towards their camp; which finding void of defendants, he took and ſet afire. Which when the ſouldiers of Martius ſaw burning before their faces, and the enemy likewiſe, as they looked behind: then began the Samnits on all hands to flie: but killed they were every where down right: all places full of murder and ſlaughter: ſo in no part could they find means to eſcape and ſave themſelves. Now when there were thirty thouſand of the enemies ſlain, the Conſuls ſounded the retreat, and gathered both their armies together, with great congratulation one to the other: by which time, behold, there were G deſcried a far off, certain new bands of enemies, enrolled for a ſupply; and they gave occaſion of a new and freſh ſlaughter. Againſt whom without commandment of Conſul, or any ſignall received from their leaders, the Romans advanced luſtily, crying aloud, that theſe Samnits were to be welcomed with an ill hanſell, and this their firſt training ſhould coſt them deer. The Conſuls let the legions alone in this their furious heat, as who knew well enough, that theſe new comers ſeeing the old beaten ſouldiers ſo aſtonied already and flying away, would ſoon have enough of it, and not once adventure fight. And they were not deceived in their opinion; for the whole forces of the Samnits as well old and new, fled apace unto the next mountains: and thither the

Romans

Romans alſo make as great ſpeed. But no ſafe place could thoſe vanquiſhed enemies find: for even H from the very hil tops which they held, they were beaten down, ſo that with one voice they all craved peace. Then after the Conſuls had impoſed upon them corn for three months, and a years pay, and for every ſouldier a livery beſides, they were permitted to ſend Embaſſadours to the Senat, to treat and capitulat thereof. During which time, Cornelius was left in Samnium, and Martius returned into the City, with triumph over the Hernicks. Moreover a decree paſſed, that his ſtatue riding on horſback ſhould remain in the common place of aſſemblies, which was erected accordingly even before the Temple of Caſtor. To three States of the Hernicks, to wit, the Alatrinats, the Verulans and Ferentinats, their own laws, and ancient liberties were reſtored again, becauſe they made choice thereof, rather than to be enfranchiſed Citizens of Rome: and permitted they were to marry amongſt the Romans; which liberty they only of the Hernickes for a good I while enjoied. The Anagnins, and thoſe that had born arms againſt the Romans were incorporat free denizens of Rome, but without the priviledge of giving voices and ſuffrages: debarred they were of holding any Councels and making marriages with them, yea, and denied at all to elect any magiſtracy, but only the function and miniſtry of divine ſervice and ſacrifices.

The ſame year the Chappell of dame Salus was by C. Junius Bubulcus now Cenſor, ſet out at a price to be built, which he in his Conſulſhip had vowed, in the Samnits war. By his direction and appointment, together with his colleague M. Valerius Maximus, were the great high waies and cauſeys made, of all ſides of the City, through the fields, at the common charge and expenſes. The ſame year alſo, was the league renewed now the third time with the Carthaginians: and K their Embaſſadors who came for that purpoſe, were courteouſly entertained, and rewarded liberally with rich gifts. In that year there was a Dictator P. Cornel. Scipio, with P. Decius General of the horſe: and theſe were Preſidents at the Election of Conſuls, for to that purpoſe they were created, becauſe neither of the two Conſuls could be ſpared from the wars. Conſuls were created L. Poſthumius, and T. Minutius. But Piſo ſayth, that theſe Conſuls immediatly ſucceeded Q. Fabius and P. Decius: leaving out thoſe two years, wherein he hath written that Claudius with Volumnius, and Cornelius with Martius were Conſuls. Whether he forgot himſelf in digeſting his Annals and yearly records, or of ſet purpoſe overhipt two couple of Conſuls, thinking that they were not in truth Conſuls, I wot not.

The ſame year the Samnits made rodes into the territories of Stella, within the liberties and ap- L purtenances of the Campains, and therfore both Conſuls were ſent into Samnium: who when they were parted into divers wayes, for Poſthumius took his journey to Tifernum, and Minutius to Bovianum: firſt there was battell fought at Tifernum, under the leading of Poſthumius. Some make no doubt, but write, that the Samnits were diſcomfited, and put to the worſe, and thirty thouſand of them taken priſoners: others ſay, that the conflict was equall, and that they departed on even hand: alſo that Poſthumius making ſemblance of fear, journyed by night, & cloſely retired untothe hils adjoyning, & the enemies followed after them, two miles, and from thence encamped, and fortified alſo themſelves in ſtrong places of advantage. The Conſul, becauſe he would be thought to have fought and choſe a ſafe place, and plentifully ſtored with all neceſſaries (as it was no leſſe indeed) where he might keep a ſtanding camp; after he had fortified the ſame, and fur- M niſhed it with all kind of proviſion, leaving behind him a ſtrong garriſon for defence; at the relief of the third watch, leadeth the neereſt way, his legions not encumbred with cariage, to his Colleague, who alſo himſelf lay in camp over againſt another army. There, by the perſwaſion & advice of Poſthumius, Minutius gave battell; and when as the conflict continued doubtfull untill it was far on the day; then Poſthumius with his freſh legions, on a ſudden charged the battaillons of the enemies, now already overroyled; thus partly for wearineſſe, and partly for wounds, they being diſabled for to flee away, were out of all meaſure ſlain every one, and xxi. banners were taken: and ſo from thence they went forward to the camp of Poſthumius. Where theſe two victorious armies finding the enemy diſcouraged and amazed at the tidings of this overthrow, ſet upon them, diſcomfited, and put them to flight; and wan from them xxvi. enſignes: where the General of the N Samnits Statius Cellius, with many a man beſides, was taken priſoner, and both their camps won. Bovianum alſo, which the morrow after began to be aſſaulted, was ſhortly after forced: and finally with great glory of no noble acts atchieved, both Conſuls triumphed. Some write that the Conſul Minutius being grievouſly hurt, was brought back into the camp, and there dyed: and that M. Fulvius was ſubſtituted Conſul in his room: and that it was he, who being ſent unto the army of Minutius, wan Bovianum. The ſame year Sora, Arpinum, and Conſentia were recovered from the Samnits: and the great image of Hercules was in the Capitol ſet up and dedicated.

When as P. Sulpitius Averrio, and P. Sempronius Sophus were Coſſ. the Samnits deſiring either to ſee an end of war, or elſe to delay it, ſent Embaſſadors to Rome pretending peace. To whom O
" as they pleaded and intreated moſt humbly, this anſwer was given; That if the Samnits had not
" ſo often treated for peace, when they intended and prepared war they might after certain enter-
" views, and conferences paſſed between, obtein their ſuit: but ſince that evermore untill that " time, their words were but wind; now they would truſt to their deeds, and nothing elſe. P.
" Sempronius the Conſul, ſhall ſhortly be in Samnium with an army: who would not be abuſed,
" but ſoon ſee, whether their minds be enclined to war or peace: and as he found and ſaw every " thing, ſo would he bring word and make relation: and therfore their Embaſſadors were to attend upon

upon the Conſul when he departed out of Samnium. The ſame year after that the Romans army had paſſed peaceably to and fro, and viſited all Samnium, having victuals by the country courteouſly allowed, the ancient league was granted again to the Samnits. From thence turned the Romans their forces againſt the Æquians, their old enemies; but for many years making ſemblance of quietneſs, where as indeed their peace was little to be truſted: for that the Hernick nation was ſafe and on foot, they with them, had uſed oftentimes under hand to ſend aid unto the Samnits; and alſo after the ſubduing of the Hernicks, the whole nation in a maner without diſſembling, and averring all they did by publick counſell and authority, had fallen away unto the enemie: and after that the Romans had made league with the Samnits, and their heralds came to make claim for their goods took from them by way of hoſtility, they ſaid, It was but a tempting of them, to ſee, whether upon fear of war they would ſuffer themſelves to become Romans. Which, ſay they, how greatly it were to be wiſh'd, the Hernicks was able to teach them: for they, as many of them as had liberty to do what they would, choſe rather to live under their own laws, then to be entranchiſed citizens of Rome: but others, who had not the ſame ſcope to chooſe to their liking, they were conſtrained to accept of the Burgeoiſie of their City, by way of a puniſhment. Upon theſe ſpeeches and arguments commonly toſſed in their aſſemblies and Councels, the people of Rome decreed war againſt the Æquians: to which both the Conſuls went, and encamped four miles from their enemies camp. The Æquians (who in their own behalf, and for any quarell of theirs, had many years ſat ſtill and made no war) like as if their army had been levied of a ſudden and in haſt, without certain Captains appointed, and without any Generall to command, were affraid. Some thought good to go forth into the field, others to defend themſelves, and keep within their camp: moſt of them were moved to think aforehand upon the waſting of their country afterwards, and conſequently the deſtruction of their cities left but with ſlender garriſons. Therefore after that, amongſt many opinions, this only had audience, namely, to abandon the care of publick weal and every man to regard his own privat ſtate, and at the firſt watch to depart divers waies one from the other, and quit the camp, and convey away all their bag and baggage, and to defend their Cities within the wals: they all with one accord accepted thereof, and imbraced it. Now when the enemies were thus ſcattered abroad about the country, the Romans by day-light, with banner diſplaied went forth into the field: and when they ſaw no man come abroad to meet them, they marched in warlike order apace towards the enemies camp. But when as they could perceive there, neither warders before the gats, nor any man upon the trench & rampiers, nor ſo much as the uſuall noiſe of a leaguer; being moved with this unaccuſtomed ſilence, for fear of forelaying and treachery, they ſtood ſtill: but being got over the rampier, and finding the tents void and empty, they ſet forward to purſue the enemy by his trace. But when they found their foot-tracks, leading to all parts of the Country alike: as being ſlipt here and there, ſundry and divers waies; at the firſt they wandred out of the way, and miſſed of them; but afterwards knowing by their eſpials the purpoſe and intent of their enemies, they went round about and beſieged every City, and in threeſcore daies wan forty towns all by aſſault: moſt part whereof were raz'd even with the ground, and conſumed into aſhes, and the nation of the Æquians utterly in a manner deſtroyed. Over the Æquians there was triumph; Whoſe calamity and deſolation was ſo fearfull an example, to the Marrucins, Marſi, Peligni, and Ferentins, that they ſent Orators to Rome to treat for peace and amity: and to all thoſe nations at their requeſt, a league was granted. The ſame year, C. Flavius a Notary or Regiſter by profeſſion, whoſe father Cneus was no better than of a ſlave made free, a man, thus deſcended of baſe and low parentage, howbeit otherwiſes crafty and eloquent withall, aroſe to be an Ædile Curule. I find in ſome records, that when he gave attendance in his calling to the Ædiles, and ſaw that his own Tribe were willing to give him their voices and elect him Ædile, but his name not accepted of among other competitours, for that he got his living by his pen, he caſt aſide his books and papers, and ſware an oath, that he would no longer be a Notary and uſe pencraft. But Macer Licinius avoucheth, that a good while before, that he gave over his writing, namely, after he had been Tribune, and born two Triumvirſhips, the one for the night miſrules, the other for the placing and tranſporting of a Colony. But they all agree upon this, that he became very ſtout, and in great contumacy oppoſed himſelf and made head againſt the Nobles that contemned his baſe birth. The civil law which before time was laid up in great ſecret by the Prieſts, and Prelats in their Arches, he publiſhed abroad: and ſet up a table in the great common place, in manner of a Calender, wherein all men might know worke-daies from holy-dayes; when it was lawfull to plead, and when not. Alſo in deſpite, and to the great heart-burning of the Patritii, he dedicated the temple of the goddeſſe Concord upon the Court of Vulcan: and by the generall conſent of the people, Cornelius Barbatus the high Prieſt was compelled to endite and pronounce the certain form of words therto belonging; notwithſtanding he conteſted and denied, that by the cuſtomes of their forefathers any could dedicate a Temple, unleſſe he were either Conſul or Generall of an army. And therefore by the authority of the Senat, a law was preferred to the people, That no man might dedicate a Temple or Altar, without permiſſion and conſent of the Conſul, or the more part of the Tribuns of Commons. I will report in this place a thing, of it ſelf not worthy of remembrance, but only for a proof and example of the liberty of the Commons againſt the pride and inſolencie of the Nobles. This Flavius, coming upon a time to viſit his Collegue lying ſick, by a complot afore hand of certain young gentle-gentleman of the Patritians that ſat by his bed ſide, had no reverence done unto him, nor any one H ſo much as roſe up at entrance into the chamber: whereupon, he commanded his ivory chair of State to be brought unto him, and ſet him ſelf upon it; and ſo he outfaced his adverſaries, that were ſo vexed to the heart with envy of his dignity. This Flavius was nominated & choſen Ædile, by the baſe faction of the commoners, banding together in the place of aſſemblies: who firſt took heart by the Cenſorſhip of Appius Claudius the firſt that ever diſtained and polluted the Senat, by bringing in the Sons of Libertins: and when he ſaw that no man accounted that Election of Senators good and lawfull, and perceived withall, that in the Court he had not that backing of Citizens which he ſought for; he intermingled in every Tribe certain of the moſt baſe perſons of the Commons: and ſo he corrupted both the common place and Mars field alſo. In ſo much as the Election of Flavius was reputed ſo unworthy an indignity, that moſt of the gentlemen of I Rome laid away their gold rings and rich trapping of their horſes which were the ornaments and enſigns of their calling. And from the time forward the City was divided into two parts. One ſide was maintained and upheld by the true hearted people, ſuch as favoured and loved good things: the other by the faction of riffe-raffe and ſcum of the City; untill the time that Q. Fabius and P. Decius were created Cenſors. Fabius to bring the City unto an uniform accord, and to withſtand this inconvenience, that the Elections of Magiſtrats ſhould not be carried away by the ſtrong hand of the vileſt and moſt abject perſons, made a ſeparation of all that baſe rabble, and caſt them into four Tribes, and called them * Vrbanæ. Which action of his (men ſay) was accepted with ſo great contentment and thankfulneſſe, that upon the good temperature of degrees, he purchaſed the ſurname of Maximus, which in ſo many victories he had not acquired and obtained. K

By him alſo (by report) it was ordained and inſtituted, that on the Ides of July, the horſemen rode, as it were, in a ſolemn muſter, and ſhewing their great horſes to the Cenſor.

* Tribes of the City ſuch as were born to no lands in the country: all the reſt were named Ruſticæ.

WHen L. Genutius and Ser. Cornelius were Conſuls, there was reſt in a manner from all wars abroad; in ſuch ſort, as they had leiſure to place certaine Colonies at Sora and Alba: And for Alba there were enrolled 6000 inhabitants, to affront the Æquians. As for Sora, it had ſometimes belonged to the Volſcians territory; but the Samnits uſurped the poſſeſſion of it, and thither four thouſand were ſent to inhabit. The ſame year, the Arpinats and Trebulans were infranchiſed denizens at Rome. The Fruſinats were fined with the loſſe of one third part of their lands: for they were evidently detected to have ſollicited the Hernicks to rebellion: and after that the Conſuls Commiſſion from the Senat, had made due inquiſition, the principall O heads of that conſpiracy, were ſcourged and beheaded, yet becauſe there ſhould not paſs a year clean without war, a journy was made (ſuch a one as it was) into Umbria; upon news, that there uſed to iſſue forth day by day, certain men in arms out of a cave, and to make rodes into the country about. Into this cave or peak, the Romans entred with their enſignes diſplayed: where by reaſon that it was a blind corner, they received many a wound, and ſpecially by throwing of ſtones

A ſtones; untill ſuch time as they found the other mouth of the cave (for it was a thorow-fare.) So they piled a deal of wood together at both ends, and ſet it on fire: with the ſmoke and vapour whereof, there were about 2000 armed men driven out of their hole, who ruſhing at laſt into the flame, deſirous to eſcape, were ſmothered and burnt to aſhes.

When as M. Livius Denter, and C. Æmylius, were Conſuls, the Æquians began to war again: for they hardly could abide and endure, that a Colony ſhould be planted upon their borders, as a frontier-fortreſs to bridle them, and aſſaied by all kind of force to win the ſame: but they were luſtily repulſed by the Inhabitants only within the town. Howbeit, ſuch a fear they made at Rome, becauſe it was not thought credible, that the Æquians alone of themſelves, ſo diſtreſſed as they B were, would be ſo hardy as to take arms, that in regard of that trouble, a Dictator was named, to wit, C. Junius Bubulcus, with T. Titinius General of the horſe. Who at the firſt conflict ſubdued the Æquians, and upon the eighth day of his government returned into the City in triumph: and now the Dictator, dedicated the Temple of Salus, which he had vowed being Conſul, and had put out to workmen for to be builded, while he was Cenſor.

The ſame year a fleet of Greeks, under the conduct of Cleonymus a Lacedæmonian, arrived upon the coaſt of Italy, and won Thuriæ, a City of the Salentins. Againſt this enemy was the Conſul Æmylius ſent, who in one battel diſcomfited him, and drove him aboord. Thus Thuriæ was rendred again to the former Inhabitants, and the Salentine Country obtained peace and quietneſs. I find in ſome Records, that it was Jun. Bubulcus the Dictator who was ſent to the Salentins:
C and that Cleonymus before he was to encounter with the Romans, departed out of Italy. From thence he fetched a compaſs, and doubled the point of Brunduſium, and ſailed with a fore-wind through the midſt of Venice gulph: for that on the left hand the Haven-leſs and harbourleſs coaſts of Italy, and on the right, the Illyrians, Liburnians, and Iſtrians, fierce nations, and for the moſt part, reputed infamous, for roving and robbing by the ſea-ſide, put him in exceeding fear. So he arrived at length upon the river of Venice, lying far within the ſhore, and there he landed a few to diſcover the Coaſts: but hearing that the ſtrand that lay out againſt them was not broad and ſpacious, and when they were paſt over it, there were behind them the plaſhes (as it were) overflowed with the ſea-tides, and that not far off might be ſeen the champian fields near hand, and hils beyond; and diſcovering by this means the mouth of a very deep river, into which he ſaw, D that the ſhips might be brought about as into a ſure harbour (now that rivers name was Meduacus) thither he commanded, that the Armada ſhould put in, and to make ſail up againſt the ſtream. The heavieſt veſſels, the chanel of the river would not bear: but the ſouldiers were tranſported in lighter barks and ſmall pinaces, and ſo fell at length with the levell and the plain Country, frequented with much people, by reaſon that three ſea-towns of the Patavins, inhabited that Territory. Being once landed, and having left a ſlender guard for their ſhips, they take Towns by aſſault, burnt houſes, plunder and drive away prizes both of men and catteil: and when they had once taſted of the ſweetneſs of booty and pillage, they went far from their ſhips. The allarm hereof was given at Patavium (now the Patavins were alwaies in arms, becauſe of the Gauls their borderers,) Wherupon they divided their fighting youth into two regiments: the one was led in-E to thoſe quarters whereas the report went, that the Greeks forraged here and there all abroad: the other, becauſe they would not meet with the robbers and rovers, was conducted another way to the harbour, where the ſhips rid (about fourteen miles from the Town. And after they had ſlain the warders, they charged upon the ſmall barks. Whereupon the marriners were afraid, and were forced to retire their veſſels to the other bank-ſide. Likewiſe upon the main they ſped as well in fight againſt the ſtragling rovers: for when as the Greeks fled back to recover the harbour, the Venetians encountred them afront, and made head againſt them. So the enemies were environed in the midſt, and moſt of them ſlain: ſome that were taken priſoners, bewrayed what their fleet was, and that King Cleonymus was three miles off. There, when they had beſtowed the priſoners ſure enough in ward within the next village; ſome man with ſouldiers F their river-veſſels, made fitly and framed with flat bottoms, for to paſs over the meers and ſhallow waſhes; others embark armed men in the ſmall gallions taken from the enemies; and made way apace to give an aſſault upon the main fleet, and beſet thoſe ſhips which rid at anchor, and durſt not weigh and remove, fearing not the enemy, ſo much as the unknown coaſts. Theſe, I ſay, they environed, and charged upon them: and when they made haſte to gain the deep and open ſea, without any reſiſtance at all, they were purſued and chaſed unto the mouth of the river. Thus when they had taken the enemies ſhips, and fired others, namely, ſuch as for fear and haſte were driven upon the ſhelves, and run a-ground, then they returned with victory. Cleonymus hardly ſaved the fifth part of his fleet. And thus having had no good luck in attempting to land in any coaſt of the Adriatick ſea, he departed. The ſtems of the ſhips, with their beak-
G heads, and brazen pikes, together with the ſpoils of the Lacedæmonians, were ſet up in the old Temple of Juno, and there be many at this day alive, which have ſeen them. The memoriall of this ſea-fight, is celebrated yearly (upon the very ſame day that it was fought) at Patavium, with a ſolemn skirmiſh and combate of ſhips repreſented upon the river, within the midſt of the City.

The ſame year was a League made at Rome with the Veſtins, who came to ſue for peace and amity. But from that time, there aroſe many and divers fearfull occurrents. For news came, that Hetruria rebelled, which troubles took their beginning by occaſion of the civill diſſention H and diſcord of the Aretins: who began to expell by force of arms the houſe and family of the Licinii (mighty and puiſſant above the reſt) for very envy and repine of their wealth and riches. Over and beſides, the Marſians ſtood out, and by arms maintained their title to that part of their territory, into which there had been a Colony of Carſeolans brought, to the number of four thouſand men, enrolled there to inhabit. Againſt which ſtirs and tumults, Marcus Valerius Maximus was created Dictator, who made choice of M. Æmylius Paulus to be the Commander of the Horſe. Which I rather beleeve to be true, than that Q. Fabius, a man of thoſe years and that worth, after ſo many honourable dignities, ſhould be under Valerius. But I would not deny, that the errour might grow by reaſon of the ſurname of Maximus. The I Dictator having taken the field with his Army, in one battell diſcomfited the Marſians: and after he had driven them into their walled and fenced Towns, Miloniana, Pleſtina, and Freſilia; within few daies, he won them alſo over their heads: and having fined the Marſians with the loſs of ſome part of their Territory, he received them into their ancient League again. Then all the forces were emploied againſt the Tuſcans: and whiles the Dictator was departed to Rome to take his Auſpices anew, the General of Horſe, being gone out a forraging, was by a ſecret ambuſh entrapped. And having loſt certain enſigns, he was forced into the Camp, after a foul ſlaughter and ſhameful flight of his men. Which fearfull cowardice is not like to have been in Fabius, not only, becauſe if ever he deſerved his ſurname of Maximus by any commendable parts, it was eſpecially for his proweſs in war; but alſo, for that in remembrance of Papyrius K his cruelty toward him, he never could have been brought to fight, without the commandment or permiſſion of the Dictator. This diſcomfiture and loſs being reported at Rome, cau-ſed a greater terrour than there was cauſe. For no leſs than if the Army had been utterly defeated, there was publiſhed and proclaimed a ſtay and ceſſation of all law-matters, warders beſtowed at the gates, order taken for ſtanding watches in every ſtreet, and armour and darts carried up to the wals. And after that all the younger ſort were ſworn and preſt to ſerve the Dictator was ſent again to the Army. Where, he found all more quiet than he looked for, through the careſull dilligence of the Generall of Horſe. The Camp was removed to a place of more ſtrength and ſafety, the bands and companies which had loſt their enſigns, left on the bare earth without the rampiers, deſtitute of tents and covert; and the army eager and deſirous of L fight, to do away and raſe out the former ignominy and ſhame. Preſently therefore, he raiſed his Camp, and removed forward into the country of Raſella. Thither followed the enemies alſo hard at heels; Who albeit upon their late good ſpeed, they were in right great hope and affiance, to be ſtrong enough even in open fight and plain field; yet they aſſail the enemy alſo by the ſame ſleights and trains which they had already fortunately tried. There fortuned to be in the country thereabout, not far from the Romans Camp, certain houſes half pulled down and ruinate, belonging to a village which was burned when the country was over-run: where, after they had beſtowed cloſely certain men in arms, they drave their beaſts and cattel in the very ſight of the Roman corps de guard, commanded by C. Fulvius, a Lieutenant: at which bait, when as there ſtirred no man from the Roman wards, one of the Heardmen advanced even under the M very trench and fortifications of the Romans, and called aloud to the reſt (that ſeemed for fear to drive but ſlowly from the ruins of the village aforeſaid) asking why they ſtaied behind, ſeeing they might ſafely march, and paſs forward ſtill (as it were) through the middle of the Roman Camp? Theſe words certain Cærits interpreted to the Lieutenant Fulvius. Whereat, every band or company of ſouldiers took great indignation, but durſt not ſtir a foot without a warrant. Then he commanded thoſe that were skilfull in the tongue to mark whether their language ſounded neerer to the ſpeech of peaſants or to Citizens: Who brought word, that both their voice, and alſo the habit and freſh hue of their bodies, was more elegant and civill than for country ſhepherds. Go your waies then (quoth he) unto them and bid them beware and diſcover their ambuſh, which in vain they ſeem to hide: for that the Romans were cunning in all things, and N advertiſed of their deſigns, and could no more now be overtaken with wiles, than overcome by arms. When theſe words were once heard and carried to thoſe that lay in wait, preſently they ſtart up out of their lurking holes, and brought forth their enſigns all abroad into the open field. The lieutenant ſuppoſing they were a greater troop than might be dealt withall and matched by his corps de guard, with all ſpeed ſent for aid to the Dictator: and in the mean while himſelf received and bare off the brunt and forcible charge of his enemies. This meſſage was no ſooner brought, but the Dictator commanded the ſtandards to be advanced, and the ſouldiers to arm and follow:

that

but every thing was done ſooner almoſt than it could be commanded: forthwith they caught up the enſigns, and took weapon in hand: and ſcarcely could they be held in, but that they would run amain. For not only the ſpiteful anger of the late received loſs pricked them on, but alſo O the ſhouts of their fellows, which they might hear more loud, and to be redoubled thicker according as the skirmiſh grew hotter and hotter. The greater haſte therefore they made, whiles one putteth forward another, and crieth to the port-enſigns to go faſter and mend their pace. But the more haſte the Dictator ſeeth them to make, the more earneſt was he to keep them back in their march, and to hold them in; willing them to go fair and ſoftly. Contrariwiſe the Tuſcans, who roſe up at the beginning of the battel, were there ready with their whole forces to give the charge.
Whereupon there came meſſenger after meſſenger to the Dictator, bringing word that all the legions

A legions of the Tuſcans were entred into the fight, and that his men already were not able to reſiſt any longer. Nay himſelf alſo, from the higher ground, might ſee in what danger the corps de guard was. But preſuming and reſting upon this conceit, that the Lieutenant was able yet to maintain fight, conſidering that he was not far off himſelf to help and ſave him out of peril; he was deſirous that the enemies might be wearied and tired aſmuch as was poſſible, and that his own forces freſh and in heart, ſhould ſet upon them overtoiled. And albeit they went ſoftly forward, yet by this time had the Horſemen but a very ſmall ground to take their run with full career. Formoſt marched the enſigns of his legions, that the enemy ſhould not fear any covert and privy ſtratagem, but leave good ſpaces and diſtances between the files of their footmen, through which the Horſes B might have room and liberty enough to gallop with eaſe. Then all the battaillon of the Infantry ſet up a cry and ſhout when they charged, and withal, the Cavalry, with reins at large entred within the ranks of the enemies, who being not marſhalled and ſet in order againſt ſuch a bluſtring ſtorm of Horſemen, were with a ſudden fear aſtonied. Whereupon, the troop of Fulvius which erewhile was in manner environed and compaſſed about, and had help and reſcue almoſt too late, now all in general breathed themſelves at eaſe, and were put to nothing. For theſe that came freſh and luſty undertook the whole weight of the conflict: which was neither long nor doubtful. The enemies were put to flight, and in diſaray made haſt to recover their camp. And when as the Romans advanced againſt them with banner diſplayed, they quit their place and retreated, gathering themſelves round into heaps in the fartheſt part of the camp: and as they C would have fled out, they ſtuck faſt in the narrow gaps and paſſages of the gates: a great part of them leapt upon the banck, to climb the rampier, if haply either from the higher ground they might defend themſelves, or get over any where and eſcape. By chance in one place where the banck was not well rammed, the rampier was ſurcharged with the weight of ſo many ſtanding upon it, and ſo tumbled down into the trench. Whereupon, they ſet up a cry all together, That the Gods had made them way to eſcape, and by that means indeed they ſaved themſelves, but more of them unarmed than armed. In this battel, were the forces of the Tuſcans once again utterly abated: in ſo much as, after they had capitulated and promiſed a years pay, and corn for two months, the Dictator permitted them to ſend Embaſſadors to Rome for a treaty of peace. Peace was denied, but truce for two years granted: and the Dictator with triumph returned into the D City. I find in ſome writers; that Hetruria was by the Dictator quieted, without any notable battel, only by compoſing the variance and debate of the Aretins, and reconciling the family of the Licinii with the Commons.

M. Valerius upon his Dictatorſhip became Conſul. Some have believed that he was created without his own ſuit, yea, and while he was abſent, and that the ſaid Election was held by the Interregent. But howſoever it was, out of all queſtion, he bare the Conſulſhip with Apuleius Panſa. Whiles M. Valerius and Q. Apuleius were Coſſ. all was well quieted abroad: for the Tuſcans of one ſide, partly upon their ill ſucceſs in war, and partly by reaſon of their truce, were forced to be ſtil and in repoſe. The Samnits alſo on the other ſide, being well tamed with the overthrows ſo many years together, repented not yet, and were not weary of their new league. At Rome likeE wiſe, the Commons were quiet, and found themſelves much eaſed, and diſcharged of a great number of baſe and poor people, which were withdrawn and ſent away into Colonies. But becauſe their reſt ſhould not be every where entire and perfect, there aroſe a quarel between the chief and principal men of the City, as well the Nobles as Commons, and that by the ſuggeſtion and inſtigation of Q. and Cn. Ogulnii, Tribuns of the Com. Who having ſought occaſion and matter every way to accuſe and blame the Nobility unto the Commons; when they ſaw all means aſſayed in vain, at length entred into an action, whereby they kindled and ſet on fire not only the meaneſt, but even the chief heads of the Commons, ſuch as had been Conſuls, and triumphed: who wanted no promotions and honors, but only Sacerdotal dignities and Prelacies, which as yet were not indifferently common to both States. They propoſed therefore a Law, That whereas at that time Fthere were but 4. Augurs, and as many Prelats or Biſhops, and for aſmuch as they thought it good, that the number of Prieſts ſhould be increaſed, there might be choſen to the reſt, 4. Biſhops, and 5. Augurs, all out of the body of the Commons. But how this Colledge or Fellowſhip of Augurs, was reduced to the number of four, but by the death of two, I can not find: ſince this is certain, that among the Augurs the number muſt be odd: namely that the three ancient tribes, Rhamnenſes, Titienſes, and Luceres, ſhould have each one their Augur: or if they needed more, they ſhould with equal number increaſe thoſe Prieſts: like as they were augmented and multiplied, when as five being put to four, made up the number of nine; that is to ſay, for every tribe three. Howbeit, becauſe they were choſen out of the Commons who ſhould ſupply, and make up the number; the Nobles took it as grievouſly to the heart, as when they ſaw the Conſulſhip parted equally in G common: but they made ſemblance as though this indignity perteined to the Gods more than to them: who would themſelves ſee, that their holy ſervice and ſacred myſteries ſhou'd not be polluted. And as for them, this only they could do, namely, pray and wiſh, that no calamity thereby ſhould light upon the common-weal. But leſs earneſt were they in oppoſing themſelves and making reſiſtance, for that they were uſed already in all ſuch broils and contentions to have the worſe: and they ſaw beſides, that their adverſaries ſhot not at that (which in time paſt they could ſcarce hope for) namely, the greateſt honours and dignities: but that they had already obteined all, for which they had ſtrived ſo long in ſo doubtful terms of hope, to wit, manifold Conſulats, Censorships, and Triumphs. Howbeit, the contention and dispute in debating and arguing to H and fro the law proposed, was mainteined (as men say) between Ap. Claudius especially, and P. Decius Mus: and after they had contested and discoursed in their Orations pro & contra, the same reasons in manner, touching the rights and liberties pretended by the Nobles and Commons, which sometimes had been alleaged, both for, and against the law Licinia, at what time as P. Decius Mus against Ap. Claudius. as it was set on foot for the Commons to be Consuls; Decius (as it is said) represented in open audience the very resemblance and shew of his father, in such manner, as many of them who were then present at the assembly, had seen him: to wit, girded and apparelled in Gabine robe, standing over his javelin, in which gesture, habit, and fashion, he offered himself to voluntary death, for to save the people and legions of the Romans; "Seemed (quoth he) P. Decius, that I "then was Cos. as pure and religious in the sight of the immortal Gods, as if T. Manlius his col- "league had been likewise devowed and offered? and might not the same P. Decius have rightly "been chosen, to execute the publick divine service and sacrifices of the people of Rome? or is this "all the fear and doubt, that the Gods would give less ear to his prayers, than to Ap. Claudius? or "doth Ap. Claudius with more devotion serve God privately, and worship the Gods more re- "ligiously, than himself? Who was there ever that repented or misliked of the vows, which so "many Consuls and Dictators of the Com. either at their first setting forth to their armies, or in "time of war and battel, pronounced for the Common-wealth? Reckon and count the chief "Captains, year by year, since the first time that the Commons began to have the leading and "conduct of the wars: number all the triumphs ever since: it will appear that the Commons are K

"no whit abashed, and have no cause to complain of their own nobility. And this I know for "certain, that if any new sudden war should arise, the Senat and people of Rome would repose "no more hope and confidence in the ancient Patritii, than in the Com. for to be the Captains "and Commanders. This being so, quoth he, what God or man can think it an indignity, to "adorn those persons also with the titles and ornaments of Bishops and Augurs, whom ye have "honoured with chair of Ivory, with the long robe bordered with purple, with the coat of arms "embroidred and branched with the palm tree, with the gown or mantle of purple, wrought with "divers colours, with the chaplets and coronets of triumph, and with the victorious branch and "garland of lawrel; whose houses ye have beautified above the rest, with setting up the spoils of "enemies? Or who can thinck much, if he be seen with a sacring cup, or holy-water pot, and with L
"a croisier staff, and his head vailed, either to kill a sacrifice, or to take Augury by flight of birds "from the castle hill; who hath been adorned and decked with the ensigns and ornaments of the "great God Jupiter, and hath ridden in a gilded chariot through the City into the Capitol? Or in "whose Title, inscription and stile over his image, men shall with content, read Consulship, Cen- "sorship, and Triumph; will not the same abide to see and read, that ye have added thereunto ei- "ther Augurship, or Pontifical dignity? I verily for my part hope (without the displeasure, and "with reverence of the Gods be it spoken) that we by the beneficence of the people of Rome are "such, as for our quality and worthiness, may and will yeeld no less credit and honor to our "Priest-hoods than we shall receive thereby: and who desire, in regard of the honor and service "of God, more than for our own sakes and proper interest, to have the means, That whom we M
"serve and reverence in private, those we may also worship and honor publickly. But why have "I hitherto so pleaded the cause, as if the Patritii were entirely alone intituled and invested in the "prerogative of Sacerdotal Dignities; and as though we were not already possessed of one right "honorable and principal Priest-hood? We see that the Decemvirs for celebration of sacrifices, "and for interpretation of Sibylla her Propheses, and other the fatal destinies of this people, the "Prelats also and Ministers of Apollo his sacrifice, and other Holy Ceremonies, are of the Com- "mons. Neither was there any injury done unto the Patritii at that time, when for to gratify the "Commons, the number of the Duumvirs was increased; those I mean, who should oversee (as "superintendents) the offering of sacrifices. And now at this present they have no greater cause to "complain, if the Tribun, a stout and brave man, hath added five places more of Augurs, and four N
"of Bishops, unto which commoners may be nominated: not to dispossess you of your rooms, "or to displace you, O Appius, but that men of the commons might assist you in the function and "ministery of divine service and Church matters: like as they do their part, and perform good ser- "vice in human and civil affairs. And be not ashamed, O Appius, to have him for your colleague in "the Priest-hood, whom you might beserm to have in Consulat or Censorship, your companion "and fellow; unto whom being Dictator, you might be Collonel of Horse; as well as he to you in "your Dictatorship. Those ancient Nobles in old time (our progenitors) admitted into their num- "ber and order, a Sabine stranger, the very head and top of your nobility, one Ap. Clausus, or Ap. "Claudius (chose you whether.) You must not think much then, to accept us into the number of "Priests. We bring with us many honorable titles, even all the same that make you so proud, and O
"to bear your head aloft. L. Sextius was the first Commoner, created Consul; and C. Licinius Stolo "the first Collonel of Horse. C. Rutilius was the first Dictator and Censor, and Q. Publius Philo the "first Prætor. We have heard this song evermore sounding in our ears, That to you alone perta- "neth the taking of Auspicia: that you only are of noble descent and gentility: that ye and none "but ye, by right and duty ought to manage the affairs, and the soveraign government, both at "home and abroad: and yet alwayes hitherto the commons in their places and charges, have done "and sped as well as the Patritii, and henceforth ever shall (I doubt not.) What? heard ye never

A "it ſpoken, that the Patritii were at firſt made and created, and not deſcended from Heaven; but "ſuch as were able to name their father and grandſire; that is to ſay, even free men juſt, and "no more? What? I my ſelf can nominate already mine own father to have been a Conſul, and "ſhortly ſhall my ſon be able to alledge his grandſire. There is nothing elſe, O Quirites, in the "matter whereupon we ſtand, but that we may obtein all which hath been denied us. For the "Nobles deſire only to maintain a ſide and to contend, and care not greatly what iſſue their "contentions come unto. As for me, I do adviſe, and this would I have, That (to the good pro-"fit, and happy eſtate of you all, and the weal publick) this law may paſs under your affirmative "voyce [Uti rogâſtis.] Then preſently the people commanded the Tribes to be called to a ſcruti-
B ny: and ſoon it appeared, that the law would without all doubt be accepted: but that day was loſt, by the oppoſition and negative of ſome Tribuns. Howbeit, the morrow after, they were afraid to croſs it; and then with exceeding conſent of all hands it paſſed cleer. So there were created Prelats or Biſhops; firſt, P. Decius Mus himſelf (that ſo pleaded for the law) with P. Sempronius Sophus, C. Martius Rutilus, and M. Livius Denter. Likewiſe five Augurs of the Commons, to wit, C. Genutius, P. Ælius Paetus, M. Minutius Feſtus, C. Martius, and T. Publius. So there were eight Prelats in number, and nine Augurs.

The ſame year, M. Valerius the Conſul, procured the law of appealing to the people, more ſurely to be eſtabliſhed and confirmed. This was now the third time after the depoſition of the Kings, that this one Act was revived; and alwayes by the ſame houſe or family of the Valerii. The C cauſe of renuing the ſame ſo often, was no other I ſuppoſe, than this; for that the mightineſs of ſome few great men of the Patritii, was more powerful than the liberty and freedom of the Commons. Only the Law Portia, ſeemeth to have been enacted for to ſave the back and ſides of Citizens from whipping, becauſe that it awarded and ſet a grievous puniſhment upon him, that either had beaten or killed a Citizen of Rome. The Law Valeria, which forbad, to ſcourge or behead any man whoſoever, that made his appeal, had this annexed only, that if any one had treſpaſſed and proceeded farther, it ſhould be decreed, Leaudly and naughtily done. Such was the modeſty and reverence of men in thoſe dayes, that this one addition [in my conceit verily] was ſuppoſed to be a ſufficient bond to ſtrengthen the Law. But now adayes, would a man ſcarcely threaten his ſervant or ſlave in that manner.

D The ſame Conſul made war, without any worthy or memorable exploit, againſt the Æquians that rebelled; who (ſetting aſide their ſtout and proud ſtomacks) had nothing left of their ancient fortune and eſtate. The other Coſſ. Apuleius, beſieged the Town Nequinum* in Umbria. The place was difficult and hard to get up, and on the one ſide ſteep down right (whereas now ſtandeth Narnia) ſo that it was impregnable, either by aſſault, or countermures and ſconces whatſoever. Whereupon, the new Conſuls, M. Fulvius Paetus, and T. Manlius Torquatus, entred upon this enterpriſe, left undone and unfiniſhed by the former. Now when all the Centuries nominated with one voyce Q. Fabius for the Conſulſhip of that year, even without his own ſuit and ſeeking; Macer Licinius and Tubero do write, that he himſelf laboured to have that charge put off, and reſerved unto a year of more war: alledging, that for the preſent he would ſerve the Com-E mon-weal in better ſtead, by bearing ſome civil office in the City: and ſo neither diſſembling what he rather deſired, nor yet ſeeking for it, he was made Ædile of the Chair, with L. Papirius Curſor. But, to ſet this down for a certain truth I dare not; becauſe that Piſo, a more ancient Writer of Chronicles, ſaith, that the Ædiles Curule of that year, were C. Domitius, Cn. F. Calvinus, Sp. Carvilius, and Q. Fabius Maximus. That ſurname, I ſuppoſe verily, gave occaſion of the error in the Ædiles. Whereupon enſued a tale (ſorting to that error) mixed and compounded of the Elections of Ædiles and Conſuls together. The ſame year was held a ſolemn ſurvey and purging of the City by ſacrifice, called Luſtrum, by P. Sempronius Sophus, and P. Sulpitius Averrio, and two Tribes more were added to the reſt, Anienſis, and Tarentina. And thus much concerning the affairs at Rome.

* The ſame that Narnia.

From whence they were brought before the Conſul, and promiſed him to let in and receive what garriſon and troop of armed men he would, within the City. This offer was thought neither to be neglected and refuſed, nor yet raſhly to be credited. So with the one of theſe twain (for the other was kept behind as an hoſtage) two other ſpies were ſent by the ſame mine to diſcover the train. By whoſe relation, when it appeared ſufficiently, that all was ſafe and without danger: by the leading and guiding of the traitor aforeſaid, 300 armed men by night entred the City, & ſeized that gate which was next unto them: at which being broken open, the Conſul and the Roman army without reſiſtance, made entry, and G ſurpriſed the City. In this ſort Nequinum was reduced to the obedience of the people of Rome. A Colony was thither ſent to Frontier againſt the Umbrians called of the * Rivers name [which runneth under it] * Narnia. And the army with a rich prize was brought again to Rome.

The ſame year the Tuſcans, contrary to the tenure of the truce, made preparation for war. But whiles they were buſily occupied otherwiſe, it fortuned, that a puiſſant army of Gauls invaded their marches, and for a while altered their deſignments. Afterwards, by the means of mony whereof they were full and bare themſelves mighty, they ſought to make the Gauls, of enemies to become their friends, and ſollicited them to band together, and ſo jointly to maintain war with the Romans. Their ſociety and friendſhip the barbarous people refuſed not; only, H they ſtood upon the ſum what they ſhould have for their hire. Which being agreed upon and received, and all things elſe in a readineſs for to go into the field; when the Tuſcans willed them to follow after, they flatly denied, that they had received any conſideration for to make war upon the Romans: but whatſoever they had taken, it was becauſe they ſhould not waſt the Tuſcan Land, and by way of hoſtility and force of arms, do any violence upon the inhabitants: howbeit, if the Tuſcans were ſo minded to employ them, they would be willing to ſerve; but for no other reward and recompence, than to be admitted into part of their territory; that at the length they might have ſome certain place of abode, to ſettle themſelves in. Many Diets and conſultations hereabout were held by the States of Tuſcan, but nothing reſolved and concluded: not ſo much, I for that they feared to part with ſome of their Lands, as becauſe they were in great dread every one and abhorred, to have dwelling by them ſuch neighbours, deſcended from ſo ſavage a race and cruel Nation. Thus were the Gauls let go and diſmiſſed, having away with them a huge maſs of mony, which they got without any travel or peril of theirs.

The bruit of the Gauls tumult and inſurrection, together with the Tuſcans war, cauſed no little fear at Rome. Whereupon, more haſt was made to conclude a league with the * Picene people. T. Manlius the Conſul had the charge of the Tuſcan war allotted unto him. Who ſcarcely was entred into the confines of the enemies, but as he was training and exerciſing amongſt the Horſemen, he ran his Horſe with full carier, and ſuddenly as he turned about, was caſt off, and preſently lay for dead: and ſo the Conſul, three dayes after his fall, ended his life. Which the Tuſcans K taking hold of, as a good ominous token and preſage, got heart and were very jolly; ſaying, that the Gods had in favour of them, begun this war. This was heavy news at Rome, both for the loſs of ſo brave a perſonage, and for the time, wherein ſo unhappily it fell out: ſo as, the aſſembly held (by the advice of the chief Peers) for to ſubſtitute a Conſul in his place that was deceaſed, frighted the Senators from chuſing a Dictator. All their ſentences, and all the centuries gave with M. Valerius to be Conſul: who was the man, whom the Senat was about to have pricked for Dictator. Then forthwith, they ordained him to go into Tuſcany to the army. Whoſe coming ſuppreſſed and kept under the Tuſcans; ſo as not a man durſt once go out of their trenches and hold. Even their very fear was as good as a ſiege unto them: for that the new Conſul neither by waſting the fields, nor firing their houſes in ſuch ſort, as every where, not only the ſmall villages, but alſo L the good and wel-peopled Towns were ſeen to ſmoke and burn again, could draw them forth to fight.

* Marca Anconа.

This war continued longer than men thought: but behold, there aroſe a bruit of another; (which, conſidering the mutual loſſes of both ſides, was for good cauſes greatly to be feared) upon intelligence given from the Picenes their new allies, namely, that the Samnits were about to take arms and rebel, and had ſollicited them alſo to do the ſame. The Picentes were highly thanked for this, and a great part of the Senators care was diverted now from Tuſcany to the Samnits. The dearth beſides of corn and victuals troubled the City: and driven they had been to extream famine, if Fabius Maximus (as they have written, who are of opinion that he was Ædile that year) by provident purveighing and diligent conveighing of corn, had not been as careful and M induſtrious, in the diſpenſing of victual now at home, as many times before in war affairs. The ſame year there was an Interreign, but upon what occaſion, it is not known. The Interregents were App. Claudius and after him P. Sulpitius, who held an Election of Conſuls, and created L. Cornelius Scipio and Cn. Fulvius.

In the beginning of this year, there came Orators from the Lucans to theſe new Conſuls, for to make complaint, That the Samnits, who by no conditions and means could induce them for to band and take arms with them, were entred into their confines, and made waſt of the "country, and by very force provoked them to war, ſaying, That the Lucans had long ago over- "ſhot and paſſed themſelves that way: but now they were ſo fully reſolute, that they could "find in their hearts ſooner to abide and endure all kind of calamity whatſoever, than ever after N
"to offend and diſpleaſe the Roman name. They beſought the Senat therefore, to receive the "Lucans into their protection, and alſo to keep and defend them from the violence and injury of "the Samnits. And for themſelves, albeit entering into war already with the Samnits, they were of neceſſity obliged to be faſt and true unto the Romans: yet for better ſecurity they were ready to put in ſufficient hoſtages. The Senat was not long conſulting hereabout: but all with one conſent were of opinion, to make league with the Lucans, and to ſummon the Samnits to make amends and reſtitution. The Lucans, beſides a courteous and gracious anſwer, were accepted into the league. Then were there Fecial Heralds diſpatched to the Samnits, to give them warning for to depart the territory of the Roman allies, and to withdraw their forces out of the confines of the Lucans. But the Samnits ſent out certain meſſengers to meet them upon the way, and O to denounce unto them, that if they preſented themſelves in any Councel within Samnium, they ſhould not depart again with ſafeguard of their perſons. When theſe news were heard at Rome, both the Senat adviſed, and the people allowed, to make war upon the Samnits. The Conſuls parted their Provinces and charges between themſelves. To Scipio fell Hetruria, and the Samnits to Fulvius: and ſo they take their journey divers wayes, each one to the war allotted unto him. Scipio looked for no other, but a lingering war at the enemies hands, and like to the defenſive ſervice of the former year: but behold, they with an army well appointed and arranged,

A arranged, encountred him and gave him battel neer to * Volaterræ; where they fought the better part of the day, with much bloodshed on both sides: and whiles they were doubtful which way the victory went, the night came between. But the morning after bewrayed both who were winners, and who were losers. For the Tuscans in the still and dead time of the night dislodged. The Roman Consul coming forth into the field, and seeing by the enemies departure, the victory confessed; went forward to the camp: which he found empty of men, but full of rich pillage, (for they had fearfully and in great hast abandoned their tents) and was master thereof. From thence he retired his forces into the territory of the Faliscans: and after he had left at Falerii, all his bag and baggage with a meetly garrison there; lightly appointed, he marched forward, and with a B running camp wasted the marches and territories of his enemies. He put all to fire and sword: drave away booties from all parts: and left not the ground only, wast and desart, but set fire also upon Castles and borrough Towns. Only he forbare to assault the great and strong Cities, into which fear had driven the Tuscans for refuge. Cn. Fulvius the Consul on the other part fought a noble battel in Samnium, neer * Bovianum, and the victory was no whit doubtful. After which he assailed Bovianum, and not long after Aufidena: and both Cities he wan by force. The same year was there a Colony bronght to * Carseoli within the territory of the Æquiculi. And Fulvius the Consul triumphed over the Samnits.

When as now the time of the Consuls Election drew neer; there was a rumour raised, that the Tuscans and Samnits were levying and enrolling of great and mighty forces: that openly in all their C Assemblies and Diets, the Princes of the Tuscans were checked and reproved, for that they had not waged the Gauls to war, whatsoever it had cost them: that the Magistrates of the Samnits were blamed, for exposing that army as it were a prey unto the Romans, which had been provided against their enemies the Lucans. For now seeing that the enemies both with their own power, and also with the help of their allies, were come to war; they should not be able to match them, having their forces thus redoubled. Now albeit there were other famous and renowned persons stood to be Consuls, yet this new fear and affright turned all men to be come favourits of Q. Fabius Maximus: who at the first made no suit, and afterwards, seeing the inclination of their affections, refused also to be Consul. "Demanding what they meant to trouble and molest him, so "aged a man as he was, and one, who as as he had gone through all labours and travels of this D "world; so he had passed also the rewards, and recompences of his travels: alledging, that neither strength of body, nor vigor of spirit could alwayes continue the same, and last for ever: and "besides, he feared fortune her self, lest haply she might be thought of any of the Gods too pro- "pitious and favourable unto him, and more permanent than the ordinary train and course of "this world would permit. Therefore, like as himself had grown up after the glory of his elders, "and succeeded them; so he saw and beheld with joy of heart, others also rising up after him, and "to succeed him in the like glory: and as there wanted not at Rome high promotions and advance- "ments for hardy and valiant men, so there failed not brave men of worth for to receive those "honors and dignities. But by this refusal of his so modest, so just and reasonable he whetted and kindled more and more their earnest affections and favours towards him, which he thinking to E dull and quench, with the reverent regard and awe of the laws, commanded a statute to be read, wherein it was not lawful for one and the same man within ten years to be created Consul twice. But scarcely for the noise that the people made, could this law be heard read: and the Tribuns of the Com. said, that this should be no let: for they would prefer a bill unto the people, that he might be discharged and dispensed withal from the Statutes in that behalf. Howbeit he stood stiffly stil in his refusal: demanding of them to what purpose and end were the laws made, if by the very makers thereof, they might be thus deluded and made of no force? For so (qd. he) laws ruled not, but were over-ruled. But nevertheless, the people went to a scrutiny and began to give their voyces: and as every Century was called into the rails, they named and chose Fabius Consul, without sticking at the matter. Then at last, overcome with this general accord and consent of the F "whole City: God say Amen (quoth he) O Quirites, to that you do and are about. But for as- "much as you wil have your wil and dispose of me at your pleasure, do me this favour yet, that I "may have the chusing of my Colleague. I beseech you make Consul with me, P. Decius, a man ap- "proved unto me already, with whom, I have sorted well in the fellowship of another office: a "man I say, answerable otherwise to the greatness of his name, and worthy of his fathers vertue, "from whom he is descended. This favour which he requested, seemed unto them just and reason- able. So all the Centuries behind, created Q. Fabius and P. Decius for Consuls.

The same year the Ædiles served process upon very many Citizens; for holding and possessing of more Lands, than by Law was limited: and none in a manner was able to acquit himself hereof. Which was a great bridle and restraint to their unmeasurable avarice. As the G new Consuls, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and P. Decius Mus the third time, conferred and laid their heads together about their charges, that the one should take in hand the Samnits, and the other the Tuscans; and consulted what forces might serve and be sufficient for this or that Province and exploit; and to whether war either of them were the more meet and sufficient Leader; certain Embassadors, from Sutrium, Nepet, and Falerii, advertised them, That the States of Tuscanie, were now consulting in their Diets, about a Treaty of peace: which was an occasion, that they turned all their preparations and forces into Samnium. The Consuls being gone forth, to the end they might have the readier provision of grain and,

Victuals, and the enemy be more to seek, which way they would assail them, led their Legions H into Samnium; Fabius, through the territory of Sora, and Decius by the way of the Sidicins. When they were come into the confines of their enemies, both of them spred themselves all abroad, and fell to forrage and spoil the country: yet so, as they sent out their espials farther than they wasted.
Whereupon, they were well aware of their enemies, as they lay in ambush well appointed, within a close and secret valley neer Tifernum; what way as they thought to take the vantage of the higher ground, and to set upon the Romans so soon as they were once entred in. Fabius having removed his carriages into a sure place, and set there a competent guard for defence, fore-told his souldiers that there was a battel towards: and in a four-square battaillon marched directly to the forsaid Embascado, where the enemies lurked and lay in wait. The Samnits then, despairing and I out of all hope to do any great exploit, by sudden tumult, considering their trains were discovered; and seeing they must once at the length come to the tryal in open field, were themselves also more willing to put all upon a set battel. Thereupon they descended into the plain and even ground, and committed themselves to the fortune of fight, with more courage of heart than hope of victory. But were it, that they had assembled together the whole flour and manhood out of all the Nations of the Samnits, or that the hazard of the main chance made them more hardy and take the better heart: surely even in plain field, they held the Romans play and put them to great fear. Fabius seeing the enemies no way to retreat and give ground, commanded M. Flavius and M. Valerius, two Colonels, with whom he had set forward and advanced into the forefront, to go to the Horsemen, and to exhort them, If ever they remembred and called to mind, that the K Common-wealth had been helped by the valour of the Gentlemen on horseback, they should that day endeavour to make invincible and eternal the glory of that degree and order of Cavalry. For seeing that the enemies stood unmoveable against the Infantry, there was no other hope but in the force of Horsemen: and here withal he called upon those two young Gentlemen, and plyed both the one and the other with like courtesy, one while praising them, another while loding them with fair and large promises. But when as the assay of that force likewise, prevailed not, thinking where strength would take no place, there craft was to be tryed and practised, he caused Scipio his Lieutenant, to withdraw out of the conflict, the javeliniers of the first legion, and as closely as he could to fetch about with them, toward the next hills: and then, to march up the hill some way from the sight of the enemies; and after he had gained the top, all of a sudden to L shew himself behind, and charge upon the enemies backs, whiles their faces were turned another way. Now the Horsemen, by the direction of those two Colonels, being ridden of a sudden before the standards, troubled their own fellows almost as much as the enemies. For against these troops and cornets of Horse that thus violently put forward, the Samnits battel stood unmoveable, and on no part could either be forced to retreat, or to break their array. The Horsemen when they saw this attempt to take no effect, retired themselves behind the ensigns, and departed out of the battel. Hereupon took the enemies more heart unto them; neither had the vanguard of the Romans been able to abide so long a conflict, and the violence of the enemies still encreasing, upon their own confidence, but that the second ranges in the middle ward, by the Consul his commandment, came forward into the front of the vanguard. Where they with their fresh strength, M slayed the Samnits, being now ready to enter forceably upon them, and to gain the ground: and withal, at the time appointed, the ensigns shewed themselves from the hills, and came down unawares to the enemies; and setting up a shout, not only daunted the hearts of the Samnits [but also encouraged the Romans.] For both Fabius cryed aloud, that his Colleague Decius approached, and every souldier for his part, what he might, with joyful and cheerful hearts, iterated, that the other Consul was come, and the legions were at hand. Which error and mistaking, as it turned to the good of the Romans, so it caused the Samnits to flie, and to be surprized with a fright, fearing and doubting nothing so much, as that being now overtoiled and wearied, they should be overcharged also with fresh and lusty forces, And for that in their running every way, they were scattered asunder, there was less slaughter than for the preparation of so great a victory. For 3400 N only were slain, and of prisoners were taken, welneer three hundred and thirty: and three and twenty bonners and ensigns won and carried away. The Apulians had joyned with the Samnits before the battel, but that P. Decius the Consul encamped against them at Maleventum, and having drawn them forth to fight, discomfited them. Where also there were more that fled, than died upon the sword: for not above 2000 Apulians were slain. And Decius making no reckoning of that enemy, conducted his legions into Samnium. Where, two Consular hosts, having over-run the country in divers parts, within five months space laid all wast and desolate. Five and forty places there were in Samnium, where Decius had encamped: and eighty six, wherein the other Consul had pitched. In which, they left behind them not only the marks of stakes, rampires, and ditches, but also many other more notable signs and tokens of the country wasted all about, O and utterly spoiled by them. Fabius besides, won the City Cimetra. Where there were taken prisoners two thousand and four hundred armed souldiers, and slain there were in fight upon 430.

From thence he went to Rome against the Election of new Consuls, and made all the hast he could to dispatch that business. And when as all the Centuries first called forth to give their suffrages named Q. Fabius for the Consul; then Appius Claudius a Consular man, and one of the Competitors, a grim sir, and ambitious by nature, laboured no more for his own honour and advancement,

A vancement, than to recover again unto the Patritii, both the rooms of the Conſulſhip, and employeda s well his own devoir, as alſo all the means and aſſiſtanc e of the Patritii and Nobility, to have himſelf choſen Conſul with Q. Fabius. As for Fabius, at the firſt, ſpake and alledged in his own be half; the ſame reaſons in manner which he had uſed the former year, and refuſed to be Conſul. The whole body of the Nobility ſtood about his ſeat, praying inſtantly, and entreating him to pluck the Conſulſhip out of the mire and baſe degree of theſe Commons, and to reſtore the ancient Majeſty both to the Magiſtracy it ſelf, and alſo to the Patritii and their houſes and families. Fabius after ſilence made, framed a middle and moderate kind of ſpeech, whereby he appeaſed and allayed their hot affection, promiſing and aſſuring them, that he would willingly ac-
B cept the names of two of the Nobility, if he might ſee, that they would create any other Conſul but himſelf: for at this preſent Election, he would in no wiſe admit himſelf, to be eligible and nominated Conſul, and give ſo bad a precedent to prejudice all courſe of law, for the time to come. So L. Volumnius, out of the body of the Commons, was created Conſul with App. Claudius, who likewiſe in the former Conſulſhip had been matched Colleagues together. The Nobility uſed to object unto Fabius, and reproached him, that he avoided App. Claudius to be his companion in government, who for eloquence and other civil parts was no doubt a ſingular and excellent man. When the Election was ended, the old Conſuls were commanded to war in Samnium, having their Government continued, and their commiſſion renued for ſix months. And ſo in the year following likewiſe, when L. Volumnius and Appius Claudius were Conſuls, P. Decius, C who being Conſul, had been left behind his Collegue in Samnium, ceaſed not now in quality and name of Proconſul, to waſt the country; until at length, when the Samnits would in no place abide battel, they were by him chaſed out of their own borders and limits. And thus driven out of the field, and excluded out of their own country, they went into Hetruria. Where, ſuppoſing that with ſo huge a multitude of armed men, they ſhould do that more effectually with intreaty and prayers, mingled with threats among, which by ſo many Embaſſages they had ſo oft attempted in vain; they called for a Diet and general Councel of the States and Princes of Hetruria.
"Which being aſſembled, they declared and ſhewed, for how many years ſpace they had main"tained war with the Romans in the right of their freedom; that they had aſſayed all means, if "haply they might have been able by their own puiſſance alone, to ſuſtain and ſupport the weight D "of ſo huge and important a war: that they had beſides made proof of the aids of other neigh"bour nations, but to little effect; that they had ſought for peace of the people of Rome, when "they were not able to wage war any longer: and becauſe peace was more grievous unto them "with that ſubjection, than war with their liberty, they had rebelled and made war again: and "now their only hope they had, remained in the Tuſcans: knowing well enough, that for men,
"munition, and mony, they were the mightieſt nation of all Italy; as having to their neighbours
"the Gauls, a people born and bred up in armor and war: by natural diſpoſition fierce and cruel,
"but eſpecially in any quarrel againſt the people of Rome: of whom they do (and not untruly re"port) that they were by them vanquiſhed and conſtrained to ranſome themſelves for gold.
"Now, if the Tuſcans were of that heart and courage, as Porſena ſometimes, and other their no-E "ble progenitors were: there were no doubt, but that they might diſſeize the Romans, and diſ-"poſſeſs them of all the ground on this ſide Tybris, and make them fight for the defence and pre-"ſervation of their lives, and not for the intollerable ſeignory and dominion of Italy. They ſaid
"moreover, that there was now come unto them an army of Samnits, well appointed and fur-
"niſhed with armour, and ſtored with pay and mony, who would follow them forthwith, even "to the aſſault of the City of Rome, if they would lead them.

Whiles they were thus braving, and gloriouſly boaſting themſelves, and preparing of war in Tuſcanie, the Romans war at their own dores, lay ſore upon them, and ſtung them at the heart. For P. Decius having learned by the eſpials, that the Samnits army was gone forth, and had taken their voyage, aſſembled a Councel and ſaid, What mean we thus to range over the fields, war-
F ring from village to village? And not rather aſſail the walled Towns and ſtrong Cities? There is no army now, that defendeth Samnium: gone they are out of their confines, and wrought their own exile and baniſhment. When they all had allowed of this motion, he led forth his power to aſſault the ſtrong City Murgantia. And ſo hotly were the ſouldiers ſet, both for the love they bare to their Captain, and alſo for hope of winning a richer pillage thereby, than by driving booties out of the country, that in one day by mere force of arms they won the Town. Where two thouſand and one hundred Samnits, fighting men, either fell upon the edge of the ſword, or were taken priſoners, with a great and rich booty beſides. But for fear that it ſhould ſurchage and encumber the army with heavy carriages, Decius cauſed his ſouldiers to be called together unto an audience, and thus to them he ſaid. "And will ye ſtand contented indeed with G "this victory only, and this prey? Or will ye build your hope ſtill, anſwerable to your proweſs
"and valour? All the Cities of the Samnits, all the ſubſtance and riches that lieth and remaineth
"in their Cities are yours for aſmuch as ye have in ſo many battels vanquiſhed their legions and
"at laſt driven them out of their own country. Sell theſe prizes, and with hope of gain draw
"after you chapmen and merchants to follow the army. I will from time to time ſtill help you to "wares and commodities for to ſell. Let us go from hence ſtreight to the City Romulea, where "your toil ſhall not be ſo great, but the ſpoil far greater. So when they had made ſale of their pillage, and willingly of themſelves called upon and exhorted their Captain to that expedition, to Romulea they go. Where likewiſe, without mure and platform, without warlike engines of H battery, ſo ſoon as they advanced their enſigns, and approached the walls, they could by no violence be driven from thence, but ſet up ladders in all haſt, at the next place that every man could find, and ſo ſcaled up the walls. Thus the Town was won and ranſacked. To the number of 2300 were ſlain, and 6000 taken priſoners. The ſouldiers having got an exceeding booty, were forced to ſell it, and make all away, as before: and from thence without any reſt at all given unto them were they led to Ferentinum, yet they marched thither with exceeding courage and cheerfulnes. Howbeit, there they found more difficult and perilous ſervice: for the walls were with all forcible means defended, and the place it ſelf was both by mans hand, and natural ſituation, ſurely fenced: but yet the ſouldiers now being fleſhed, and enured to ſpoil, overcame all difficulties. Three I thouſand men about the walls were ſlain: and the ſaccage fell to the ſouldiers ſhare. The greateſt part of the honor in aſſaulting and winning of theſe Cities, is aſcribed in ſome Chronicles to Fabius Maximus. For they write, that Murgantia was by Decius won, but Ferentinum and Romulea, by the conduct of Fabius. But ſome attribute the glory hereof unto the new Conſuls. And there are, that give the glory not to both, but to the one of them, to wit, P. Volumnius, unto whom befell the Province of Samnium.

Whiles theſe affairs thus went in Samnium (by whoſe leading and managing it skils not) in the mean time a mighty war was a preparing in Hetruria; and that, of many nations banded together: the principal author whereof was Gellius Egnatius a Samnit. The Tuſcans, in manner all, had taken arms and levied their forces, and the neer ſociety, cauſed alſo the people of Umbria adK joyning to take their part: beſides, Gauls alſo were waged for mony to aid: all which multitude aſſembled together, and met in the Samnits camp. The news of which ſudden and unexpected tumult, being brought to Rome; for ſomuch as P. Volumnius the Coſ. with the ſecond and third legions, and with 15000 confederats, was gone already into Samnium; it was thought good and determined, that App. Claudius with all ſpeed poſſible, ſhould go into Hetruria: and after him, two Roman legions followed, to wit, the firſt and fourth, with twelve thouſand allies; who encamped not far from the enemy. But more good was done there, in reſpect that they came thither betimes, (to the end that the fear of the Roman name might keep in awe certain nations in Hetruria, which already intended war) than for any exploit performed either skilfully or luckily, under the conduct of the Conſul. Many skirmiſhes there paſſed in places of diſadvantage, and at L times unconvenient; in ſo much, as the enemy took more heart, and conceived greater hope every day more than other: and now it grew welneer to this point, that neither ſouldier could well reckon of the ſufficiency of Captain, nor Captain truſt upon the loyalty of the ſouldier. In three ſeveral Annals I find, that Appius diſpatched his letters to his fellow Conſul, and ſent for him out of Samnium: howbeit, I am loth to ſet this down, being ſo uncertain as it is; ſeeing that the very Conſuls themſelves of Rome, who now the ſecond time were coupled together in one government, conteſted, and openly jarred about this point: whiles Appius denied flatly that he ſent any ſcript at all, and Volumnius again avouched, that he was ſent for by Appius his his letters. Volumnius by this time had won three Caſtles in Samnium, wherein were ſlain three thouſand enemies, and almoſt half ſo many taken priſoners: and compoſed beſides the ſeditions and quarrels M of the Lucans, which aroſe from the Commons and needy perſons; and that, with the exceeding good contentment of the chief and principal perſonages of the country, by the means and mediation of Q. Fabius the Proconſul, who was thither ſent with the old army. This done, he left Decius to waſt and pill the country of the enemies, and himſelf with his forces marched toward his Colleague into Hetruria. Who at his firſt coming, was received generally with all the joy that might be. For mine own part, I ſuppoſe verily, that as Appius had good cauſe to cary an angry ſtomack with him, in caſe his conſcience bare him witneſs, that he wrote not unto him: ſo again, if he had need of his Colleagues aid, he ſhewed an illiberal, unkind, and unthankful nature of his own, in that he would ſo diſſemble, and not be known thereof. For being come forth to meet him, before they had well greeted and ſaluted one another, How now, quoth he, O L. Volumnius, is all well? How goes the World in Samnium? What hath moved you to abandon and leave your own charge and province, and to depart? Volumnius made anſwer, that in Samnium all things went well and chieved proſperouſly, and that himſelf was now come, as ſent for by his letters: which if they were counterfeit, and that there were no need of him in Hetruria, he would preſently turn his enſigns, and be gone. Mary, quoth he, and good leave have you: you may be gone when you will, and no man holdeth you: and ill beſeeming it is, that you who peradventure are not able to wield and manage your own affairs of war, ſhould glory thus, and make your boaſt that you are come hither to help others. Hereat, Volumnius ſhould reply again and ſay, It is well, and God ſend us good luck: I had rather loſe my labour, than ought ſhould have happened, whereby one Conſuls army were not ſufficient to deal with Hetruria. Now as the Conſuls O were parting aſunder one from the other, the Lieutenants and Colonels of Appius his army, came and ſtood round about them both: "ſome requeſted their own General, that the aid of his Col-
"league which ought to have been accepted by them if it had been required; now that it was "offred ſo willingly, and of his own accord, ſhould not be refuſed and rejected. But the more
"part encountred Volumnius, as he was ready to go his way, and earneſtly beſought him not for "any froward contention, and debate with his companion, to betray the common-weal. For if "any overthrow or miſadventure ſhould happen, the blame would be imputed rather to the forſaker

A "saker than the forsaken: and now things were come to this pass, that the honor or dishonor of "the war in Hetruria, prove it well or ill, should fall upon L. Volumnius: for that no man would "enquire of the words and language that Appius gave him, but of the fortune and success of the ar"my: and albeit Appius had given him his farewel and pasport, the weal publick and the army held "him still by the sleeve, and for proof hereof, let him but make tryal of the souldiers hearts and "affections. Thus with remonstrances, perswasions, and hearty prayers to the one Consul and the other, they drew them both, in manner against their wils, to party in publick audience before the whole army. Where they grew to longer speeches and discourses, but to the same purpose and effect, as before in the hearing and presence of a few. Now when Volumnius (as having the better B cause) seemed to reply, and that with good grace & words enough, against that singular eloquence of his Colleague; and that Appius in trumping and taunting manner, gave out and said, That they were beholden to him, and might con him thank, that of a dumb and tongue-tied Consul they had one now, that was so ready and eloquent: and who in his former Consulship, and specially in the first months, could not open his mouth, and speak a word, was now of a sudden become an Orator, and able to make plausible and popular Orations: then replied Volumnius and said, "Would "God, with all my heart, you rather had learned of me to fight valiantly, then I of you to speak
"finely: and in conclusion, he said, he would tender him an offer, which should determine and put "out of all doubt, whether of them twain, were, not the better Lawyer and Orator (for at this "present the Common-weal stood not in need of such) but the better warrior and Captain Gene-C "ral. Whereas therefore, there are ii. Provinces, Hetruria and Samnium, it shal be in your choice
"(qd. he) to take one of them, whether you will, and I my self will with my own army, make war "in the other. Then began the souldiers to cry aloud unto them, that they would jointly enter "both upon the Tuscan war. Which consent and accord of theirs, when Volumnius had perceived,
"For asmuch (qd. he) as I have once mistaken and misinterpreted the will of my Colleague, I wil
"not in any case stand in doubt and be ignorant of your minds too: Let me know therefore by a "shout of yours, whether you would have me tarry or depart? Whereat they set up such a note, that it gave an alarm to the enemies, and raised them out of their camp: and presently they caught their weapons up, and came forth into the field. Volumnius likewise caused the trumpets to sound, and the standards and ensigns to be brought abroad. Then Appius (as it is reported) seeing plain-D ly that whether he fought or sate still, the victory would be ascribed to his Colleague, stood in a mammering and suspense for a while: but afterwards fearing, lest that his own legions also would follow Volumnius, gave likewise unto his men the signal of battel, which they so instantly called for.
But neither they, nor the enemies were well arranged and in good order: for both the leader of the Samnits (Gellius Egnatius) was gone a foraging abroad, with some few cohorts and bands with him; whereupon the souldiers rather of their own head, than by conduct and direction of Captains, began to charge: and also the Roman armies were not both lead forth together, nor yet had time enough to be marshalled accordingly: for Volumnius first gave the charge, before that Appius could come to encounter the enemies: whereupon, the forefronts were not equally matched together: and as if some fortune had exchanged the enemies, that they were wont to fight withal; E the Tuscans presented themselves to Volumnius and the Samnits who stayed awhile (for that their General was absent) affronted Appius. It is reported that Appius in the very heat of the skirmish, was seen in the front of the formost ensigns, to lift up his hands to Heaven, and pray in this wise,
"O Lady Bellona, if thou give us victory and the honor of this day then, be sure, I vow here unto "thee at this hour, a fair Temple. When he had thus prayed, as if the goddess had put life unto him, and animated his courage, both himself matched the valour of his Colleague, and his army answered the vertue of their Commander. For he performed the devoir and part (indeed) of a brave General. The souldiers likewise, for fear that the other army should begin the victory, endeavoured and streined all that ever they could; Whereby, they disarayed, discomfited, and put to F flight the enemies, who could not easily abide any extraordinary force and violence, more than they were wont to meet withal. And so with pressing hard upon them still that retreated, and chasing them hotly that were scattered in flight, they beat them into their camp. There, by the coming in of Gellius and the Sabellian bands, the battel for the time was freshly renewed. But when they also, within a while were discomfited, then was the camp assaulted by the conquerors. Thus whiles Volumnius for his part entred with banner displayed unto the very gate, and Appius ever and anon reiterated the name of Bellona the victress, and all, to set on fire and inflame the courage of his souldiers; there was neither trench nor rampier that could hold them back. So the camp was won and sacked, and a huge pillage therein found, which was given all to the souldiers. Seven thousand and three hundred enemies were slain, 2120 taken prisoners.

During the time that both Consuls, and the whole puissance of the Romans, were thus more G bent and imployed in the war within Tuscany; there were new forces raised in Samnium, to wast the marches of the Roman Dominion: who taking their way through the Vestins, into Campania and the country of Faleria, drave huge prizes and booties away. And as Volumnius by great journies returned into Samnium (for by this time Fabius and Decius were come to an end of their prorogued government) the bruit that was blown abroad of the Samnits army and their forraging of the territory of Capua, turned him out of his way, to the defence of his allies and confede-rats. So soon as he was entred into the country Calenum, both he himself saw the fresh marks and tokens of great dammage and desolation: and also the Calenians advertised him, that the enemies caried with them already so excessive a prey and booty, that they were scarce able for it to march in good order, and that their Captains began openly to speak and say, that the best course they could take, was presently to retire Samnium, there to leave their prizes and bootes, and so to return afresh to their rodes and make new expeditions; and not to commit an army, to laden and surcharged, to the fortune and hazard of a battel. Which words, albeit they sounded much to a truth, yet he thought it meet to look better into the matter, and to build upon a surer ground, and therefore he sent certain light Horsemen, to intercept some forragers as they straggled and were scattered one from another in the fields. By whom he learned, after much questioning with them, that the enemies encamped by the river * Vulturnus, and from thence at the * third watch, would set forward on their journey directly into Samnium. After he had sufficient intelligences and advertisements concerning these things, he dislodged and put himself upon his way and encamped so far from the enemies, as his approach by being too neer could not be known, and yet he might be able to surprise them as they should issue in disorder out of their camp. So a good while before day, he marched towards the enemy: and sent such as were well seen in the Oscian tongue, to listen and learn what they did. Who being intermingled with the enemies (which was an easy matter in that night garboil and confusion) they found that the ensigns were set forward, not sufficiently accompanied with armed men for defence; and that the whole pillage with the guard and convoy thereof, was now going forth, and marched carelesly, like a sort of vile and base lozels, every man thinking of his own particulars and running on his own head, without consent of others, and with little or no direction and government. This was thought the meetest time to set upon them: and now it drew neer day. Whereupon he commanded the trumpets to sound the charge, and set upon the march of the enemies. The Samnits, incumbred as they were, and pestered with their booty, and few of them here and there in armour, began, some of them to double their pace and to march faster away, and drive before them the booty: some stood still, and wist not whether they were better, to go on forward, or retire again into the camp. But whiles they thus trifled and stayed, they were environed and surprized by the Romans: and by this time they had gotten over their rampier: much killing there was, and confusion in the camp. The Samnits, as they marched, besides that they were troubled with the assault of their enemies, were also disquieted with the sudden escape and revolt of their prisoners: who being some of them loose, loosed also those that were bound: whiles others of them, caught up their weapons which were fastned to the packs, and being confusedly intermingled in the march, made a greater and more fearful garboil and havock, than the very battel of the enemies. And more than that, they performed one memorable and notable Act above the rest. For as Statius Egnatius the General, went about the ranks and files encouraging the souldiers to fight, they set upon him, scattered the Horsemen asunder, that accompanied him, environed him about, and took him as he sat on Horseback, and haled him to the Roman Consul. Upon which tumult and stir, the formost ensigns of the Samnits were called back, and the battel which in manner was done, now began afresh: yet could not they any long time resist and hold out. Slain there were about six thousand; two thousand and five hundred taken prisoners. Amongst whom, were 4 Colonels and 30 Ensigns: and (that, wherein the victors took contentment) of captives, 7000 and 400 hundred were again recovered; with an exceeding great booty which they had got from their allies: whereunto, by proclamation were called, all that could lay any claim, or pretend a right, to seize upon their own goods, and to receive the same by a day appointed. And look what parcels could not be owned or challenged by the true owner, was given away to the souldiers: who were compelled to make sale thereof, to the end, that they should not set their heart upon any thing but war.

This saccage of the territory of Capua, had raised great trouble and stir in Rome. And at the very same time also, it chanced, that there came news out of Hetruria, how that upon the withdrawing of Volumnius his forces out of those parts, all that country was up afresh in arms; that Gellius Egnatius the Samnit Captain, and the Umbrians likewise, were moved to revolt; and the Gauls also sollicited with great sums of mony. At this bruit the Senat being affraid, commanded an abstinence or vacation of term, and that all sorts of men should be mustered: and not only the free born natural citizens, and the flower of the youth were prest and sworn, but certain * companies also of the elder sort, yea, and bands of Libertins newly enfranchised, were inrolled by the hundreds. Likewise they sat in Councel about devising means for defence of the City: and P. Sempronius the Pretor, had the whole government of the State. But the Senat was partly eased and discharged of this care, by the letters of L. Volumnius the Cos. which gave intelligence that the forragers of Campain were defeated slain and put to flight. Thereupon were decreed in favour of the Consul, for this exploit by him atchieved, solemn processions, and the abstinence of term again was remitted, which had continued for eighteen dayes space: and the procession aforesaid, was right joyfully performed. Then began they to devise about garrisons for defence of the country thus wasted and overrun by the Samnits. And agreed it was, that two Colonies should be sent about the Vestin and Falern coasts: one to the mouth of the river Liris, which Colony was called * Minturnæ, the other in the Vestin forrest and streights, adjoyning to the Falern country; where Synope, a Greek Town sometime stood, and afterwards was called by the Romans there inhabiting, * Sinuessa. The Tribuns of the Com. had in charge to ordain by an Act of the common people, that P. Sempronius the Pretor should choose certain Triumvirs,

* Natarone, or Vulturno.

A virs, about the ſending and tranſlating of inhabitants into thoſe Colonies. But much ado they had to find thoſe that willingly yeelded to be inrolled Coloners, ſuppoſing indeed that they were ſent thither, not to inhabit Land and ground for their beſt behoof, but to lie in garriſon, and to ſtand upon their guard in thoſe frontiers, which were continually moleſted by warlike enemies. From the care of theſe affairs the Senat was withdrawn, by occaſion of the Tuſcans war, whereof the rumour daily encreaſed: and letters alſo came thick from Appius, who warned them not to neglect the riſing of that countrey: which letters imported, that four nations had united their forces, and banded themſelves together; to wit, Tuſcanie, Samnium, Umbria, and the Gauls: that they were already encamped in two places, for that one was not able to receive ſo great a mu.ti-
B tude. Upon theſe occaſions, as alſo for that the time drew neer of Election of Conſuls, Lucius Volumnius the Conſul was called home to Rome. Who before that he called the Centuries for to give their voyces, having aſſembled the people to an audience, diſcourſed before them at large, concerning the greatneſs of the Tuſcan war. "How that afore time, when he himſelf and "his brother Conſul warred there together, it was of ſo great importance, that neither one lea-"der, not yet one army was ſufficient: and by report, the Umbrians, and a mighty power of "Gauls were afterward combined unto them. So that they ſhould remember, that they were to "chuſe that day two Coſſ. againſt four Nations. As for himſelf, but that he was certainly per-"ſwaded and aſſured, that the people of Rome would with a general conſent declare him Coſſ. "who at that time, without all controverſie was counted the principal Captain and beſt leader of C "all others, he would forthwith nominat a Dictator. No man doubted, but the Q. Fabius was the man, who by the aſſent of all, was meant and deſtined to this charge: and him together with Volumnius, both the prerogative tribe, and all thoſe that were called firſt, every one, nominated to be Coſſ. Fabius made a ſpeech by way of excuſe, in ſubſtance, like as he had done before, two years together: but afterwards ſeeing he was overcome with the general agreement of the people, he framed it ſo in the end, that he required P. Decius to be his collegue: "Alledging, that he "would be inſtead of a good prop and ſtay to him in his old age: how he had found by expe-"rience in one Cenſorſhip and two Conſulſhips, born jointly together with him, that there was "no ſurety and defence of the Common-weal, to the concord and agreement of thoſe that are com-"panions in government. And to any other new Collegue beſides him, hardly could an old mans
D "mind ſort and frame. Alſo that he would and could more eaſily impart his mind and purpoſe to "one, whoſe humor, condition, and behavior, he had been already acquainted with. The Coſſ. himſelf confirmed his Oration, and accorded thereunto; as well, in regard of the commendable parts and deſerts of P. Decius, as alſo of the good that proceeded and enſued upon the managing of war-affairs, by the concord and unity of the Conſuls; and of the hurt which hapned and followed upon their diſagreement and diſſention: "and therewith he ſhewed how neer they were "of late to utter peril and deſtruction, through quarrels between him and his brother Appius; "admoniſhing Decius and Fabius both to live ſo, as with one mind and heart they affected and in-"tended the ſame things. He added moreover and ſaid, they were men of Action both, born for "war and to be ſouldiers; for martial feats renowned already: but for to maintain contentions
E "of words and quarrels of the tongue, altogether rude and unskilful, and ſuch natures, (ſaid he) "were fitteſt to make Conſuls. As for nimble heads and fine wits, deeply ſeen in points and "quircks of law, full of their eloquent tearms, ſuch as Ap. Claudius was; thoſe were meet to be "made Lord Preſidents of the City and chief Juſtices in the common place, for to ſit in judgment "of cauſes, and ſee the execution of laws. Thus in handling of theſe matters was that day ſpent. The morrow after, according to the Conſuls appointment, was the Election held, both of new Conſuls, and alſo of Pretors. Q. Fabius and P. Decius were created Conſuls, and App. Claudius Pretor, all abſent. And L. Volumnius by Act of the Senat, and grant of the Commons, had his government prorogued, and continued in his charge one year longer.

The ſame year were many ſtrange ſights and prodigious monſters ſeen: for the turning away F of the dangers foreſignified and menaced thereby, the Senat decreed ſupplications and Letanies for two dayes together. Wine and incenſe for the ſacrifices, was allowed at the publick charges of the City, and in proceſſion went both men and women in great number, with much reverence, to viſit the Holy ſhrines, and there to do their devotions. Theſe ſolemn ſupplications were more renowned and memorable, by reaſon of a contention that aroſe among the dames of the City, in the Chappel of Lady Pudicitia Patritia, which ſtandeth in the beaſt-market, by the round Church of Hercules. The Noblemens wives would not admit into that Chappel Virginia the daughter of Aulus, who, notwithſtanding ſhe was nobly deſcended from the race of the Patritii, yet had eſpouſed Volumnius the Conſul, a Commoner, and was married (forſooth) out of the family and ranck of the Patritii. Whereupon, there began ſome ſhort and cutted ſhrewd G words to be dealt between: and ſo (as women commonly are ſoon angry and ſet on fire) there grew to heart-burning and hot contention. Whiles Virginia alledged and ſaid that ſhe being a Gentlewoman and Patritia born, and a chaſt and honeſt Dame, was entered in the Chappel of Patritian Chaſtities: over and beſides, ſhe had not been noted for Bigamy; but was the wife of one only husband, unto whom ſhe was given and brought a pure maid: and as for her husband, and his dignities which he had born, his noble acts that he had atchieved, ſhe had no cauſe to complain, or be aſhamed, nay rather, ſhe gloried therein right greatly. After this, ſhe accumulated theſe magnificent and glorious words, with a generous and brave a deed. For in the long ſtreet where ſhe dwelt, ſhe ſet by and cut off a part of her dwelling houſe, aſmuch as would H ſerve for an Oratoy or pety Chappel, and there erected an Altar. And when ſhe had aſſembled the wives of the Commoners together, and had complained of the injurious dealing of the Patritian dames; "This altar (quoth ſhe) do I dedicate unto Pudicitia Plebeia: and all you here I exhort, "that with what emulation, the men our husbands, in this City contend about feats of valour "and arms, who may do beſt; ſo likewiſe the Matrons and wives ſtrive and excel in continence "and chaſtity; and that ye will labour and endeavour, that this altar may have the name to be "frequented, and reſorted unto, with more reverence and devotion, yea, and if (it be poſſible) of "more chaſt women, than that other of the Nobility. And ſo it fell out indeed, that from that time, this altar alſo had the ſame rites (in a manner) and ceremonies as the other, which was I more ancient: in ſuch ſort, as no wife, but of approved honeſty and chaſtity, and wedded but to one husband during her life, might be allowed there to ſacrifice and offer oblations. But this religious order and inſtitution, in lapſe and proceſs of time was prophaned afterwards and divulged, and the altar frequented by them that were ſtained and infamous, and not only by matrons of name and quality, but alſo by women of all ſorts and degrees, until at laſt through diſuſe it grew to be utterly forgotten, and came to nothing.

The ſame year the Ædiles Curule, Cn. and Q. Ogulius accuſed certain Uſurers, who were convicted, and their goods forfeit and confiſcat. And of that which came into the common cheſt, they cauſed to be made a braſen portal in the Capitol, and ſilver veſſels for to furniſh out three tables in Jupiter his Chappel: alſo the image of Jupiter himſelf in the Lantern or frontiſpice of the K Capitol, ſitting in his chariot drawn with four ſteeds. Moreover, at the Fig-tree Ruminalis, they erected and ſet up the images of the foundling babes, the firſt founders of the City, pendant at the teats of a ſhee-wolf. They paved alſo with ſquare ſtone, the cauſey and high way from the gate Capena, unto the Temple of Mars. The Ædiles likewiſe Commoners, L. Ælius Paetus, and C. Fulvius Curvus, of the forfeited mony which they levied of the graſiers or farmers of the City paſtures, who were condemned and fined, exhibited certain pageants and playes, and ſet up golden bolles in the Temple of Ceres.

After this, Q. Fabius the fift time Conſul, and P. Decius the fourth, entred their government, who now had been companions together in three Conſulats, and in one Cenſorſhip, men renowned, not more for the honor of their noble exploits in war, which was right great, than for L their loving agreement and concord. Which unity of theirs was not perpetual to the end; by occaſion I ſuppoſe, of the contention of the States that came between, rather than of any difference betwixt themſelves. For the Patritii laboured, that Fabius ſhould have the Province of Tuſcan extraordinarily: and the Commons were as earneſt with Decius to put the matter to a Lottery. Certain it is, that a great contention there was in the Senat. But afterwards, ſeeing that Fabius was able there to do more and make a greater ſide than his Colleague, the matter was brought again before the people. In which aſſembly, few words paſſed between the parties themſelves, being martial men both, ſtanding more upon deeds than words. Fabius gave out and ſaid;

Debate between Decius and Fabius for their Provinces,

"That it was an indignity, that another ſhould gather fruit under the Tree that he had planted.
"Alſo, that himſelf was the man, who had opened the way through the wood Ciminia, and had M
"given entrance and paſſage for the Roman war, through deſart and wild forreſts. What meant "they then to trouble him, a man of thoſe years, with this place of charge, in caſe, they minded "to give the conduct of this war to any other General but himſelf? No doubt, but by little and "little he upbraided them covertly and caſt in their teeth, for chuſing unto him an adverſary, and "not a companion in government: yea, and charged Decius, that he repented and envied the "good concord, wherein they had lived together, during the time of three Magiſtracies already. "Finally, he aimed and reached at no farther matter than this, but if ſo be, they thought him "worthy of the Province, thither to ſend him. For as he had been at the appointment and plea- "ſure of the Senate, ſo would he be at the ordering and direction of the people. On the other "ſide, P. Decius complained of the injury offered by the Senat: for that the Nobles had endea- N
"voured to their power, and done their beſt that no Commons might have acceſs to honourable "places and dignities: and after that proweſs and valour had got the upperhand, and prevailed "ſo, as even in thoſe kind of men vertue wanted not her due reward and honour; there were "means ſought, that not only the voyces of the people were deluded and made vain; but alſo "the very awards and arbitrements of fortune, were transferred to the wills and pleaſures of ſome "few. All Conſuls before him had their provinces by lot: and now the Senat by their abſolute "authority, without caſting lots, gave unto Fabius the charge of his province. If it be (ſaith he) "to honour the man: verily, he hath ſo well deſerved both of my ſelf and of the Common- "wealth, that I favour highly and tender the glory of Q. Fabius; provided alwayes, that it get "not a ſhining luſtre, by a foil of my diſgrace and diſhonour. And who will ever doubt, where O
"there is one difficult and dangerous war, and the ſame preciſely and abſolutly charged upon "one Conſul, without ordinary and lawful calling: but that the other Conſul ſtandeth for a "Cipher, and is reputed either needleſs, or good for nothing? As for Fabius, like as he gloried "in his ſervice and noble Acts archieved in Tuſcan, even ſo would Publius Decius alſo full fain "do the ſemblable: and peradventure, he ſhould be able to put out and quench that fire once for "all, which Fabius left behind him, ſo covered and raked up, as that oftentimes it ſuddenly brake "out again, and yeelded forth new flames and blazes. In concluſion, he could be content to

A "yeeld the titles of honour and all rewards of vertue unto his Collegue, in the reverent regard "of his old age, and majesty of his person: but for any hazard or jeopardy that might be pre"sented unto them, he neither at this time gave place, nor ever would (with his good will) to "him or any man else whatsoever; and if he gat no other good by this contention, yet would he
"obtain thus much at the least, that the people should hold their own, and dispose of that abso-
"lutly at their discretion, which was in their power; rather then permit the Nobles to gratifie
"any one therewith at their pleasure. And herewith he prayed Jup. Opt. Max. and all the im"mortal gods, that even as they vouchsafed to bestow upon him and his Collegue equal valour
"and happiness in the conduct of their war, so they would afford them one and the same right B "and authority and rule. For, surely it was in nature meet and reason, for example good and "profitable, and for the credit and fame of the people of Rome much material, that such should "be Consuls, as by either of their guidance and conduct, without exceptions, the war with the "Tuscans might be administred as it ought to be. Fabius then, having besought the people naught else, but that before the Tribes were called in to give their suffrages, they would hear the letters of App. Claudius Pretor read, which were brought out of Tuscany, departed out of the assembly. So the Province of Tuscany, without casting lots, was awarded unto Fabius, with no less consent of the people, then of the Senat. Hereupon all the younger sort (in manner) ran unto the Consul, and offered their service of themselves, and gave their names to be enrolled, so desirous were they to serve under that Captain. Which multitude being thus flocked about him
C round; Four thousand footmen (quoth he) and six hundred horse, and no more, am I minded to take up and levy. As many therefore, as to day and to morrow, will present themselves and give their names, will I accept of, and take with me: more care have I to bring you all home rich and wealthy, then to have numbers of souldiers to fight my battels. Thus went he forth with a competent Army well appointed, and so much more confident, and in hope of good success, by how much less he stood upon the great number; and directed his journey to the Town Aharna, where Appius the Pretor encamped, and from whence the enemy was not far distant. A few miles on this side, the fewellers or wood-purveiors, accompanied with a good guard of souldiers for their convoy, met him: who seeing the Sergeants going before, and understanding that it was Fabius the Consul, with joy and cheerful hearts, thanked God and the peo-
D ple of Rome, for sending unto them such a General. After this, when they came all about the Consul to salute and welcome him, Fabius demanded whither they went? who answered, To purvey wood and fewel. Say ye so? (quoth he) and have ye not your camp empaled and fortified? Yes, cried they all, and that with a double rampart and ditch, but yet are we in exceeding fear. Then (quoth he) ye have wood and timber enough. Go ye back again, and down with the trench and pallisade. Who returned into the camp, and as they were plucking up the rampart, they gave the alarm both to the souldiers that tarried behind in the camp, and to Appius himself, and made them afraid. Then every man said to one or other as they came, that it was by the expres commandment of Q. Fabius the Consul that they did so. The morrow after they removed the camp; and Appius the Pretor was dismissed and sent away to Rome. After which time, the E Romans abode no where in standing camp: for he said, it was not good and commodious for an army to make abode in any one place; but that it was better and more wholsom both for the agility and health of their bodies, to have a running camp, to be ever marching, and changing the air and the soil. But their journeys were no other, then the winter would permit, which was not yet past.

In the beginning of the Spring, Fabius having left the second legion at Clusium, which in old time was called Camars, and appointed L. Scipio Pro-pretor, to be governor of the camp, he returned himself to Rome for to consult about the war: were it of his own accord and motion, because it appeared evidently in view of eye much greater then it was reputed before; or that he was sent for by order from the Senat: for there be writers that affirm both the one and the other. Some F would have it thought, that he was called back again by Appius Claudius Pretor, who both at the Councel Table in the Senat House, and also before the body of the people (like as he had continually done by letters) enforced the fear and terror of the Tuscan war, saying, that one General and one Army, were not sufficient to make head against four Nations: that it would be dangerous and doubtful, whether they jointly in one body gave battel unto one, or maintained war apart in divers quarters: that one man was not able to perform and mannage all at once. As for himself, he had left behind him two Roman Legions and no more, and with Fabius there were come not full five thousand in all, of horse and foot together. His opinion therefore was, that with all speed, P. Decius the Consul, should go to his Collegue into Tuscany, and L. Volumnius have the charge of Samnium in the mean time. But in case the Consul had rather go in-G to his own Province, then he advised, that Volumnius took his way directly with a full and compleat Consular army into Tuscany, to the Consul. When this discourse of the Pretor had moved a great part of the House, then P. Decius spake (by report) to this effect: That all should be left entire and free to the disposition of Q. Fabius, until such time as either himself in person (if it might stand with the weal-publick) were come to Rome, or sent one of his Lieutenants by whom the Senat might be enformed, and truely understand the poyse and importance of the war in Tuscany; what forces were requisite, and how many Leaders and Captains were expedient and needful. Fabius, so soon as he was returned to Rome, both in the Senat-House, and also in the audience of the people, held a middle course in all his speech; that he might seem neither to encrease, nor yet to diminish the rumor of the war: and in assuming to himself another Captain, he pretended, that he condescended thereunto, in regard of other mens fear, more then for his own safety, or for any danger that the State was like to incur. Howbeit, if they would allow him a coadjutor and companion in war, how might he forget P. Decius the Consul? of whom he had so good proof and experience in so many Magistracies, which they had born and administred together. Of all men in the world he loved none better, and would make choice of no one sooner: and having P. Decius with him, he would never think his forces too few about him, nor his enemies too many before him. But if perad venture the mind and heart of his Collegue stood otherwise, his request was, that they would give him L. Volumnius to be his assistant. The determination of all was referred over to Fabius, both by the people and Senat, and also by the Consul himself. And when as Decius shewed and testified, that he was ready to take a journey either into Samnium or Tuscany, there followed such a joy and gratulation of all men, as if they had conceived in their spirit a victory afore-hand, and even now, had decreed for the Consuls, not a doubtful war, but a glorious triumph. I find in some writers, that Fabius and Decius, presently upon the entrance into their Magistracy, went into Tuscany, without any mention of casting lots for their charges and provinces, or of the contention between the two Collegues, which I have set down. There be some again, who having laid abroad these debates, stayed not there, but over and besides have added a surcease of matter, touching the invectives of Appius before the people, against Fabius in his absence; as also the obstinate stubbornness of him being Pretor, against the Consul, to his very face: moreover, another contention and variance between the two Consuls; whiles Decius endevoured to bring about, and was instant that each one should keep him to his own Province allotted unto him, and hold it. But all writers agree in the course of the history, from the time that both Consuls went out to war, and so forward.

But before that the Consuls arrived in Tuscany, certain Gauls called Senones, came with a great power before Clusium, ready to give assault unto the Roman Legion and the camp. But Scipio, who was left Governor thereof, thinking it necessary to help out the small number of his men, by advantage of the ground, led his army up to the hill between the town and the camp. But (as it falleth out in such sudden cases) he had not discovered aforehand the wayes and passes all about; but inconsiderately went forward, and engaged himself up to the top and pitch of the hill, which the enemy was master of already, by another side. Thus was the legion assailed on the back and beat down, and thus was it enclosed and environed round by a multitude of enemies, and put to the sword. Some writers there be who report, that the whole legion perished there, so as not one escaped alive to carry tidings. Also, that the Consuls who now were not far from Clusium, had no news brought them of this overthrow, before the horsemen of the Gauls were in sight, who carrying the heads of them that were slain, some hanging before at their horse poitrels, others sticking aloft upon their lances, braved and triumphed, singing and chanting songs of joy, after their manner. Some write that they were the Umbri and not the Gauls, and that the defeat and massacre was not so great: also that when the forragers for the camp under the leading of L. Manlius Torquatus a Lieutenant, were compassed about by the enemy; then Scipio the Pro-pretor came forth of the camp to succour and rescue them, and that the Umbrians who first had the better, afterwards when the battel was renewed, suffered the foil and were overcome, and that as well their prisoners as their booty was taken from them. But more probable it is, that this overthrow was given by the Gauls, then the Umbrians; for that as divers times afore, so that year especially the City was frighted with the tumults and risings of the Gauls. Upon this defeat, over and besides, that both the Consuls were gone to war with four legions, and a great power of Cavalry of natural Romans, and a thousand horsemen of Capua, chosen out of purpose for that war, and sent unto them, with a greater power also of Allies, and of Latins then of Romans; there were two other armies not far from the City of Rome, opposed to frontier and make head against Tuscany: the one in the Falisian territory, the other in the Vatican. Cn. Fulvius and L. Posthumius Megillus, both Pro-pretors, were commanded to keep a standing camp in those parts. But the Consuls by this time, having passed over the mountain Apenninus, were come to the enemies within the country of the Sentinats. And there about four miles off, they sat them down and encamped. Then the enemies, after much consultation, resolved in the end upon this point; not to be intermingled all in one camp, nor come into the field and hazzard all their forces at once in one battel: But that the Gauls should take the Samnits unto them, and the Umbrians join with the Tuscans. The day of the battel was appointed. The Gauls and Samnits had the charge to maintain the fight: and in the time of battel the Tuscans and Umbrians were commanded to assault the camp of the Romans. But these their designs and purposes were altered by reason of three Clusin fugitive traitors, who by night stole away privily unto the Consul Fabius, and disclosed the intents and enterprise of the enemies: who were sent away with rich rewards, to the end that every hour, upon new plots and devices that should be determined by the enemies, they would give them an inkling and certain intelligence. The Consuls write unto Fulvius and Posthumius, that the one should advance and come forward with his army, out of the Falisian country; and the other out of the Vatican directly unto Clusium: and that with all their forces, they should overrun and destroy the enemies country. The rumor of these rodes & invasions, caused the Tuscans to remove out of the

Sentinat

A Sentinat territory, to the defence of their own frontiers. Hereupon the Consuls made speed to strike a battel in their absence. And for two dayes space they skirmished continually with the enemy, and challenged him to the field: but for those two days, no worthy deed of importance was atchieved. A few on both sides were slain, and hereby were their courages rather provoked, and their stomacks whet to a full set battel then any trial or hazard made of the main chance. Upon the third day into plain field they come with all their power. When both armies stood ranged in battel array, there fortuned a Hind to be chased out of the mountains, and to run away before a Wolf, even through the midst of the plains between both armies: then, parted both these wild beasts asunder the Hind took her way to the Gauls, and the Wolf his course to the Romans. The B Wolf had way given him through all the ranks and files: but the Hind was killed among the Gauls. Then a Roman souldier, one of the forefront, who was to fight before the Ensigns: There will the flight (quoth he) there will the slaughter be, where you see the beast sacred and dedicated to Diana lie dead: but here on this part, the martial Wolf, consecrated to Mars, having with victory gone clear away safe and unwounded hath put us in mind of our martial Nation and of our first founder, the son of Mars. The Gauls put themselves in the right wing, the Samnits in the left. Against the Samnits, Fabius marshalled the first and third Legions, in the right point: and Decius, C the fifth and sixth in the left, affront the Gauls. For the second and fourth served in Samnium under L. Volumnius Pro-consul. At the first shock and encounter, the battel was so indifferently fought, and with so equal force, that if the Tuscans and Umbrians had either shewed themselves in the field, or assailed the camp, the loss and overthrow must needs have light in either place, whereas they had bent their forces. Howbeit, although hitherto the conflict of battel went equal and indifferent, and that as yet fortune had not determined, which way she would encline and give the victory; yet they fought not alike, in the right and left wings. For the Romans under the conduct of Fabius, rather warded the enemy warily, and stood upon their guard, then offered to charge lustily: so as they maintained fight, and drew it at length until it was very late in the evening, because the Captain was enformed and perswaded of the Samnits and Gauls both, that being as they were in the first skirmish very hot and furious, it was sufficient to keep off at length and at staves end. As for the Samnits, their courages would abate and fail, by any long conflict and the bodies of the Gauls, (who of all other can least away with travel, & heat especially) would turn all to D sweat, & melt away: who at the beginning fight more fiercely then men but in the end more faintly then women. Against that time therefore when the enemy used to fail & give over, Fabius had kept his souldiers in breath & reserved their strength fresh & lusty. But Decius being very eager & hot by reason of his youth and courage of heart, laid on lustily at the first, and spent upon the enemies all the force & vigor he had: and for that the Infantry seemed to fight but coldly, he set the Cavalry a work: and himself personally in the thickest throng and troop of most valiant and hardy Knights, exhorted and besought the formost gallants of those lusty youths, to join with him & to charge upon the enemy: saying that they should carry away a double honor if by the means of the men of arms, the victory began at the left wing. Twice they forced the Gauls horsemen to turn side and back; but when as they were engaged farther within, and were now fighting hard pell mell a-E mong the squadrons of the horsemen, they beheld a new and strange kind of fight, which troubled and terrified them. For the enemies standing all armed upon chariots & wagons, with a great noise of their steeds, and rumbling of the wheels, ran full upon them & mightily affrighted the horses of the Romans which had not been acquainted with such uncouth & strange noises. So the horsmen who had the upper hand before, & were at point of victory, were now with a foul fear discomfited and scattered, as if the hideous furies of hell & the divel himself had been amongst them. Whereupon they fled suddenly & not looking before them were overthrown both men & horse. By this occasion the ensigns of footmen were distressed & disordered, and many of those that were ranged in the front before the ensigns, were by force of horse & wagons driven cross through the battaillons, troden under foot and their guts squashed out. Herewithal the battaillons of the Gauls foot-F men, seeing their enemies thus scared followed on apace, & gave them no time of breathing. Decius cried out aloud to his men. Whither flie ye? Or what hope have ye to save your selves by flight? Decius opposed himself against them that retreated and fled: Decius rallied those that were disbanded and scattered: but seeing that by no force or means he could stay them thus amazed & astonied as they were; he called upon his father P. Decius by name, and said: Why do I stay any longer the fatal death that is destined to my house & name? "It is given to our race & family, to be sacrifi"ced in lieu of propitiatory sacrifices for to assoil & save the publick weal from dangers menaced
"& threatned unto it. Even now therfore, will I offer the legions of the enemies to be sacrificed
"with my self to Dame Tellus and other infernal gods. When he had spoken these words, he commanded M. Livius the high Priest (whom as he marched into the field, he straightly had charged G not to depart from him) for to pronounce and say that form of words, whereby he should devote, offer, and betake himself to death, together with the legions of the enemies, for to save the army of the Quirits and people of Rome. Which when he had done by the same form of prayer and in the same habit wherein his father P. Decius at the river Veseris, in the war against the Latins, caused himself to be offered to death: and besides these solemn prayers, added moreover these words:
"That he drave before him Fright Flight Murder, Massacre Bloodshed, Ire and Wrath of gods in "Heaven & fiends in Hell: and that he would with deadly maledictions and execrable curses smite
"the ensigns, weapons, and armors of his enemies: and that one and the same place, should give

" both himſelf, and alſo the Gauls and Samnits together with him, plague, perdition, and deſtru- H " ction. After theſe curſed, horrible, and deteſtable ſpeeches againſt his own perſon and his enemies; look where he ſaw the thickeſt ranks of the Gauls, thither he ſpurred his horſe, and rode in amongſt them: where amidſt the pikes, javelins, and ſwords, he was preſently ſlain. Then could it hardly be ſeen, that the battel was any longer fought by power and help of man. The Romans ſo ſoon as they had loſt their Captain, (which at all other times is wont to ſmite a terror into them) ſtayed their flight, and were willing and contented to renew the battel afreſh. The Gauls, and eſpecially that troop which ſtood about the Coſ. his body, fared as though they had been out of their wits, flang their darts from them (I know not how) to no purpoſe, and in vain: ſome of them ſtood ſtill, as it were benummed, forgetting both to run away, and to fight ſtill. I But on the other ſide the high Prieſt Livius, with whom Decius had left the ſerjeants, and whom before his death he nominated and ordained to be Propretor, cried out, as loud as he could, that the Romans had the victory, and by the death of the Coſ. were acquit and excuſed from all other fatal danger: but as for the Gauls and the Samnits, they were deſtined and forfeited (as it were) to mother Tellus and the infernal ſpirits. And now Decius (quoth he) haled after him, and calleth to follow him, the army that with him was devowed, curſed, and offered: now all the enemies are full of furies and fearful fright. Then, as theſe aforeſaid began the skirmiſh again, behold there came unto them, Cornelius Scipio, and C. Martius with a ſupply of ſuccours from the rereward; who by commandment of Q. Fabius the Conſul, were ſent to aid and reſcue his Collegue. Where they heard of the worthy end of P. Decius, a noble example to encourage them to adventure all K hazards in the ſervice of their country and Common-weal. Therefore, when as the Gauls ſtood cloſe and thick together, oppoſing their targets before them, ranged and joined one over another featherwiſe, ſo, as to deal with them affront, and to cope together at hand ſtroaks, was thought a difficult and dangerous matter; then, by the commandment of thoſe two Lieutenants, the darts and lances which lay ſtrewed upon the ground, between the two armies, were gathered up, and flung againſt the pavoiſade or tortuſe-ſenſe of the enemies targets aboveſaid. And by reaſon that theſe javelins and ſpears light and ſtuck faſt, ſome in their targets, and ſome in their very bodies, it hapned that their knot was broken, and the battaillon (as huge and cloſe as it was) disbanded, in ſuch ſort, as many of them, notwithſtanding their bodies were untouched and unhurt, fel down aſtonied one upon another. Lo how fortune altered the caſe, and changed all in the left wing of L the Romans. But in the right, Fabius (as is beforeſaid) at the firſt, lingered and drew on the day: but afterwards, when as he perceived, that neither the enemies ſhouts, nor their manner of giving charge, nor yet the darts and javelins which they lanced, had the ſame vigor and force, as before; he commanded the Captains of the horſemen to wheel about with their Cornets, and to flank the Samnits, that upon a ſignal given, they might charge them overthwart with all the violence they could, whiles his own Legionary footmen by little and little advanced forward, and brake the ranks and diſordered the enemy. When he ſaw once, no reſiſtance made, and that without all doubt, they were wearied and out of breath: then he gathered together all his ſubſidiary companies of the rereguard, which he had reſerved until that time and buſineſs, freſh and in heart: and at once, both ſet forward the Legions, and gave the horſemen alſo a ſignal to ſet upon the ene- M mies. But the Samnits could not endure this violent charge, but ran as faſt as ever they could to recover the camp faſt by the battaillon of the Gauls, leaving their fellows behind them in fight, to pay the reckoning. The Gauls having likewiſe made a target-fenſe, ſtood thick and cloſe together under it. Then Fabius advertiſed of the death of his brother Conſul, commanded a wing or Cornet, to the number almoſt of 500. horſemen of Capua, to withdraw themſelves out of the conflict, to caſt about and to play upon the backs of the Gauls: after whom, he cauſed the Principes of the third Legion to follow; and whereſoever they eſpied the ranks of the enemies by force of horſmen diſordered and broken, there, to ſecond them, and preſs on ſtill, and kill them whiles they were in diſarray, and afraid. Himſelf vowed a Temple to Jupiter Victor, together with the ſpoils of his enemies. Which done, he advanced ſtraight forward to the camp of the Samnits. Thither N all the multitude of them were driven in great fright and diſarray. And for that the gates were not able to receive ſo great a multitude, crouding together, they that were kept out, and could not get in, by reaſon of the throng of their fellows, began again to fight under the rampart. Where Gellius Egnatius, the General of the Samnits was ſtrucken down and ſlain: after this, the Samnits beaten within their rampart, were killed every one, and their camp after ſmall reſiſtance won. The Gauls behind their back were environed and cut in pieces. That day were ſlain of enemies five and twenty thouſand, and 8000 taken priſoners. Howbeit, this victory coſt the Romans blood; for of P. Decius his army, there died 7000. and of Fabius, 1200. Fabius then having ſent out to ſeek out the body of his Collegue, gathered up all the ſpoils of the enemies into an heap, and burned them, to the honor of Jupiter Victor. But that day could not the Conſul his body be ſeen, by O reaſon it was covered and hidden under heaps of the Gauls that lay there dead. The morrow after it was found and brought again with many a tear of all his ſouldiers. Then Fabius ſetting all other matters for the time aſide, ſolemnized the burial and funeral obſequies of his fellow Conſul, with due commendation and condigne praiſes, and with all honor that could be deviſed.

In Tuſcany alſo about the ſame time, Cn. Fulvius Propretor, had fortunat ſucceſs to his hearts deſire: for beſides great damage done to the enemy, by invaſions & rodes into the country, he fought

alſo

A also a notable battel: wherein of Perusins and Clusins were slain above 3000, and twenty en signs won. The Samnits, as they fled through the territory of the Pelignians, were by them intercepted and enclosed; and of five thousand, they were left but one thousand. Great is the fame of that day, and of the battel that was fought in the Sentinate territory, if a man hold him only to the truth, and make no more of it than it was. But some have overreached a little, and written, that the enemies were 40330. foot, and 4600. horse strong: also, that they had a thousand charriots or waggons, reckoning and comprising the Umbrians and Tuscans withal: who also (as they say) were at the battel. And to encrease also the power and forces of the Romans, they report, that L. Volumnius Propretor, was a Commander, together with the Consuls, and that his army B was joined with the Legions of the Consuls. But I find in most Chronicles, that this victory was atchieved by the two Consuls only. Volumnius in the meantime warred in Samnium; and having forced and driven the army of the Samnits, to take the hill Tifernum, nothing afraid for the disadvantage of the place, discomfited them, and put them to flight. Q. Fabius, having left the army of Decius behind him in Tuscany, reduced his own legions into the City, and triumphed over the Gauls, Tuscans, and Samnits. His souldiers followed him in his triumph, who in their rude military rhimes and songs, celebrated no less the brave and noble death of P. Decius, than the worthy victory of Quintus Fabius. And they revived the memorial of his father late deceased, comparing him in equal degree, for the issue and event, as well publick as privat, with the praises of his son. Of the booty and pillage gained from the enemies, the souldiers had given unto C them * 82 Asses apeece, with a livery cloak, and coat: a good reward for a souldiers service in those days. * 2 sh. 7. d ob. sterl.

For all these notable victories atchieved; yet neither the Samnits nor the Tuscans were at quiet. For, both the Perusins began to rebel, so soon as the Consul had away his army: and also the Samnits came down to forrage and poil into the territory of Vestin and Formianum, and another way into Esetrunium, which lie along the river Vulturnus. Against them was Appius Claudius the Pretor, sent with Decius his army. And Fabius in Tuscany, which began new war, slew four thousand and five hundred Perusins, took prisoners 1740. who were ransomed for * 30. Asses a piece. The rest of the spoil was all bestowed upon the souldiers. The Legions of the Samnits being pursued hard at heels, partly by Appius Claudius Pretor, and partly by L. Volumnius Proconsul, met D all together in the territory of * Stella. Where both the Samnit Legions abode, and also Appius and Volumnius joined and encamped together. There was a sharp and cruel battel fought on both sides. The Romans were incensed with anger and choler against those that had so often rebelled: the other, upon a desperate mind were resolute to hazzard the utmost. So there were slain of the Samnits, 16300; 2700. taken prisoners, and of the Romans there died two thousand seven hundred. * 46 sh. 10 d. ob. sterl. * Territorio Carilono.

This year so fortunate in war, was by reason of pestilence much afflicted; and for certain prodigious tokens, ful of care and perplexed. For it was reported, that in divers places it rained earth: and that in the army of Appius Claudius, there were many smitten & blasted with lightning. In regard hereof, the books of Sibylla were perused and sought into. The same year Q. Fabius Gurges, E the Consul his son, fined and punished by the purse, certain wives who had been convicted and condemned before the people, of Adultery: of which money so raised by their fines, he caused to be built the Temple of Venus, which standeth neer the Cirque or Race.

There remain yet behind certain wars of the Samnits, whereof we have now continued our history in these four books, for the space of six and forty years, ever since that M. Valerius, and Au. Cornelius were Consuls, who were the first that warred in Samnium. To let pass therefore, and not to trouble the readers, with a prolix narration of the alternative overthrows given and received between both nations so many years one after another, for all which calamities and losses their hearts and courages could not be daunted or conquered: the very last year, the Samnits, in the Sentinat country, in the Peligns territory, at Tifernum, and in the territory of Stella, were de- F feated both by themselves, with their own legions, and also mingled with others; and that, by four armies, and four Roman Captains; lost the bravest and most noble General of all their nation; saw their confederates and allies in war, the Tuscans, Umbrians, and Gauls, in the same predicament as themselves, not able to stand and maintain their estate any longer, either by their own power, or with help of forraign forces; yet for all this, would they not abstain from war, so little weary were they of defending their liberty, although it were unfortunately: choosing rather, to be vanquished, than not to attempt the winning of victory. Who is he, that would not think it irksom, and tedious, either to write or read this long suit and train of wars, which they in fighting were never wearied?

After Q. Fabius and P. Decius, succeeded Consuls L. Posthumius Megillus, and M. Attilius Re- G gulus. To them both, was committed charge of Samnium, for that the bruit went, that the enemies had prepared three full armies, the one to go again into Tuscany, the second to invade and over-run afresh the territory of Capua, and the third to defend their own frontiers. Posthumius by reason of sickness remained at Rome, but Attilius went presently with an army forth, to the end that he might surprize the enemies on a sudden in Samnium, before they had taken the field; for so the Senat had given direction: and he found the enemy in the way to meet him, as if it had been so of purpose before by them determined, ready there to keep him from entrance: and so far off were they from wasting the lands of the Samnits, that they could not once enter into their confines; nay, the Samnits debarred them from departure thence, into the peaceable parts H and territories of their allies. Now when as they were encamped affront one against another; that, which the Romans being ſo often conquerors, would hardly have adventured, (ſee how utter deſpair driveth men to raſh projects and extremities) the Samnits attempted: even to give aſſault upon the Romans camp. And albeit this ſo ventrous enterpriſe ſped not well in the final effect, yet was it not altogether in vain attempted. There chanced to be a foggy miſt, which continued a good part of the day, ſo thick and palpable, as men could not ſee before them, I ſay not, ſo far as without the trench, but not ſo much as thoſe that came cloſe to ſpeak one to another. The Samnits hereupon taking the advantage fit for an ambuſhment, before it was full day light, and the ſame much overcaſt and dim with the miſt, came as far as the Corps de guard of the Romans, I who in the gates and entrance of the camp warded but negligently: being thus taken on a ſud-den, they had neither courage nor ſtrength enough to reſiſt. At the back-ſide of the camp, they aſſaulted the great gate Decumana, ſeized the Queſtors pavilion, and that quarter about it: where the Queſtor himſelf (L. Opimius Panſa) was ſlain, and thereupon the alarm was given. The Coſ.

being with this tumult raiſed, commanded two bands or cohorts of allies, to wit the one of Lucanians, and the other of Sueſſans, which haply were next hand, to defend and guard the Prætors pavilion, and that quarter. In the mean while he marched with the legionary bands along the high broad ſtreet in the camp, called Principalis, and before they had buckled and fitted their armor about them, they were ranged in battel array; and had knowledge of the enemy, by the ear and ontcries, rather then by the ſight of the eye: neither could they give an eſtimate what K number they were. At the firſt, as doubtful of the event, and miſtrutting their fortune, they retreated, and received their enemies in, and let them come even into the midſt of the camp:
but then the Conſul cried out, and asked, Whether they meant to be turned out of their own ramparts and holds firſt, and after have a new piece of work to aſſail and win them again? So, they ſet up a ſhout, and put all their might together, and firſt made reſiſtance only and kept their ground: but afterwards they ſet forward, and preſſed upon them: and having once beat them back, they drave them afore them; with the ſame fear, that they themſelves began, yea, and chaſed them out of the gate and the trench: but to proceed further, for to purſue the chaſe, they durſt not, for fear of ſome ambuſhment, by reaſon of the miſty and troubled weather, contenting themſelves with the ſaving of their camp and no more: and ſo they retired within their ram- L parts having ſlain to the number welnear, of three hundred enemies. Of Romans, as wel thoſe that were in the firſt Corps de guard and Sentinels, who kept the watch, as of thoſe that were ſurpriſed about the Queſtors lodging, were killed 230. This bold adventure of the Samnits ſpeeding ſo well, made them take better heart; ſo as they would not permit the Romans to encamp farther into the Country, no, nor ſo much, as to go a forraging into their territory: whereupon they were compelled to retire again, and to purvey forrage in the quiet and peaceable quarters of their friends about Sora.

The bruit of all theſe occurrents more troubleſome and fearful then truth was, being come to Rome, cauſed L. Poſthumius the Coſ. before he was well recovered of his ſickneſs, to take the field: but ere he departed the City, he proclamed the Rendezvous at Sora, for his ſouldiers there to M meet. Himſelf now dedicated unto the goddeſs Victoria, the Temple, which in the time of his Curule Ædileſhip he took order to be built, with the money raiſed of certain fines taken of per-ſons condemned. Then took he his journey to the army, and ſo went forward from Sora directly into Samnium, to the camp of his brother Conſul. But the Samnits diſtruſting themſelves, as not able to withſtand two armies, were diſlodged, and departed back: and the Conſuls alſo parted one from another, ſundry ways, to waſte the country, and aſſault the towns. Poſthumius at his firſt coming, aſſayed by meer force to aſſail the town Milionia, and ſeeing he could do ſmall good that way, at length by rolling trenches and platforms, he approached cloſe to the walls, and wan it: and albeit the town were thus forced, yet there continued a ſharp and long booty and pillage. From thence, he led forth the legions to Ferentinum, but the inhabitants with their bag and baggage, and all that ever they could drive or carry, had quit the town in the ſtill night ſeaſon, and departed in great ſilence at a contrary poſtern gate, which opened from the camp of the enemy. The Conſul ſo ſoon as he was come, at the firſt approached the walls, as well appointed and provided of all things, as if he ſhould have found as much to do, as at Mi-lionia: but afterwards, perceiving all ſilent and deſolate throughout the City, ſeeing neither men nor munition within the towers and upon the walls; he held back his ſouldiers, deſirous and greedy to enter upon the bare walls, ſo abandoned and diſfurniſhed of defence: and doubting to O fall headlong ere he were aware, into the trains of ſome hidden and privy ambuſh, he commanded two Cornets of the Cavalry of Latine confederates, to ride about the walls about the coun-terſcarp, and well to view and conſider all places. The horſemen finding one or two gates neer together ſtanding wide open, and in the very ſame ways that led from thence, the freſh tracks and footing of the enemies, as they fled by night; rode ſoftly neerer and neerer to the gates; and there they might ſee ſtraight afore them ſafe entrance, and the City lying open even from one end to the other: whereupon they brought word back to the Conſul, that the City was abandoned, and the enemies

A enemies gone: which was very evident and apparent, as well by the very ſolitude thereof, as the new and freſh marks and traces of their diſlodging and departure; as alſo by the ſtuff and goods that lay here and there ſcattered all abroad, whiles they haſtned fearfully in the dark, to take their flight. The Conſul upon this report, with his hoſt drew to that ſide of the town, which the horſemen were at: and pitching down his enſigns not far from the gate, commanded five other horſemen to enter into the City; giving order, that when they had gone forward a pretty way, three of them ſhould ſtay behind in the ſame place, if they ſaw all ſafe and out of danger; and the other two, bring him word what they had ſeen and found. Who being returned, made relation that they were gone ſo far as they might ſee about them every way into all parts, & could perceive
B nothing but ſilence and vaſt deſolation all about, both far and neer: then forthwith, the Conſul entred the City, with certain cohorts lightly appointed, and charged the reſt in the mean while to fortifie the camp. The ſouldiers being once entred, fell to break open the doors: where they found a few ſilly old folk, and ſome feeble and diſeaſed perſons, with ſuch moveables as were hard to be conveighed and tranſported: thoſe they rifled, and ranſackt; and by certain captives they underſtood, that divers other towns thereabout, were all with one accord fled and gone: and as for their own countrymen, they departed at the firſt watch of the night, and they thought no other verily but that in the reſt of the Cities, they ſhould find the like emptineſs and ſolitude. And as the priſoners ſaid, ſo it proved indeed: and the Conſul poſſeſſed himſelf of thoſe forlorn and abandoned towns.

C The other Conſul M. Attilius, had ſo eaſie war for his part: who as he was marching with his Legions toward Luceria, which he heard was beſieged by the Samnits: the enemy encountred and met him in the very entry of the frontiers, and gave him battel: and the anger and indignation on both parts, but the end and iſſue more heavy and dolorous on the Romans ſide: both becauſe they were not uſed to be vanquiſhed; and alſo for that in the very looſe and retreat, rather then in combat and skirmiſh, they found that many more were hurt and ſlain of their part. Which fearful ſight and terror, as it began in the camp, if it had ſurprized them in the conflict, it would have been an heavy day with them, & no doubt they had received a notable overthrow. And even then, being as it was, they had a careful night, and full of anguiſh, thinking verily that the Samnits would preſently aſſault their camp, or at leaſt wiſe that in the morning betimes they D muſt of neceſſity fight with the conquerors. But the enemies, as their loſs was leſs, ſo their heart and courage was never the more: For ſo ſoon as the day brake, deſirous were they to be gone without any battel. Howbeit there was but one way, & that lay cloſe and neer to their enemies; which they were not ſo ſoon entred into, but they made ſhew a far off, as if they marched ſtraight to the aſſault of the camp. The Conſul commanded his men to arm, and to follow after him without the ramparts. To his Lieutenants, Colonels and Captains of the Allies, he gave ſeveral charges to do as he thought needful and requiſite. They all promiſed to execute any direction whatſoever; but they ſaid withal, that their ſouldiers hearts were done, that they had watched and ſit up all night, amongſt the grievous wounds and uncomfortable groans of them that lay a dying: and no doubt if the enemy had come before day againſt the camp, ſo daunted were they, that they E would have abandoned their colours: and even now for very ſhame and nothing elſe, they forbare indeed to run away, but otherwiſe their hearts were gone, and they clean ſpent. The Conſul hearing this, thought good to go about himſelf in perſon, unto every one of his ſouldiers, and to ſpeak unto them: and even as he met with any of them, and ſaw them ſo backward, and going about ſo coldly to take arms and weapon in hand; he checked and rebuked them: crying aloud, and aſking why they ſat ſtill? why they loitered and made ſuch delay? ſaying, that the enemies would come to them within the very camp, and cut their throats, unleſs they made more haſte to ſally forth: yea, and forced they ſhould be to fight before their tent doors, if they would not give battel without the trench and ramparts. They that are armed (ſaith he) and will fight manfully, ſhall obtain undoubted victory: but the unarmed and naked man that attendeth the enemies coming,
F muſt either die for it, or endure captivity. As he rated and rebuked them in theſe tearms, they anſwered flatly again; that they had enough of yeſterdays work, and were utterly done; and had neither ſtrength nor blood left them in their bodies: and now the enemies (ſay they) ſeem more in number then they were the day before. Amid theſe ſpeeches the army approached: and being now but a little way off, they might take a full view of them more certainly, and ſee every thing. Whereupon they ſaid confidently, that they ſaw the Samnits to bring with them their ſtakes and pales to caſt a pallaiſado, no doubt, round about their whole camp. At this, the Conſul cried out upon them for very ſhame, to ſuffer ſo foul a reproach and diſgrace of a moſt daſtardly enemy. "And ſhal
" we be (quoth he) beſet and empaled within our own camp, there to die for hunger and famine
" with ſhame, rather then by edge of ſword (if there be no other remedy) with honor, like men?
G "The gods ſpeed us well (quoth he) and their will be done; and do every man as he thinks beſt:
" as for M. Attilius the Conſul, he is reſolved even himſelf alone (if no man elſe will follow) to " meet the enemy in the face, and rather be beaten down and die amongſt the Samnits enſigns,
" than ſee the Roman camp beſieged with a trench caſt, and rampart raiſed about it. The Lieutenants, Colonels, and all the bands and Coronets of the Cavalry, yea, and the principal Centurions of the formoſt companies liked well of this, and accepted the Conſul his words. Then the ſouldiers for ſtark ſhame, full faintly take weapon in hand, and as ſlowly, God wot, go forth of camp. And thus in long ranks and files; not cloſe uninted together but broken here and there, with heavy cheer, and as men half vanquiſhed already, they marched after a ſort toward the enemy, who was neither in hope nor in heart better reſolved and ſetled then they. For ſo ſoon as the Samnits diſcovered the Roman Standards, ſuddenly from the vanguard to the rereguard, there went a muttering and bruit from one to another, that the Romans were come forth (the only thing they always feared) to empeach and ſtop their paſſage, ſo as now there was no way for them to fly and eſcape from them, and ſave themſelves, but muſt either die in the place, or ſlay their enemies and make a land even over their bodies. All their packs and fardels, they caſt together upon an heap in the midſt: and being armed as they were, every man ranged and marſhalled themſelves in their own arrays. Now was there a very little ſpace between the two armies, and they ſtood looking one upon another, waiting when their enemies would begin to give the firſt charge, and ſet up the firſt ſhout. But neither of both had any ſtomack to fight. And ſurely on both ſides they had gone ſundry ways untouched, and without any blows given or taken, but that they feared both, leſt if they had diſmarched of one part firſt, the other would have come upon them. Thus of themſelves they began a faint fight, as unwilling and loath thereto, with an uncertain and unequal ſhout: neither ſtirred any man one foot. Then the Roman Conſul, to begin the skirmiſh, ſent out ſome few Cornets of horſmen from a ſide, without the battaillons: wherof the moſt part fel from their horſes, and others were diſarrayed and put out of order: whereupon both Samnits ran out to kill thoſe that were fallen, and Romans alſo to reſcue their fellows. Then the skirmiſh began a little to wax hot: but the Samnits advanced forward in greater number far, and beſtirred themſelves (as it ſeemed) more luſtily: and withal, the Roman horſemen being diſordered and in confuſion, with their horſes affrighted trod under their feet the footmen that came to reſcue. Who beginning once to flie, cauſed the whole Roman army alſo to turn their backs. And now the Samnits played upon the backs of the Romans, as they fled: whereat the Conſul rode before a gallop to the camp gate, where he beſtowed a good corps de guard of horſemen, oppoſite in the way: and made proclamation, that whoſoever came toward the camp, were he Samnit or were he Roman, ſhould be taken and uſed as an enemy. With theſe and ſuch like threats, he put himſelf againſt the ſouldiers, that marched ſo faſt in heaps to the camp. Whither away ſirrah, (quoth he to every ſouldier that he met) even here ſhalt thou find men in arms to fight withal; here ſhalt thou meet with thine enemy, as well as in the field behind: no entring here into the camp without victory, ſo long as thy Conſul liveth: chuſe therefore whether thou hadſt rather fight with thy own countrimen or thine enemies. Whiles the Conſul entertained them with this welcom, the horſemen alſo with ſpear in reſt, and bent full againſt them, came all about, charging the footmen upon their peril to turn again to battel. Thus not only the Conſul his vertue and proweſs ſerved in good ſtead, but fortune alſo went on their ſide: for the Samnits followed not the chaſe ſo hard, but that the Romans had both time and ground enough to turn about their enſigns, and to direct their battaillons from their camp againſt the enemy. Then one encouraged another to go to battel again. The Centurions ſnatched the banners out of the bearers hands, and advanced them forward: declaring to their ſouldiers, how few the enemies were in number, and how diſorderly and out of all array they came againſt them. In this while the Conſul lift up his hands to heaven, and with a clear and audible voice, vowed a Temple to Jupiter Stator, if ſo be the Roman army ſtayed their flight, and by renuing the conflict ſhould kill and vanquiſh the Samnits Legions. Hereupon endevoured they on all hands, the Captain and ſouldier, both horſemen and footmen, to re-enforce the battel. And even the very gods from heaven ſeemed to have a ſpecial regard of the Romans at that time, ſo quickly the dice turned, and the enemies were repulſed from the ramparts, and within a ſmall while forced again to the very place where the battel began. Where by reaſon of their fardels and packs which they had heaped together in the midſt, and now lay in their very way, they were ſtopped in their very paſſage, and for fear leſt their goods ſhould be rifled and ſpoiled, they caſt a ring round about their bag and baggage. Then the Roman Infantry afront, and the Cavalry behind, compaſſed them, and charged upon them right fiercely: where in the midſt between, they were either ſlain or taken. The priſoners were in number 7300. who were all put naked under the yoak, and ſold: the number of them that were ſlain was about 4800. The Romans for all this had no great liſt to boaſt and brag of their victory, for the Conſul taking view and account of his loſs theſe two days, found by computation, that he miſſed 7300.

Whiles theſe things thus paſſed in Apulia, the Samnits with another power, aſſayed to ſurprize and get again Interamna, a Colony of the Romans: ſituate upon the Latine high-way: but when they could not be maſters of the town, they overran and plundered the territory: and having got a good booty of men, women, and cattel, one with another; whiles they were driving the ſame before them, together with certain Coloners whom they had taken priſoners, they light upon Conſul as he returned with victory from Luceria: where they not only loſt their ſpoil, but were themſelves ſlain as they marched diſorderly in long files. The Conſul made proclamation, That every man ſhould repair to Interamna, for to own and challenge his own goods, and to receive the ſame again: and there, leaving his army, went to Rome, againſt the Election of new Magiſtrates. When he laboured inſtantly for a triumph, he was denied that honor; both for that he had loſt ſo many thouſands, and alſo becauſe he had put his captives under the gallows, and ſold them, without farther impoſition.

The other Coſ. Poſthumius, wanting ſubject matter of war to work upon among the Samnits, paſſed

A paſſed with his army into Tuſcany: and after he had firſt pilled and ſpoiled the Volſinians territory, he gave them battel not far from their walls, who iſſued forth to defend their frontiers; where there were 2200. Tuſcans ſlain: the reſt, by reaſon that the City was ſo neer, eſcaped and ſaved themſelves. Then led he his army into the territory of Roſellum, where he not only laid the fields waſte, but won the town alſo: took priſoners above two thouſand, and ſlew under two thouſand before their walls. Howbeit, in that year, the peace obtained in Hetruria, was more honorable and renowned then the war had been. For three of the ſtrongeſt and moſt puiſſant States, even the very Capital Cities of Tuſcany, to wit, Volſinii, Perufia, and Aretium, deſired accord. And having conditioned with the Conſul, and promiſed, to find his ſouldiers clothing and corn, ſo they might B have leave to ſend Orators to Rome to treat for peace, obtained at length a truce of forty years. And for that preſent, each City was fined to pay * 500000 Aſſes. For theſe acts done, the Conſul having requeſted triumph of the Senat, for manner and faſhion, rather then upon any hope to ſpeed; and perceiving ſome of them to deny him flatly, as pretending that it was ſo lateere he departed the City; and other ſome, for that without order and direction of the Senat, he paſſed out of Samnium into Tuſcany: and that partly his adverſaries, & partly the friends of his Collegue, who might take ſome comfort and contentment, that he alſo had the repulſe with him, were againſt his triumph: My Maſters (quoth he) you that are Senators of Rome, I wil not be ſo far mindful of your honor and majeſty, as that I will forget my ſelf to be a Conſul: and by vertue of the ſame authority of commiſſion, wherewith I have conducted and managed theſe wars; for ſo much C as, I have happily brought them to end, and ſubdued Samnium and Tuſcany, atchieved victory, and obtained peace; triumph I will, and ask you no leave. And with that he departed out of the Senat. After this, there aroſe a debate and diſſention among the Tribuns of the Commons. Some of them ſaid, they would enterpoſe their negative, that he ſhould not in this manner triumph, and give ſo ill a precedent. Others gave out, that they would aſſiſt him in his triumph, maugre the heads of all their Collegues. After much ado, the matter was referred unto the people, and the Conſul being thither called, alledged, that L. Horatius, and Mar. Valerius Conſuls, alſo Caius Martius Rutilius of late days, even the father of him, who then was Cenſor, triumphed without the authority and approbation of Senat, only by the ordinance of the people. Over and beſides, he added and ſaid, that himſelf alſo would have moved the people therein, but that he knew that the D Tribuns of the Commons, who were become vaſſals and ſlaves to the Nobles, would have nipped and croſſed the bill. As for himſelf, he proteſted, that he did and would account of the will and favour of the people, agreeing together, as well as of all their Acts and Decrees whatſoever. So the morrow after, by the aſſiſtance of three Trib. banded againſt the oppoſition and negative voices of ſeven, yea, and againſt the general reſolution of the Senat, he triumphed: and all the people with great joy ſolemnized and celebrated the honor of that day. But the records do vary much about the acts and affairs of this year alſo, Claudius writeth, That Poſthumius having won certain towns in Samnium, was after in Apulia diſcomfited and put to flight: and that himſelf in perſon being hurt, was with ſome few beſides, driven to take Luceria for refuge: and that it was Attilius, that fought in Tuſcany, and triumphed. Fabius contrarily reporteth, That both Conſuls
E warred in Samnium, and at Luceria: and that one of the armies was tranſported into Tuſcany: but which of the Conſuls had the conduct thereof, he hath not ſet down withal: alſo, that before Luceria, there were on both parts many ſlain: and how in that battel, there was a Temple vowed to Jupiter Stator, like as Romulus had done before in times paſt: howbeit, before this time, there was no Temple erected, but only a Fanum, [i. a place pronounced, deſtined, and conſecrated before to build a Temple on.] But in this year at laſt, the City being now twice bound and obliged to perform one and the ſame vow, made a conſcience of it, and moved the Senat to decree and take order, that the houſe and temple aforeſaid ſhould be edified accordingly.

After this year, there ſucceeded a brave and noble Conſul, L. Papyrius Curſor, as well in regard of his fathers glory, as his own reputation. Alſo a mighty great war, and ſuch a victory as never F any General wan the like at the Samnits hands before that day, but L. Papyrius againſt the Conſuls father. And as it fell out, they made the like preparation for war, with the ſame endeavor and furniture of moſt coſtly and brave armor, as before time. Moreover, they uſed the help and favor of the gods beſides, by a ſtrange kind of induction and inſtitution of the ſouldiers, binding them to take their oath, after an old ceremonial cuſtom, as if they were to take orders in ſome holy myſteries; yea, and levied muſters throughout all Samnium, after a new form of a law and edict: That whoſoever of the younger ſort and ſerviceable men, fit to bear arms, ſhewed not themſelves, and gave attendance at the Generals appointment and proclemation, and whoſoever departed without his leave and licence, his head ſhould be forfeit unto Jupiter as accurſed and damned. Which done, the Rendezvouz was appointed at Aquilonia, for all the forces to aſſemble. Where there
G gathered together, to the number of forty thouſand fighting men, even the whole flower and manhood of Samnium. There, about the midſt of the camp, was a plot of ground ſet out, well fenced and enclоſed all about with hurdles and boords, and the ſame covered all over with linnen cloaths: the place was two hundred foot ſquare, every way. Then there was a ſolemn ſacrifice celebrated and divine ſervice ſaid, according to an order read out of an old book made of linnen, and the ſame by a certain Prieſt, one Ovius Paccius, a very aged man: who avouched, that he fet theſe ſacred and holy ceremonies from the old ancient Religion of the Samnits, according to the manner and cuſtom, which in times paſt their anceſtors had uſed, at what time as they complotted
